Her next position was in a well-managed, amply provided house, where the occupation of the husband, who was seldom at home, even at nights, remained a mystery to her. She liked the place fairly well, at the beginning. The seven-year-old girl who was entrusted to her care was pretty, confiding, and clever. The mother on some days hardly left her room, while on others, she remained away from home from early morning until late at night, and seemed, in a way that was totally incomprehensible to Theresa, to be absolutely indifferent and unconcerned about her child. But she treated Theresa with friendliness. This cordiality continued to grow, and gradually took on a form which at first filled Theresa with suspicion, then with disgust, and finally with fear. Like an escaping prisoner, she left the house, one morning, following a night during which she had been compelled to keep her door securely locked. She wrote to the master of the house from the station, where she was taking the train to Ensbach for a few days' stay, explaining that a sudden indisposition of her mother had compelled her to leave unexpectedly.

Her next position, as governess of two bright boys of seven and eight, was made untenable by the behaviour of the master. She pretended at first not to understand his significant glances and seemingly accidental contacts with her body, especially since the relationship between the man and his young and still pretty wife seemed to be entirely harmonious. Soon, however, Theresa could no longer ignore the intentions of this man, who in other respects did not displease her. She was obliged to confess that she could not, or would not, long be able to resist his advances. Then, one evening, when his wife and children were in an adjoining room, he made a deliberate attempt to overpower her — an attempt which inspired Theresa with more fright than resistance, but once more necessitated her sudden departure.

LII

NEXT, SHE ACCEPTED what at first appeared to be an excellent position. The employment agent who procured it for her looked upon it as such an unusual opportunity that he expected to receive a special compensation for securing it. The head of the household, Emil Greitler, a bank director, and a man over fifty, was gracious and respectable, and almost diplomatically reserved in his deportment. His wife, an unattractive and faded lady, clung to him with unreciprocated love, and looked up to him with admiration. They had four children. Theresa had nothing to do with the two oldest boys, one of whom studied law and the other, banking. The thirteen-year-old girl and the youngest child, a boy of nine, attended the public schools and in addition, had so many private instructors that Theresa's duty was limited to accompanying the children on their way to and from their lessons and taking them for walks.

Theresa desired to be on terms of greater intimacy with the young girl. But, like her father, whom she also closely resembled in features, she was unapproachable, and responded coldly to Theresa's sympathetic advances. This, at first, annoyed Theresa. She changed her tactics, and was even more severe with the girl than she really cared to be. At last, there developed between them an attitude of complete indifference, which was broken on but rare occasions, either because of a silly and ludicrous fit of temper on the part of Margaret, or of some stubborn decision on the part of Theresa. These episodes would direct their attention again to their former, almost forgotten, half unconscious battle. The nine-year-old Siegfried was a happy child, unusually clever for his age, whom Theresa often had to scold for his talkativeness, but whose droll notions and quaint turns of speech moved to laughter all who heard him. This position left Theresa plenty of leisure, but her employers did not like her to leave the house for any great length of time. Although her services were required only rarely, they wished her to be available at all times. Although there were often small or large parties at the house, Theresa was never invited to join them.

Towards the end of Carnival, in 1902, a large ball was planned. Frau Greitler, who was somewhat ill, depended much on Theresa for assistance in her preparations for this event. Consequently, she could hardly fail to invite her to participate in the festivities. After the music had begun, Theresa was invited to dance by a young man with a small blond moustache. The young masters of the family, the law student and the bank clerk, as well as other guests, also danced with her; but the blond young man came again and again, and chaffed with her in an animated and somewhat familiar manner.

A Lieutenant of Dragoons poured her out a glass of champagne at the buffet, and drank to her health. A dark, curly-headed fellow, with a light wound on his forehead, who had quite shamelessly pressed her to him while dancing, but had hardly spoken a word to her, dared about three o'clock in the morning, to make such audacious advances that she blushed deeply and could make no response.

The blond young man asked her quite frankly if he might not see her again. She denied his request. Still, for several days following the ball, she entertained the hope that she might somehow meet him on the street. And when, a few weeks later, some mention of him was made by the Greitlers at table, she became aware that, at thought of him, her consciousness was oppressed by a sort of disillusionment, not so much on account of this neglected tryst of which he had known nothing, as because of the many other painful and inexplicable deflections which her hopes had suffered in the past few years.

As the Greitler family were invariably a few days late in paying her her salary, Theresa hardly noticed that a full month had passed since she had last been paid. But when, on the first day of the next month, nothing was forthcoming and she stood in need of money, she felt compelled to speak to Frau Greitler. She was asked to be patient for a few days; and, as a matter of fact, she soon received the greater part of her pay. This would have satisfied her, had not the maid, on the same day, asked her how much they still owed her. It was by no means her habit to allow herself to discuss her employers with the hired help. This time, however, she could not resist the temptation; and she soon learned that the Greitler family was in debt on all sides; that, for example, the caterer's bill from the last dance was still unpaid. Theresa could not and would not credit this. Everything in the household continued without change. The family were still served well. They still ate the very best. They still received guests. Their carriage still stood before the house. The ladies ordered their summer dresses from a first-class dressmaker, just as before. Even the mood of Herr Greitler showed no modification. He still retained the same aloofness toward his wife and children, and never displayed a sign of haste or impatience. At dinner, they would discuss the question of selecting a summer resort, and not a single sign or word suggested that any considerable change in their circumstances was imminent.

One day, however, Herr Greitler left on a trip, as he frequently was in the habit of doing, bade his family a pleasant farewell, as usual, and promised to return within ten days. Even during his absence, not the slightest unusual event troubled the household, until, early one morning, voices and movements in the hall awakened Theresa. She sat up in her bed and listened. Two hours later, the maid informed her that Frau Greitler had unexpectedly been called away. At dinner, the eldest son told them of the sudden illness of a distant relative. But before evening, Frau Greitler returned, deathly pale and looking as though she had been weeping profusely. They could not longer conceal what had happened. The evening papers published the news. The bank had failed, and Herr Greitler had been arrested that morning while on a train, two hours distant from Vienna. Frau Greitler told Theresa that she was at liberty to leave the house at once. But she asked for permission to remain until she had found another position.

It was remarkable to her how quickly the members of the family adapted themselves to their changed circumstances, although at first hardly any change could be detected. They ate as well as before; the children continued to go to school; Margaret remained as stubborn as usual; Siegfried continued to make his droll remarks; the teachers appeared at the usual hours; and there was no lack of company, although among them were many who had not been there before.

When Theresa left the house Frau Greitler, who in these difficult days had exhibited an altogether unsurmised spirit of calm and strength, wished her the best of luck. The remaining salary, of course, was not paid.

LIII

THERESA WAS COMPELLED to take the first reasonably good position offered to her. In her new place of employment, she had to take care of three entirely untrained children, between six and ten years of age, who gave her nothing but trouble. The father was an insurance agent, who did not come home until evening, and then was invariably in a bad temper. The mother, a dull, stupid, and apparently phlegmatic individual, would scream two or three times a day at the children, and quarrel with each child as it approached her. She soon began to treat Theresa as a common servant. Frequently too, she would sink into a sort of lethargy, from which neither household duties nor the clamours of the children could arouse her, so that the whole responsibility of the household would devolve upon Theresa's shoulders. She tolerated this existence for two months; then she gave notice, and left for Ensbach.

It was not merely the reaction, the weariness of feeling, which Theresa experienced after the excitement of the last few months; it was also a sudden desire, not entirely untroubled by qualms of conscience, that drove her now to her Franz. She had concerned herself too little about him in the last three years; she had hardly taken any interest in his growth and education. She tried to justify herself by telling herself that she had lacked the time; that on her free days, she was too exhausted physically and spiritually, to make the journey to Ensbach. Although this might be true, to a certain degree, she felt nevertheless that generally her desire to see her boy had not been too keen. Indeed, at times, when the weeks of separation lengthened, she had sometimes felt the small payments which she made to Frau Leutner as an unwelcome burden.

She would excuse herself on the supposition that Franz's love for his foster-mother was greater than his affection for herself; that he was gradually becoming a peasant child; and that, at certain times, he recalled, in a disturbing way, the hated features of his father. But of late a certain consciousness of guilt repeatedly attached itself to these ideas, and she felt as if she were under an obligation to expiate a wrong done to her boy. She felt as if the weakness and irresolution of her maternal instincts would be avenged upon her and upon the boy. It was with such thoughts that she approached the Leutner's farm, with a trepidation such as she had not experienced for a long time.

She felt a sudden fear of finding her boy ill. For, in fact, she had received no news of him in almost three weeks. Perhaps he did not care to know her any more; perhaps he would say to her:

"Why do you come back, again and again? I do not need you any more!"

She burst into tears, when she saw him run joyfully out to meet her. How gladly she pressed him to her heart, as though now she had won him back for ever! Even Frau Leutner seemed to her more friendly than usual. Frau Leutner was much disturbed by Theresa's worn appearance, and advised her most earnestly to remain in the country, at least until autumn. Theresa felt herself physically and spiritually so fatigued that she acquiesced in this proposal at once. Within a few days, her improvement was marked.

She derived more joy from her boy than she had had in a long time. This time, all his strangeness seemed somehow to have disappeared. He voluntarily joined her on her short walks, a thing which he had never done before, and for the first time, she noticed that his face was frank and open.

A few months before, he had begun to attend school; and his teacher, to whom she once spoke, termed him a bright and active child. Frau Leutner had had to provide various necessities for him. Theresa was behind in her payments and could not defer them any longer. For the first time, she felt compelled to ask her mother for assistance. The money did not come for some time, and as the days passed, the behaviour and disposition of Frau Leutner, and particularly that of Herr Leutner, toward Theresa gradually became less cordial. After a second call for help, she received from her mother a sum so meagre that it did not enable her to fulfil all of her obligations. Theresa paid a portion of her debt. The attitude of the Leutners thereupon became more and more disagreeable, and Theresa realized that she could not remain any longer in Ensbach. So on a frightfully hot August day, hardly ten days after her arrival, she departed again for Vienna, determined to accept the very first position which might present itself.

LIV

THE TWO GIRLS, of four and six years, who were entrusted to Theresa's care gave her much worry, particularly as the mother was employed during the day in an office, and did not come home until late in the evening.

The father was ostensibly on a business trip, but as no letters ever came from him, Theresa soon quite clearly perceived that he had deserted his wife, who was a bluff, uncharming creature. The youngest girl was sickly. She was perpetually restless at night, which, however, did not seem to disturb her mother, who slept in an adjoining room. When Theresa once spoke of the child's condition, and suggested that it might be advisable to consult a physician, she assured Theresa with some curtness that she knew her duty perfectly well. One word led to another, and Theresa gave notice that she would be leaving her position. She had not realized before that she might be grieved at parting with the small, sickly little girl, but such proved to be the case. For some time to come, she would be thinking of the pale, pathetic face of the little creature and of her smile when, at night, she would throw her small arms about Theresa's neck and cry, and Theresa would comfort her. She did not want to go back to Ensbach until she was in a position to pay off her small indebtedness, and as she did not at once find another position, she decided to stay at a small hotel. She had never lived in a more miserable, forsaken place. She slept without undressing. Unfortunately, too, it rained constantly during these days when she was running up and down a hundred stairs in her fruitless efforts to find a new position.

She did not wish to be too hasty in her decision, this time. She preferred to take her time, and get on meanwhile as best she could, rather than again enter a house where she could not be certain of remaining. It happened that in many homes, where she herself made a good impression and where she would have gladly stayed, she noticed that she was refused because of her shabby clothing. What should she do? Should she turn again to her mother, and be made to receive grudging charity? Should she call upon her brother, with whom she had had no connection of any kind for years? Should she beg for assistance from some of the ladies for whom she had previously worked? All these ideas were repulsive to her. And furthermore, she did not know whence she might reasonably expect really adequate assistance.

That night, as she lay, fully dressed, on the wretched bed, she conceived the idea, which she had once thought of years ago, in a similar situation, of selling herself. She thought of it as of something indifferent to her personally, yet difficult to achieve. Was she still a woman? Did she feel even the slightest desire to lie in the arms of a man?

The miserable existence which she led, as a creature who did not belong to herself, who had no home, who was a mother, but, instead of caring for her own child, was compelled to protect and train the children of strangers; a creature who did not know where she would repose tomorrow night, who went about for a day amid the experiences, the affairs, and the secrets of strange people, as a chance confidante, or as one purposely initiated, only to be thrown out on the sidewalk as an inconsiderable intruder the very next day — what right had such a creature as she to the love of a man, to womanly happiness?

She was alone, and fated to a solitary existence. Was there still any creature to whom she might cling? Her child? Her mother's heart was numbed, as was her whole soul, her body, and everything in it. Even her beauty — she had never been really beautiful — her appearance then, and her youth, were gone. She felt how her lips were drawn into a tired smile. She was twenty-seven years old. But was it not too soon to relinquish all hope? She remembered the Greitlers' ball, which had occurred only a short time ago, where she had made so many conquests in a single evening.

In the quiet and darkness of her room, while the raindrops pattered ceaselessly against the window pane, she became suddenly conscious, beneath her shabby coat and miserable clothing, of her body, of her skin, and of her throbbing arteries. She became more conscious of them than she had ever been before, even in a lukewarm bath or in the arms of a lover; this was a long-forgotten sensation.

On the following morning, she awoke from a pleasant dream, the details of which she could not recollect. In this mood, with a sudden access of courage, she dared to visit a ladies' tailor whom she knew. She was approached with great friendliness. She apologized for her somewhat shabby appearance, by saying that she had lost her trunk. At her request, they made her, within twenty-four hours, a plain, well-fitting costume, without insisting upon immediate payment. She started out on her search anew. God, how often, how often, had she done that already! But this time, she went with renewed courage.

LV

THE NEXT DAY, she found a desirable position, in the home of a professor's widow, where it was her duty to supervise the education of two quiet, flaxen-haired girls of ten and twelve years, who were not attending a public school this year, on account of their health. The good treatment which Theresa received in this house, the pleasant and agreeable conversation which prevailed there, the simple and obedient natures of the young girls, and the friendliness of the mother, who was still mourning her late husband's death — all these pleasant circumstances at first delighted her. Even the teaching proved an interesting occupation, since it was entirely confided to her hands. She began again, as she had done while at the Eppichs', to prepare herself for her lessons, thereby refreshing her knowledge of many things, and recovering many interests which she had thought were lost to her. She was readily permitted a vacation at Christmas time, and at once went to Ensbach, where she enjoyed the company of her boy as she had never done before. Yet, she could not explain, even to herself, what it was that drove her back to the city during the early afternoon of her second holiday.

As she sat at the simple dinner that evening with the widow and her two children, silent, as usual, while the others thought with melancholy of the deceased head of the family, a sudden, disturbing sense of monotony overcame her. She began to feel a dull hatred against these people, into whose sorrow she, a stranger, was thus irresistibly drawn.

She had, of course, learned often enough that no one took the slightest cognizance of her spiritual condition; that people would weep or laugh with equal indifference to her presence. But she had never felt such rebelliousness against this as in this house, where she really had nothing to complain of, and where, indeed, everybody desired to please her. Moreover, she had not been expected to dinner that evening and in consequence, she arose from her meal, rather more hungry than usual. Theresa determined that night to leave the house as soon as possible; but it was not until spring that she was able to put her decision into execution.

LVI

AFTER AN ALMOST painful leavetaking, when for the first time she left a home with a feeling of guilt toward its occupants, she accepted a position in the household of a hat manufacturer.

She was to act as the teacher of their only child, a badly disciplined and exceptionally handsome seven-year-old boy. What chiefly attracted Theresa's interest was the constant good cheer which reigned in this home. There were guests at dinner almost every night — an uncle, a cousin, a business acquaintance, or a couple of relatives from the country. They ate and drank well, told anecdotes, gossiped, laughed continually, and were plainly delighted and even flattered, when Theresa joined in the laughter.

They treated her as an old acquaintance, and questioned her about her parents and her youth. It was the first time that she could talk freely about her father, the dead officer; her mother, the beloved novelist of Salzburg; and of all the men and women whom she had learned to know in the process of time. It was the first time that she could talk without seeming forward. In such a household she soon felt at her ease.

But the boy, however much trouble his spoiled nature created for her, positively charmed her. She soon discovered that his parents knew well how to humour him, but did not quite understand how to appreciate him. She found that he was not only brighter than his age warranted, but was possessed of a unique, almost superhuman beauty, which reminded her of the costume picture of some prince, she knew not whom, which she had once seen in a gallery. And soon she realized that she loved this child, as much, even more than her own. When he became sick of a fever, it was she who spent three anxious nights at his bed, while his mother, who was also ill at the time, was satisfied merely to obtain reports of the condition of the boy.

Soon after his recovery, suggestions were made for the disposition of the summer holidays. They took the neighbourhood of Salzburg into consideration, and welcomed Theresa's counsel.

Then, one bright Sunday morning, the lady of the house called Theresa to her room and explained to her, in her usual friendly way, that the former governess, who had merely received a half-year's leave of absence to visit a relative in England, was expected to return within a few days. Theresa could hardly grasp the situation. When she could no longer doubt the fact that she must leave, she burst into tears. The lady comforted her, and even teased her, in a good-natured and thoughtless way, about her childishness.

Neither the mistress of the house nor the husband seemed to entertain the slightest suspicion that they had wronged Theresa or caused her pain. The attitude toward her in the house altered so little after this notice that Theresa continued to hope that she might be permitted to remain. Indeed, the family still discussed with her, as before, the various details of the approaching vacation, and the boy spoke enthusiastically of the trips, canoe rides, and mountain climbs which he would take with her. She had to fight back the tears, again and again, at table. One night, half in a dream, she pondered all kinds of romantic plans: to kidnap the boy, to fight against the return of the other governess. Even darker plans, concerning herself and the child, flashed through her mind. Of course, by morning, all these fantasies had vanished.

At last, the day of parting came. The master and mistress had arranged to have the youngster away on a visit to his grandparents. They gave Theresa an inexpensive box of candy and wished her good-luck, without, by even a single word, indicating that they would like to see her occasionally. As, tense and tearless she walked downstairs, she knew that she would never enter this house again. It was not the first time that she had made such a decision. But this really signified very little, for even in those few instances when she had departed from a house without making such a resolve, when she had left a house in amity and friendship, she had never returned.

She rode to Ensbach, in the hope of recovering her peace of spirit amid natural surroundings and the healing pulsation of intimacy there. She had, too, the additional hopeless desire of loving her child more than she had done before.

None of these hopes were fulfilled; indeed, everything seemed more gloomy than ever. She had never inhabited such a totally strange world. It seemed to her as though everything were antagonistic to her, and, try as she would, she could not succeed in stirring herself to any maternal tenderness toward her child.

It was worse when Agnes, who had meanwhile become a children's nurse in Vienna, came home for a few days. She hated the tenderness which the sixteen-year-old girl showed toward the boy, and she could not bear to see the young girl usurp what should have been her own maternal functions. Sometimes, however, she felt that the attitude of Agnes did not wholly arise from tenderness. It seemed rather as if Agnes only wanted to arouse her anger, to hurt her, to make her jealous. When Theresa accused her of this, she replied contemptuously and insultingly. Frau Leutner took sides with her daughter. A quarrel ensued, in which Theresa lost all control of herself. She was angry with the others, unsatisfied with herself, and she realized that everything would only become worse if she remained longer. And so it came about, for the first time, that she left Ensbach without a real farewell: she left like one escaping.

LVII

ON A HOT day in August, Theresa began work in her new position. She found that the agency had misinformed her concerning many matters with regard to her latest incumbency. In the first place, there was no elegant villa, as she had been assured. True enough, there was a rather large house, situated in the country; but four families were spending their summer vacation there. And these four families were constantly at loggerheads with one another. They even went so far as to quarrel for the benches, chairs, and tables in the garden, and were always backbiting. All of which set the example for the crew of squalling children, of whom the worst were Theresa's three charges — not two, as the agency had said, but three boys, between the ages of nine and twelve.

The mother was still a young woman, though she had already grown corpulent. Early in the morning, she was already bedecked and powdered, and could be seen walking about in a none-too-tidy négligée, though evening always found her smartly dressed. All the members of the family habitually conversed in that terrible Jewish jargon, which Theresa disliked, even as she rather vaguely disliked Jewish people as a whole, although the treatment accorded her by the Jews with whom she had thus far come in contact had not been worse than that of any other class.

The Eppichs, too, although baptised, had belonged to this race, against which she was frankly prejudiced. It was only shortly before her departure that she learned this fact. The father of her new charges was a small, repressed man, with mild, melancholy eyes, who was hardly ever present except on holidays, when he arrived about noon and at once plunged into a quarrel with his wife. In the afternoons, as Theresa discovered from his wife's contemptuous remarks, he betook himself to a coffee-house, where he played cards until late at night, and gambled away, so his wife asserted, the whole of her dowry.

Theresa wondered why she should complain about being neglected, when she actually had not a moment of the day to spare. All afternoon, she lay on the divan; and all evening, she was "out for a walk," coming home long after the hour when she was expected. Toward Theresa, she behaved quite amiably. Sometimes, she even curried favour with her; at other times, she was violent and impatient, while at all times, her behaviour was characterized by a shamelessness that Theresa often endured with pain.

Theresa intended to give up this position, as soon as the family left their summer home. She therefore took as little pains as possible with the three little Jew-boys, as she called them, and allowed them to play and behave very much as they pleased. And, as time lay heavy on her hands, she would now and then pick up an abandoned novel and, opening it casually, read a chapter here and there.

She once took up one of her mother's books, with no more interest than she felt toward any other novel, for the fragments which she had read of her mother's previous efforts had struck her as being not only dull, but, which was even worse, as being positively ridiculous. Now, she sat in the garden, one afternoon, and read, while some one played the piano. She read apathetically, until suddenly she was deeply moved, she knew not why. It was, after all, a story no different from what might be found in a hundred other cheap novels, so hackneyed, in fact, that she seemed to have read it many times before.

Then Theresa realized why she was so deeply touched. She had been reading the letters of a deceived lover. No wonder they struck her as being so true to life! They were none other, except for some necessary changes due to the plot of the novel, than the letters from Alfred which she had once almost caught her mother pilfering from her drawer.

At first, Theresa felt only that tender sorrow that always overcame her when anything reminded her of Alfred. But then she was seized by a violent feeling of anger against her mother. This mood soon turned to hearty amusement at the thought of how she was, in a sense, a collaborator in her mother's novels. That very evening, she wrote as much to her mother, telling her how flattered she was to have helped a great novelist, even in a modest way.

A few days later, she received from her mother a rather business-like, but quite jovial letter, demanding to know what her daughter expected in payment of her services. And this was followed, two days later, unasked, by the gift of some linen and a white batiste blouse, instead of money. Theresa at first thought of sending them straight back, but reconsidered and kept the things, for it was undeniable that she needed them badly.

LVIII

A FEW DAYS before the contemplated departure for Vienna, Theresa received a letter, asking for a rendezvous.

The signature was that of an officer whose name was totally unknown to her, but in whom she thought she recognized a certain lean, dark-moustached Lieutenant whom she had often noticed in the Kurpark. He was in the habit of measuring her with a peculiarly appraising expression on his face. The officer confessed, unashamed, his deep love, his passion, and his desire, in words that at first aroused her to indignation, but ultimately stirred her deeply.

The whole day, she fought down her own impulses. But that evening, after she had put the children to bed, she could no longer resist, and hurried to meet the Lieutenant in the Kurpark. He was expecting her. As soon as he saw her, he seized her hand in a strong grip and drew her with him along a dark, deserted path. Theresa scarcely knew how it all came about, but she soon found herself answering the passion of his kisses.

He wished to lead her to an even more deserted and remote portion of the garden, but she tore herself free and went home. Only now was she aware of the fact that she had scarcely spoken ten words to the officer during their passionate meeting. She was ashamed of herself. He was to meet her again the next day, but she made up her mind that she would not be there.

She passed an almost sleepless night, during which her desire for the officer mounted to actual bodily pain. At noon, she received a letter from an anonymous "well-wishing friend," warning her to be careful with whom she consorted, for at least one particular officer was here to be cured of a venereal disease, and his cure was still in the early stages. The "well-wishing friend" hoped that this warning had not come too late.

Theresa was panic stricken. She would not leave the house. She was well aware that even last night's kisses might have terrific consequences. She hoped, madly, that God would not punish her with so horrible a fate. She promised that she would never go back to this dangerous man again. In fact, she managed to keep to the house during the next few days, and finally, a violent quarrel with the mother of her charges gave her an excuse for leaving before the expiration of her period of notice. On the way to the station, she saw the Lieutenant in the distance, but managed to slip away before he had noticed her.

Her next employer was a rich manufacturer, in whose house she was not so much governess as nurse to a nine-year-old girl, who was incurably lame and in a gradual decline. Theresa herself was unable to understand why she was so deeply touched with sympathy, not only for the poor child, but for the parents who had been the inconsolable witnesses of this painful tragedy for nine long years, and had been forced to keep up their courage in the face of the realization that there was nothing that they could do. At first, Theresa was prepared to sacrifice herself, along with the parents, in this abyss of sorrow; but she soon realized that she lacked both the physical and the spiritual strength to long endure the strain, and she was forced to leave.

A friendly letter from her mother determined her upon a visit to Salzburg, where she was graciously received. Conditions in the small town had changed very favourably for Frau Fabiani. Society women visited her, and among others, the wife of a Major, who had been recently stationed there, and the wife of an editor, all of whom held the novelist in great esteem.

Theresa felt both more comfortable and, at the same time, more estranged in her mother's house, as if she were not with her mother at all, but with some elderly woman whom she had met somewhere, say during a voyage, and to whom she was now paying a friendly visit.

When Theresa, in the course of their conversations, spoke of her many experiences of the past few years, her mother would listen with great interest, and was not ashamed to take notes, sometimes word for word. She even suggested that her daughter send her similar “true experiences,” for which she would be glad to pay.

Even in Salzburg, things had happened. Count Benkheim, who had once wooed Theresa, and who had finally married the actress he had been courting, had died, leaving his widow a tidy fortune. Frau Fabiani also spoke of Karl who, as vice president of a German nationalistic fraternity, was now playing a more and more important rôle in the student life in Vienna and always cut a figure in political circles, when he visited Salzburg. Frau Fabiani was so proud of her son that she did not seem to consider the fact that he not only did not trouble himself about his sister, but did not even care much for his mother.

LIX

WHEN, DURING THE last days of October, Theresa went back to Vienna, she felt somewhat recovered in health, but spiritually more impoverished than ever. She had parted with Frau Fabiani with a perfect understanding, and now realized more deeply than ever before that she had no mother. Of her three weeks' stay in Salzburg, she remembered with pleasure only her lonely walks and the solitary hours which she had spent in the church, where, it is true, she never prayed, but where she yet felt sheltered and at peace.

Theresa now took a position in the house of a judge in the Supreme Court, who, with his wife, his children, and another person, lived in a small suburban villa. The judge was a silent and melancholy, but withal courteous gentleman; the mother, a kindly, though suppressed creature; and the two daughters, aged ten and twelve years respectively, though not in the least talented, were well-behaved and willing children. Though it was a meagre ménage, nothing absolutely necessary was lacking. Even where human sympathy was concerned, Theresa had her share in the correct measure, so that she need not feel spoiled on the one hand, or quite neglected on the other. In the same dwelling lived a roomer, a young bank official, who had nothing whatever to do with the family. Theresa saw him only for rare, brief moments on the staircase or in the hall. Occasionally, they exchanged comments upon the weather. Nevertheless, she was not in the least surprised — on the contrary, she was rather expecting it — when, one evening, as they met at a very late hour in the hall, he suddenly took her violently in his arms and kissed her. That same night — she scarcely knew whether she had asked or had been asked by him — she spent the night with him. Thereafter, she was with him every night, though sometimes only for fifteen minutes, for she slept in the same room with the two maids and was afraid of arousing suspicions.

With the exception of these moments, she hardly ever thought of him. And when she met him, she scarcely realized that he was her lover. Nevertheless, she now regretted her wasted years, as she phrased it; for, since the deflection of Kasimir Tobisch, she had had no lover.

When she began to notice that he was falling in love with her and began to question her jealously concerning her past, she knew that it was time to break with him. She caused him to believe that the judge's family was becoming aware of their affair; and she acted as if she were deeply afraid of possible consequences, as, indeed, she sometimes was.

One day, she began looking about for a new place, and left suddenly, while he was away at work, without leaving him her address.

LX

THERESA'S NEXT POSITION was with the family of a money-changer of the business section. Here, she had a great deal of time to herself, for the mother of her seven-year-old charge was an unhappy person, who loved nothing better than to spend hours alone in the company of her boy. Thus, Theresa had not only hours, but frequently whole days, in which to go to Ensbach and see her Franz. But more often she chose to walk about the streets of the city, without any set destination in her mind. She excused herself for not going to her child by fancying that the peasant couple, and especially Agnes, with her forward, yet secretive ways, had become absolutely unbearable to her.

It so happened that, one evening, she encountered the handsome, curlyheaded fellow whom she had met, two years before, at the Greitler ball. He declared that fate had brought her to him. So weak-willed was she that, on their next meeting, she was prepared to give him anything he asked for.

He was a law student, impudent and merry, and Theresa fell deeply in love with him, often sacrificing to him the days which she really intended to devote to her child. She often wished that she might talk with him seriously, to tell him more of herself. But he was always so patently bored when she began that she desisted for fear of annoying him with her personal affairs.

Toward the end of the summer, she received a gay farewell letter from him. He said that she had been a grand girl, and that he would always remember her. He hoped that she would likewise remember him. Theresa cried through two whole nights. Then she journeyed to Ensbach, to her child, whom she had not seen for at least a month. She loved him now more than ever.

Before the image of the Virgin Mary on the oak tree, she made a solemn vow never more to neglect Franz. Since Agnes was not at home, she got on very well with the Leutners; and when evening came, she returned to Vienna, feeling much relieved. She was again at peace with herself. It was as if she had been plagued by a great thirst; and now, her thirst allayed, she could once more calmly resume her tasks. But when she began to pay some attention to her pupil, the mother became distrustful; and one day, she even accused Theresa of seeking to steal the child's love away from its mother. This, together with the fact that her husband had recently acquired a mistress, aroused the woman to fits of jealousy that approached an actually diseased condition. Theresa was simply forced to depart. There was nothing else to do.

LXI

NOW SHE FOUND a place in a quiet and very comfortable house, where she hoped she might remain a long time. The owner was a busy manufacturer, whose very activity kept him happy. His wife was a kind-hearted, pleasant woman; and his two girls, just growing out of childhood, were well-bred, tractable, and musically talented children.

Theresa was by this time accustomed to her rapidly changing environment, and knew how to strike the right note between reserve and familiarity. She was careful not to let her heart go out to her charges. She cultivated an attitude of cool motherliness, which she was capable of raising or lowering by several degrees at will. This was the foundation of her relationship to her employers' children. Thus, spiritually, she was free as soon as she closed the door behind her; and when she came back, she was again at once at home.

She now visited her boy regularly, though in the intervals between these visits she was never troubled by any longing for him.

Once, at the approach of winter, when she was going to Ensbach, she found the train crowded, and was forced to take a first-class carriage. An elegant, middle-aged gentleman was the only other occupant. He engaged Theresa in conversation, and informed her that he was going to Germany; and that, having been on a country estate, he was compelled to take this local train for the first part of his journey.

He spoke with great affectation, and constantly stroked his scrubby English moustache with his index finger. She allowed him to believe that she was a married woman; and after all, he had no reason to doubt her word, nor her information that she was on a visit to a friend of hers, the wife of a doctor, who, with her four children, lived all the year round in the country.

By the time she reached Ensbach, she had acceded to the gentleman's plea that she allow him to see her when, in two weeks, he returned from Munich. He kissed her hand in parting.

As she walked over the snow-covered walk toward her familiar destination, she was aware of her lightened step and her heightened self-consciousness. Toward her child, she felt a curious estrangement. At about this time she became more conscious than ever of his speech, which, if it was not actually dialect, at any rate had a peasant accent. She wondered if it were not high time for her to move the lad to the city. Clearly, it was her duty to do so. But how was she to manage it?

She recalled the elegant gentleman in the railway carriage, with his fine fur coat and his yellow gloves. And as she walked into the snow-covered world, she herself seemed almost a married lady, just as she had told him she was. Then, she saw herself in the small, stuffy room, drinking coffee by the light of an oil-lamp, while Frau Leutner gossiped; while Agnes, in her Sunday dress, sat by the stove and sewed, and little Franz painfully spelled out words from his picture book.

Suppose her fine gentleman suspected that she had not gone to visit a country friend, but instead, to see her illegitimate child, the son of Kasimir Tobisch, the swindler?

She trembled and, calling her boy, kissed him and mothered him, as if she were thus making restitution to him for her evil thoughts.

The next two weeks passed with a painful, snail-like pace.

It seemed as if her sole object in life was to see this strange man again. When the moment of their rendezvous approached, she was frightened lest he fail to keep the appointment.

He was there; in fact, he had been waiting for some time. His appearance somewhat undeceived her. In the railway compartment, she had not observed that his stature was shorter than her own, nor that he was almost bald.

But his words, the very intonation of his voice, again affected her.

She claimed that she had only half an hour to spare; that she was invited to a tea where her husband would meet her, after which they would visit the theatre. He did not insist. He did not wish to be indiscreet, but expressed himself as satisfied that she had come. He apologized for not having sooner introduced himself. He was Dr. Bing, a department head in the Ministry.

"I do not insist, Madame, that you give me your name."

He instantly added:

"I hope you will soon be convinced that you can completely trust me. Then you may give me your name, if you wish."

He then discussed his journey. It had not been a pleasure, but an official trip of political importance. All the same, he had managed, while in Berlin, to see a number of operas. The opera was really his only amusement. Was Madame musically inclined?

"A little," Theresa confessed; but added that she had very little time to go to operas and concerts.

"Of course," Dr. Bing added. He could understand this, what with her domestic duties, family matters, and the like. Theresa shook her head. No, she had no children. She had had one, but it had died. She did not know why she lied, why she sinned and deceived. Dr. Bing apologized for having touched a sore spot in her heart. Theresa appreciated his delicacy as much as if she had actually told the truth.

At a certain corner, she suddenly asked him to leave her and permit her to go on alone. He took his leave of her very politely, and she departed, feeling annoyed with herself for having made a free evening, and then thrown away her chance to do something with it. It pained her; but there was nothing else to be done but to go home.

At their next meeting, one cold winter evening, Dr. Bing invited her to have tea with him in his apartment. She did not hold out any longer than was necessary. And it really did not require the effect of an excellent meal in his comfortable rooms, with the turned-down lights, to bring the adventure to its foreseen and desired culmination.

He asked no questions, and seemed prepared to believe anything that she cared to tell him. Yet, on their next visit, perhaps through fear of once standing revealed before him as a prevaricator, she deemed it expedient to tell him at least a part of the truth.

She was married, she said, but had been separated from her husband for the past two years. After the death of her child, her husband had left her, and despite legal notice, refused to support her. She had therefore determined to earn her living as a governess. The department head kissed her hand, and was more respectful than ever.

They met regularly, once every fortnight; and Theresa was each time happy to go to his well-appointed apartment, with its beautifully shaded lamps, to enjoy the invariably excellently prepared meal which he offered her. The very change in her life which this day brought meant more to her than her lover himself. His voice was still as agreeable as ever; his manner of speech affected her just as delightfully as on the first day; but she could not simulate much interest in the things he told her.

She was most attracted to him when he spoke of his mother, who had obviously been a noble and kind-hearted woman. Concerning the opera, he always spoke in phrases that, it seemed to her, she had previously read in the newspapers. Frequently, too, he spoke of political matters, in a dry, matter-of-fact way, as though he were speaking to a professional colleague of the ministry. He sometimes did this at moments that were certainly incongruous. In his exceedingly discreet manner, which was not, however, quite free from self-gratification, he had declared himself anxious to augment her material situation with a small monthly allowance. At first, she emphatically declined; but, after a decent interval, she accepted.

On the whole, this was a very calm period in Theresa's career, and it might have been a very happy one, had she not been more than ever aware of the aimless, meaningless character of her life. Sometimes, she felt impelled to reveal all the torments of her heart to her lover. But some inner barrier always restrained her. There were moments when she felt that this resistance came from his side, for she had noticed that he avoided moments of confidences, as if to avoid the annoyance, or perhaps the greater responsibility, that such confidences might entail.

Thus, she was well aware that this affair would soon come to an end, just as she was conscious that, no matter how friendly her relationship to her employers and their children might become, she could never find a home among them.

So she realized the unstable pattern of her life. Even in the presence of her child, she could not feel any sense of security. No, she could not even deny the self-evident fact that Franz was closer to Frau Leutner and to the rapidly maturing Agnes, than he was to his own mother.

Sometimes her soul yearned for some one to whom she could speak of her inner emptiness and her desires. And now and then, when Theresa was in the company of some other governess who confided all her troubles to her, then she, Theresa, likewise wished to be able to speak out concerning the secrets of her own heart. But she never did. Perhaps it were best so. Her acquaintances considered her a secretive and haughty person. The best of them thought to excuse her by saying that, coming as she did from an impoverished family of the nobility, she thought that she merited a better position than she held in life.

In May, after a number of days of worry, interspersed with periods of deceitful composure and hope, she was no longer able to conceal the truth from herself. She was pregnant again! Naturally, her first impulse was to inform her lover. But at their next meeting, an indescribable shyness overcame her as she was on the point of revealing her condition, whereupon she decided not to tell him anything at all, but instead, to rid herself of the child in all haste. Rather death, she said to herself, than another child!

She did not hesitate long, but betook herself to a place where, for a sum of money which she had originally laid aside for a new dress, she was quickly relieved of the source of her agitation. The manufacturer's family were somewhat annoyed that it was necessary for her to stay in bed a few days. Suspicion awakened in their minds, and their attitude became so unfriendly that Theresa felt she could no longer endure their censure, which they no longer took the trouble to conceal.

Without revealing the original cause of her misfortune, Theresa one day communicated the story of her misery to her lover. The latter received her tale unmoved, hardly taking the pains to conceal the coldness behind his conventional and affected responses. She noted this with bitterness; and suddenly, offended beyond endurance, she overwhelmed him with all the unspoken reproaches which had been gathering within her heart during the last few months. Words came to her lips of which, a moment later, she was heartily ashamed.

When her lover, however, acted as if it were his part to forgive her, her indignation burst forth again; and this time, she did not spare him a full recital of the cause of all her calamities. She flung it in his face, and reproached him with having treated her as one hardly better than a street-walker. He was touched by her emotion, and sought, in his crude fashion, to appease her. But all that Theresa could feel in his tender words was his exultation at having got off so cheaply. She flung this at him, too, and tried to leave him; but he restrained her. He kissed her hands, and begged her to forgive him. So they were reconciled, but Theresa realized that this revival of their passion would be of short duration.

A few days passed, and the manufacturer's family, having decided to leave for the country, took this opportunity of discharging Theresa. She breathed freely, once more. It was a day of exceptional beauty, of such beauty that it seemed to her a portent of reconciling grace, when she betook herself along the familiar path to the Leutners' place.

Theresa had brought presents, not only for her boy, but also for Herr and Frau Leutner, and even for Agnes, although she liked the girl less and less. This summer, she proposed to consider more seriously her child's education; although it frequently occurred to her that such plans were to little avail, since she could be with him so infrequently, to offset the peasant and rural influences which surrounded him at all times.

Theresa was repeatedly shocked and astounded to observe in her Franz singular gestures and crude mannerisms, which sometimes amusingly reminded her of Herr Leutner himself. She did what she could to eradicate the worst of his boorish locutions and actions. She tried, too, to assist him in his studies. Naturally, he was still in the elementary stages of reading, writing, and arithmetic; but he learned quickly, although he showed no particular interest in his work.

It would have pleased Theresa if her son had shared her love of the beauties of Nature, but he could not appreciate, as she did, the lyrical splendour of the scenery, the odour of the fields, the flight of butterflies. Always surrounded by these things, he took them for granted; and perhaps after all, it was asking too much of him to expect him to exhibit joy at the sight of what had constituted the intimate atmosphere of his life from the day of his birth. Still, she felt that he lacked sensibility.

She became increasingly aware of the narrow circles in which the Leutners, and the other families of the neighbourhood, moved. To be sure, the people of the community saw each other frequently enough, meeting as they did in the fields, at the inn, and in the church. But there existed no real social life; there was no true communication from person to person, or from family to family. Their conversations were always the same. It frequently happened that Theresa was told the same story of some unimportant event by a dozen different people, over and over again, and usually in the same words and with the same gestures. She herself had long since ceased to be of particular interest to the inhabitants of Ensbach. It was commonly known that she was Franz's mother, and that she held a position in Vienna. She was on friendly terms with every one, and conversed with all the people she met; so much, indeed, that she herself soon fell into the habit of telling the same inane stories over and over again, with the same words and gestures.

In an effort to mitigate her carefully concealed boredom, during the two months she remained in the country, Theresa wrote a great many letters. She entered into correspondence with some of the other governesses with whom she had become acquainted, and, from time to time, she sent cards of greeting to some of her former charges. Her mother, however, was the recipient of her most detailed letters.

Theresa had never told Frau Fabiani of the existence of her child. She merely explained to her that she had gone to the country, in company with a girl friend, in order to enjoy a rest. She was quite certain, however, that her mother suspected the truth, if she were not, indeed, acquainted with all the facts. She did not really care to conceal them from anybody, except her brother. The bond between them had been resumed, to a limited degree, since one day when he had chanced to meet her, and had subsequently paid her a visit when she was employed in the manufacturer's household.

Theresa received several replies to her letters to Doctor Bing. These consisted of short, formal sentences, which were in strange contrast to his glowing perorations and exordiums. They rather disgusted Theresa. Once, she delayed answering him, waiting to see if he would pursue the correspondence of his own accord. But she did not hear from him. And, in her heart, she was glad of it.

LXII

IN SEPTEMBER, THERESA accepted a position as governess to a seventeen-year-old girl — a pale, homely, somewhat simple-minded child, the only daughter of a retired wholesale merchant, whose two sons, the one a lawyer and the other an engineer, shared the house with him. They lived in the first floor of an old, suburban house, a rather dreary, but well-preserved building, in which some modern conveniences — notably, electric lights — had not been introduced. The wholesale merchant, who had been blind for many years, was still a handsome, well built man, and he wore a neat, gray beard. He personally selected Theresa from among the various applicants, because, as he said, her voice sounded like that of a loyal person, and had moved him deeply and agreeably.

Since Berta, the daughter, lacked all ability to supervise the household, this duty fell upon Theresa; and she was pleased to discover in herself a positive talent in this direction. The house was more frequented and much gayer than Theresa had anticipated. The young men regularly received visits from their colleagues; the daughter, Berta, was visited by friends and relatives: and thus the house was constantly filled with a young, lively, often noisy company in whose presence the old man took obvious enjoyment.

Theresa was invited to participate in the social life of these happy people. She was made to feel as one of the family. One of the cousins — a vivacious, arrogant girl — even made Theresa the confidante of her first passion. She claimed that she was in love with the elder of her uncles, the lawyer. But, to Theresa's eyes, it seemed that the girl was equally in love with the other brother, or even with a certain blond soldier, who was a frequent guest at the house.

Theresa was sensible of a certain envy at these confidences, although she would not confess it to herself, since she had vowed that she would never again enter into any relationship which could lead her nowhere. She was weary of being pushed about here and there in the world. She longed for peace, for a home which she might call her own. How many among her acquaintances, with no particular distinction of person or position, had contrived, without much effort, to find themselves husbands! And if they could do it, why shouldn't she?

Only recently, a governess of Theresa's acquaintance, a meagre, rather faded creature, had married a well-situated bookkeeper. Another governess, and this one a person of none too excellent reputation, had married a rich widower in whose house she had been employed. There was no really good reason why she, Theresa, should not be similarly successful!

Her child would not, must not prevent her. After all, was her condition any different from that of one who had been divorced or widowed? Herr Truebner was no longer young; and, moreover, he lacked his eyesight. But he was a stately, yes, a really handsome man, and she had no difficulty in observing that he enjoyed her presence.

He particularly liked to have her read to him, especially from philosophical writings. At first, these bored her immeasurably, until he began to interrupt her with friendly questions, the answers to which he himself provided, in such a fashion that he almost delivered connected lectures to her. Soon, she not only understood, but became thoroughly interested in an otherwise, to her, strange realm of thought.

Occasionally, he questioned her closely regarding her past. With a fair amount of truth, she related to him the history of her youth, of her parents, of her life in Salzberg, and of her many experiences as a governess. She glossed over her affairs of the heart, leaving him to suspect that she had suffered a great deal, and that once, years ago, she had been “as good as married.”

Herr Truebner did not probe further, but, one evening, between two chapters of a philosophical treatise, he asked Theresa, in a serious but gentle voice, how her child was getting along. She blushed and hesitated. He went on to explain that he had long ago deduced, from the tone of her voice, that she was a mother. Theresa did not answer, and Herr Truebner took her hand and held it for a long time in silence. He did not seek to make her reveal any more.

Some time afterwards, when she came home from some errand and was just mounting the steps, she met the blond soldier on the dimly lighted staircase. As if in jest, he refused to allow her to pass. She smiled and, in the next moment, he had her in his arms, and refused to release her until the sound of an opening door interrupted them. She dashed up the steps without looking back; but she knew all the while that he had already won her.

She felt that it would be useless to protract a meaningless resistance, so, at their next meeting, she gave him an assignation, asking him to promise her only one thing — that he would never reveal their secret to any one.

He promised, and he kept his word. For Theresa, there was a particular charm in sitting across from him in the Truebner house; and in seeing him there, with his eyes still heavy with love and passion, and hearing him address her in the most formal manner. His attitude toward the other girls did not change in the slightest degree. To them, he was still the gallant soldier, bringing them flowers and candy, and, on festive occasions, playing the piano while the young people danced.

No one suspected their relationship... that is, no one, except the blind clairvoyant merchant, who one day took it upon himself to warn Theresa, in his gentle way, of the dangers and deceptions to which young people in her position are exposed. Although Theresa suspected that the old man was not interested in preserving her virtue for her own sake alone, she nevertheless took his warning to heart; and her demeanour toward Ferdinand altered at once. She was no longer the thoughtless, gay creature whom he had formerly held in his arms. She began to bethink herself of duties which previously she had never allowed to stand as hindrances to their appointments. And after another talk with Herr Truebner, in which he spoke, in guarded words, of the frivolity of youth and of the duty of single women to society, Theresa, as if under a spell, felt herself compelled to write a farewell letter to Ferdinand. Three days later, to be sure, they were together again; but both of them realized that the end of their adventure was fast approaching.

One day, early in the spring, as she was shopping in the city, Theresa met Alfred. She had not seen him since that day when she had been in the carriage, with her newborn baby and Frau Nebling, on her way to the station. He stood still, no less pleased than she; and both of them at once began to converse in such an exceedingly friendly fashion that, after a few minutes, neither was able to credit the fact that eight years had passed since their last meeting.

Alfred had hardly changed at all. That little shyness which so specially characterized him was still noticeable, although now it no longer made him appear awkward, so much as reserved. Theresa related to him as much as she wished to of her many experiences, and was silent regarding many things which his eyes seemed to ask her, though his lips spoke nothing. No doubt, he suspected that her affair with Max had not been her last. After all, he himself had grown into a man.

She again experienced that strange conviction that sometimes overcame her, that Alfred was the father of her child. She smiled mysteriously. Alfred’s eyes returned a questioning look. He began to tell her of his life. His two sisters were married. His mother was ill. He himself was to receive his doctorate this summer. Rather tardily, he admitted, but he was not as industrious as many of his other comrades — as Karl, for instance, who was already an interne, and was surely at the beginning of a great career. If not as a doctor, at any rate, as a politician, he added, smiling.

Did Theresa know that her brother was no longer a Fabiani, but a Faber? Yes, indeed! For one of his strong, pan-Germanic sentiments a name with an Italian sound might one day prove a stumbling-block to his progress and a weapon in the hands of his opponents.

Theresa looked away.

“I hardly ever see him,” she said, casually.

Then she begged Alfred to write to her, as soon as he had become a doctor.

“Not before?” he asked.

She smiled, and extended her hand to him. She smiled all the way home.

Herr Truebner departed somewhat from the type of books which he had formerly preferred. Theresa had to read him some lighter works. Therein, they frequently encountered passages that bore so strong a resemblance to her own life that her voice broke as she read. Once, as she was reading a chapter in a translation of some French memoirs, she was obliged to stop, not only because she was ashamed, but because, due to her emotion, her voice failed her.

Herr Truebner seized her hand and drew it to his lips. Theresa, both frightened and unnerved, made no resistance; whereupon, he became bolder, until Theresa finally had to beg him to leave her alone. She remained at his side in silence for a while; then, she excused herself and left the room.

On the following day, her employer, in his most gentle voice, begged her to forgive him. She was deeply moved. But when he renewed his advances, after an interval of two days, she tore herself loose and shortly thereafter, gave her notice, saying that she had been called to the side of her sick mother.

LXIII

BY VIRTUE OF the excellent recommendations which she received from the Truebners, Theresa was able to exercise a certain choice in her next position. She decided to enter the house of a certain Rottmann family, where the two daughters, aged ten and thirteen, had captivated her by their frank and animated ways. The mother, who was a pianist, and frequently absent for long periods on extended concert tours, became at once almost too friendly with Theresa, and the woman's nervous, capricious manner annoyed her.

As to the father — a serious, somewhat melancholy man of exceedingly youthful appearance — Theresa simply could not understand him. During the first few days, he appeared to be merely a much respected guest, and not really the master of the household. But the whole atmosphere of the house abruptly changed, when Frau Rottmann departed on her tour.

The whole tone of the house was pitched to a gayer note. The daughters acted as if a weight had been lifted from them. The father's melancholy disappeared. The servants obeyed the new governess much more readily than they had ever obeyed their mistress. No one ever mentioned the absent member of the family. No letters ever came from her — only occasional picture post-cards from the German cities where she was performing.

Theresa was happier than she had ever been before. The management of the household and the teaching of her clever pupils kept her both busy and satisfied.

Six weeks later, Frau Rottmann returned, and at once everything lapsed into its former state. Even worse, as far as Theresa could judge from the meagre progress made by her pupils, as compared with the rapid strides which they had made during the absence of their mother. Herr Rottmann again relapsed into his former melancholy.

During August, the family moved to a nearby, very unpretentious resort. Seemingly out of sheer boredom, Frau Rottmann took Theresa into her confidence, and related to her all the various experiences and adventures which she had encountered on her numerous journeys. Theresa would have preferred not to listen but her quite apparent reserve mattered very little to Frau Rottmann. She, as Theresa quickly noticed, was interested only in breaking the monotony of their sojourn in the country; and it mattered little who her audience was, as long as she had an audience.

No sooner had the family returned to the city, than Frau Rottmann ceased her confidences. In the autumn, she went to London, ostensibly to extend her studies with a famous pianist resident in that metropolis. At once, the house breathed freely again. And Theresa felt so perfectly at home in the company of the daughters and their father that she often asked herself if she were not indeed better fitted to be the mother of this household than the wandering pianist.

Herr Rottmann pleased her immensely. She made this much plain to him, and their proximity, together with their constant association in their daily life, did the rest. She became his mistress. Both observed the strictest secrecy, and were careful not to conduct themselves, when in the presence of others, in any way that might betray their relationship.

At Christmas time when Frau Rottmann returned, although Theresa realized the necessity of caution, the manner in which Herr Rottmann seemed to have completely forgotten her existence, angered her beyond endurance. She suffered much on account of his exaggerated wariness; and when his wife left again, after a few weeks, she obstinately refused to permit a resumption of their former intimacy.

But he managed to explain to her the necessity of his actions, and secured his pardon from her, with the result that their old life was resumed, after all. Sometimes, Theresa caught herself wishing that some anonymous letter would come to inform Herr Rottmann of the manner in which his wife demeaned herself while on her tours. Once, she even dared, in a half jocular manner, to suggest to him the possible dangers that threatened beautiful women, especially artists, on their sojourns in foreign countries. Herr Rottmann, however, appeared not to understand that any reference was being made to his wife.

Frau Rottmann returned a few days earlier than she was expected, and at once exhibited a changed attitude toward Theresa. She shut herself up with her husband and, when she reappeared, summoned the governess, while Herr Rottmann escaped from the house, and abruptly declared that she knew everything. Then she berated Theresa violently, and without sparing her language in the least.

Theresa did not know how to reply. She was mad with humiliation that the man to whom she had given herself could have been such a coward as to leave her alone. Apparently, he had given his wife full authority to act as she saw fit. Frau Rottmann had so managed the scene that her daughters were not at home, and she insisted that Theresa should leave the house forthwith, before they returned.

Theresa went to her room and packed her belongings, overcome with the stupidity of her behaviour. Suddenly, she decided not to leave the house until she had flung into the face of this man and his wife all that she knew of them and that they deserved to hear. But Frau Rottmann had already departed. The servant grinned as she informed Theresa that the couple had gone to the Theatre. Did the Fraulein wish her to fetch a cab and take her things down? No, Theresa replied; she still had something to say to Herr and Frau Rottmann, and would await their return.

She was dressed and ready to leave. Her trunk and her bag were packed, but she waited with compressed lips, while a terrible rage filled her heart. Then the two girls came home, and, finding Theresa prepared to go away, assailed her with questions. Theresa wept, and at first was unable to answer. Then she declared that she had received a telegram saying that her mother was very ill, and that she must return to Salzburg at once.

She arose, kissed the two girls as gently as if they were her very own, begged them not to make her departure difficult, and went below to await the arrival of the servant girl with a cab.

LXIV

LATE THAT NIGHT, she arrived at Ensbach — a discharged, expelled, shamed, unhappy creature, with whom the world was disgusted, and she herself more than any one else. Her boy was fast asleep. In the dark, she could see only the pale glow of his beloved, childish face. She was grieved to reflect that it was two months since she had last seen him. She had belonged to other people, and had been obliged to obey others. Once again, the injustice of her fate oppressed her. She swore that she would never again sacrifice herself to the children of strangers; that she would see to it that her own child no longer had to live with strange people.

For a long time, sleep would not pity her. It was incredible that she had spent the previous night at the Rottmanns'; in fact, in Herr Rottmann's own bed! She buried herself deep in the covers and pillows, as though she could hide her shameful experience from herself. What had come over her in this last year?

In the morning, however, she awoke feeling gay and more refreshed than she had been for a long time. It was like a miracle! A single night away from the city, away from the Rottmanns', had, so it seemed, restored her to health. Was not life an easy matter, so long as such miracles were possible?

Never before had the radiance of the sunlight, the calm of the country-side, made her so happy. If only she might remain here forever! Well, in any case, there were many goodly days of peace before her to enjoy, and now she was not sorry that she had not been too stubborn in her refusal to accept the occasional gifts of money which Herr Rottmann had pressed upon her. These sums would enable her to remain somewhat longer at Ensbach.

Everything about her boy delighted her. Even a certain way that he had of holding his head, which used formerly to remind her, painfully and with uncanny intimacy, of Kasimir Tobisch, no longer disturbed her. She took long walks with him, or she would play with him in the fields. She was young again, almost a child once more; and her son Franz was a child, too, more than he had ever been.

About a week after her arrival, Agnes returned from the city, to pay a visit to her family. Franz received her with wild exclamations of joy; and all during the day, he scarcely bothered at all about his mother, who was made to feel almost like a stranger by his neglect. When Agnes departed, leaving Franz actually miserable and in despair, Theresa felt unreasonably angered against him, as though he were a grown man and answerable to her for a great misdeed. Toward Agnes, whom she had always disliked as an impudent and secretive person, Theresa now felt a veritable hatred.

Her whole attitude was suddenly reversed. She had temporarily rejected the idea of taking her son with her, on account of the present impracticality of the plan. Now she dismissed the idea completely. After all, what could she do, except to make her living educating other people's children, while she left her own child in the country?

One thing, however, she solemnly swore to herself. Never again would she commit a stupidity such as that which had upset the comfortable scheme of her life. Of late, as she well knew, she had become particularly attractive. No matter how economically and how simply she was clothed she knew that she presented a striking appearance. And, despite her modest and even reserved demeanour, there was some gesture or look that she gave unconsciously, that promised things which she had no idea of giving.

She determined henceforth to make better use of the gifts that Nature had bestowed upon her. After her recent experience in the Rottmann family, she felt prepared and fortified to hold herself calculating and cold toward all men, except when it might be definitely to her advantage to be otherwise. She was in communication with several agencies, and now and again she answered advertisements; but nothing seemed to come of it in the field which she especially desired — employment with a widow with children.

Among the letters which she received, there was one from Alfred. It was the belated printed invitation to his graduation, which had already taken place. The same day, she received a letter from her mother, asking her if she could not shorten her stay with her "girl-friend" — the word was set between quotation-marks — and come to Salzburg for a few days.

To Theresa, this invitation, arriving as it did at that particular moment, seemed like the beckoning finger of fate; for she suspected that Alfred, after his graduation, would have gone to spend some time with his parents. It was the hope of seeing him that caused her to leave Ensbach on the following morning.

LXV

NO. WAS SHE mistaken. On the very first day of her stay in Salzburg, she met him in front of the Cathedral. They took a walk along the same streets which they had traversed years before, to the same park, and indeed, to the very bench where the two officers had once passed, the dark eyed one holding his cap in his hand.

This time, she told Alfred many things concerning her life. She felt that Alfred would understand these confidences. She felt certain that if she had revealed even more, he would have understood. She did not conceal the fact that she had a son nine years old, and Alfred told her that he had known it long since. When he had seen her, that time, riding past in an open coach, he had not failed to observe the old woman with a child in her lap, and he had never doubted that the child was Theresa's. He did not agree with her that it was necessary to maintain such a strict secrecy concerning the child. Of late, people were much more liberal in that respect, and there were many families where her past would surely not be held against her.

They met several times again in the following days, accidentally, and yet they had both been certain that they would encounter one another. Alfred spoke of his interneship in the General Hospital, which he was to assume upon his return in the fall. They exchanged no promises, but when he took leave of her on the day of his departure, they both knew that they would soon see each other in Vienna.

Three days later, Theresa also left for the capital. Her mother accompanied her to the train. She had never been so amiable to her daughter as in the last few days, and yet Theresa felt in her presence some inexplicable resistance which prevented her from disclosing her most intimate self.

When the train was already in motion and Theresa stood at the window of her carriage, her mother suddenly called to her:

"Kiss your little boy for me!"

Theresa blushed, and then nodded to her mother, as if to a newly acquired friend.

LXVI

HER NEXT POSITION was not with a widow, but with a couple who had one child — a boy about the age of Franz. The father, an editor, was a rather young but grayhaired, slender man, who was friendly, abstracted, and generally rather excited. He was in the habit of rising at noon, and did not come home from work until about three in the morning. His wife, petite and graceful like her husband, was the manager of a gown shop, and left the house very early in the morning. Thus, the Herr and Frau Knauer took their meals separately, and at all hours. Yet Theresa had never encountered such a smoothly run household, or such a well-mated couple.

She followed Alfred's advice, and demanded two successive free days each month, so as to be able to spend them with her child at Ensbach. Frau Knauer offered no objections. In fact, her attitude was exactly as Alfred had thought it would be, and she seemed even to take an especial liking to Theresa on this account. Each time Theresa returned from Ensbach, Frau Knauer never failed to ask concerning the child, and she rather liked to talk about it.

Her own child, Robert, was a blond, curly-headed, beautifully built boy — so perfect a child that Theresa could not understand how his parents had begotten him. From the very first moment she saw him, Theresa took the child to her heart and grew to feel for him a greater affection than she had ever felt for any of her charges.

Robert did not go to school, so Theresa had complete charge of his education. She devoted herself to this difficult task with all her soul — so much so, that sometimes she felt abashed at her neglect of her own child; and on such occasions she was especially gentle with him, and rejoiced that her son was, after all, the stronger and more rosy-cheeked of the two, even if he were not actually prettier than Robert.

Nor was he less apt than Robert, though his speech was full of peasant locutions. Nevertheless, in her heart, Robert continually surpassed her Franz; and Theresa suffered thereby, for she realized that this was not the first sin of which she was guilty in her relationship to her child.

One day, when she was out walking with Robert, she met Alfred, whom she had not seen since they were in Salzburg together; and she seized the opportunity to tell him that she wished to speak to him at greater length, as soon as a suitable meeting could be arranged. Very soon thereafter, on one of her free evenings, she met him by appointment, at a place not far from the hospital, and acquainted him with the details of her relationship to her own child and the other one who was superseding him in her heart.

Alfred quieted her conscience, and explained to her that it was quite natural that she could not have the same feeling toward her child as she might have in happier circumstances, for even so fundamental an emotion as mother love required constant renewal by the presence of the living object.

He concluded by expressing a desire to see the child; and so, on their next evening walk, they made an appointment, and he accompanied her to Ensbach on her first Christmas holiday. He sat with the child and together they went through the picture book which he had brought with him. Alfred was friendly, but inquisitive; reserved, yet amiable; and Theresa could not but admire his ability to sound the right note, not only with her son, but also with Frau Leutner and her dull, unsociable husband. In consequence, their visit to the country passed quickly and pleasantly.

On the train, en route for Vienna, Alfred did not conceal from Theresa his conviction that her child was neither in the proper environment nor with the right people. She ought to find some place nearer the city — in some suburb, perhaps — where she could see him more often and supervise his further education.

Before they left the train at Vienna, Alfred kissed her. It was their first kiss since that evening in Salzburg, when they had parted, without suspecting how long it was to be before they should see one another again.

Shortly thereafter, it so happened that Frau Knauer asked Theresa if she would not forego her coming two days off, and instead, invite her son to pass the day in Vienna with them. Theresa was at first reluctant to accept this suggestion. She was somewhat afraid to see the two children side by side.

In her indecision, she turned again to Alfred, who quieted her fears. So, one day, she had Frau Leutner bring Franz to the house. The day passed more pleasantly than Theresa had anticipated. The two boys struck up a friendship at once, and chatted and played together all day long. In the evening, when Frau Leutner came to get Franz, Robert insisted that his new friend should soon return. Frau Knauer nodded her assent, and her friendly comments concerning Franz made Theresa very proud.

It was settled, now, that Frau Leutner was to bring Franz to Vienna, two or three times each month. Robert always received him with great joy, and Frau Knauer took a genuine liking to him. Even Herr Knauer, who sometimes passed half an hour in the children's room, seemed to take to the lad. This was not particularly significant, however, for Herr Knauer was always happy and always quite abstracted. He was always in complete agreement with everybody and everything, and presented everywhere the same superficial amiability.

This gray-haired, unkempt journalist aroused in Theresa a growing sense of strangeness and impenetrability. Sometimes, it seemed to her as if his constant jocularity were a mask behind which he concealed his real self.

Theresa fell into the habit of going over her experiences and opinions with Alfred, and the latter always smiled at her propensity for discovering strange and exceptional characteristics in everything. The two grew more and more intimate. Their meetings were now much more frequent than before, but usually they were very brief, although sometimes they went to the theatre together, and afterwards had supper in some small, inexpensive coffee-house.

Theresa's attitude toward Alfred was now similar to what it had been many years ago. She wished that he were more bold, that he were gifted with a great initiative. But no sooner did he betray any such impulses, than she at once became frightened; as if she feared that, in becoming more beautiful, their happy moments were but fated to end the more quickly.

LXVII

AT LENGTH, ONE evening in the early spring, she gave herself to him, in his bare but exceedingly neatly-kept room in the Alser suburb. In thus becoming his at last, she had a sentiment that she was fulfilling a long-neglected obligation, rather than that she was acceding to any suppressed longing of her own. That night was the first time that she had ever been unable to speak freely to Alfred of the emotions which filled her heart. The thought came to her with an almost physical pain.

Gradually, however, she came to feel more happy when she was in his arms than she had ever in her life been before. Alfred was veritably the first man whom she had ever known, the only man whom she could trust. To all the other men whom, from time to time, she had permitted to enter her life, she had remained relatively a stranger, or at least, a person of ambiguous status, if not merely an easily possessed and quickly forgotten victim. But Alfred belonged to her.

The only thing about his attitude which occasionally offended her was his all too apparent unwillingness to be seen in public with her; a precaution for which he endeavoured to find excuse in the embarrassment which he would feel if he were to encounter Karl while in her company. He sullenly refused to go with her again to Ensbach. She no longer importuned him, since she observed that her requests irritated him.

One of the most pleasant days which Theresa ever experienced occurred the first time Frau Knauer gave her permission to take Robert with her to Ensbach. The sight of "her two children" — as she called them in secret, to herself and, on this occasion, to Frau Leutner — playing together in the fields, made her heart throb with pleasure. Sensing anew of how much she deprived herself by her continued separation from her son, she resolutely determined to take Franz away in the autumn, and thenceforth to keep him near her.

She was able to carry out this plan even earlier than she had thought possible, for she had no difficulty in finding a place for Franz in the family of a tailor, who lived in Hernals. Now, Theresa had more frequent opportunities of visiting her son than she had ever enjoyed before; but she spent all her Sunday afternoons with Alfred, and so saw less of the boy than when he had been far away.

Early the next spring, it became necessary for Theresa to remove her child from the tailor's household, chiefly because of an inveterate ill-feeling existing between Franz and the tailor's eldest boy. This episode involved Theresa in a violent quarrel with the tailor's wife, in the course of which the latter delivered herself of certain vague insinuations regarding various evil traits which Franz had exhibited. Theresa was inclined to dismiss these allusions as mere spite.

She soon found her child a better place in a cleaner house, with the elderly childless widow of a teacher; so that she really had no reason to complain of the failure of her first venture. Franz made fair progress at school. He was always welcome at the Knauers' and no one there seemed to find him wild or unruly. The widow, to be sure, soon made complaints, but not so violently as had the tailor's wife.

These considerations did not touch Theresa as deeply as they should have, and she could no longer deny the fact that the central point of her emotional life was neither Franz nor Alfred at all, but Robert. Her love for this child gradually took on the aspect of a malady. She took care not to show his parents the greatness of her passion, lest they should therein find cause for dismissing her.

Theresa was aware that, although they loved their child, he did not mean more to them than a living and precious toy. It was certain that they did not appreciate him as fully as she did. As for the little fellow, he made hardly any discrimination between his parents and his governess. Like all spoiled children, he took all their love and idolization as a matter of course.

During the winter months, Frau Knauer became ill of pneumonia, and for a few days, her fate hung in the balance. Theresa assuredly wished her to recover, but there were times when vague, unutterable hopes came to her heart. Although Herr Knauer had never given her the faintest sign which she could interpret as an indication that he might desire her as a wife; although he had remained strange and, in fact, as unlikeable as ever, she knew that, if his wife should die and if he should offer his hand, she would not hesitate a moment to become Robert's step-mother. For the hope of that alone, she would have broken with Alfred — all the more so because, while nothing suggested that their relationship was soon to end, she realized that it had no real permanence.

Frau Knauer recovered slowly and, as a convalescent, made a most attractive picture. She and Theresa had several small quarrels, to which Theresa attached no importance. One day, Theresa was requested to make a certain purchase. She, feeling unwell, passed on the request to the chambermaid. Frau Knauer refused to allow this, and Theresa was led to answer her mistress somewhat harshly. Frau Knauer thereupon suggested that Theresa might leave her employment, whenever it might be convenient for her to do so.

Theresa did not take Frau Knauer seriously. She had become almost indispensable in this house, and how could any one think of separating Robert from her, or her from Robert? Moreover, from that time forward, neither Herr nor Frau Knauer, in their conduct toward her, gave the slightest indication that any change, any estrangement, or any hostility had occurred.

Theresa was on the point of dismissing the episode completely from her mind when, one day, Frau Knauer spoke to her of her impending departure as if it were a foregone conclusion, concerning which there could not possibly be any more discussion. With the most friendly concern, she inquired if Theresa had already found herself another position. She mentioned that she intended to go to the country during the summer, and would try to get on without the assistance of a governess.

Theresa felt certain that the Knauers would want her back in the fall, but she was too proud to say anything about the possibility; and so the days passed without her having taken advantage of the opportunities which they offered her of determining her real status in the household. She was unable to believe that they would deal so cruelly with her as actually to separate her from little Robert. At the last moment, she was sure, they would make some effort to retain her.

She therefore neglected to make any preparations for her departure, feeling certain that, on the morning of the last day, Frau Knauer would retract her words. But the latter only asked her, in a friendly way, if she would not linger long enough to lunch with them. Theresa, on the point of tears, her throat choked with sobs, could only nod. Frau Knauer was doubtless embarrassed at her emotion, for she left the room; then, at once, Theresa burst into tears, falling on her knees before Robert, who was sitting at his own little white table, drinking his breakfast cocoa.

He had been informed, in a vague way, that his Fraulein was going away for a time. He could not, however, understand her violent weeping, nor the cause of the many kisses which she showered upon his hand; but he took it all without astonishment and, feeling impelled to do something in return, bent down and kissed her forehead. When Theresa looked up and saw his cool eyes, she realized how completely selfish he was. She ruffled his hair playfully, wiped away her tears, and began to help him dress, as if nothing had happened.

Then she took him to his mother's room and stood by, with an expression of fixed amiability on her face, while he kissed his mother good-bye before taking his customary morning walk. Theresa chatted with the child, just as usual, and she did not even forget to take a roll along to feed to the swans.

Robert met a few playmates, and Theresa spoke condescendingly to a nursemaid with whom she had struck up a slight acquaintance. She asked herself what it was that made her feel superior to her fellow nurses and governesses. Was she really any better than they? Was she not just as homeless a creature? Were not all of them tossed round the world, from one house to another, even though they gave to their charges the motherly love and attention which the real mothers could not or would not give? And did they ever acquire any rights, even when they loved the child they cared for more than they did their own?

She worked herself into a mood of angry rebellion. Robert was playing about the lake in the comfort-conserving way which was all his own, allowing himself to be caught by his playmates before he was actually tired. Theresa called to him suddenly, with unusual severity. It had become late, and it was high time that they were going home. Robert obeyed at once, indifferently, and the two proceeded homeward.

After the noon meal, Theresa begged Frau Knauer to be allowed to pass the night in her house. Frau Knauer assented at once, but it was noticeable that she considered herself somewhat gracious in doing so. Theresa promised, as though she were in duty bound to do so, to leave the house very early in the morning, without seeing Robert again. Herr Knauer thanked her for her excellent service and hoped that she would come and see them sometimes. She and her boy would always be welcome.

She hastened to meet Alfred in the afternoon, and did not conceal from him the extent of her desperation. She declared that her present condition was simply intolerable, and that she must get into some more stable profession. Alfred patiently explained to her that she would have plenty of time to think things over. At any rate, she ought to devote this summer to recovering her health. She ought to spend a few weeks in Salzburg, and a few weeks with Franz, preferably at Ensbach, where the Leutners would doubtless be glad to welcome her.

Through the veil of her tears, Theresa was conscious of Alfred's indifferent, even bored eyes, that looked past her, just as Herr Knauer's and Frau Knauer's and little Robert's had done. Her astonished glance, revealing her inner torture, did not escape him. He was embarrassed, and tried to be especially tender to her. She accepted his love because she thirsted for it, but she felt that, no matter how long she remained with Alfred, she would always recognize this moment as the beginning of their parting, even though they should continue together until the end of their lives.

Alfred had frequently asked to be allowed to assist her financially. Now, when he renewed his offer, against the exigencies of the next few months, she felt obliged to accept it.

LXVIII

THE FOLLOWING MORNING, she left the house of the Knauers. She went at once to Salzburg, where her mother received her most cordially. It seemed to Theresa as if her mother had rid herself of all the sickly, confused, and unclean parts of her being, those things which had so often pained Theresa, by putting them into her novels. Now, she had become a charming and reasonable old lady, with whom she could get on delightfully, and whom it was even possible to love.

Her mother expressed the desire of settling in Vienna, as soon as possible. Salzburg failed to provide her with sufficient excitement and an adequate outlet for her energies. Moreover, Karl was now engaged, and she dreamed of passing her old age, surrounded by her grandchildren. She made Theresa tell her about the various families in which she had been employed, and she did not attempt to dissemble her curiosity concerning her daughter's most intimate experiences. She confessed that every year it became more difficult for her to find the right words by which to describe the indispensable love scenes in her novels. Would not Theresa help her in her next novel, by supplying the passionate interludes? In any case, she insisted that Theresa should consider the matter, and examine her manuscript.

Theresa complied, but later declared that it would be impossible for her to gratify her mother's request. Frau Fabiani at first took this as pure rudeness; but, soon thereafter, dropped the matter, without cherishing any malice over her disappointment.

A week later, Theresa went to fetch her child from Vienna, in order to go with him for a time to Ensbach. She was determined to love him; and in this she succeeded, because she could not now think of Robert without bitterness, since her heart was so filled with impossible longing for him.

Alfred met her later, and the two set out on a little journey through the lesser Alps of Styria. Theresa enjoyed the excursion immensely. Alfred had to go back to his hospital in Vienna, so Theresa returned alone to Ensbach.

This time, Frau Leutner insisted that she could keep silent no longer about Franz's misdeeds. His stay in Vienna had not, apparently, done him much good. He had become quite intractable and impudent; he had torn up the flowers from the beds at one of the villas and, worst of all, he had perpetrated all sorts of petty thefts. Franz denied everything. It was true that he had plucked a few flowers. And, yes, he had once pocketed a few kreutzers that Frau Leutner had left on the table — but that was only for a joke!

Theresa was unwilling to take these matters too seriously. She promised Frau Leutner that Franz would change for the better, and she brought him to the point where he was willing to ask the kind-hearted old woman to forgive him. She herself redoubled her love and tenderness toward him. She occupied herself with him the whole day, instructing him and going on long walks with him; and it seemed that, within a few days, his whole nature had improved.

One day Agnes came home on a visit, dressed in her most attractive Sunday clothes, and looking four or five years older than her actual eighteen years. Again, Franz received her with delight. She kissed him as if she were his mother, and yet indifferently, and she winked saucily at Theresa as she did so.

At table, she related all manner of gossip about the noble family for whom she worked as a second chambermaid. She treated Theresa as an equal, asked her where she was now "in service," and dropped hints concerning the things which a young and beautiful girl had to put up with at the hands of young, and particularly old, gentlemen. Without doubt, Theresa could tell a great deal about that!

Theresa, incensed, forbade her to make any further remarks. Agnes became sarcastic, and Frau Leutner had to interfere, in order to prevent a quarrel.

“Come, Franz!” Agnes said; and the two of them ran away.

Theresa wept bitterly. Frau Leutner consoled her.

Later, visitors came. Then Agnes and Franz returned, and the latter, just before her early departure, came up to Theresa and extended her hand.

“Don’t be angry,” she said. “I didn’t mean anything!”

And thus peace was reëstablished.

Meanwhile, the time was fast approaching when it would be necessary for Theresa to look about for another situation. She made an attempt to secure an appointment in a school, but was unsuccessful, due to the fact that she had not taken the necessary examinations. She once more determined not to neglect this matter. Meanwhile, she did what she had so often done before — read the advertisements in the newspapers and wrote letters of application to the most promising addresses.

Now, more than ever, this struck her as wretched and pointless. It often occurred to her that Alfred might be of greater assistance than he actually was. The least he could do was to watch for chance advertisements which might interest her. But in all these matters pertaining to her work, he took no interest at all. Nor did he return to Ensbach to seek her.

LXIX

AT LENGTH, THERESA secured a position in the house of a bank director, who had two daughters, aged eight and ten. She had firmly resolved never again to allow her heart and soul to become engaged by her charges. Hereafter, she would always bear in mind the fact that she was a stranger, and she would always make it her business to remain one.

Nevertheless, only a few days had passed when she began to take an interest in the younger girl, who was of an affectionate and pliable nature. To offset this, she resolutely hardened her heart against the elder one.

The bank director was a man of fifty or more, still what one might term handsome, and not without a certain inclination to dandyism. He was in the habit of choosing his words very carefully, and he had a peculiar way of looking at one — almost coquettishly. He had a way, too, of brushing against Theresa whenever he passed her and of blowing his breath down her neck.

Theresa was certain she could have him, if she liked, for his wife was an ailing, rather elderly person, who was not too scrupulous about her appearance. It made Theresa bitter to reflect that this woman could go to bed and rest whenever she pleased, whereas she, Theresa, who after all was a woman, too, had no such privileges and was given consideration by no one.

She remembered an occasion years ago, when she had really been very ill, yet had been forced to go out in terrible weather and fetch the children home from school. After that, she had come near to being very ill indeed. Formerly, she had taken such conditions as the unavoidable accompaniment of her profession; now, she felt quite differently about it, although she could make no open manifestation of her sentiments.

When she spoke of these things to Alfred, he would point out her unjustness and her occasional exaggeration, and would seek by her words to inspire her to a greater kindliness and attention. Then she would accuse him of being the son of a good bourgeois family, and say that, never having known any worries, he had a greater feeling of kinship with a Jewish banker than he had with her. She would declare that he was heartless and egotistical, and sometimes she would even go so far as to accuse him of being the cause of all her misfortunes, because he had abandoned her when she was still a young and innocent girl. Alfred would receive these recriminations with a shrug of his shoulders — a gesture which would make her simply furious. Thus, their meetings became less and less frequent, and were more and more characterized by quarrels and ill-temper.

She found a place for her son in a nearby suburban district called Liebhartstal, where she had arranged with another tailor's family to take care of him. Theresa no longer thought of having her son go to high school, so she took fate as it came, and had Franz apprenticed to the tailor while he was still attending the lower grades.

It seemed to her that he was developing a more agreeable disposition than he had exhibited in the last year. His master was a kind-hearted man, although somewhat addicted to drink; and neither he nor his wife had anything to say against Franz's character or actions. He got on well, too, with the somewhat older son of his new guardians.

One day, Alfred surprised Theresa with the information that he was about to depart for a small university town in Germany, there to study under a famous psychiatrist. He himself seemed to think that their separation would not be for long; but she, although she betrayed her conviction by no sign, realized that the end for them had come. Nevertheless, she now treated Alfred with a tenderness and a confidence which she had not shown toward him in many months.

In his first letters, Alfred exhibited more candour and joyousness than he had been able to summon at their last meeting, but there was not a hint of love in even the most familiar passages. Theresa, half unconsciously, half purposely, tempered the style of her own letters accordingly.

When summer came, she went with the banker's wife and children to a comfortable villa near Vienna, where she was just beginning to recover her good spirits, under the influence of the friendliness of her employers and the gaiety of the children, when a short letter from the tailor's wife informed her that they could no longer keep Franz in their house.

"Shall I ever have any peace?" Theresa thought. She at once asked for a short leave of absence, made the trip to Vienna and, at Liebhartstal, was hardly astonished at being informed that Franz was "altogether rotten," and that he had led the tailor's son into "all kinds of mischief."

She was told that Franz's teacher wished to speak with her. Theresa went to him and found a clever, friendly little man, who counselled her to take her son back to the country, where he would be in healthier surroundings. Although she was determined not to take anything which her child might do too much to heart, this advice shocked her deeply, and she was unable to rid herself of a feeling of bitter regret that she had not had the courage, while there had yet been time, to seek out the accommodating woman who might have spared her all the cares and vexations which she had since suffered. And a dull anger arose within her, such as she had not suspected herself capable of, against the long forgotten, ridiculous, and almost nonexistent Kasimir Tobisch. She was fully capable, she felt, of doing him physical harm if he should ever again offend her sight.

She conceived the idea of having her son adopted by some childless couple — Alfred had sometimes casually suggested this but each time she had indignantly rejected the idea — and thus be entirely relieved of her trouble. But she had no sooner begun to consider this plan than her mood changed. She was overwhelmed with a motherly sympathy for this poor lad, who was, after all, not to blame for his nature and his fate, and who, in other circumstances, might have developed into a fine and capable young man. She was more conscious of the enormity of her sin than she had ever been before.

She had so often failed her child! She had so often preferred strange children to him — children who surpassed him in nothing, save in the good fortune of having been brought up in better homes, and of being better cared for and more healthfully influenced than her own child.

One hot summer day, as the dust of the city blew through the poor suburb out toward the hills, Theresa sat with her boy on a bench by the side of the street and talked very plainly to him. She thought she saw the light of resolution — yes, regret — in his eyes, and she was suddenly filled with renewed hope. He moved closer to her, and she began to feel that the stubbornness in his heart was beginning to yield.

She ceased to despair and, with sudden inspiration, asked him if he would like, in the future, to live with his mother.

Tears came to her eyes when she heard him exclaim, with genuine joy, that he loved no one but her, and that he could not endure it to be alone with other people. And he would gladly learn more, but his teachers did not like him, and treated him so that he had no desire to please them. It was a lie that he had stolen a piece of cloth from the tailor's wife. Frau Leutner, in Ensbach, had lied, too. His mother should hear what she and Agnes had told Herr Leutner about her. There were lots of things that he could tell.

And as for his master's wife, she was a bitch! Theresa was astounded at her son's language, and forbade him ever to use such a word again. But Franz, not heeding her, went on to tell her of a teamster who often came to the house and what went on then; and Theresa was forced to listen to words and expressions which she had never heard before. She continually interrupted him, to make him alter his speech; and finally, she was constrained to change the subject altogether.

Her heart was oppressed by a dreary sadness, as she retraced her steps along the dusty street. She still held his hand in hers, but gradually her fingers relaxed and slipped from his grasp, and she was all alone. She took Franz back to the tailor's home for this last night, and herself went to a local inn, after a fruitless search for a place to lodge her son. Before going to bed, she wrote a detailed letter to Alfred, speaking to him openly as to a friend.

The next day, she felt more calm. She was fortunate in discovering a small, neat room for Franz, in the home of a childless couple. She felt then that she had fulfilled her duty to him, and returned to the country. A few weeks of comparative leisure gave her an opportunity of recovering herself. The banker had gone on a long journey. The girls gave her very little trouble. She was scarcely ever disturbed by the banker's wife or his children, and so she passed whole days, reading and sleeping in the shady garden, whose walls shut in the house and its inhabitants and protected them from the harsh world outside.

LXX

IN THE AUTUMN, Frau Fabiani moved to Vienna, where she at first found accommodations in a boarding house. Her son had meanwhile married the daughter of his landlord in a small Austrian city, where he had served for a short time as an assistant doctor. Now he had established himself as a general practitioner in Vienna. Politics, however, still remained his principal interest.

Since he had been relieved of his material cares, Karl had become more genial and approachable, as Theresa was able to note when she once chanced to meet him in her mother's rooms. His young wife, who was also present, proved to be a pretty creature, and sympathetic, if limited and somewhat provincial in her ways. She went up to Theresa at once and, with ingenuous kindliness, invited her to visit her new home.

Thus Theresa, who, a few weeks before, had not the slightest expectation of such an eventuality, had the pleasure of dining in the house of Dr. Faber, as her brother was now legally known. The evening passed perfunctorily and without embarrassment, but Theresa felt little of the spirit of family relationship. After all, she was a stranger everywhere, and this meal en famille left her with an unpleasant after-taste.

She did not see her son more often than she had before.

The pensioned official, Mauerhold, who, with his wife, had undertaken the care of Franz, had not done so for any pecuniary gain, but because they had lost their only child a few years before, and longed, in their approaching old age, for the presence of a young person in the house.

It seemed as if their constant thoughtfulness and care exercised a beneficial influence upon Franz's character. Theresa heard nothing ill concerning him, either from the Mauerholds or from his teachers. It did not greatly disturb her that Alfred's letters were constantly becoming more reserved. She had the feeling of satisfaction which arises from duty well accomplished, and from the circumstance that her presence in the banker's house was becoming more and more indispensable by reason of the failing health of his wife.

Sometimes she indulged a momentary thought of the possibility of marrying one of the men who visited the house: the doctor, for instance — an old bachelor; or the widowed brother of the banker, both of whom casually courted her. She knew she might take advantage of these situations, if she were to make some consistent effort to do so. But, in matters of love, she abhorred the idea of employing skill and guile; and so she permitted these opportunities to pass, without once accusing herself for her laxness.

Once, she answered an advertisement for a housekeeper to a well-to-do widower, forty-odd years of age. The answer which she received was so disgusting that she took care never to lay herself open to such an experience again.

LXXI

ONE SPRING DAY, as she was walking with her two girls in the Stadtpark, she met Sylvia, whom she had not seen in several years. She was sitting in the sun with her charge, an eight-year-old boy. Sylvia seemed delighted at meeting Theresa again, and told her how she had passed several years in Rumania, and had only recently had a position on an estate in Hungary. She did not appear changed in the least. She looked just a little faded, but, on the whole, more charming than when Theresa had first known her.

On their next meeting, Sylvia unexpectedly proposed that they should spend their next Sunday together. She had an appointment for that day with a close friend of hers, a student-officer, who wished to bring along a comrade. Theresa glanced at Sylvia with a surprised and almost indignant expression, but Sylvia only smiled.

It was a beautiful spring day. The two governesses sat on a bench near the lake, while the children entrusted to their care fed the swans. Sylvia at once began telling of her affair. She had met her soldier friend the last winter, at a masked ball — yes, she went to masked balls! — and he was a handsome, blond, rather short, and very happy-go-lucky fellow. He would doubtless remain in the service, and not return to his student life, for he preferred the Army to the University. When she had mentioned to him her recent meeting of an old friend, he had at once suggested a little foursome. They would take a row-boat up one of the branches of the Danube. Then they would go somewhere to eat — either on Mount Constantine, or else in their favourite coffee house. Well, there was no point in laying out a programme, for everything would take care of itself. Theresa declined. Sylvia insisted, until finally they agreed to let the weather decide for them.

When Theresa awoke, on the morning of the following Sunday, and saw the sky covered with dark clouds, she was somewhat disappointed. In the afternoon, however, the weather cleared up, and Sylvia came at an early hour to fetch Theresa. The two proceeded to the Prater Circle, where the two gentlemen awaited them smoking cigarettes, near the monument of Admiral Tegethof.

They greeted the ladies with consummate courtesy, and really looked quite elegant in their uniforms. Practiced gallants, thought Theresa; and, at first glance, the short, blond fellow who was Sylvia's lover, pleased her rather more than the other. The second man reminded her of Kasimir Tobisch, by his spare figure and his long, sallow face. He wore a dark moustache and a small beard, such as the Austrian student-officers and officers in general were certainly not in the habit of affecting. His slender, almost too thin fingers held a peculiar, inexplicable fascination for Theresa.

Both gentlemen thanked her for having come. Sylvia at once led the conversation, in her lively and joyous way. Every one spoke French. The blond fellow was very fluent. The other spoke with difficulty, but his accent was meticulously correct.

They walked down the main road, but the crowd was so great — its odour none too good, as this man added — that they soon turned into a by-path which led beneath tall trees with delicate green foliage to a quieter section of the park. The blond officer recounted some experiences which he had had while shooting in Hungary, on the estate of a nobleman, whose guest he had been the year before. Sylvia mentioned the name of an aristocrat whose acquaintance she had made during her stay in Hungary. Her friend ventured a bold insinuation, which she received with bursts of laughter, replying in kind.

Theresa and her escort remained somewhat in the rear. He spoke to her of more serious matters, in a low voice, which at times struck her as being intentionally mysterious. He had allowed his monocle to fall out of his eye, and looked ahead with an indifferent air from under his reddened eyelids.

He found it difficult to believe that Theresa was a Viennese. She looked so much more like an Italian — yes, a chestnut-brown Italian, from Lombardy. Theresa nodded, not without pride. Yes, her lather was really ol an old Italian family, and her mother had come from the Croatian nobility. Richard expressed surprise that she should be a governess. Surely, there were professions better suited to one of her birth and capabilities. With her brilliant eyes and dark complexion, she would have gone far on the stage. In any case, he was at a loss to comprehend how any one could choose such a servitude of her own free will, since certainly she had not been forced to undertake it.

Theresa was again strongly reminded of Kasimir Tobisch, who, years ago, had employed the very same words. She looked away, and Richard went on, in still more emphatic fashion:

"To have only a few hours of liberty, every holiday! It is positively incomprehensible how any one can endure such an existence!"

Theresa felt the passion beneath his speech, although he had not shown any emotion on his face.

They had coffee and cookies on Mount Constantine. The two men made several sarcastic remarks at the expense of the "low" people at the other tables. Theresa did not see anything particularly wrong with the crowd about her. It occurred to her that their escorts forgot that the two poor creatures with whom they were sitting must likewise be considered among the lower multitude.

They descended the hill and rented a row-boat at the lake which lay at the foot of the hill. Theresa could feel that the gentlemen considered it rather sport to mingle thus with the lower classes; a kind of patronizing condescension on their part, to be willing to row their boat along among the many other boats in which were the inferior creatures. Gradually, they pushed their boat into one of the narrow branches of the river which serpentined along through the meadows between the green shores.

Sylvia smoked a cigarette, and Theresa, who had not tried one since her evenings in Salzburg among the officers and actresses, made another attempt, but liked it no better than she had before. Her escort, observing her distaste, took the cigarette from her fingers and smoked it himself. He ceased rowing, leaving the job to his blond comrade. It would do the boy good, he remarked, what with his tendency to lay on flesh.

On the shores, beneath the lofty and ancient trees, lay amorous couples and family groups. Presently, they came to a lonelier and more quiet stretch. Finally, they went ashore, securing their boat to one of the posts provided for the purpose along the shore. Then they walked on further through the bushes, which became thicker and thicker, toward the meadows. They went two by two, clinging to one another. They crossed one broad road, and then at once found themselves in a path that brought them with surprising rapidity into what seemed the far-removed heart of a deep forest. It was magical!

Sylvia went on with her blond friend. They were holding each other closely. Richard suddenly stopped and kissed Theresa passionately on the mouth. She made no resistance whatever. He began at once to talk very seriously, as though what had just happened had no particular meaning. At a casual question from Theresa, he began to tell about himself.

He was studying law, and was going to be a lawyer. Theresa expressed surprise. She had thought that he wished to become a professional officer, like his friend. He shook his head, almost contemptuously. He was not even considering that idea. Besides, a military career necessitated a great deal of money, and he was really quite a poor devil. That was not to be taken too literally, to be sure; but, in comparison with his blond comrade, he was a beggar. Far ahead, the loud laughter of that fortunate gentleman was audible.

"Always jolly," Richard observed, "and for all that, he has a fixed idea that he is melancholy!"

A young couple went past them. The girl, a well-dressed, pretty blond, stared at Richard with such evident pleasure that Theresa felt flattered.

A cool, moist, sweet-odoured breeze was wafted to them from the near-by stream. The path grew fainter and fainter, until it disappeared. They had to push the branches out of their way. Sylvia gaily called back to Theresa:

"A la fin je voudrais savoir, où ces deux scélérats nous mènent," she cried.

But Theresa had lost all sense of direction. Now and then, they could see the river, glistening through the bull-rushes; and then, at a turn, they had lost sight of it again. From somewhere came the long, drawn-out whistle of a locomotive. Close by, an invisible train rattled over a bridge. Theresa had the feeling that she had lived through all this once before, she could not remember where or when.

Sylvia and her escort had quite disappeared, though one could still hear occasional laughter, giggling, and low cries of simulated resistance. Theresa could almost feel the frightened expression of her face. Richard was looking at her, smiling. He threw down his cigarette and stepped on it. Then he took Theresa in his arms and kissed her. He held her tightly, while he penetrated further into the bull-rushes and finally drew her down with himself.

To her surprise, Sylvia's laughter now sounded quite close. With terror in her eyes, she looked up at Richard and shook her head vigorously. His face was dark and strange.

"No one can see us," he said.

She heard Sylvia's voice again, asking her a bold, shameless question. How dare she! Theresa thought. But, suddenly encircled by Richard's arms, she heard herself answering. She heard her own voice uttering words almost as loose and impudent as those which Sylvia had spoken. What has happened to me? she wondered.

Richard brushed back the hair from her moist brow and whispered delicate and passionate phrases into her ear. Far away in the distance, a wagon rattled over the cobblestones. She could not see the river, but the dark, blue sky overhead appeared to her as some strange reflection of the Danube.

Later, when they had emerged from the thicket and again found the small path, she nestled close to her companion, whom she had not known three hours ago, and who was now her lover. He spoke of unimportant matters.

"The races are over, I suppose. They are the first that I have ever missed!"

When she looked up to him, as if hurt, he stroked her head and kissed her gently on the brow.

"Are you sorry?" he asked. Then he added: "Silly girl!"

They left the meadows and approached the broad avenue where carriages and cabs went by, veiled in dust. They reached the river, found their boat, and rowed back to the place from which they had started. Theresa was at first afraid, lest she should discover some indelicate or frivolous reflection in Sylvia's eyes; but, to her pleasant surprise, Sylvia was unusually serious and calm.

Her friend began to talk bravely of a voyage which the four of them might easily take during the coming summer. All of them realized, of course, how idle his chatter was. Richard even did not hesitate to condemn travel in general. He could not endure the unpleasantness invariably connected with any change of location; and, worst of all, there was the spectacle of strange faces. His comrade returned that he had no particular affection for acquaintances, as it was. Richard made no reply.

Sylvia insisted that there were, nevertheless, moments in one's life that were worth the trouble. Richard shrugged his shoulders. That did not alter matters. Fundamentally, everything was sad. Beauty, more than everything else; and for that reason, love was the saddest thing of all. The truth of his observation struck Theresa deeply. She shivered slightly, and tears came to her eyes. Richard put his small, cool hands on her forehead. It was growing quite dark when they reached their starting-point, landed, and found themselves among crowds along the avenue. The broad street was still jammed with carriages. The music of a dozen orchestras on every side of them mingled together. All the inns were crowded. The two couples walked on into a quieter section, and presently reached the same modest restaurant where, years ago, as a princess or a lady of the court, Theresa had sat with a ghost — or was it a fool?

She recognized the waiter at once. He looked absolutely unchanged as he rushed from one table to another, just as she remembered him, almost as if he were the only person in the world who had not felt the passage of years. Am I only dreaming this? Theresa wondered again; and she glanced quickly at her escort, in order to assure herself that it was not Kasimir Tobisch with whom she stood. And she looked again at the waiter, who, with his napkin dangling from his arm, was running from table to table. How many Sundays since that one! Theresa thought. How many couples have been here since then; how many so-called blissful hours; how much actual misery; how many children, legitimate and illegitimate! And again the whole stupidity of her fate, the total incomprehensibility of life in general, oppressed her. And the young man who was beside her was, strangely enough, the first person who had at once instinctively understood her, although they had spoken not at all of the indecisions of her heart. And she felt nearer and less a stranger to this man, to whom she had given herself in the very first hour of their acquaintance and who did not despise her for her weakness — she was certain of this — than she had ever felt toward Alfred, or any other man.

They stopped at one of the more quiet inns for their evening meal. Theresa drank more than she was accustomed to, and soon became so weary that she could hardly keep her eyes open, and the conversation of the others became only a murmurous drone in her ears. She was anxious to tell her friend of the things which had come into her mind a short time before, but no opportunity presented itself as they walked homeward.

The separation took place abruptly. The gentlemen remarked that they were due at manoeuvers at four o'clock in the morning, so, at the very next cab stand, they put the ladies in an open carriage. Richard paid their fare in advance. Another appointment was rapidly agreed upon for the Sunday following the next. Richard politely kissed Theresa's hand and said "Au revoir"; and as he did so, she noted, with wide, frightened eyes, his cool and distant glance.

On the ride homeward through the deserted streets, she let Sylvia speak. The latter was suddenly overflowing with undesired confessions. Theresa scarcely listened. A bitter after-taste remained with her. She thought, with curious compassion, of her lover; and it seemed to her as if they had parted for ever, as if he were already far away.

LXXII

A FEW DAYS later, a letter from Herr Mauerhold begged her to pay him and his wife a visit, at her very earliest convenience. Theresa had not seen her Franz for three weeks, and she fell at once into a state of violent excitement. Herr Mauerhold received her in a most cordial fashion, but it was plain that he was embarrassed. He declared, after some hesitation, that, in view of the fact that he and his wife intended to leave Vienna and settle in some small town of lower Austria, he was obliged to ask Theresa to take her child away.

Theresa drew a sigh of relief. She expressed the idea that it might be better for Franz to be out of the big city and in some small country town, and she declared her willingness to have the boy remain with them even after their removal. Her son seemed to be getting on with them so well!

The couple's embarrassment was now very plain, and Theresa had to urge them not to conceal the truth from her, before they would inform her that Franz had recently perpetrated a small theft. Thereupon, Frau Mauerhold, who had thus far kept silent, burst out into a long complaint. Franz's thefts were not the worst thing. The boy had all manner of bad habits and disagreeable ways, of which she would rather not say anything. There were complaints from the school, too. He went about with the very worst boys of the neighbourhood, stayed out until all hours of the night, and there was no surmising what the eleven-year-old boy would eventually come to, if he showed such reprehensible traits so early.

Theresa sat with bowed head, as though she herself were the accused. Well, yes, she realized that her proposal to have them keep the lad was impossible. She would wait until he had returned from school, and take him with her immediately. Herr Mauerhold, first glancing at his wife, expressed the opinion that there was really no necessity for such haste. They would not mind keeping the child for a few days more, while Theresa looked about for a new home. Theresa was surprised to see tears in the good man's eyes. It was his turn now to console Theresa. He had known many children who had been worthless rascals at this critical age, but had eventually developed into quite respectable people.

The hour at which Franz should have returned had long since passed. Theresa had asked for only a short leave, and could wait no longer. She thanked the Mauerholds, and promised to look round at once for a new place for Franz. On the way home, she became more calm, and decided to consult some one on her predicament. But whom? Ought she take her mother into her confidence? Should she write to Alfred? What could they do for her? No, she had to decide everything for herself. She alone could solve her own problems.

The next day, however, she chanced to meet Sylvia in the Stadtpark; and, though she was the last person whom Theresa would have chosen under other circumstances to take into her confidence, in her present anxiety she was glad to find a compassionate soul. She poured out her heart to her friend. She told Sylvia more than she had ever told anyone.

Fortunately, Sylvia proved to be a kind, resourceful, and helpful person in this emergency. She urged Theresa to give up her present position, and not to undertake similar work any more. Instead, she was to take a small furnished apartment and give private lessons. Sylvia pledged herself to find her a few pupils very shortly, and in the meanwhile, she put herself and her means completely at Theresa's disposal. She always had "a little something" put away, she declared, with a roguish smile which Theresa did not much like to see. Nevertheless, she thanked Sylvia for her advice and for her offer.

And so, with new industry and energy, she at once set to work to put the new plan into operation. The banker's family received her notice with great surprise. The two girls were both sorry to see her leave, and the eldest especially, wept disconsolately. Theresa's heart was touched to see how, without having suspected it, she had aroused so great a love in the young girl.

LXIII

ON A SULTRY day in August, Theresa and Franz moved to the two furnished rooms and kitchen which they had rented. The rather new and modest, but neatly-kept house where they began their life in common was situated in an easily accessible, but quite suburban street.

Before making this move, Theresa resorted to every possible device to secure a few pupils, and in this she had been successful, by dint of answering advertisements, by approaching all the families where she had formerly held a position, and largely through Sylvia's aid. At the worst, these pupils assured her against starvation. The banker's wife had given her a small sum of money as a parting gift, and this came in most handily in her emergency.

It really meant a great deal to Theresa to find herself, for the first time in her life, in the possession of a home. It seemed to her that all her son lacked for his proper development was a life in common with his mother. The school which he now attended was so far distant from his former one that the possibility of his meeting old acquaintances was slight.

As usual, he did not behave badly during the first few weeks at his new residence. To her, it seemed almost as if she were just beginning to learn to know her child. Certain of his childish traits, which had disappeared too early in his life, now gradually reappeared. And was it not delightful to sit down to a noon-hour meal with him, a meal which she herself had prepared; and how marvelous to come home in the evening, after her lessons, and to be greeted by his wild embraces! Her heart swelled with pride when he asked her assistance with some difficult passage in his home-work.

She felt satisfied, almost happy. She began to write to Alfred again, urged by some inner need for some one to confide in. She told him in detail of her new life; and he replied, announcing his approaching return to Vienna, where he was to be an assistant doctor in a psychiatric clinic.

LXXIV

ONE DAY, THERESA was surprised at receiving an invitation to dine with her brother. It had been a year since she had heard from him. She found two guests there — a young doctor, and a professor in a gymnasium — both, as the conversation indicated, political friends of Dr. Karl Faber.

Karl led the conversation. The other two, even the professor, who was at least ten years older than he, listened respectfully. Theresa felt that her brother somewhat hoped to impress her with his importance in his party.

Her sister-in-law, who had become a mother a few months before, left the table at the conclusion of the meal, while Theresa remained in the company of the gentlemen. The conversation became more friendly and intimate, and soon passed to the subject of Theresa's profession and her experiences as a governess and teacher. The professor did not conceal his regret that Theresa had been obliged to serve in a subordinate capacity, almost as a servant, in the houses of strangers; and he declared that the law ought to prevent such situations, once and for all time. The professor spoke clearly and precisely, in contrast to the young doctor, who continually lapsed into stuttering. Theresa's brother, however, though he now and then nodded with approval, often glanced sarcastically in the professor's direction. Theresa long remembered the crafty, malicious expression in his eyes.

She had not heard from Richard in weeks — months, in fact — and she was almost happy to be able to forget him, when she received a letter from Sylvia, inviting her to go out "avec nos jeunes amis de l'autre jour." Her first impulse was to decline. She was accustomed now to spending all her evenings at home with her son. But Sylvia came to her in person to repeat the invitation, and Theresa allowed herself to be persuaded.

The evening began calmly enough but became more and more wild as it proceeded, and ended in the most flagrant manner. When Theresa came home, early in the morning, she found her son sleeping peacefully in his bed; and this she took as an unexpected and unmerited stroke of luck. Neither she nor Richard had anything but good feeling for each other, yet she determined never to see him again.

The invitation to her brother's house was repeated, now and then, and there Theresa often encountered the professor, who now adopted a clumsily gallant attitude toward her, and would not be denied the privilege of accompanying her all the long distance to her home.

A few days after one of these meetings, her brother acquainted her with the fact that the professor was very much interested in her, and would very probably declare his intentions with due formality on the next appropriate occasion. His brotherly advice was not to reject him with too much finality, even if she found herself bound elsewhere at the moment.

"I am not engaged," Theresa replied, curtly and severely.

Karl did not seem to notice her tone, and went on to explain that the professor was well liked by his superiors, and would doubtless soon be appointed director of a gymnasium in some fairly large city in the provinces.

"And," he added, "so as to consider everything while we are at it, I may remark that the difficulty which you are thinking of would not stand in your way."

Theresa felt the blood mounting to her cheeks.

"You never bothered about my thoughts before. Why should they interest you now?"

He did not seem to heed her anger. Undisturbed, he pursued his argument.

"The matter could be explained thus: you were once married, but it developed that the marriage was illegal. Such cases actually do happen. You are, so to speak, absolutely innocent."

He blinked past her.

Theresa objected.

"I will be responsible for what I have done, and I will never deny my child. I would never have denied him to you, either. But did you ask me?"

"You needn't become excited. It is exactly for the reason that you need not deny your child that I thought of the illegal marriage. You ought to thank me!"

Before she could reply, he went on, vehemently.

"Your mother would certainly be glad to know that your circumstances were more assured!"

Theresa reflected quickly. Why not? The man proposed by her brother she regarded with indifference, but she by no means despised him. Did she not owe it to her son not to allow such an opportunity to pass? Her brother began to set forth the advantages of such a marriage. The position of her husband would enable her all the better to pursue her own profession. She need not give it up. On the contrary, a professor was exactly the right man for her.

Her sister-in-law entered at this moment, carrying her child in her arms. Theresa took it, and recalled the first weeks of her own son's life — those piteous, scanty hours when she had been able to press him against her breast. And she thought that, in her new, real marriage, she might have another child and enjoy to the full the happiness which had been denied to her when Franz had been born.

Then it occurred to her that her thoughts were unjust and disloyal to her son. All the other injustices that she had been guilty of in her actions toward her son rose in her mind. Tears came to her eyes, even as she still held her brother's baby. She felt incapable of pursuing the conversation, and left the house in a painfully disturbed condition.

A few days later, she accidentally met Richard. In his civilian clothes, he appeared very elegant, and yet as though he had come down in the world somewhat. His overcoat fitted him perfectly, but the velvet collar was a little worn, and his well-made shoes were cracked. His monocle was fixed immovably in his eye. He kissed her hand and asked her, almost without any preliminaries, if she would not spend the evening with him. She declined. He did not urge her, but on the chance, gave her the address of his parents, with whom he lived. She wrote to him the very next day.

It was a strange meeting. She did not really understand why he had insisted upon dining in a private room of an exclusive restaurant, for he acted very reserved and scarcely even touched her hand. She liked him all the better for that. He spoke a great deal about himself. His understanding with his parents was not of the best. His father, a well-known attorney, was generally dissatisfied with him. He was quite right, too. He had never gotten on with his mother. He casually termed her a silly goose, which rather frightened Theresa. He was soon to undergo a third state examination, and he asked himself what it was all about. He never intended to be a lawyer or a judge.

He had no serious ambitions at all. That was because he really had no particular talent, and nothing in the world amused him very much. Theresa observed that his remarks did not correspond with his nature. If he was so indifferent to the whole world, how could he attach as much importance as he obviously did to the selection of his necktie?

He looked at her with a certain pity, which wounded her; and she experienced a burning desire to convince him of the fact that she was quite capable of understanding such seemingly conflicting characteristics. But she could not find the right words.

After the meal, he took her home in an open carriage. They had not been together for more than an hour. He kissed her hand very politely, and she was sure that she would never see him again.

Nevertheless, she received a letter from him within a few days. She was more delighted than she had thought she would be to receive an invitation from him. This time, he was an entirely different person. He was gay almost to boisterousness and, for the first time, he exhibited a little interest in her personal life.

He made her tell him of her youth, of her parents, of her seducer, and of her other lovers. She also revealed to him the existence of her child, and confessed that she frequently neglected her duty toward her boy. He shrugged his shoulders almost angrily. There were no duties, he declared. No one owed anything to any one else. Children owed nothing to their parents, and parents nothing to their children.

The whole business was a fraud. All people were egoists; only, they would not confess it to themselves. Besides, what he chiefly wanted to tell her was that he had won at the races what to him was quite a sum of money. That ought to interest her more than anything else.

What he proposed to do, after this stroke of good fortune, was to follow up his luck at Monte Carlo the coming winter. He had thought up a system of breaking the bank. After all, money was the only thing worth having. Money gave one power over people. When you possess it, you can put people in their places. And she was to come with him — to Monte Carlo. She would get along there; she could be sure of that, though not as a teacher, of course!

She spoke against his plans, but could not prevent the charm of the adventure from wholly enthralling her. And she was very happy that evening.

A letter from Alfred, which arrived the next morning, completely destroyed her mood. The world appeared dull again, and the future dismal. She had told him of the probable proposal of marriage from the professor, and Alfred urged her to consider the matter carefully; but from the way he worded his letter, it was plain that he would not be sorry to see her married and himself freed from any responsibility which he might have incurred in consequence of his affair with her. Theresa replied to him in a cold, almost sarcastic letter.

LXXV

SHE CONTINUED TO be tolerably contented with Franz. Whenever she came home, she invariably found him seated and pondering over his hooks and notes. Of his early unruliness, but little remained. If he occasionally showed a tendency to cast politeness aside, or forget himself, a warning on her part generally sufficed to convince him of his error. She was accordingly most disagreeably surprised when, at the end of the school term, he brought home his report card which, in addition to having very low marks, showed that he had missed no small number of hours at school. There, to her dismay, she learned that, during the past several months, he had attended classes only sporadically. The class instructor brought forth written excuses bearing her signature.

Theresa was careful not to admit them to be forgeries.

She, on the contrary, maintained that her boy had been ill this year; she took it on herself to see that he caught up with his studies. All she asked on their part was patience.

At home, she took him to task. He was at first stubborn; then, he proved impudent; finally, he simply fled from the room and house. It was late at night when he returned and immediately flung himself on the couch in the living room that served in place of a regular bed. His mother sat nearby, entreating him to reveal to her where he had been during his absence. He refused to answer, sullenly staring at the wall. Only now and then she intercepted a sinister flash from his eyes, a look in which Theresa this time recognized not only stubbornness, not only a lack of understanding and a poverty of love, but bitterness, derision, and even a hidden reproach, which he might not wish, out of a last vestige of respect for her, to utter.

And from this sombre glance, a memory, far-off and blurred, returned to her. She strove to dispel it, but ever it loomed nearer, growing more living. Now, for the first time in a long while, she bethought herself of the night when she had given birth to him — that night when she had first supposed her new-born babe dead, had wished him dead. Wished — had she only wished? Her heart froze with terror, lest the boy, who had turned away and pulled the covers up over his head, might again penetrate her with his knowing, hating, deadly glance.

So she rose, stood trembling for a short space, her breath held tight; then tiptoed into her room. Now she was certain that this child, this twelve-year-old boy, not only lived as a stranger, but as an enemy beside her. And never before had she at one and the same time realized how unhappily she loved him, and yet how forlorn was any expectation on her part of her boy returning that love. Still, she could not yet abandon him as lost. All that she had neglected to do, her every act of thoughtlessness, her wrong and guilt — these things she must rectify, must atone for. She must be prepared for sacrifices far more difficult than any that she had yet made. And if she could find the opportunity to provide him with better surroundings than he had yet known, the possibility of entrusting him to fatherly supervision, she had no right to hesitate. The sacrifice — was it, after all, so tremendous? Might not such a marriage bring salvation to herself, as well?

So that, when Professor Wilnus, purposely left alone with her after lunch, on the occasion of their next meeting at the house of her brother, asked Theresa if she would marry him, she first hesitated an instant, then, steadily regarding him, asked:

“Do you know me well enough? Do you know who it is that you propose to marry?”

With an embarrassed nod, he awkwardly reached for her hand. She withdrew it, and asked:

“Do you know that I have a child, a rather difficult boy of almost thirteen? Whatever gossip you may have heard, the truth is that I was never married."

The professor frowned; he blushed, as if some one had related a bawdy joke. But he quickly recovered his poise: "Your brother told me something," he said. "But he gave no details. Yet, I can say that I expected something like this."

He paced up and down the room, his hands behind his back. Then he stopped before her. With well chosen words, as if in walking he had studied a little speech, he made her a definite proposal. Under no circumstances must the fact of a child interfere with their future.

"What do you mean by that?"

He explained. There existed childless couples who desired nothing better than to adopt some child. And if they carefully...

She interrupted abruptly:

"I shall never part with my child!" she exclaimed, her eyes flashing.

The professor, silent, reflected. After several seconds, he remarked, in a clear, noble voice, that he would first like to meet the boy. They might then discuss matters again.

Her first instinct was peremptorily to refuse, and not accept him under any conditions. But her recent resolution soon reverted to her mind; and she declared her willingness to receive the professor the following evening at her home.

Franz she succeeded in detaining; he was on the point of leaving the house, unobserved, as he usually contrived to do at this hour. The professor made his appearance, only faintly concealing his embarrassment under a gay and forcibly worldly manner. Franz contemplated the visitor with obvious distrust. And when he suddenly and surprisingly declared his wish to examine Franz's school report, it was no easy matter to overcome the lad's resistance. That which the eyes of Professor Wilnus beheld was not too favourable. But he was gracious enough to express his displeasure through words of humorous understanding. He next tried to ascertain the extent of the boy's knowledge; he asked all manner of questions, supplying the answers, too, by practically putting them in his mouth; and, in general, comporting himself like a teacher who, for reasons of his own, is anxious not to fail a sorry pupil during the examination.

What he most strongly objected to was Franz's pronunciation, which he characterized as a mixture of suburban dialect and peasant speech. When he casually hinted at his connection, and ventured the possibility of placing the lad in a monastery school in upper Austria, Franz bolted from the room.

His mother knew that he would not soon return. She excused him to the professor. It was his habit, she explained, to spend his evenings in the open with his comrades. The professor appeared to be relieved to be alone with Theresa. She wished to hear no more of the school; and, at last, definitely answering the cautious hint of the professor that it might be possible to find adoptive parents for the boy, she resolutely declared that under no circumstances would she consent to part with her son.

The professor seemed inclined toward leniency. His eyes began to shine. Moving closer to Theresa, he ventured on boldness. Each moment, he became more ridiculous and obnoxious to Theresa. She was wondering whether or not to show him the door, once for all, when there was a knock. To Theresa's surprise, Sylvia, who for weeks had failed to put in an appearance, entered. Following the casual introduction, the professor expressed the hope of seeing Theresa the following Sunday at the house of her brother, and left.

Sylvia was pale and excited. She hurriedly asked Theresa if she had read any of the papers that day?

"What has happened?" Theresa asked.

"Richard has committed suicide!" Sylvia replied.

"For God's sake!" Theresa exclaimed, helplessly letting her hands fall on Sylvia's shoulders.

She had not seen Richard for so long! And with eyes downcast, Sylvia confessed that she had seen him quite frequently. Theresa felt no twinges of jealousy, no real pain. Suddenly, she felt a certain superiority! It was she who must console her friend! She stroked her head and caressed her cheeks. Never had she felt so sisterly, so close to another person.

And Sylvia went on to tell her story. The thing had happened in the early hours of the morning. He had spent the night with her. He had been in particularly high spirits, had escorted her to her door in a carriage, waved to her from the window of the vehicle, and then, while being driven to the Prater, had in that self-same carriage shot himself. She had been expecting this a long time.

"Debts?" Theresa inquired.

No. He had recently been a steady winner at the races. But life disgusted him. People, rather. Almost all people.

"He liked you, Theresa, very much," Sylvia said. "Much, much more than he did me. Do you know why he did not wish to see you any more?"

In great excitement, Theresa took Sylvia's hand and looked questioningly into her eyes.

"'She is too good for me!' Those were his words. 'Trop bonne!'"

Then they both wept.

They entered the church two days later for the consecration. After the ceremony, the funeral procession passed Theresa, who was seated on a bench, far in the rear. Richard's mother, a thin, pale woman in whose reserved, proud features, Theresa thought she recognized something of Richard's expression, passed her so closely that Theresa involuntarily recoiled. At the same time, she felt a deep pain. Sylvia firmly grasped her arm. The funeral procession passed.

She beheld familiar faces there: the bank manager, in whose house she had had her last position, and who stared at her without recognizing her in the half gloom of the church; and a young man who had once been her sweetheart.

As if weeping, she hid her face in her handkerchief. She stared at the coffin as it was borne out of the church door into the open, where a dark, blue, summer light welcomed it. That evening on the banks of the Danube returned to her mind; a few days more, and it would be just three years ago. Too good for him! She wondered. As if she were either too good or bad for any one! She heard, outside, the funeral carriage getting under way. The door closed slowly, and the incense enveloped her.

Sylvia was resting her head on the praying bar, sobbing under her breath. Theresa rose silently and left the place alone. A mild summer day received her. She had to hurry home quickly, for at five o'clock she was expecting pupils.

LXXVI

FOR A TIME, she devoted herself exclusively to her profession, in which she was steadily advancing, by dint of constant labour and through the utilizing of all her spare hours to perfect herself, to the position of a capable and sought-after teacher. She taught and prepared young girls exclusively for their examinations. Two youths who had applied she dismissed, since it was quite apparent that their aims were other than the passion of mastering English and French. A letter from Professor Wilnus, asking permission to visit her again, she had answered with a definite refusal. This she did not for an instant regret, although she occasionally felt that she had some reason to be grateful to him. Since his visit, a temporary change for the better was apparent in Franz's behaviour. He seemed to be attending school regularly, as a casual inquiry of Theresa's revealed. How and with whom he spent his many hours outside the house, she dared not attempt to discover.

She heard nothing from her brother, and was convinced that he resented her refusal of Professor Wilnus. Her mother, too, kept away from her. But for Sylvia's occasional visits at night, she would have been quite alone.

Richard was dropped from their conversation within a surprisingly short time. But they related all kinds of other occurrences of past days, Theresa resorting to hints, Sylvia sometimes expanding her narratives in more than lively descriptions. The men whom the two women had met in the course of their lives did not escape unscathed. Both warmed their hearts on the memories of by-gone days. Sylvia intended to return to her home in southern France as soon as possible. She had not visited it in almost twenty years. What she wished to do there, how she intended to maintain herself — naturally, she had been unable to save anything — she did not know. But her nostalgia for her home had almost assumed the character of a sickness. Tears streamed down the cheeks of this still gay creature whenever she spoke of the place of her birth. At such moments, Theresa noticed how withered and old Sylvia's features had become. It shocked her. But she consoled herself with the conviction that she herself was seven or eight years younger than her companion.

During this epoch of her life, the church again came to stand for an often visited and ever consoling haven. She prayed, or at least fervently wished, that she might continue to remain satisfied with her lot; that Franz might not cause her too much worry; and especially, that passion might never again disturb the quiet current of her life and torment her innermost being.

It happened that, during this summer, she was to prepare a ten-year-old pupil, the youngest girl child of a celebrated actor, for her entrance examinations. To this end, the parents invited Theresa to a summer cottage in the Salzkammergut. Her activities were practically limited to instructing the little girl for several hours each day, most of the time sitting in the garden. An older daughter, not yet eighteen years of age, was in love with a young man, who frequently called. A cousin courted the still attractive lady of the house; and the husband devoted his attention to a sixteen-year-old girl friend of the daughter, a spoiled creature whom he practically pursued.

For Theresa, it was strange to observe how father, mother, and daughter each followed his or her own bent, utterly indifferent to everything else, and mistaking for harmless whims the profound emotions that were causing the others such untold suffering. Her eyes sharpened by so much experience, Theresa viewed this play of passions without herself being touched. She was affected less than a spectator at a theatre, and felt particularly glad that she was done with all such matters of the heart, both outwardly and inwardly.

Indeed, everything seemed to be running smoothly with her. But ultimately, a victim had to fall. The daughter of the house attempted suicide. Now, it was as if they were all rudely shaken from a dangerous dream. Without any painful discussions, these relationships, interwoven as by the play of summer winds, dissolved into an airy nothingness. They left the cottage earlier than they had planned. The entire family went south, Theresa returning to Vienna long before she had anticipated.

She had entrusted her son to the care of a neighbour, the widow of a government employee — a somewhat stupid creature, who was herself the mother of an eight-year-old boy. Although this woman was careful not to speak unfavourably of Franz, she felt obliged to inform Theresa that occasionally he had not come home for several days at a stretch.

Theresa talked to him. He lied so stupidly that Theresa was unable to believe even the most likely things. Upon reproving him, he became more than usually aggressive. But what shocked Theresa most deeply was not his words so much as his gestures and glances. There were no traces of the countenance of a boy remaining; instead, a precocious, spoiled, evil youth insolently stared at her. When Theresa began to talk of school, Franz brazenly declared he could not think of continuing. He had other, more clever plans.

He then discussed his former teachers, in the ugliest terms. A particularly offensive word hurt Theresa so much that she could not restrain herself from slapping his face. His face grew distorted with rage. He lifted his arm to strike her. Theresa could not parry the blow. Franz's fist crashed against her lips, which immediately began to bleed. Paying no heed to her, he rushed out, banging the door after him.

Filled with cruel despair, Theresa remained behind. But she did not weep.

That evening, for the first time in a long while, she again wrote to Alfred. The answer arrived in two days. Alfred counselled sending the boy somewhere to the provinces, as an apprentice, or a clerk, or anything. Her obligations were more than fulfilled. He did not wish her to worry. The most important thing was that she might finally be liberated of her worries and fears. Fears? The word at first seemed strange. But immediately afterwards, she felt that it was the correct one. Alfred, in another paragraph, mentioned that he was now engaged to the daughter of a professor in the University of Tübingen. He would probably return to Vienna with his bride between Christmas and the New Year. But never would he forget what she, Theresa, had meant to him, and what he owed her. She could count on him under all circumstances. The taste of bitterness was in her mouth. But even now, she did not weep.

She had been invited to dinner the coming Sunday at her brother's. Since she need not fear meeting her rejected suitor, she accepted. Karl welcomed her with obvious friendliness. She soon realized that he now favoured her refusal of the professor, who had proven thoroughly unreliable, he having left the Nationalistic party, for opportunistic reasons, to join the Christian-Socialists. He was now a promising candidate for the Board of Aldermen.

Karl next spoke of their mother, who, he claimed, gave him cause for grave concern. What, he asked, does the old lady do with her money, and what does she intend to do with it in the future? It was obvious that she must by now have saved a quite tidy sum. The children, and himself in particular, as the father of a family, had undoubtedly the right to investigate this matter. He wondered if Theresa, who as a single daughter could most gracefully do so, would mind talking over this delicate matter with her mother, and point out that he, Karl, was prepared to take their mother into his home, where she could certainly live more economically than at a boarding house. Although Karl's method of discussing the subject was distinctly offensive to Theresa, she promised to talk to her mother. But she had no intentions of acting on her promise, at least for the time being.

One evening, she encountered Agnes in the middle of the city. Theresa did not at once recognize her. She looked vulgar, almost disreputable. It was unpleasant for Theresa to stop in the street to talk with her. Agnes informed her that she had some time since given up housework, and had secured a position as a saleslady at a perfumery shop. Theresa inquired after the old people. Agnes replied that she but seldom visited Ensbach now. Her father, moreover, had died last summer. Then she asked to be remembered to Franz, and took her leave.

A few days later, uninvited, she called on Theresa. Franz, with whom Theresa had hardly spoken a word since he had lifted his hand against her, and who now only came to the house for meals, and then late, happened, surprisingly enough, to be home. He greeted Agnes, not without embarrassment. But this he quickly lost in the face of her unconstraint. Soon the pair were hardly paying any attention at all to Theresa, but were conversing in some sort of familiar street dialect, which she could barely follow. They exchanged memories of Ensbach, with secret hints which they felt fairly certain that Theresa would not understand.

Sometimes, however, Agnes, with her daring, crooked glance, grinned at Theresa. In her look, one could clearly read the taunting boast: Do you think he belongs to you? Well, he's mine!

Finally, and in a coarsely friendly fashion, she shook Theresa's hand and departed. Without saying a word to his mother, Franz rejoined her. How he looked in his cheap, not at all boyish suit, with the checkered trousers, the too short jacket, and his red, seamed handkerchief! How pale, how vile... and yet, his face was not bad looking. A boy? No! That he decidedly no longer was. He seemed to be sixteen or seventeen years old. A young man? That word hardly fitted him, either. Another term forced itself on her mind, but she resolutely banished it. Her breast shook heavily with repressed tears.

LXXVII

SEVERAL DAYS LATER, Franz became sick, and exhibited dangerous symptoms. The doctor diagnosed it as meningitis. On the occasion of his third visit, he seemed prepared to abandon all hope. Theresa wrote an imploring letter to her brother. The latter came, thoughtfully shook his head, and prescribed internal and external remedies which, after a few hours, actually seemed to break the power of the malady. He came again on the following day.

Franz was soon out of danger. And now, for Theresa, it was a surprising and marvelous experience to observe how Franz seemed to alter during his convalescence. When she sat by his bedside, he liked to hold her hand. Then she felt the pressure of his fingers, like a prayer for forgiveness, like a promise. She would occasionally read to him. With grateful, even child-like attention, he would listen. To her, it seemed as if he were manifesting distinct signs of interest in certain subjects, particularly stories of animals, travel, and discoveries. She resolved to talk seriously to him about his future, at the first opportunity. She even dreamed of having him continue his studies, so that he might become a teacher or a doctor. Still, she dared not yet talk to him of such plans. But the deception could not long continue. She soon knew that she had merely been fancying a change in her boy. The more definitely Franz's recovery was marked, the more quickly he reverted to his former state. The childish and grateful look in his eyes disappeared. His speech regained that intonation, that timbre that she remembered all too well from the days preceding his illness. At first, he still kept himself in control. He still answered his mother. But his answers became ever more impatient, rude, and coarse. The instant he was permitted to leave his bed, he could not be kept at home. And a night came — it was not to be the last — when Franz failed to come home till morning.

She no longer asked questions but let things slide. She was weary. There were hours when, feeling no pain, she felt that her life was ended though she was hardly thirty-three years old. But upon gazing into the mirror, particularly in the early hours of morning after rising, she felt that she looked older by years.

As long as her overpowering fatigue endured, she quietly accepted her fate. But when spring returned, and she felt her strength once more renewed, she fought against she knew not what. Her lessons began to be painfully tiresome. She showed impatience, even rudeness, toward her pupils; a thing which had never before happened. She felt lonely. But it was worse when Franz was at home. In this, she immediately felt that she wronged him. How she would have loved to pour her heart out to Sylvia! But that friend, having changed her position, was with a family in the country, and therefore could not be reached. For this reason, and to free herself of the occasionally quite unbearable feeling of desolation and desertion, she more frequently visited the home of her brother. She observed that he received her visits not without surprise, and certainly without enthusiasm.

Her sister-in-law, on her part, was doubly amiable at that time when she was awaiting her second child. Theresa, once or twice, opened her heart to her, confessing a number of things which she had formerly kept hidden. It touched her to find understanding and compassion where she had least expected it. It was as if the period of pregnancy had not only softened the woman, but had seemingly made her more intelligent than she really was.

As soon as the child was born, the woman relapsed into her former indifference and narrowness, apparently remembering not a single fragment of the various secrets entrusted to her by Theresa. Theresa was glad that it should be thus.

LXXVIII

AT THE BEGINNING of the winter, Theresa chanced to meet Alfred in the city. She had not received an answer to her last letter which he claimed never to have received. At first somewhat cool and embarrassed toward her, he soon was as cordial as ever. The manner in which he spoke of his young bride did not permit the supposition of a particularly passionate affection on his part. Theresa immediately imagined her as a poor, pale, German provincial creature, at whose side he would certainly be assailed by renewed desire for her, Theresa. She liked him more than ever. Even his appearance had improved, and he seemed better groomed than ever before. They made no appointment when they parted; but now he was again in the city, and it was possible for her to see him whenever she so desired. She dreamed of a new affection on his part, and was happy in the thought. She began to look fresher and younger again.

A young man, almost a boy, who occasionally called for his sister after her lessons with Theresa, fell in love with her, although she had not paid any special attention to him. Once he came early in the morning, to bring her a message from his sister. His embarrassment amused her, and she herself ventured some advances. He remained as embarrassed as ever, probably not even understanding her smile and her glances — and when he had left again, she was ashamed of herself, and resolved to be cold to him from then on.

One day, Theresa was again requested to visit the school. She was not particularly surprised to learn that, for many weeks, Franz had not attended his classes. When she talked to him about it, at home, he told her of his resolution to become a sailor. Theresa remembered that he had expressed similar desires before, and had referred casually to the subject during his talk with Agnes. Now, however, it seemed to be his earnest ambition. Theresa had nothing to say against it; they talked the plan over quite thoroughly and, after a time, they were conversing with each other decently and in an almost friendly manner, and not like enemies forced to live together under the same roof. But during the next few days, the plan was not mentioned again. Theresa did not dare to bring it up, as if she feared to be blamed some day for having driven her son out into the world.

A sallow, lanky youth, who claimed to be a clerk in a grocery store, had called at her house a few times, and frequently took Franz to the theatre, for which, as he said, he always received free tickets. After the theatre, Franz usually stayed the night with his friend; that, at least, was what he told his mother. Once it happened that he did not appear during the entire day following. In a sudden access of fear, which she thought she had long since stifled, Theresa sought out the parents of the friend, and learned that he, too, had not been home. That evening, Theresa was summoned by the police. It developed that Franz, together with a few other half-grown boys and girls, had been arrested as a member of a band of youthful thieves.

Franz, as the only one who had not reached his sixteenth year, was delivered over to his mother for punishment. The police commissioner had him brought into the room, talked to him seriously and, in a cold monologue that sounded as if he had learned it by heart, expressed the hope that this might be a lesson for Franz, and that he would hereafter conduct himself as a decent member of society.

Theresa walked home with her son in silence. Finally, she resolved to question him. At first, he answered in a peculiar, constrained manner, his words sounding like a defense prepared for the courtroom. To listen to him, one would imagine the whole thing to have been merely a joke. In fact, nothing had been stolen at all. When Theresa tried to appeal to his conscience, he did not seem to be as stubborn as before; in fact, it seemed as if the confession forced out of him in the presence of his mother had made it easier for him to talk — something which he had not heretofore found the courage to do.

He spoke of the boy and girl friends with whom he used to foregather every night; and, for a while, it actually seemed as if he were talking only of youthful mischief. He mentioned names which could not possibly be genuine; they were, as he confessed, surnames of a peculiar nature, and full of double meaning. Gradually, he seemed to forget that it was his mother whom he was addressing. He told of nights spent in the Prater during the past summer, when they all, boys and girls alike, had slept in the open. Only when he caught a terrified look in her eyes, did he laugh impudently and become silent. And she knew that this sudden burst of confidence had more definitely and hopelessly alienated her from her son than anything that had passed between them before.

LXXIX

THENCEFORTH, SHE ASKED nothing. Without remonstrance, she let him leave the house nightly, knowing that he would not return until the next morning. Once, however, when morning came and he had not returned, an anxious, inexplicable presentiment overcame her. She did not doubt that once more he had been caught in some vileness, and that, this time, it would not end so happily for him. And when he finally stood before her, her excitement, probably ascribable to the fact that her fears had proved without foundation, expressed itself in particularly harsh words.

He let her talk on, hardly replying. He even laughed at her, as if he enjoyed her wrath. Still more excited by this attitude of indifference, she talked herself into a state bordering on hysteria. Then, quite suddenly, he flung at her a word which at first she could not believe that she had heard correctly. With wide, almost crazed eyes, she stared at him. But he repeated the insult, and continued:

"And one like you would tell me what to do! What the hell do you think you are?"

His tongue was now unleashed. He kept on talking, heaping curses, sneers, and threats upon his mother. She listened helplessly, rooted to the spot. It was the first time that he had thrown the blame of his birth at her. But he did not talk to her as to an unfortunate girl, deserted by her sweetheart. No; he talked as if she were a hussy, who had had bad luck and did not even know who was the father of her child. Nor were these the accusations uttered by a child who feels himself handicapped, endangered, and disgraced through being born in bastardy. These were the common, foul curses which gamins shout after harlots.

Theresa consoled herself with the thought that, in spite of his baseness, he hardly understood what he was saying. He was simply expressing himself in the manner of the circle in which he moved. She neither took offence nor felt hurt. It was simply the horror of a tremendous loneliness, such as she had never felt before. And from an immense distance came to her the voice of an inexplicably strange person — a human being to whom she had herself given birth.

That same night, she wrote a special delivery letter to Alfred, telling him that she must see him. Several days passed before he asked her to call on him. He proved amiable, but a little distant. His searching glance made her feel as if he wanted to ascertain first that nothing in her appearance was amiss. While she talked of the reason for her visit, speaking in a somewhat forced, hardly coherent way of the last experiences she had had with Franz, she tried vainly to catch a glimpse of her own reflection in the mirror on the opposite wall. When she had finished, Alfred remained silent for a moment before stating his opinion. Then he made some sort of speech on the case, from which Theresa learned hardly anything that she had not known before. Nor was this the first time that she heard the words "moral insanity" issuing from his lips. And he finished his remarks by stating anew his conviction that he could not give her better advice than he had done some time before — to give the boy away; if possible, to send him to another city, before something that could not be otherwise averted should happen.

Theresa, rocking forward and backward in her chair, had finally caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror, and was shocked. To be sure, the lighting of the room was not of the best; but that the mirror could transmute the beautiful into the ugly and the young into the old, could not possibly be credited. And she saw, she seemed to discover irrevocably in this strange, unfamiliar mirror, that at her thirty-four years, she was becoming withered, elderly, and sallow, like a woman of more than forty. Well, she had lost weight, especially in the last few weeks; besides, she was not dressed to advantage, and her hat particularly did not suit her face. But even taking these things into consideration, the face staring out at her from the mirror brought her a painful surprise. When Alfred stopped talking, she was aware that she had hardly listened to him. Now he stepped up in front of her. Feeling obliged to add a few softening words, he remarked that it was possible that, to a certain extent, the age of puberty might be responsible for Franz's ugly attitude. Before everything else, he warned Theresa against those self-accusations in which, as he thought, she was likely to indulge in her predicament, and for which no foundation whatever existed.

She protested vehemently. What, had she no reasons for self-accusations? Who, if not she? She had never been a real mother to Franz! For a few days, or a few weeks at a time — only occasionally, so to speak — she had behaved like a mother toward him. Most of the time, she had been exclusively occupied with her own affairs, with her profession, with her own problems, and — yes, why should she deny it? — with her love affairs. And how often had she thought of the boy as a burden; yes, just that: as a misfortune — even a long time ago, before she had ever thought of any such thing as moral insanity, or found the slightest traces of it. Even at the time when he was a tiny, innocent baby, even before he had been born, she had not wanted to have anything to do with him. And on the night of his birth, she had hoped and prayed that he might not live!

She had wanted to say still other, truer things; but at the last moment she held them back, in the fear that still more detailed confession might definitely lose this friend to her, and that she might put herself too completely into his power. So she was silent. Even if he did put his hand affectionately and kindly on her shoulder, she could not help seeing that, with the other hand, Alfred took his watch from his pocket; and when Theresa thereupon rose with a certain haste, he remarked, in excuse, that he had to be at the hospital before six. But he did not want Theresa to do anything before she had talked to him again. And — probably it had had not been his intention to go quite so far, at first — he proposed that she should bring Franz with her the next time she came; or, better still, that he himself should call on her some day, perhaps on Sunday, at noon. He would talk to Franz once more, and endeavour to get a clear, personal impression of the boy's character.

Theresa herself did not understand why this very natural offer of her onetime lover, her friend and physician, should now impress her as if a way to salvation had suddenly opened. Out of a full heart she thanked him.

LXXX

THE PROPOSED VISIT of Alfred was not destined to take place, for the next morning Franz had disappeared from the house of his mother, without leaving a word of explanation. Theresa's first impulse was to notify the police; but she finally decided not to do so, lest the officials should regard his disappearance as flight, and be set in pursuit of him through her. She telephoned Alfred, who at first seemed displeased at being called during his working hours. He assured her that he could see nothing wrong in this new turn of events. It might be most wise for her to take no new steps, but instead, to let the affair run its course.

His indifference pained Theresa. She could not but realize that it hurt her more than Franz's disappearance. Soon, though, on her son's account alone she was experiencing interminable hours of pain and despair. Through a sleepless night, she felt an unbearable longing for her missing boy. She even thought of inserting an advertisement in the papers, such as she often read: "Return, and all will be forgiven!"

But by morning, she realized the stupidity of her plan. She did nothing and, after several weeks had passed, she was obliged to admit that her life, if it was not actually happier, was at least quieter than when her son had occupied her home.

She told the neighbours that Franz had found a position in a small town in the Austrian provinces. It mattered not whether they believed or disbelieved her. Nobody was particularly concerned with the family life of Fraulein Fabiani.

Her professional duties, which she had long followed mechanically and listlessly, once more began to afford her a certain satisfaction. Not only did she give individual instruction, but she also succeeded in grouping in classes a number of young girls of the same age.

Beyond this, she once more relapsed into the lethargy of a lonely life. Neither mother, nor brother, nor sister-in-law showed any interest in her. Nor did she hear from Alfred. She left the house as little as possible, and arranged matters so that she need but rarely teach beyond the confines of her own four walls.

Rarely did she manifest any interest whatever in her pupils, beyond the limits of her lessons. Sometimes, bitterly and ruefully, she thought of the days when, as a governess, she had given her heart to and felt a motherly interest in pupils to whom, certainly, she had then been nearer through the very fact of sharing their domiciles.

But once, several months after Franz had run away from home, it chanced that one of the girls attending her classes remained away a number of days. This absence of the sixteen-year-old girl stirred her more deeply than anything of the kind had ever done before. When a letter from the girl's father explained the absence of his daughter as being due to a sore throat and fever, Theresa developed a restlessness which she herself hardly understood. Thilda appeared again after a week's absence. Theresa felt her face redden with joy, and knew that her eyes were shining. This she would hardly have realized herself, but for the fact that, like an answer, a smile, strange, indulgent, and yet superior, played round the girl's mouth. Then Theresa knew that she loved this child, and that her love presaged unhappiness. She also knew that this sixteen-year-old girl belonged to a species of mortals different from herself; that she belonged among the cold, the resourceful, the self-satisfied: among those who never suffer from anything really difficult or important, understanding as they do how to preserve themselves and, from every one coming within their sphere, taking what they can — precisely as much or as little as they need or as may seem agreeable to their caprice.

Now, when Thilda entered the room, after a week's absence, several minutes late as usual, with a graceful gesture; when she instantly moved her chair to the table to join the five other members of the class, a barely perceptible, well-bred movement of her hand prevented Theresa from interrupting the class one instant for her sake. And that moment was one of those when a ray of light suddenly pierced the slumbering soul of the teacher, revealing the sentimental relationship between herself and this pupil, once and for all time, definitely and vividly.

The lesson over, it seemed most natural that Thilda should remain alone with her teacher. A conversation followed, beginning with the girl's illness. Thilda confessed that it had first appeared dangerous. Her parents had even engaged a nurse.

"What, a nurse?"

"Why, yes! Mother, you know, does not live in Vienna."

Did Fraulein Fabiani not know that? Her parents were divorced. The mother had been sojourning in Italy these many years, the climate of Vienna not being propitious for her. Thilda had spent all the preceding summer, until late in the autumn, with her mother at one of the Italian bathing resorts on the Mediterranean. She did not divulge the name, for she loved to be casual. And Theresa felt it would be tactless, that it would sound too inquisitive, to ask the name of the resort. The nurse had proved to be a pleasant enough person. They were able to dismiss her, fortunately, on the fourth day. It had seemed a relief to be alone and undisturbed in her bed, at last able to read an interesting book. Though Theresa was tempted to ask what the book was, she dared not.

"So you live alone with your daddy?" she inquired.

Thilda smiled. Her answer spoke of a father, not a daddy. While talking of him, she grew a little more warm than was customary with her. It was quite simple living with him. After the mother had "departed," Thilda had a governess for a while. It had soon become evident that she could manage as well, in fact better, without one. She had attended a girl's school until last year. Now she studied at home, taking piano lessons, even harmony, — and here a shadow of envy passed across Theresa's features — and twice weekly, she attended lectures on the history of art, in the company of several friends. Almost instantly, she corrected herself: a few acquaintances, for she had no friends. She made short trips each Sunday with her father, who also took her to concerts, for her sake alone, since he himself cared but little for music.

Then she bent her head forward. Theresa did not at once understand that this signified good-bye. A slight handshake followed, and Thilda had left.

Theresa, strangely numb, remained where she sat. Something new had entered her life. She felt both older and younger — older in a motherly way; younger as a sister.

She was careful not to let the other girls, or Thilda herself, for that matter, perceive how peculiarly she felt toward the latter. She sensed Thilda's gratitude for this. Her reward soon came. One day after class was over, Thilda invited her, in behalf of her father, to dine with them the coming Sunday. Theresa blushed with joy; but Thilda was kind enough not to notice it. She spent a little time arranging her books; then, taking her coat, talked of a Bulwer novel recommended to her by Theresa, and which had somewhat disappointed her. Finally, with a happy face, she again turned to Theresa:

"Tomorrow, then, at one!"

And she was gone.

LXXXI

THE OLD, WELL-PRESERVED, and from all appearances but recently renovated house in one of the side streets of the Mariahilf suburbs had belonged to the Wohlschein family for nearly a century. In the rear stood a small manufacturing plant where leather-goods were made. The ground floor was occupied by a store. A larger, more fashionable store had been established elsewhere in the city, but the old customers preferred to make their purchases here. The living quarters were one flight up. The drawing room into which Theresa was ushered was comfortable, though somewhat old-fashioned, with heavy, dark green plush curtains and over stuffed furniture in the same colour. The dining room, the door to which stood ajar, was bright and modern.

Thilda came running up gaily to greet her guest.

"Father is home, too," she said. "We can begin to eat immediately."

She was wearing a blue dress, with a white silk collar. Her brown hair hung free down her back. Theresa had only seen her before with her hair braided. She looked younger and more childish now.

It was a dull, wintry day. The massive bronze lamp standing on the table was already lit. "Where do you think father and I spent the day?" Thilda asked. "In the Dombach Park and on the Hameau! We started at half past eight."

"Wasn't it rather foggy?"

"Not so terribly! Toward noon, the weather cleared up beautifully. We enjoyed a good view of the Danube."

Herr Sigmund Wohlschein entered from the adjoining room. He was somewhat heavy. Despite the bald spot on his head and his grayish hair, he was still youthful in appearance. He had a roundish face, a dark, heavy moustache, and light-coloured, medium-sized, friendly eyes.

"I am glad to have you here, Fraulein Fabiani. Thilda has told me a great deal about you. Forgive me, please, for presenting myself in sports clothes."

He spoke in a remarkably deep voice, using a dialect faintly Viennese. He wore quite handsome sports clothes, with dark stockings and patent leather house shoes.

An elderly servant served the soup, while Herr Wohlschein himself filled the dishes at every course. It proved to be a homely, well-prepared Sunday dinner, accompanied with a light Bordeaux wine. The talk led from the Wienerwald, lauded by Herr Wohlschein for its autumnal charms, to other hilly, mountainous sections through which, as an enthusiastic climber, he had wandered. In answer to friendly questions, Theresa described her childhood, Salzburg, her dead father the colonel, and her mother the writer whose name seemed to be entirely unknown in this household. She also casually mentioned her brother, though she did not tell them that he carried another name. Her son, naturally, she did not discuss, though she took it for granted that he was known to Thilda, as he was to her other pupils, who might have observed him while he was living at home. Never before had his existence, his relationship to her, seemed so ambiguous and remote as now. Herr Wohlschein retired shortly after the meal. Thilda led Theresa into her own airy room, which contained a small, well-chosen library. Together, they pored over the illustrations of an historical work. While she looked at a view of the Barberini palace, Thilda asked Theresa if she knew the original of the print, which was hanging in the Art Museum? Theresa was obliged to admit that, since an early visit there with one of her pupils, she had never revisited the place.

"We must make up for that," Thilda said.

A little later, Herr Wohlschein, now in street clothes, wearing a rather too high collar and a fur coat, again appeared, kissed his daughter on the forehead, and said he was going to his game of tarock at a nearby café, and would return for supper at eight o'clock.

"You may stay longer," she replied, glancing at him with an understanding smile. "I have letters to write."

Letters, Theresa thought — probably to her mother, who is abroad. Herr Wohlschein certainly thought so, too, for he remained silent a moment. His kindly brow wrinkled.

Then he took an amiable leave of Theresa, but without expressing any desire to see her again. Theresa shortly thereafter thought that it was time for her, too, to go. Thilda did not detain her.

Thus was her introduction to this house effected. At intervals of two or three weeks came further invitations for Sunday meals, at which other guests occasionally participated. There was the widowed sister of the head of the house, who, despite her gay temperament, loved sadly to shake her head and discuss the serious maladies of her acquaintances; the reserved and uncommunicative manager of the Wohlschein firm; an older girl friend of Thilda's, an art student, who talked, amusingly and sarcastically enough, of the professors and girl students at her school. They all made but vague impressions on Theresa, who forgot practically all of them before she had left the house. It seemed that, as compared with Thilda, although she hardly participated in the conversation, the others had no light of their own.

Theresa could not help feeling the girl's sustained intelligence, her superior qualities, and, at the same time, her aloofness.

This aloofness persisted. Always, not only during the classes, but afterwards during their talks, in Thilda's own room as at the Museum, which she visited with Thilda for the first time one Christmas day, Theresa was conscious of this sometimes embarrassing detachment. She occasionally felt jealous of the blond wife of Palma Vecchio, of Rubens' Maximilian, since Thilda seemed, in their presence, to be more free and intimate and tender than when she was with Theresa, perhaps with any living human being.

LXXXII

ONE NIGHT, WHILE she was preparing for bed, the door bell rang. Franz was standing outside, covered with snow, without a winter overcoat, but wearing what appeared to be a somewhat gaudy new suit of clothes. His red, seamed handkerchief protruded as before from his breast pocket. This was a person entirely different from the one he had been half a year ago. No longer could he be justly called a boy; he was rather a young man, although not one of the best quality. His face was pale; his greased hair was parted in the middle; there was the promise of a moustache under his pug nose. His shifting, piercing eyes gave him a suspicious air.

"Good evening, Mother," he said, with a stupid, insolent laugh.

She gazed at him steadily, unshocked. He beat the snow from off his clothes and shoes. With a somewhat gawky politeness, as if entering a strange house, he followed his mother. The remains of the supper were still on the table. His hungry glance rested on the plates of butter and cheese. Theresa cut him a slice of bread and pointed to the food.

"Please!" she said. "Yes, the cold weather makes one hungry!" he said, spreading butter on his bread and eating.

"So, you are back again?" Theresa said, after a short silence.

She felt that she had turned pale.

"Not for ever!"

Franz, his mouth full, replied quickly, as if to reassure her.

"You know, Mother, I got sick on the way."

"On the way to America!"

Theresa, completely apathetic, finished the sentence for him.

Franz continued, paying no heed to her:

"After all, it was only a hurt foot. But the money didn't last, either. The friend who was with me left me in the lurch. Then somebody told me that you need papers of some sort for the ship. I'll be sure to get them, somehow. But for the time being, I thought it best to come home."

"How long are you back?" she asked, slowly.

"Not for such a long time, you may be sure!" he replied evasively, with a defiant laugh.

He told her he had worked as an extra waiter at a restaurant on Sundays and holidays. He claimed that he had a chance to find steady work there. He would have secured it long before, he said, but for the fact that he needed all manner of small things. Shirts, for example. His shoes were in bad shape, too. He showed his mother the pair he was wearing — thin, patent leather shoes, practically without soles.

Theresa nodded her head. She would not let herself be conscious of whether the emotion she felt was pity, or fear lest her boy should become a drag on her again.

"Where do you live?" she asked.

"Oh, there's no need for you to worry on that score. Thank heaven, I'm not without a roof over my head! I've got friends enough for that."

"Why don't you stay here, Franz?" she asked.

Hardly had she uttered the words, when she regretted them. He shook his head.

"I don't belong here," he said, dryly. "But if you will let me sleep here tonight, I won't refuse. It's a long way. And in this weather, with these shoes..."

Theresa rose, but again hesitated. She had intended taking one of the few banknotes she possessed from the linen chest where she kept them concealed. She realized that this would be worse than careless. Instead, she said:

"I'll make you a bed on the couch. Perhaps I can raise a few gulden for you, so you can buy a new pair of shoes."

Franz wrinkled his forehead, without as much as saying "Thank you!"

"You'll get it back, Mother, I promise, not later than three weeks from now."

"I don't want it back," she said.

Franz lit a cigarette and stared into space.

"You haven't got a bottle of beer, Mother, have you?"

She shook her head.

"Well, then, perhaps a glass of rum?"

"I'll make you some tea."

"No, thanks, no tea. Only rum makes a fellow warm. I know where you keep it."

He rose and went to the kitchen.

Theresa spread the sheet on the couch. She heard Franz fumbling about outside. My son? she asked herself, shuddering. While Franz was still outside, she took a five-gulden bill from the chest. While she was locking it, Franz tiptoed in again, the rum bottle in his hand. He acted as if he had noticed nothing.

She kept the bill in the palm of her hand, holding it so until the bed was made. He poured the rum into a water tumbler, filling the glass almost to the brim, and raised it to his lips.

"Franz!" Theresa cried.

He drank it, shrugging his shoulders.

"When a man's cold!" he said.

He threw off his coat, vest, and collar. He wore only a torn undervest, and was without a shirt. Then he stretched himself on the couch and covered himself with the blanket.

"Good-night, Mother," he said.

She stood motionless and silent, while he turned his face to the wall and instantly fell asleep. She took a second five-gulden bill from the chest and placed it with the first one on the table. Then she sat down for a while, refleeting, her head on her hands. Finally, she put out the light and went into her bedroom. She did not completely undress, but lay down, trying without success to fall asleep.

Shortly after midnight, she again rose and tiptoed into the room. Franz was breathing quietly. She thought of the way she had formerly watched over him in his sleep, when he was still a child. Tonight, too, he was lying in the same way, the covers piled up to his chin. As the room was dark, she saw not his face as it looked now, but another face of past years. Yes, he too had once had a child's face; he too had once been a child. Today, even — oh, this much was certain — his face would be different today, had she not murdered him once.

Involuntarily, as from profound depths, this word had entered her consciousness. Yet, it was something else that she had meant.

"Had I only been able to devote more attention to him" — that was what she had wished to think— "he might be different now. Had I been a different mother, my son would have become a different man!"

She trembled. Carefully, almost without touching him, she stroked his smooth, oiled hair.

Under her breath, she said:

"I will keep him with me. Tomorrow morning, I shall talk to him again."

She returned to her bed. This time, she fell asleep. Awakening at seven the next morning, she entered the adjacent room. The blanket lay crumpled on the floor. The bottle was three-fourths empty. Franz had vanished.

LXXXIII

SHE TOLD NOBODY of this visit. Sooner than she had thought possible, it became a dim memory. Even the fact that, a week later, an elderly, plain-featured woman, with a kerchief round her head, brought a letter from Franz which read: "Help me again, Mother, I need twenty gulden urgently!" hardly touched her. Without an accompanying line, she sent him half the sum which he requested. Even that entailed no small sacrifice.

Shortly afterwards, and most unexpectedly, her sister-in-law paid her a visit. She seemed friendly, though embarrassed. She would have come long before, she explained, but for the difficulty of leaving her household and her two children. And the reason she came today... Here she hesitated, and handed Theresa a letter, several lines in length, from Franz, written in a childish, clumsy scrawl and badly spelled:

My dear Mrs. Faber, Permit me, in my temporary embarrassment, to address you. Would you be kind enough to help me, because just now my mother can't, and get me a pair of shoes? Also, lend me eleven gulden."

Very respectfully,

Franz Fabiani.

"I hope you sent him nothing, "Theresa said.

"Even had I wished to, I could not. I must account for every penny. I only wanted to ask you to tell him, for God's sake, never to write me another such letter. If my husband intercepted one like this! It's for your sake, too, Theresa!"

Theresa frowned.

"Franz has not lived with me for a long time. I know nothing about him. What I could do, I have done. Only a few days ago, I sent him some more money. What can I do? You don't suppose I prompted him to write that? I don't even know where he lives!"

She suddenly burst into tears. Her sister-in-law sighed.

"Every one must bear his cross!"

Now, as if she had been waiting for her chance to unburden her heart, she talked on. Not everything was smooth running with her, either. But for the children — a third one was now expected! Another worry, but perhaps better luck. She needed it!

"You can imagine that it's not so easy, living with Karl. He thinks only of his societies and his meetings. He hardly spends an evening home. Naturally, his professional work suffers too."

She bitterly complained of his surliness, his harshness, and his fits of temper. There were still tears in her eyes when she left, her departure precipitated by the arrival of two pupils. One of these was Thilda.

Her glance rested questioningly and not without compassion on Theresa, who felt obliged to offer an explanation.

"That was my brother's wife," she remarked.

"My brother's wife," Thilda repeated, transposing the German into English. She unpacked her notebooks. Her interest in Theresa's family affairs was exhausted.

LXXXIV

DURING THE FOLLOWING week, they planned no walks or visits to the galleries in each other's company. Nor did Thilda remain with her teacher after the lessons as was her custom. But one day, and most unexpectedly — it was almost spring — she again invited Theresa for Sunday dinner.

Theresa breathed more freely. She feared that she might have fallen into disfavour with the Wohlscheins, for she knew not what reason. Moreover, only yesterday, she had been agitated by a renewed demand from her son for money, the demand transmitted again by that ugly old woman. She had sent him five gulden, and had availed herself of the opportunity to warn him never again to approach her brother's wife.

"Why don't you find a position, somewhere outside of Vienna," she wrote, "if you can't find one here? I am not in a position to help you any more."

Hardly had she dispatched the letter than she regretted it, feeling that it might be dangerous to excite Franz. Now, with Thilda again kind to her, she felt stronger, as if steeled against further impending mishaps.

Thilda was alone when Theresa arrived. She greeted her teacher with special warmth, and expressed her joy to find her looking so much better than usual. As if answering Theresa's questioning look, she spoke, almost in an aside, and with a knowing air:

"It's always so! No good ever comes of family visits, particularly when they are unexpected."

"Well," Theresa replied, "I fortunately receive them but rarely, whether expected or unexpected."

She spoke of her retired, almost reclusive mode of life. Now that her son had finally found a position "abroad" — she blushed, and Thilda busied herself with the books on the racks — she hardly saw any of the members of her family. Her mother was completely immersed in her scribbling; her brother had his professional duties, and was moreover interested in politics; and her sister-in-law was completely absorbed by her home and children.

Thilda quite unexpectedly remarked:

"Do you know, Fraulein Fabiani, what Father said, the other day? But you won't feel offended?"

"Offended!" Theresa repeated, in surprise.

Thilda added quickly:

"Father thinks — how shall I phrase it? — that you don't quite know how to make the most of your opportunities." At Theresa's blank stare, she explained.

"He thinks that such an excellent teacher should be entitled, in fact obliged, to demand higher fees."

"I'm afraid, Thilda," Theresa protested, "that even what I get is too much. I am only a private teacher. I have never passed a single examination, and never held a public position."

She told how she had early been forced to earn her own living, and had never had a chance to make up her deficiencies — all that she had missed, perhaps through the fault of no one but herself. But, as always happened, it was now too late appreciably to better her condition.

"Heavens, it is never too late!" Thilda replied.

Again, she most unexpectedly asked Theresa if she might take the liberty of asking her a favour. She was not quite sure when Theresa's name-day occurred.

"I have none, you know," she explained.

That was why she now begged her to accept a belated present. Before Theresa could answer, Thilda had disappeared into the adjoining room. Returning with an English tailor-made coat, she asked Fraulein Fabiani to rise and helped her into it. The coat fitted as if it had been made to her order. If any alterations were needed, Thilda explained, the tailor would make them at any time.

"Why, you look extremely trim!" Theresa told herself, as she stood before the huge mirror in Thilda's room. It was indeed a tasteful, correctly fitted coat. It made her appear as a fairly youngish young lady of good family.

"Oh, yes, before I forget!" Thilda proceeded, handing Theresa a small package, wrapped in thin paper. "This goes with it."

It contained three pairs of white, dark-grey, and brown gloves, of the best quality suede.

"Six and three-quarters — isn't that the size?"

While Theresa was trying on one of the gloves, Herr Wohlschein entered.

"Congratulations, Fraulein Fabiani!" he said.

"Why, Herr Wohlschein?"

"This is your birthday, Thilda tells me."

"Why, no! It is neither my birthday nor my name-day! I really don't know!..."

"Well, we are celebrating it today!" Thilda declared. "And that is that!"

The dinner progressed, with every one in the best of spirits. They drank white Burgundy. Theresa was toasted. She began to be persuaded that it was really her birthday. A sister of Herr Wohlschein joined them for coffee. Later, a business friend came, a Herr Verkade, of Holland — a man past the flush of youth, smoothly shaven, with dark hair, gray temples, and light blue eyes beneath black eyebrows.

They discussed Java, where Herr Verkade had lived for many years, sea journeys, luxurious steamers, balls at sea, improvements in trade and commerce throughout the world, and the deficiencies of Austria.

Herr Wohlschein's sister defended her country. Herr Verkade did not care to presume with a judgment of local conditions, and so adroitly diverted the talk into other channels, speaking of operas, famous singers, concerts, and the like. In the course of his conversation, he several times addressed Theresa with particular politeness.

She had often participated in such conversations, but never before on equal terms. Today, she several times found herself eager to speak, but afraid to venture an opinion. At a convenient opportunity — nobody but Theresa noticed the strategy of the manœuvre — Thilda made her talk. Gradually — the wine may have been in part responsible — Theresa's embarrassment disappeared. She spoke with a freedom and vivacity that had almost become foreign to her nature. She occasionally noticed the somewhat surprised, but certainly not displeased glance of the master of the house.

LXXXV

THE FOLLOWING SUNDAY finally brought about what had frequently been planned, but never carried out — a long walk with Thilda, her father, and a young married couple, whom they had encountered in the street car.

It proved to be a beautiful spring day. They lunched at an inn in the forest. Theresa knew it as the very one where she had, many years ago, spent several hours in Kasimir's company. Was she not sitting at the identical table, on the very chair, perhaps? Were not these perhaps the same children scampering about the tiny plot of grass yonder, just as that was the self-same sky above her, the same landscape, the same confused hum of voices? Were not the people at the adjoining table the very people with whom her companion, much to her displeasure, had begun a conversation?

Only a second later did she realize that the man with whom her thoughts were preoccupied was the father of her child. Something else occurred to her which, strangely enough, she had not thought of until this moment — that only last night, Franz had reminded her of his existence, in a most disagreeable fashion. He had sent her a letter requesting two hundred gulden. He was in trouble. This would save him. Moreover, with that sum, he could begin anew.

"Mother, don't fail me, I beseech you," he had written. It was not the old woman with the kerchief who had brought the letter, but instead, a lanky, dilapidated youth, who had roughly pushed open the door, closed it behind him, and silently handed her the letter, with an impudent expression on his face. It was as if it were Franz's intention to frighten his mother by his messenger's appearance. She had sent him thirty gulden, which had been difficult enough for her. How was this affair to end? Oh, if he had only gone to America; if only she had money enough to pay for his passage! But what guarantee had she that he would actually board the vessel and depart?

Suddenly, as if in a picture, she beheld him aboard a freighter, in a frayed suit, with torn shoes, no overcoat, and with the collar of his coat turned up about his neck, freezing in rain and storm. And simultaneously there returned that sense of guilt which again and again came back to her, though but for a few fleeting moments only, and which, disappearing, left her suspended in space — floating, as it were, as if everything which she experienced were unreal and dream-like.

"Your soup will be cold," Thilda said.

Theresa glanced up, and recovered her self-possession. The others had not noticed her absent-mindedness. They ate, talked and laughed. Even Theresa breathed, freely again. She relished the soup and enjoyed the air, the landscape, the people, the season, and the Sunday spirit which surrounded her.

The married couple, wishing to climb a nearby hill, took leave. The others started homeward. In a beautiful open spot in the forest, overlooking the wide expanse of the Danube, they rested. Herr Wohlschein fell asleep. Theresa sat at some little distance and began to talk at length. She recollected much of by-gone days; people she had not thought of for a long time; others whom she had completely forgotten; families with whom she had lived; fathers and mothers; children she had educated, or at least tutored. It was as if she had opened an album of photographs, passing over some, superficially regarding others, and pondering on still others with deep emotion.

It was sad, yet consoling, to think that of all the children to whom she had been practically a mother, there was hardly one who would still remember her; certainly, there were none who knew anything of her present existence.

Attentively, her hands linked round her knees, occasionally with a child's wondering eyes, or deeply touched, Thilda listened; and as she listened, those pictures of the past assumed a more definite reality to Theresa than they had had at the time of their occurrence. She was grateful to Thilda because, through her, her poor life had become rich for the space of one brief spring hour.

Herr Wohlschein awoke, looked up, rose, and asked if they had discussed many interesting things. Theresa and Thilda also rose, and shook the grass and dust from their clothes. The three made their way down the hill. Thilda linked her arm confidentially into Theresa's. Occasionally they ran ahead, while Herr Wohlschein, his coat slung over his arm, followed. It was the same path that Theresa had taken, so many years ago, with Kasimir Tobisch... in those far-off days, when she had carried his child within her.

Long before dusk, Herr Wohlschein and Thilda took leave of Theresa at her door. She felt doubly lonely, that evening, in her house into which the warmth of the burgeoning spring had not yet found its way.

Soon her life, which had been rich for a moment, was as barren as before.

LXXXVI

A WEEK OR more passed, during which Thilda's behaviour was hardly more intimate than that of any of Theresa's other pupils. The girl seemed, in fact, anxious to leave the instant the classes were dismissed. Then, quite unexpectedly again, she brought an invitation, in behalf of her father, to attend the opera with them.

For Theresa, it was marvelous, after these many years, to be enjoying a performance of "Lohengrin" in this spacious and beautiful theatre, particularly with Thilda at her side. She felt almost like an older sister, and hardly required the excellent perfection of the performance to make her happy. Herr Verkade, too, had been invited to join the box party.

Afterwards, they supped in the elegant restaurant of a hotel. There Theresa, in her poor dress, no longer felt like Thilda's older sister, particularly since the Dutchman talked almost exclusively to Thilda, while the generally talkative father seemed engrossed in his own thoughts. Theresa ascribed his abstraction to possible business difficulties, but was not particularly affected by the contingency. She continued to ruminate, picturing the old factory in bankruptcy, Wohlschein's fortune lost, and Thilda, no longer a rich young lady, but a poor girl forced to earn her own living, and consequently that much the closer to her.

But the real cause of Herr Wohlschein's ill humour, or what Theresa had mistaken as such, became apparent several days later, when Thilda surprised her in her light matter-of-fact way with the intelligence of her betrothal to Herr Verkade. The wedding would occur late in autumn. The future home of the married couple would presumably be Amsterdam, for which destination Herr Verkade had, incidentally, departed yesterday for a prolonged stay. As Thilda spoke, a frozen smile was fixed on Theresa's features, which might be construed as an expression of the congratulations she could not formulate into words.

She could not understand Herr Wohlschein for giving permission to this betrothal, and thought him weak or devoid of feeling. She even thought of baser motives for his action. Perhaps his firm was in financial straits, and Herr Wohlschein had actually contrived the engagement to save himself and his factory. She refused to believe that a mere child actually loved this man, who was twenty or more years her senior, and neither particularly interesting nor even handsome. She was inclined to consider this pretty young thing as an innocent victim, hardly conscious of her sacrifice. She even planned to talk to Herr Wohlschein. But she immediately realized the futility of such an expedient. Indeed, she knew that Thilda was not the type of girl who could be persuaded or bullied into any act that did not meet with her full approval.

The thought of the impending separation so engrossed her that she hardly felt the many other minor and major cares of the day. Having lost a number of pupils, she was forced to live on a still more meagre scale than ever. She was barely conscious of the actual privations which she endured. Even the fact that Franz, one night, had suddenly reappeared with a small satchel, and accepted as his right her bed and food, without a word of thanks or explanation, was merely one added unpleasantness, though one no more grievous than the others. At first, he seldom disturbed her. Ordinarily, he rested on the couch until noon, disappearing after his meal and reappearing late at night, or even in the small hours of morning. He never came in contact with her pupils — a thing which she was most anxious to avoid.

Sometimes Franz, who was behaving more quietly and politely than before, would be called for by friends after the meal. One of them was a tall, rather handsome lad, who looked as if he might be a student of the poorer middle-class. In another person, however, she recognized the evil-looking individual whom Franz had sent to her house for money. He seemed specially garbed to awaken the suspicions of every policeman, with his loud-patterned, gray trousers, short brown jacket, gray cap, and the small ring hanging from the lobe of his left ear. His voice was hoarse; his glance, evasive and threatening.

Theresa was ashamed to have such a creature received at her house, and afraid lest the neighbours might see him emerge from the door of her flat. She could not help speaking of this to Franz. He suddenly stepped in front of her and roughly forbade her to offend his friend.

“He comes of a better family than I do,” he shouted. “He, at least, has a father!”

Theresa shrugged her shoulders and left the room. Even that scarcely touched her spirit, which was now freighted with more painful things.

LXXXVII

THILDA CONTINUED TO attend classes regularly. She never discussed her intended husband, nor even the approaching marriage; so that Theresa occasionally was convinced that the engagement was broken. But, at another Sunday dinner at the Wohlschein home, attendee as well by the sister of the master, only the topic of the marriage was discussed and things relevant thereto: Dutch lessons which Thilda had begun to take, and of which Theresa now for the first time learned; her trousseau; the Verkade villa on the Zandvord shore; the farm in Java, belonging to one of the intended husband's brothers. And Herr Wohlschein was today neither sullen nor meditative, but quite gay, as if the marriage absolutely met with his approval and it were the most natural thing in the world to dismiss one's own daughter, a child to whom he was sincerely attached, into the world and to lose her for ever.

The wedding occurred earlier than originally planned, during the first days of July, in the City Hall. Theresa heard of it the next day when a printed announcement came by mail. The card in her hand, she now admitted that she had known all along that this would happen. She felt that Thilda, after the last lesson, had pressed her hand more significantly than ever before. She also remembered a parting look at the door, in which she seemed to detect at once an expression of regret and a trace of mockery, like that of a child who had perpetrated some prank as yet undiscovered by its victim.

Theresa, all the same, hoped to receive a personal note during the honeymoon. Nothing of the sort happened, nor was to happen for a long time. Neither letter, nor card, nor greeting of any kind, arrived.

One fine summer evening, toward the end of the week, Theresa walked toward Mariahilf with the hardly sincere resolve of congratulating Herr Wohlschein on his daughter's wedding. But once before the house, she saw the shuttered windows and remembered that Herr Wohlschein had, weeks before, expressed the intention of starting on his vacation immediately after the wedding. She slowly started back to her home, through the half-deserted, summer-baked streets. Even Franz had gone. Theresa, the day before, had thrown him out when he came home late at night, in the company of a friend and a girl. She had seen none of them; but their laughter and whisperings had awakened her from sleep. At first, Franz had tried to lie, claiming that no woman had been present. Then, with a defiant shrug of his shoulders, he finally admitted it, packed his belongings, and left the house without saying good-bye.

As July advanced and the last pupils left for their vacations, the loneliness which enveloped Theresa was complete. As was her habit, she rose early each morning and was at a loss how to dispose of her day. Her housework was finished in no time at all. Walks during the morning hours through the hot streets wearied her. She tried to read during the afternoons, for the most part novels that either bored or else superfluously excited her by describing exotic environments and delicate love scenes.

Walks over the Ring or through the parks at dusk left her profoundly sad. It still happened that, during these hours, men in quest of adventure would follow her; but she was too abashed to let them talk to her, or even accompany her. She knew that her appearance was still sufficiently youthful. But in her heart, she carried the picture that the mirror used to reveal to her each morning when she arose: a pale, finely chiselled face, prematurely withered, with two heavy, gray streaks in her otherwise still full dark blond hair. When her loneliness, patiently borne all day, pressed at night like a heavy burden on her shoulders, she would think for the briefest of moments of calling on her brother. But she always abandoned the idea, uncertain how he would welcome her, or, if he would receive her at all. And to call on her mother, after having avoided her for a whole year, seemed too difficult.

And yet, one fine summer morning, she resolved to go thither, as if her decision were born of a dream. It was not longing. Nor was it the instinct of fulfilling a long-forgotten duty which suddenly drove her there, but simply the circumstance that she did not know any one else who might lend her the money to spend a few quiet weeks in the country. For the desire to leave town for at least a few days, to flee to the country, had grown overwhelmingly compelling within her, as if her health and her happiness rested upon that, and that alone. And these terms — country, rest, renascence — she had lately come to identify with the picture of a certain grassy spot in Ensbach where, many, many years ago, she had played with a little boy who had then been her child.

Theresa's mother was living in an ugly four-story tenement house on the Hemalser Hauptstrasse, occupying a dingy hall-room with a window. Theresa did not know whether the money which her mother had earned so abundantly these many years had been lost in speculating, whether it had been given away foolishly, or whether it was merely parsimony which caused her mother to lead the miserable existence she did. Small as was the hope of securing a loan from that source, it was perhaps the impetuousness of her desire, perhaps her mother's quite genuine joy at her unexpected visit, or perhaps merely the definiteness with which Theresa expressed her wish, which caused her mother, without hesitation to declare herself ready to put 150 gulden at Theresa's disposal — against a note, to be sure, which obligated her to repay the money not later than November first, with interest at two per cent monthly, in case this date was not kept. Beyond these stipulations, she hardly asked her daughter for what purpose she needed the money; in fact, she asked her nothing at all concerning herself. She merely chattered, in a strange, uninhibited way, of her daily tasks, gossiped about her uninteresting neighbours, abruptly showed her the manuscript of her new novel — hundreds of pages, closely covered with script, which she kept in a drawer in the kitchen — vaguely answered the questions which Theresa asked about her brother's family, greeted a woman across the street through the open window when she watered her flowers, and finally permitted her daughter to depart, without attempting to detain her and without asking her to call again.

LXXXVIII

THERESA LEFT FOR Ensbach the very next day. It was six years since she had last been there. Shortly after the death of her husband, the widow Leutner had remarried and moved to an adjacent village. Theresa had first planned to engage a room in a farmhouse, but, fearing the possibility of contact with her former acquaintances, she decided to live at the inexpensive village inn.

On her first short stroll through the familiar countryside, over the grassy fields to the nearby woods, she met occasional villagers whom she remembered. Nobody seemed to recognize her. She was as isolated as she had wished she might be. But the sense of comfort which she had hoped to derive from this solitude, did not come to her. She was weary when she returned to the inn. The innkeeper recognized her while she ate supper, and even asked after Franz. With an impassiveness that caused her to shudder, she replied that he had a good position in Vienna.

During the whole of the afternoon, she remained in her room. Outside, the warm, summer air trembled. Through the shutters, the sun checkered the walls with blinding, small, white stripes. Half asleep, she lay on the uncomfortable, hard bed. Flies buzzed; voices, far and near, arose and died; all manner of noises from the street and from the fields blended into her dreams. Not until dusk did she rise and go out again. She passed the house where Franz had been a child, and which had now changed its owner. It seemed remote, as if it had never held any significance for her. In front of the house, on the grass, she noticed a low, light mist, as if autumn were sending advance couriers to announce its impending arrival. Unchanged, untouched, surrounded by withered leaves as before, and still with the crack in the glass, the image of the Virgin Mary gazed down at her from its maple tree. From the hill, she descended to the main road, bordered by unpretentious cottages.

Here and there, on porches, under hanging lamps, the summer boarders, couples, and children sat. Nothing had changed. Other children, other parents — and yet ever the same children, for this solitary walker, as their unfamiliar faces disappeared in the twilight. Over on the railway embankment, the express train rushed by, its rumble receding with incredible swiftness. And now the gloom, ever more oppressive, weighed on Theresa as she walked in the darkness.

Later on, she sat in the restaurant, eating her supper. Since she did not fancy the idea of going at once to her dingy, little, stifling room, she remained downstairs a long time. She read the "Farmer's Journal of Lower Austria," the "Leipzig Illustrated News," the "Huntsmen's and Foresters' Journal," until she was tired. Then she slept, heavily and dreamlessly, having, contrary to her habit, drunk two glasses of beer.

After a few days, however, she was able to enjoy the summer air, the tranquillity of the region, the scent of the hay, with the same zest that she had formerly experienced. She would rest on the fringe of the forest, thinking sometimes of the Franz who had been, as of some child long dead. She would feel a gentle longing for Thilda. This desire, she realized, was the sweetest that she had known in her life, and bore her to heights where she was a stranger. An old wish again awoke in her — the desire to spend her remaining days quietly somewhere in the country, surrounded by green, growing things, and as far removed from people as possible. The evening of life! she mused. The thought suddenly struck her with bold emphasis. And since she was attentively considering it, she smiled wanly. The evening of life? Had she really come so far?

Her fatigue gradually fell from her, and her cheeks grew ruddy. By the evidence of her mirror, she was decidedly rejuvenated, as compared with what she had been a few weeks ago. Vague hopes arose within her. She thought of reminding Alfred once more of her existence. Then she thought that Herr Wohlschein was probably returned from his vacation, and that she might inquire after Thilda, who had still not deigned to write to her.

The thought of her profession, too, returned. With it came a half longing for some regular work to do. The last days of her vacation were passed in mounting impatience, almost restlessness. Rainy weather suddenly decided her to cut short her stay. She was back in town long before the date which she had set for her return.

LXXXIX

GRADUALLY, THE NUMBER of Theresa's pupils increased. Another class was formed. Rested and refreshed, she fulfilled her duties without too much effort. As was her practice, she met her pupils with the same rather distant amiability, even though some one or other of them might have been quite sympathetic to her. There was no Thilda among them.

One afternoon, in the city, she met a well-dressed, elderly gentleman, who wore a stiff, dark hat at a rather rakish angle. She recognized Herr Wohlschein only when she had come directly in front of him. Her face beamed as if some unexpected happiness had befallen her. He, on his part, was obviously glad to see her as he shook her hand.

"Why doesn't one see you ever, my dear Fraulein Fabiani? I would have written, but, unfortunately, I had no address."

Well, well, Theresa thought, that could easily have been found! But she suppressed the observation, and inquired after Thilda.

More than a fortnight often passed, she learned, without any word coming from Thilda. That was, however, hardly surprising, since the honeymoon had been transformed into a sort of vagrant trip round the world. He was surprised that Theresa should not know of it. They were now probably somewhere on the high seas. He did not expect them back before spring.

"And you, Fraulein Fabiani, are really still without news from Thilda?"

She shook her head, almost bashfully. He shrugged his shoulders.

"That's just how she is. And yet, you can take my word for it, Fraulein Fabiani, she has a very warm feeling for you."

He continued to talk — of his dreary, empty, big house, of his dull whist parties at the club, and of the sad fate of finding himself as a bachelor or widower one day, after having for years lived with a wife and child. It was as if ten years of happy, and several other years of unhappy married life, as if that whole existence with his wife and child, had become merely a dream.

She was surprised at hearing him expressing himself with such freedom and friendliness. She said nothing, for she understood his relief at this opportunity to unburden himself. Then, suddenly, he sighed, consulted his watch, and remarked that he was that night going to the theatre with several acquaintances — to an operetta, if he must confess it; not to a legitimate play. He felt in need of distraction. Did Fraulein Fabiani ever visit the theatre? She shook her head. She had not, since that night at the opera, had another such opportunity. And no time, either. Did she still give as many and — he hesitated a moment — as ill-paid lessons?

She smiled and shrugged her shoulders, realizing that he had other questions which, for the moment, he did not care or dare to ask. He took leave of her abruptly, but with a hearty "Till we meet again!"

As she continued on her way, she had the feeling that he had stopped to look after her.

The following Sunday, the mail brought her, by special delivery, an envelope containing a theatre ticket and a business card:

SIGMUND WOHLSCHEIN

LEATHER GOODS

She had expected something of the kind. And, though the form of the invitation displeased her, she accepted it....

The house was already dark when Herr Wohlschein appeared, sat down beside her, and pressed a box of candy into her hand. She nodded and smiled her thanks, but did not allow the incident to distract her. The caressing dance rhythms pleased her and she was amused by the droll libretto. She felt her cheeks redden and knew that her features softened from scene to scene. To herself, she became younger and prettier. During the intermission, Herr Wohlschein was quite gallant to her, although not utterly at ease. When the play ended and they stood in the foyer beside the cloak room, he remained at her side, but not in the manner of an escort; rather, like a person who has made a casual encounter at the theatre.

It was a beautiful, clear autumn evening. She wished to walk home, and he took her the whole way. Only now he began to talk of Thilda, of whom he had not yet received intelligence. His invitation to supper she declined. He did not insist and, when they had arrived before her house, said a polite good-bye.

The week was not yet done when Herr Wohlschein again invited Theresa to the theatre — this time, to a modern society play at the People's Theatre. Afterwards, over a bottle of wine, in a comfortable corner of a restaurant, they chatted more freely and easily than the last time. He hinted of the last few difficult years of his marital life. She spoke of various sad experiences of her own, without permitting any of them to appear more than in vague outlines. When they parted, both felt that this night had drawn them closer together.

The next day, he sent, with a bunch of roses, an invitation— "in memory of Thilda" — to accompany him on a hike through the Wienerwald. And so she walked with him, in the first mild snowfall of the winter, along the same road that they had taken that spring day, half a year ago, with Thilda. Wohlschein had brought along three picture postcards from Thilda, all of which had arrived the day before. One carried a postscript: "And will you not occasionally look up Fraulein Fabiani? Her address is Wagnergasse 74, two flights up. Remember me to her. I'll write her a long letter, soon."

It was on this walk that she told Wohlschein for the first time of her boy, who had emigrated to America a year ago, and from whom she had not since heard.

After several evenings together, at the theatre or in restaurants, Herr Wohlschein knew not a little of her, despite the veil of generalities and wilful variations in which she had enshrouded her anecdotes, and which he tactfully accepted. He himself continued to talk a great deal of his wife; and he did this, to Theresa's great surprise, always in tones of the highest esteem, even of adoration, as if he were speaking of an extraordinary creature, not to be measured by the standards of ordinary mortals. Theresa began to realize that he loved Thilda really as the daughter of this lost woman, with whom she seemed to have many traits in common. And she knew that she, Theresa, had offered Thilda a more genuine, enduring, true love than had her own father.

The ensuing weeks in their relationship were not marked by any exceptional occurrences. They visited the theatre and restaurants together. He sent her flowers and candy. Then came a basket filled with preserves, exotic fruit and wine. She protested, but not too strenuously. When two holidays fell close to one another, early in December, he invited her to accompany him on a trip to a little village at the foot of the Semmering Mountains. She was convinced that, despite his former reserve, he at length hoped for certain definite results. She resolved not to forget herself.

During the journey, he grew intimate, in a rather clumsy fashion. She accepted his approaches with coldness. The fact that their hotel rooms did not adjoin at once reassured and disappointed her. Nevertheless, she failed to lock the door to her room that night. Next morning, she awoke as solitary as when she had retired. She thought this reticence most respectful of him.

But while dressing before the mirror, she suddenly thought she discovered a more pertinent reason for his backwardness. She simply was no longer sufficiently beautiful to tempt any man. Even though her body had retained its youthful contours, her features were old and lined with care. How could it be otherwise? She had undergone too much. She was a mother; the unmarried mother of a quite grown-up boy. It had been a long time since any man had desired her. And had she herself ever felt any stirrings of desire for this elderly, commonplace man? He was the father of one of her pupils, who, for his daughter's sake, had met her to spend two days in the fresh winter air.

Only her fevered imagination, she assured herself, could have fancied the possibility of an adventure which she herself did not crave.

Dressed in her sport dress, she again appeared fresher and younger to herself; almost graceful, in fact.

After breakfasting together in the pine-seated restaurant, in a corner of which crackled a huge oven, they drove in a sleigh through the firs and pines of a narrow valley, and at noon sat in the open, in the centre of a snow entrenched glade, warmed by a sun so strong that Theresa removed her jacket and her companion his short fur overcoat and jacket. In his shirt-sleeves, his huntsman's hat with its chamois flap, and with his turned-up moist moustache, his appearance was slightly comical.

On the return trip, it turned cold rapidly. They were happy to be back in the comfortable hotel. They dined in Theresa's room, which was more cozy than the restaurant.

They returned the next day to Vienna, like a pair of lovers who had finally found one another.

XC

IT WAS AS if, from the obscure distance where he dwelt, Franz had sensed the change in the manner of her life. Just when Theresa had received another basket of edibles, he unexpectedly reappeared. At first, in his winter overcoat, he looked fairly decent; in fact, he almost inspired confidence, despite his worn and frayed velvet collar. But when he opened his coat and showed his grease-spotted tuxedo and his maculate shirt-front, the original favorable impression vanished.

"To what do I owe this pleasure?" his mother coldly inquired.

He was again without a position and homeless. The hall room which he had for a few weeks occupied, had been rented to some one else. He had been back in Vienna for some weeks.

"After all," he said pointedly, "even if one has no home, one has a home town."

He thought it most considerate on his part not to have molested her for so long. Would his mother not give him shelter and food for two or three days, as a recompense?

Theresa firmly declined. From the basket which her pupils had given her for Christmas, he might take what he needed. She would also give him ten gulden. But she kept no public house. That was final. He pocketed a few preserves, took a bottle of wine under his arm, and turned to go.

The heels of his shoes were worn. His neck was scrawny, his ears protruded, and his back was strangely bent.

"Well, you needn't be in such a hurry," Theresa said, suddenly moved. "Sit down a while and tell me about yourself."

He turned round with a laugh.

"After such a reception, I wouldn't think of it!"

He opened the door and banged it so rudely that the house shook.

She told Wohlschein of the visit. When he called for her a week later and found her pale and excited, her eyes still red with weeping, she could not help confess that, for the second time within a week, Franz had come to demand money of her. She had lacked the courage to deny him. Now she confessed that Franz had never gone to America at all, but had led a fugitive life here in Vienna, of which she knew nothing and cared to know less.

Her tongue once loosened, she more frankly related, and at greater length, what suffering he had caused her. She first thought that Wohlschein was quite disagreeably affected. The more he listened, the more pity he felt. Finally, he declared that he simply could not watch her paltry and tormented life any longer. He felt ashamed to be carelessly rolling in wealth, while she — oh, he had noticed it — sometimes lacked the very necessities.

She protested. Under no circumstances would she listen to his proffer of a small monthly allowance to better her condition. She made a decent living, she said. It was her pride — her sole remaining pride, perhaps — that all her life she had been able to maintain herself, and for a long time, her son as well, on her earnings.

But when, on another occasion, he insisted on being allowed to replenish some of her worn wardrobe, she no longer protested. When a severe cold confined her for some weeks to her bed, she was obliged to permit him to pay for the doctor and prescriptions, and the necessary improved quality of food; eventually, too, to indemnify her for the money lost through having had to give up her lessons. He also insisted, thenceforward, that she should take better care of herself. Nothing remained for her but to accept his aid with gratitude.

XCI

ONE DAY IN January, they were given a wonderful surprise. Thilda arrived suddenly, though her father did not even know that the young couple had returned to Europe. Theresa learned the news from Wohlschein, who telephoned her. She owed the telephone, by the way, to his generosity. He excused himself from meeting her that evening, as they had planned, Thilda's coming having disrupted the even current of his present life. He excused himself so hurriedly, so embarrassedly, and with such an obvious sense of guilt, that Theresa had no opportunity to ask a question. As she hung up the receiver, she felt no joy; she only felt dismay and a heavy oppression.

She felt wronged, betrayed. And doubly so by Thilda, who had never written to her; never even included a message for her in the meagre news sent to her father. And by Wohlschein, to whom — how keenly she felt it! — she was again an unimportant, even disturbing interloper, now that Thilda was back.

All the following day — how correctly she had guessed how matters stood! — he did not communicate with her. Toward noon of the third day, he appeared. Certainly he had chosen an untoward hour, for she was not prepared to receive him. After her recent illness, from which she was not yet fully recovered, and in a grey flannel house-dress, with her hair in disorder, she did not look as well as she would have wished. But he seemed to notice nothing; he was inattentive and in high spirits.

The first thing he said was that Thilda had immediately asked after her and would particularly like to see her for dinner next Sunday. Theresa, however, felt no gladness at this. Suddenly and painfully, she realized her position. She was the mother of an illegitimate child, and had yielded herself too often to unworthy men. And she had become the maintained mistress of Thilda's father. Though she said nothing, Wohlschein realized what her thoughts must be. He tried to console her with caresses. She at first remained rigid and cold. But she gradually became conscious of the happiness she felt in Thilda's return, in the sure knowledge that she would again see her on the morrow. When she asked him to remember her to the beloved creature, she had sufficiently recovered a certain composure to remark good-naturedly:

"You need not tell her that you called on me. We might have met on the street."

He was prepared to go, his fur overcoat already donned, and holding his stick and hat in his hand. He replied, with pompous seriousness:

"I have, of course, informed her that we have been seeing a great deal of one another, and that we are — very good friends."

Thilda greeted Theresa as nonchalantly as if they had bid each other farewell the preceding day. This fact was stressed by her girlish, unaltered, still delicate appearance. She seemed, however, slightly more pallid than before. On her side, Thilda found that Theresa had changed for the better, that she seemed, in fact, rejuvenated. She inquired after several of her fellow students of the past year, without waiting for the replies, and presented greetings from her husband.

"He did not accompany you?" Theresa innocently asked, as if compelled not to appear informed.

"Certainly not," Thilda replied. "That would have been improper."

She blushed slightly and continued:

"One must be quite the young girl when returning home." She spoke as if she were quoting.

"You are here only for a few days?"

"Naturally, my visit will be a short one. Herr Verkade" — thus she termed her husband, and it did not affect Theresa disagreeably— "did not want to let me come at all. Well, I presented him with a fait accompli, I bought my ticket from a traveller's bureau, packed my trunks, and, next day, told him: Tonight at eight-thirty my train leaves.'"

"And were you quite homesick?"

Thilda shook her head.

"In such a case, I might not have come at all."

And, answering Theresa's somewhat astonished glance with a smile which seemed to comprehend it, she explained:

"I would, in that event, have tried to suppress my longing. Where would one be, if one yielded to every longing? No, I was not particularly homesick. But now I am really glad to be back. Besides, lest I forget..."

She presented Theresa with a little package, which had been laying on the couch. As Theresa opened it, discovering a big box of Dutch chocolates and a half dozen of the finest silk handkerchiefs, Herr Wohlschein, accompanied by his sister, entered the room. While the aunt embraced Thilda, Wohlschein and Theresa could, without embarrassment, exchange cordial glances.

They were the only guests invited. Dinner passed pleasantly, as in the past, in quiet contentment. Had Thilda not related sundry details of her trip and of her new home, one might have believed — Wohlschein did not hesitate to say as much — that she had not been away at all. But she talked more of the hours when, alone between heaven and the sea, she lay on her deck-chair, than of landscapes and cities seen, or of the house with the immense glass windows and numerous flowerbeds in which she now lived. And though, in her fashion, Thilda praised the glorious boredom of these days, Theresa sensed that these hours of solitude, of distance, had been the truest and deepest adventures of this journey — more important than the visit to a South American hacienda which she described; or than the view from the heights overlooking Rio de Janeiro on the bay glowing with myriads of lights; or more impressive even than the dance with the young French astronomer, who had utilized that same ship to observe a solar eclipse in South America.

Shortly after the meal, Theresa took leave, secretly hoping that Thilda would ask her to remain. But she did not. She even neglected to make any definite appointment for the next few days, and only uttered a sincere, though non-committal:

"I hope to see you again, before I leave."

"I, too," Theresa replied, though timidly. Then she added:

"Please remember me to Herr Verkade."

The package of chocolates and the handkerchiefs in her hand, she said good-bye and slowly descended the stairs — a former teacher, to whom a married pupil had considerately brought a small keepsake.

That evening at home was unspeakably dreary. Two sad days followed, during which news was forthcoming neither from Wohlschein nor from Thilda.

Dolorous thoughts arose within her.

XCII

AT AN EARLY hour on the morning of the third day, Herr Wohlschein appeared in person. He had returned directly from the station, whence he had escorted Thilda, who, upon receiving an urgent telegram from her husband, had departed earlier than she had anticipated. She had probably acted with more independence and superiority than she really possessed in returning home. How hastily, how excitedly she had torn open the telegram; how she had frowned, and then laughed lightly, blushing a deep scarlet! But it was difficult to say whether she coloured from wrath or pleasure. One thing was certain, and that was that she was already in the express train that would carry her to Holland and to the arms of an impatient husband. She had deeply regretted not having the chance to see Fraulein Fabiani a second time, and asked to be remembered to her.

But now, there was something else, something pleasant to tell, something wonderfully agreeable. Could she guess? He took her by the chin, as he might a small girl, and kissed the tip of her nose, as he liked to do — much to Theresa's displeasure — when he was in good spirits.

Theresa unfortunately could not guess that pleasant thing. An invitation, perhaps, to Holland for Whitsuntide?

One to spend the summer at Zandvord in a cottage? No, not that. No such invitation could be expected, for this year, at least. What, then? She was not clever at solving riddles. He must be good enough to tell her what it was that would make her so happy.

Yesterday, at table, Thilda had made a remark that was most characteristic of her, and that yet had come as a thunderbolt.

"Well, Father," she had said, "why don't you marry her?"

"Marry whom?" Herr Wohlschein had asked.

Did Thilda take him for a Don Juan, who could at will ask any number of ladies to become his wife? No. Thilda's question had obviously meant Fraulein Fabiani, and none other.

"Why don't you marry her?"

She could not understand why he, Herr Wohlschein, did not take Theresa for his wife. The clever little rascal had at once realized how matters stood between them, even from the way he wrote Theresa's name in his letters to his daughter.

Yes, she was a graphologist. She had added:

"You could probably do nothing better. You have my blessings!"

And what did Fraulein Theresa think of the possibility?

Though she smiled, her smiled lacked gaiety. And Herr Wohlschein wondered why no answer other than this forced smile rewarded him. Theresa was even more surprised. What she felt was not joy, and certainly not happiness; only unrest, if not actually fear — fear of the great change that such an occurrence would bring into her life, and to which a woman of her age, accustomed as she was to independence, would find it difficult to adjust herself. Or was it perhaps the horror of being irrevocably bound to this man, whom she liked a little, but whose love seemed unimportant, even at times distasteful, to her, and most often slightly comical. Did she perhaps vaguely fear the disagreeable incidents which might threaten her in connection with her son, and for which Wohlschein, unable to avoid them, might in the long run hold her accountable?

"Why don't you speak?" he finally asked.

Theresa then took his hand. Somewhat hurriedly, with features that lit up too quickly, and in a tone at first dubious, then bantering, she asked:

“Do you think I would be the right wife for you?” Reassured, he seized her in his awkward, bearish fashion, which she usually detested, but which she now tolerated so as not to endanger the spirit, and with it perhaps more than the mere spirit.

He wished her to cut down the number of her lessons, beginning the following day. At first, she would not listen, even insisting that, after her marriage, she must have some occupation from which she would derive satisfaction and occasional joy. Notwithstanding this, she refused to accept a new pupil, who applied shortly afterwards. She cut down the number of her weekly lessons from six to three. This Wohlschein accepted as a special favour.

XCIII

LETTER SOON ARRIVED from Franz, with a curt demand for money. He also mentioned a forwarding address, to which the sum of 100 gulden should be sent without delay. Theresa would not and could not withhold this incident from her betrothed, especially since this amount would have been missing when her rent fell due. Wohlschein gave her the sum without much ado, but took the occasion, for which he had apparently been waiting, to mention a plan of his own — he was ready to pay Franz's transportation to America, or rather — you could not afford to neglect anything with such a man — to send him to Hamburg in company with one of his trusted employees, who would buy the ticket for him and see him installed on the steamer. But instead of gratefully accepting Wohlschein's proposal as a welcome solution of her problem, Theresa interposed fears and objections; and the more insistent Wohlschein became, citing innumerable excellent reasons for his attitude, the more obstinately she insisted that she could not bear the thought of being separated by the width of the Atlantic from her son; and that, especially now that her own circumstances had taken such a decided turn for the better such an action would appear to her heartlessly selfish, and even as a sin which would sometime return to accuse her. Wohlschein contradicted her; and, as frequently happens in such cases, each one placed too high a value upon his own opinion, with the result that the quarrel grew more and more violent. Wohlschein strode up and down the room, his face distorted, while Theresa finally burst into tears. Then they both realized that they had gone too far. Theresa perceived at the same moment that her attitude toward her future husband certainly lacked prudence; but their relationship was still sufficiently young for the dispute to end in caresses.

But when Wohlschein, a few days later, departed on a short trip concerning which he had mentioned nothing in advance, Theresa was not so sure that this temporary parting was not intended to prepare the way for a definite break; and the unusually large sum which he left for her as a gift almost confirmed her fears. She felt, however, that this temporary separation was good for her spirit, and she imagined that she could bear the thought of a final parting without great agitation.

He returned sooner than she had expected and met her with such a strange reserve that at first she was again troubled. He did not keep her long in suspense, but said that he had interested himself in the affairs of her son on his own responsibility, and had learned that Franz at that moment was serving a prison sentence of several months — not his first one, as she probably knew. No, she knew nothing. Well, what did Theresa think now? Did she wish — did they both wish — to spend the remainder of their lives under such a strain? Gould one foresee where this fellow might end, what he might do, into what painful situations he might yet bring them, in case he remained within the city or in the country? He, Wohlschein, personally and with the aid of a reliable private detective who had aided him before in other investigations, desired to arrange everything, once and for all. Perhaps they could manage to start Franz on his journey to Hamburg and to America directly he had left the prison walls.

Theresa listened quietly, without protest; but from moment to moment, she felt an increasingly corroding and terrible torment in her heart, which nobody, above all not Wohlschein, could have understood; indeed she hardly understood it herself.

"When will he be free again?" she asked. She said nothing else.

"He has another six weeks to serve, I think."

She remained silent, but resolved to visit Franz in jail, and embrace him one last time before she took leave of him for ever.

And yet, she postponed that visit again and again. For although the thought of never seeing Franz again was most painful to her, she did not really feel any longing for him; on the contrary, she was almost unwilling to face him. Nothing further was said between her and Wohlschein of the whole affair; nor was the question of the wedding date discussed. Nevertheless, the character of her relationship became somewhat more formal. While, thus far, he had frequented ordinary restaurants when in her company, they now occasionally ate at the best places in town. Sometimes, too, he spent the entire night with her, and finally, he invited her for Sunday lunch at his own house. But the courtship was lacking in spirit and gaiety. And that Wohlschein, in spite of the fact that they were as good as betrothed, continued to address her with formal reserve when in the presence of the servants, and did not admit the truth when later his sister arrived, apparently without having been invited, appeared just a little too cautious and almost in bad taste.

XCIV

As far as the evening's entertainment went, he no longer repressed his rather cheap tastes. One night they visited a vaudeville house in one of the suburbs — a tenth-rate music hall, where the entertainment was poor enough to be mistaken for parody. A singer, about fifty years old, appeared, ridiculously painted, in a short gauze frock. With a broken voice, she sang an arch comic song about a Lieutenant, saluting in military fashion at the end of each stanza. A clown produced sleight-of-hand tricks, such as could be found in any of the magic sets purchasable at children's toy shops. An elderly man in a silk hat exhibited two trained poodles. A Tyrolese quartette, consisting of a heavily bearded man, a grotesquely thin dotard with piercing eyes, and two fat, colourless peasant girls in Greek laced shoes, sang songs and yodeled. A troupe of acrobats, "The Three Windsors," turned out to be a fat man in dirty tricot lifting two children of about ten and having them juggle; the children, after some listless applause, stepping forward and blowing kisses to the audience.

While Theresa grew melancholy, her escort seemed to be in his element. Theresa was surprised to find that this house could support a small orchestra, consisting of an upright piano, violin, 'cello, and clarinet. On top of the piano stood a glass of beer for the piano player. One of the other musicians reached for it now and then, and took a sip. Finally, a ridiculous paper curtain was lowered with a crackling sound. On it was painted a Muse in a blue tricot, with a purple belt, carrying a lyre in her arm; she was accompanied by a shepherd lad, wearing sandals and red tights.

Theresa's eyes automatically followed the beer glass, which at that moment again disappeared from the piano.

She observed the hand that had taken the glass — an emaciated, hairy hand, protruding from a cuffless, green and white striped shirt-sleeve. It belonged to the 'cello player, who had left the others for a moment to play alone. He raised the glass to his lips and drank. Some of the foam remained on his grey moustache. He raised himself slightly from his chair to restore the glass on the piano. While taking his bow, he bent over to the clarinet player to whisper something in his ear. Without paying any attention to him, the clarinettist kept on blowing. The other person, however, quite stupidly wagged his head from side to side, and licked the foam off his moustache.

His forehead was unnaturally high. His dark, greyish, short-cropped hair stood up like bristles. He half closed one eye when he joined the others again in playing. He had a poor instrument and, besides, played so obviously out of tune that he deserved the glare the pianist directed at him.

The curtain was raised again. A negro in greasy swallowtail coat and grey top-hat entered and was greeted by the audience with loud shouts of derision. The 'cellist raised his bow, saluting the coloured man on the stage, though nobody but Theresa — not even the negro — observed it.

There was no doubt about it: it was Kasimir Tobisch who was playing the 'cello in this dingy place. She was sitting far in front. Wohlschein filled her wine glass. She raised it to her lips, staring fixedly at Kasimir until she had forced him to answer her glance. He regarded her, then her companion, then the audience round about, let his eyes return to her and withdrew his glance. He had obviously not recognized her.

The performance proceeded. A dirty-looking Pierrot, a tubercular Pierrette, and a drunken Harlequin offered, almost with desperation, a pantomime. Theresa in fact forgot, for a brief time, that Kasimir Tobisch was playing the 'cello there; forgot that her son was a jailed thief and pimp; forgot even the man beside her, comfortably smoking his cigar through a white holder. With him, she laughed when Harlequin, in attempting to embrace Pierrette, fell prone on the floor.

Several hours later, however, in bed beside her snoring lover, she lay sleepless, weeping silently, her heart in pain.

XCV

AT AN EARLY morning hour, while Theresa was still giving her lessons, Karl appeared, to her great surprise. The expression on his face, the very manner of his entrance, augured ill. When she asked him to wait for a quarter of an hour, until the class was finished, he brusquely asked her to dismiss "her young ladies." The last three words he pronounced with contempt. What he had to say brooked no delay. Theresa could not but fulfil his wish.

He turned his face away while the young girls passed him, not caring to greet them. Alone with his sister, he began:

"Your son, the scoundrel, has had the impudence to send me this letter from jail."

He handed it to Theresa, who read as follows:

My dear Uncle:

Since I am about to leave jail after serving a terra, although I am innocent, and as I intend to begin a new life far from home, I respectfully ask you, in view of our close relationship, to contribute toward my expenses. I want 200 gulden of Austrian denomination. They are to be held in readiness, beginning tomorrow.

With the expression of my highest esteem, I am, dear Uncle,

Your nephew,

Franz.

Theresa lowered the letter and shrugged her shoulders. "Well!" Karl shouted. "Be good enough to say something!"

Theresa, quite unmoved, replied:

"I have nothing to do with this letter, and I don't know what you want of me."

"That's really excellent. Your son, in jail, writes me a blackmail letter — yes, it's blackmail!"

He tore the letter from her hand and pointed to the line: "in view of our close relationship... to be held in readiness, beginning tomorrow."

"The scoundrel knows that I hold public office. He will go to other people, beg, tell them that he is my nephew, the nephew of Representative Faber..."

"I can find no such intention in the letter. You are, in fact, his uncle."

This detached, mocking attitude completely infuriated him.

"And you dare to defend the rascal! Do you think I don't know that he has sent us letters before, asking for money? My wife, good-natured, but as stupid as ever, tried to hide them from me. Do you think you can hide anything from me? You think I don't know the kind of life you live under cover of your so-called profession? Yes, look at me with those big cow eyes! Some day you will lie on a manure pile, like your fine son. Do you think me blind? No! You are content with things. When you are shown a way out and get a donkey foolish enough to want to marry you — no, you prefer your freedom and change your lovers like shirts. It's more comfortable; it's more fun. And with those girls here... what are you doing with them? Lessons, I suppose! Ha, ha! You are probably making them ready for Jewish libertines."

"Get out!" Theresa ordered.

She did not raise her arm, did not stretch out her hand. Almost inaudibly, she said:

"Get out!"

But Karl would not be interrupted. He continued to pour forth a flood of abuse. Theresa, he shouted, had behaved just so in her youth. And she continued to do so, at an age when other women slowly came to their senses, if for no other reason than because they feared to make themselves ridiculous. Did she really imagine that she could ever have deceived him? As a young girl, she had flirted with his friends and colleagues. And that episode with the accursed Lieutenant! And whose child that fine son of hers was who held the fate of the whole family in his hand, she herself probably did not know. And what she had later done as a governess, as the guardian of little girls — he had had vague reports of that, too. And now, he knew that, as well, she was keeping company with an elderly rich man, whom she probably tried to hold by using her pupils to..."

Wohlschein entered. He had apparently not heard or understood the last words. He nevertheless continued to stare in surprise from Theresa to Karl, and back to Theresa again. Karl thought it an opportune time to depart.

"I don't wish to disturb you any longer," he said, and with a brief, almost mocking bow to Wohlschein, he turned to leave the room.

"Just a moment, Karl!" Theresa said.

Utterly calm, she made the introduction.

"Dr. Karl Faber, my brother; Herr Wohlschein, my intended husband."

Karl distorted his mouth.

"I am honoured!" he said. "So much the more reason why I should not disturb."

"I beg your pardon," the other man said. "I am inclined to believe that I was the disturber."

"Not at all!" Theresa replied.

"Certainly not," Karl added. "Some small differences of opinion cannot be avoided in families. Please excuse me, and accept my congratulations. Good afternoon, Herr Wohlschein."

Hardly had he left the door when Theresa turned to Wohlschein.

"Please forgive me," she said, "but I was forced to say it."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that I obligated you to nothing when I introduced you as my future husband. You are still quite free in your decision."

"I see what you mean. But I don't at all wish to be free, as you put it."

With clumsy tenderness, he pressed her to his breast.

"And now, I would like to know what your brother wanted."

She was glad that he had heard nothing of the conversation. She told him as much as she deemed proper. When he left, it was definitely arranged that the wedding would he held on Whitsuntide, and that Franz's departure for America would occur before that date.

XCVI

WHITSUNTIDE WAS ALMOST three months away. Wohlschein's postponement of the wedding to the distant date was due to two imperative business trips: one to Poland and another to the Tyrol; also, to certain changes which he desired to make in the house. Beyond this, various matters had to be discussed with his attorney, since it was expedient to insert a number of clauses in his will before the wedding. "We are all mortal," he said. Theresa had nothing to urge against the delay, cherishing the idea of not being forced completely to discontinue her teaching, particularly since she now found herself attracted to her duties in the same degree that they had ceased to be imperative.

It was as pure recreation that she considered those periods of Wohlschein's absence — one week in February and another in March — when she need expect no morning visits from him. Nevertheless now and then she felt something akin to longing for him. During the past few weeks, she had gradually grown accustomed to a sort of married life which — she could not gainsay it — had in every respect exercised a good influence on her. And from numerous signs, external and internal, she realized that her life as a woman was by no means ended. It added to her good spirits that now she could dress better than ever before. She looked forward eagerly to the promise he had made, to go shopping with her for the purchase of her further necessaries.

Shortly after Wohlschein's return, she spent the Easter holidays with him in a comfortable little hotel near Vienna. As yet, the days were quite cool. But the trees were already in bud, and the bushes had blossomed. There were evenings when, in her charming room, they felt like true young lovers, so that after her return, during many lonely hours in her own house, she became conscious of the fact that she would be very comfortable as Frau Wohlschein, sharing their home together. More precious, however, than everything else was a card from Thilda, which Wohlschein had shown her: "With a thousand Easter greetings for you and Theresa." Yes, that is what it said — plain "Theresa"!

As yet, she had not been able to bring herself to visit the jail. Too strong was her horror of this meeting, which at the same time was supposed to be a final parting. During the few weeks, Wohlschein had not once mentioned Franz; and Theresa thought that he meant to speak only after everything had been arranged. In point of fact, soon after returning from their Easter vacation, he told her that he had sent his attorney to the jail, but that Franz, for the time being, would hear nothing of the American plans. He was not sentenced to deportation, he had declared. Nevertheless, Wohlschein felt confident that the promise of a larger sum of money, to be paid to him upon his arrival in America, would substantially alter his point of view.

XCVII

A FEW DAYS later, Theresa was expecting Wohlschein, who was to call for her at ten in the morning with a carriage, to go shopping, as they had done a few times before. It was a warm spring day. The windows were open, and the near-by woods scattered their fragrance. Wohlschein was habitually punctual. A half hour after the appointed time, she began to wonder. Already dressed for the streets, she stood waiting at the window. Another half hour passed. She grew restless, and decided to telephone. There was no answer. After a time, she telephoned again.

"Who is this?" a strange voice demanded.

"I only wished to ask if Herr Wohlschein has already left the house."

"Who is this speaking?" the unknown voice insisted.

"Theresa Fabiani."

"Oh, Fraulein Fabiani, it is too dreadful!" — now she recognized the voice of the old bookkeeper— "Herr Wohlschein, yes, Herr Wohlschein suddenly died!"

"What?"

"They found him this morning, dead, in bed!"

"For God's sake!" She rushed downstairs.

She did not think of using the street car or of taking a carriage. Mechanically, as if in a drugged dream — not exactly shocked, and at first, hardly in haste, although later almost running — she made her way toward the Zieglergasse.

There was the house, seemingly unchanged. A carriage was standing before the door, as happened frequently enough. She ran up the stairs. The door was locked. Theresa had to ring the bell. The maid opened.

"Good morning, Fraulein Fabiani!"

For a moment, Theresa thought that it was not true; that she had misunderstood, or that some one had played an impudent jest at her expense. And she asked, with a strange feeling that her question might still alter the situation:

"Is Herr Wohlschein..."

But she did not finish.

"Why, don't you know?"

Now she nodded quickly, made a meaningless, protesting gesture with her hand, and, without further question, opened the door to the living room. Grouped round the table, she saw the bookkeeper and two gentlemen whom she did not know. One of them was on the point of leaving. Two ladies were sitting near the fireplace; one of them, the sister of the deceased. Theresa went over to her.

"Is it really true?"

The sister nodded and took her hand. Theresa stopped helplessly. The door to the adjoining room stood ajar. Theresa walked over, and felt them all watching her. The dining room was empty. At the window of the next room, the small smoking-room, two men were standing, conversing earnestly but softly. The next door, too, stood open. Here was Wohlschein's bed.

The outline of a human figure, covered with a white sheet, was recognizable. There, then, he lay dead, as alone as only dead men can be. Theresa felt no pain — nothing except embarrassment and strangeness. She would have liked to kneel down, but something restrained her. Why did they leave her alone? The sister might have followed her. Had the last will already been read? Was she thinking of that now? Of course, it was not without importance — this much she knew even at this moment. But everything else was more important than that. He was dead — the lover, the future husband, the good man to whom she owed so much!

Thilda's father! Ah, now Thilda would have to come, too! Had they wired her already? Certainly! Under this sheet was his face! Why were the candles not burning? Yesterday, at this hour, she had been at Herrenhuter's with him, to order bed linen. What were they whispering in the next room? The stranger with the black moustache was probably the attorney. Did the people at all surmise who she was? Well, the sister certainly knew. She might have been a little more sympathetic to the sweetheart of her dead brother. If she were his wife, they would all behave differently, that was sure!

I want to go in to his sister again, she thought. We are the two real mourners, we and Thilda. Before she left the room, she made the sign of the cross. Should she not have looked upon the face of the deceased? But she did not want to see his face again. She was afraid of it, that rather fat, shiny face. Yes, he had been a little fat — that was perhaps why... But he had been no more than fifty... And now she was his widow, without ever having been married to him.

On the table in the living room she saw cakes, wine and glasses.

"Don't you want to take something, Fraulein Fabiani?" the sister asked.

"Thank you, no," Theresa replied.

She took nothing, but sat down beside the ladies. The sister introduced her. Theresa did not understand the name of the lady. And she heard her own: "Fraulein Fabiani, for many years Thilda's teacher."

The lady extended her hand.

"The poor child!" the lady said.

The sister nodded.

"By now, she probably has the telegram."

"Does she live in Amsterdam, or at the Hague?" the stranger asked.

"In Amsterdam," the sister replied.

"Were you ever in Holland?"

"No, never. This summer I wanted to go there, with my poor brother."

A brief silence.

"Sometimes pains in the heart," the sister replied. And then, to Theresa:

"Don't you really want to take something, Fraulein Fabiani? A sip of wine?"

Theresa accepted a glass of wine. An elderly man in a gray summer suit came in. With a sorrowful expression on his face, his round, sad eyes wandering round the room, he approached the sister and shook her hand, twice, three times.

"This is terrible! So unexpected!"

The sister sighed.

Then he gave Theresa his hand, and only when he had done so became aware that he did not know her. The sister introduced him. Theresa could not understand the name of the man. Then, again:

"Fraulein Fabiani, for years the teacher of my niece, Thilda!"

"The poor child," the gentleman remarked.

Theresa said good-bye. Nobody detained her.

XCVIII

WOHLSCHEIN IN HIS last will had stipulated for a simple burial. His entire estate had been bequeathed to Thilda. Legacies were given to several benevolent societies, and ample provision was made for his divorced wife. The old employees of the factory were not forgotten, and the servants, too, received their share; the piano teachers, two former governesses, and Fraulein Fabiani, under a codicil made the previous summer, received one thousand gulden each. Through a special provision, the deceased had arranged that the heirs should be notified immediately after the reading of the will, and should receive their respective shares directly after the testator's decease.

Theresa was asked to call on the attorney, to receive her share in person. She recognized in him one of the men whom she had seen at the home of the deceased. He seemed to know everything, and volubly regretted the premature death of Herr Wohlschein, who, shortly before his death, had declared his intention of making radical changes in his last will, but had — unfortunately, although characteristically enough, — postponed the matter until it was too late.

Theresa was hardly disappointed. Only now did she realize that she had never really expected to become Frau Wohlschein; that she had never believed a quiet, untroubled existence might fall to her lot, or that she might ever become Thilda Verkade's stepmother.

The next morning, she stood at Wohlschein's grave with the other relatives and friends. She too let fall some earth upon the coffin. Thilda was there. The two women exchanged a glance across the grave. Thilda's eyes held so much warmth and understanding that a dim hope, an expectation of happiness, furtively arose in Theresa's heart. Garbed in black, leaning on the arm of her tall husband — closer than any human contact that Theresa could have imagined Thilda as capable of suffering — thus Theresa saw her, after the ceremony, walk through the gate of the cemetery and disappear.

It was arranged that Theresa should call on her, the following afternoon, at the house in the Zieglergasse. But she could not muster sufficient courage for the ordeal. The morning afterward, when she really wished to call, the daughter of the dead man had already departed with her husband.

XCIX

AND NOW SHE was alone — completely alone, as she had never been before. She had never been in love with Wohlschein. And yet, how painful it was, evening after evening, never to see the door open again, never to hear the bell outside announce his coming.

And then, once, the bell rang, late in the evening. Her knowledge of the irrevocable annihilation of Wohlschein had not as yet become an integral part of her existence; and so, for the fraction of a second, she thought: He! What does he want so late at night? Of course, before she had arisen, she had realized that it might be any one in the world save only him.

It was Franz who stood before her door. Was he already free? In the dimly lighted hall, his cap pulled down over his forehead, a cigarette end between his lips, emaciated and pale, his glance uncertain and dejected, he seemed rather more pitiable than dangerous. But Theresa felt nothing: neither pity nor dread. Perhaps she felt a certain satisfaction that, after all, at least some one had come who, for a moment, would relieve her of the heavy pressure of loneliness which weighed upon her.

"Good evening, Franz!" she said, calmly. He looked up, as it surprised at the mild, almost loving tone of her welcome.

"Good evening, Mother!"

She gave him her hand, and even kept holding his in hers as she led him in. She turned on the light.

"Sit down."

He remained standing.

"So you are already free?"

She said it quiet casually, as if she had said: "Are you back from your trip?"

"Yes," he answered, "since yesterday. They gave me a week for good behaviour. What do you think of that, Mother? So you don't need to be afraid. I have even found myself lodgings. But I have nothing else."

He laughed shortly.

Without answering, Theresa laid the table for him, gave him what she had in the house, and poured out a glass of wine.

He ate ravenously. When she put a piece of smoked salmon before him, he said: —

"You seem to be well-off, Mother!"

And suddenly there was a threat, a demand in his voice. "Not quite as well-off as you may think!" she replied.

He laughed.

"I won't take anything away from you, Mother!"

"You would not find much, any more."

"Well, thank goodness, new supplies will come soon."

"I don't know from where."

Franz glanced at her menacingly.

"I wasn't in for burglary, you know! If somebody forgets his pocketbook, I can't help it. My lawyer claimed, too, that they could sentence me only because I had kept something I had found."

She protested.

"I didn't ask you for an explanation!" she exclaimed. He kept on eating. Then suddenly he said:

“But I don’t want to hear about America! I can get along here just as well. The day after tomorrow, I start work. Yes! Thank God, a fellow still has friends who won’t leave him in the lurch when he has a stroke of bad luck!”

Theresa shrugged her shoulders.

“Why should a healthy young man not be able to find a position? I only wish it may last, this time.”

“As far as I was concerned, the others would have lasted, too. But people think you’ve got to stand for everything! And I’m too good for that. I won’t stand for anything from anybody. Do you understand that, Mother? And if I wanted to go to America, I’d go by myself. I won’t be packed off! Tell that to your — your man!” Theresa remained absolutely calm.

“He meant well,” she said. “You may believe me.”

“What was meant well?” he answered, rudely.

“This trip to America. But you can rest in peace. It won’t happen again. The man — my intended husband — died three weeks ago.”

He looked at her incredulously, as if suspecting that by falsehood she wished to safeguard herself against fresh demands on his part. But on her pale face, in her sorrowful features, even he could read that this was not an evasion, not a lie. He kept on eating, saying nothing, and lit a cigarette. And only then — and as cold as it sounded, as coldly as it was probably thought, for the first time Theresa detected in his voice something like a warm undertone:

“You have no luck either, Mother!”

Then he declared that he was too tired to make the journey to his distant lodgings, and stretched out as he was on the couch. Soon he fell asleep. The next morning he was gone before Theresa had arisen.

But at noon he was back again, this time carrying a dirty cardboard satchel, and saying that he wanted to stay with her for three days, until he could start on his new job — to which he never referred again. Theresa at least persuaded him to remain away during her hours of instruction. But she could not do anything against the fact that a friend and a girl — there might even have been three or four people, of whom she never caught sight — spent half the night drinking, whispering, and laughing with him. Whatever she had left from the table she gave him for his nocturnal gatherings. The fourth morning he waited in for her awakening. She gave him all that she had in the house; the larger portion of her money she had carefully put into the savings bank. And it was fortunate that she had done so, for before he left, Franz was brazen enough to rummage through all the drawers of the furniture. Then, for the next four weeks, he disappeared.

C

THE DAYS PASSED and Whitsuntide came — the day that had been set for the wedding. Theresa marked the occasion by a visit to Wohlschein's grave, upon which, among the withered wreaths without names and inscriptions, she found her bunch of violets, too. For a long while, she stood there under the clear, blue, summer sky — without praying, almost without thinking, and in fact, without any sensation of sadness. That word of her son's in which she had heard his heart speak, after its fashion, was still within her: "You have no luck either, Mother!" But in her memory, it did not refer exactly — and certainly not exclusively — to the death of her intended husband, but rather to her entire existence. Of a truth, she had not come into this world to be happy. And as Frau Wohlschein, she probably would not have been more happy than in any other condition. The fact that somebody dies is not in itself significant — it is one of the hundreds of ways in which a person disappears or sneaks away. So many were dead for her, of both the living and the dead! Dead, for example, was her father, who had been non-existent these many years. Dead, Richard, who, of all the men she had loved, had been the one nearest to her heart; and dead also her mother, whom she had told of the impending marriage only a few days before Wohlschein's demise, and who had hardly taken any notice of her words, continuing her talk about her literary estate, which she intended to bequeath to the City of Vienna. Dead was her brother, too, who had not communicated with her again after his last unwelcome visit; and dead, Alfred, who had been her lover and friend; dead, too her lost son, the pimp and thief; and Thilda, dreaming in Holland behind high, bright window-panes, who never thought of her teacher; and dead the many children, both boys and girls, for whom she had been a preceptor and sometimes almost a mother. Dead, all of the many men to whom she had belonged. And it was almost as if this Herr Wohlschein were proud that he slept so irrevocably beneath this mound, as if he took an unction to himself for being more definitely dead than the others.

Oh no, she had no special tears for him. The tears which she was shedding now flowed for so many others, and before every one else, she probably shed them for herself. And perhaps these were not tears of pain at all, but rather tears of weariness. For she was weary as she had never been weary before. At times, she was aware of nothing else but her weariness. Every evening, she sank into her bed so fatigued that she thought she would never be able to sleep enough and feel refreshed again.

But it was not destined to be so easy for her. She lived and worried on. Twice again, she was obliged to assist Franz. The first time, he came himself, in broad daylight, with a small satchel, while her pupils were in the house. He intended to stay at her house again. She sent him away, refusing even to let him in the door. But, in order to prevent worse, she could not help but give him all the ready cash she had in the house. The second time, it was not he who came, but two of his friends. They looked just like his kind, talked absurdly in stilted phrases, claimed their comrade's life and honour were at stake, and refused to leave until Theresa had again yielded up almost everything that she possessed.

Now, summer was at hand. Theresa's lessons had stopped entirely. The last few gulden she had saved had been eaten up, and she sold her insignificant trinkets — a small golden bracelet and a ring set with a semi-precious stone, which Wohlschein had given her. The small sum which she received for these was sufficient to help her over the summer until autumn, and she was even reckless enough to go to the country for a few days in August, to the same spot where she had spent the Christmas holiday with Wohlschein — although this time she stopped at a less pretentious hotel.

It was during these days that, for a short time, she was aroused from her lethargy and determined to bring security and reason into her existence, as far as this might still be possible. Before everything else, she definitely resolved to oppose, once and for all, any further attempts on Franz's part to blackmail her; yes, even if she were forced to seek protection against him from the police. What did it matter, anyway? Everybody knew that she had a bad son, who had served time in prison, and nobody in the world would hold it against her if she were finally to resign him to his fate. Furthermore, she determined to communicate with her former pupils, some of whom were already grown and married, in order to ask them for recommendations. She had made her own living thus far and she was quite able to continue doing so. Even these few days in the country, the fresh air, the rest, the freedom from painful and disagreeable excitements — how favourably it all reacted upon her spirits. She was not so utterly exhausted, after all, as she was made aware by many a man's intercepted glance. Indeed, if she had encouraged that young tourist in the slightest degree — the one who each night, sat in the hotel restaurant, smoking his pipe, after returning from his mountain tours, and who kept his friendly eyes fixed on her — she might even have had her little "adventure" again. But it sufficed her to know that this was still possible. It would have seemed to her unworthy, almost insolent, like a challenge to fate, to have tempted the young man by coquetry to her side, and thus to give him hopes which she did not propose to gratify.

One morning, from her window, she saw him drive away in a motor car. His knapsack was at his feet and, as if he had felt her looking after him, he suddenly turned round and, with a broad gesture, lifted his head with its chamois beard, and she waved back a farewell. He, however, shrugged his shoulders regretfully, as if he wished to say to her: "But now, unfortunately, it is too late!" Then he drove on. For a moment, she felt sad. Was that happiness, perhaps her last happiness, driving away? Nonsense! she answered herself, and was a little ashamed of such sentimental reflections.

The next evening as she had planned, she returned to Vienna.

CI

PRIMARILY BECAUSE SHE feared Franz, she had left no forwarding address. Thus, she found the printed announcement of the death of her mother only now, almost a week after the event had occurred. The names of her brother and her sister-in-law on the announcement were coupled with her own. She was more shocked than grieved. The next morning, at an hour when she knew Karl would not be at home, she went to his house. She was received somewhat coldly by her sister-in-law. Frau Faber held it against her that she could not be reached; a reproach which seemed merited for once as during her last few days the mother had repeatedly asked for Theresa.

It had unfortunately been necessary to complete all the arrangements without her consent. The last will, which Theresa might read at her convenience, was deposited with the notary. It contained hardly anything else except instructions for disposing of the literary estate of the deceased, which was surprisingly rich, but with which the City of Vienna, as the real heir, did not know what to do, and which had not as yet been called for. There had been very little cash; and against that little, a few creditors, small business people of the neighbourhood, had put in claims. In order to pay the more pressing debts, the few possessions of the deceased were to be auctioned off, within a few days. In the somewhat unlikely case of a surplus, Theresa would be notified through the notary.

It could not escape Theresa that her sister-in-law again and again glanced anxiously toward the door. She understood that the woman expected the appearance of her husband with evil forebodings, and she said:

"It might be better if I were to go now."

Her sister-in-law breathed more freely.

"I'll visit you as soon as I can," she said, "but it is really better that you should not meet Karl just now. You know him. He did not even attend the funeral, for fear that he might meet you."

"Then why is my name printed on the announcements?"

"That announcement — just imagine it — was prepared by your mother herself before her death. I'll tell you all about that in detail some time."

And she almost forced Theresa out of the door.

On her way home, Theresa, for the first time in a long while, once more paused at a church. She felt herself compelled to do that much, in memory of her mother, although her mother herself had had little enough to do with religious observances. And again it happened, as it had happened so often during the past year, that in the gloom of this place, filled with the fragrance of incense, a wonderful peace came over her — another and a deeper peace than that which had so often come upon her in the stillness of the forest, on a grassy plot in the mountains, or in any other solitude. And while she sat in the chair, with her hands unconsciously folded as if in prayer, she saw in her mind not only the picture of her mother as she had seen her the last time, but other departed ones who had meant something in her life; they appeared now, not as dead people, but rather as people risen from the grave; who had gained eternal bliss. Wohlschein, too, was among them; and for the first time, he appeared to her not as one suddenly taken away from her, as a decaying corpse, but rather as one who looked down upon her from heaven, smiling and understanding. And far away, impure and almost damned, appeared those who were yet alive. Not only men who had brought her sorrow, like her brother, her son, and the contemptible Kasimir Tobisch — those whom one could well imagine as being damned even while they were alive — but men, too, who had never done her wrong; even such a creature as Thilda seemed to her more remote than the dead, more ambiguous, more to be pitied, yes, more truly damned.

CII

WITH AUTUMN, THERESA'S school work was resumed. Only a few pupils from last year reappeared, but Theresa succeeded in finding an afternoon position, which she accepted as a particularly fortunate opportunity. It was a position as governess to the two daughters of the owner of a department store in the suburbs, and it was her duty to teach and take the children walking. The father, himself only half educated and in rather mean circumstances, was the more anxious to have a governess for his daughters, since the mother was actively occupied in his store. The two girls were pleasing enough, but somewhat stupid; and occasionally, when Theresa would take them for a walk in the rather poor park nearby and vainly begin a conversation with them, more from habit and a sense of duty than for any other reason, she was oppressed by that same weariness which had so tormented her in her earlier days, but which weighed so terribly, so heavily upon her now that sometimes it resembled a dull despair. The agreeable result of her sojourn in the country disappeared with disturbing rapidity.

Thus when, one night, Franz appeared, not as rude and impudent as he usually was, but rather timid and quiet, she did not have the courage to refuse him lodging, as she had determined to do. During the first few days, he did not, in fact, appreciably disturb her. He spent his time outside the house, received no visitors, and continued so depressed and silent that Theresa was almost brought to the point of asking what it was that troubled him. On the third night, he came in after she had gone to bed. He was in haste. He claimed to have found a furnished room at last, to which he proposed to move immediately, for which purpose he needed the sum of ten gulden. This sum he wanted her to give him at once. Theresa refused, protesting that she did not have anything left. It was almost the truth. But Franz would not believe her, and at once began to search the entire place. As his attitude became increasingly threatening, Theresa thought it wise to open a drawer and, before his eyes, take out a few gulden which she had hidden among some linen. He doubted that this was all that she had hidden away, but she swore that now she had given him her last coin. She breathed more freely when he suddenly gave up the search and took himself off with extraordinary haste.

The next morning, she understood why Franz had been in such a hurry. A detective awakened her from sleep at six o'clock in the morning. He asked for Franz and inquired if she knew his new address, informing her politely that it was her right to withhold any information which she might possess.

"We will get him soon, anyway," he remarked amiably, and left, with an officially regretful glance.

Now Theresa thought that the last vestige of feeling for her son was dead in her heart; that all that still united them was her fear of his return. The baleful glance which he had given her when she had taken her few gulden from the drawer caused her to fear still worse the next time. And she resolved never again to admit him to the house, under any circumstances, even if she had herself to summon the police.

Serious difficulties pressed her ever more closely. Never before had she been forced to ask anybody for help, and she was obliged to confess to herself that any such appeal in the present circumstances was hardly better than begging. And who was there from whom she might expect help? Alfred, of course, would not have refused her. Thilda, too, would help her, in the event of necessity; but the very thought of writing to either one of these two was painful. The lessons which she gave still brought in enough to keep her from actual hunger. No new purchases, for the time being, were absolutely necessary. She was accustomed to a precarious existence, and so she lived on — in seclusion and poverty, but at least peacefully, since Franz had once more disappeared.

And one morning, during the winter, she actually experienced a moment of joy. A letter from Thilda arrived, smelling preciously of the familiar perfume which she had been accustomed to use ever since she was a young girl.

"My dear Fraulein Theresa Fabiani," she wrote, "I frequently think of you — almost as often as I think of poor Papa. Will you not be good enough, my dear Fraulein Fabiani, to place a few flowers on his grave for me, the next time you go to the church-yard? And I would particularly appreciate it if you were to write and tell me how everything is going with you. Does the "class" still exist?

How is little Crete? Has she learned to spell yet? It is very foggy here, these winter days; that is because the sea is so near. There is hardly any snow. My husband wants to be remembered to you. He is frequently away, and then the evenings are lonely and long — but you know that, after all, I am not so unwilling to be alone with myself, and for this reason it doesn't occur to me to complain. I send my most affectionate regards, dear Fraulein Theresa, and I hope to meet you again some time. Your grateful Thilda.

"P.S. — A sum for the flowers is enclosed."

Theresa stared at the letter for a long while. "I hope to meet you again some time" — that did not sound very promising, after all. Perhaps the letter was written solely because of the flowers for her father's grave. As a matter of fact, the "sum" was not enclosed. Thilda had either forgotten to enclose it, or somebody had stolen it from the letter. Well, after all, a few asters would be sufficient, and these she could buy herself, if necessary. "The next time you go to the church-yard" — Theresa had not been there again since Whitsuntide. She would surely go during the Christmas holidays. To miss a lesson and buy flowers besides, was quite beyond her means. The letter she would answer later. Frau Thilda Verkade had kept her waiting long enough.

CIII

A FEW EVENINGS afterward, quite late, the bell rang. Theresa's heart stopped beating. She crept to the door and looked through the keyhole. It was not her son. A still youthful woman stood outside, whom Theresa did not immediately recognize.

"Who is there?" she asked, hesitatingly.

A high, somewhat hoarse voice answered:

"A good old friend. Please open the door, Fraulein Theresa! It's Agnes — Agnes Leutner!"

Agnes? What did she want? What tidings did she bring? Probably some news of Franz! She opened the door.

Agnes entered quite timidly and paused in the hall to shake the snow from her garments.

"Good evening, Fraulein Theresa!"

"Won't you come in?"

Agnes followed Theresa into the living room, and her uncertain glance fastened upon the table littered with books and papers. Theresa looked at her. Oh, one could not doubt for a moment what manner of woman she was! Her face made up, heavily rouged, under the violet felt hat with a cheap ostrich feather; the curls, dyed blond, falling over her eyes; big imitation jewels in her ears; worn-out imitation astrakhan jacket, with a muff to match — thus she stood, impudent and embarrassed at the same time.

"Have a seat, Fraulein Agnes!"

Agnes had noticed Theresa's searching, damning look well enough, and, in a somewhat mocking tone, she said, apologetically:

"Naturally, I would not have disturbed you — but I have a message."

"From Franz?"

"With your permission!"

And she sat down.

"You see, he is at the hospital of the Jesuit Fathers..."

"For heaven's sake!" Theresa cried; and she knew suddenly that it was her son who was lying at the hospital — sick perhaps, sick to death.

Agnes reassured her.

"There, there, it's not dangerous, Fraulein Theresa. He will get well again, long before the trial. He is under arrest, you know! But they won't be able to get the goods on him, this time, because he had nothing to do with it. The police always get the wrong ones, anyway!"

"What is the matter with him?"

"Nothing at all — he is just a little sick!" She hummed a popular ditty— "Love, love, that's all it is..." And, with a mocking laugh: "Well, it will last a little while. And afterwards, you've got to be careful. For the sake of the others. As if the others were careful! I had it real bad. I had to spend six weeks in the hospital!"

Theresa grew alternately red and pale. Beside this woman, she felt like a little girl. She had only one desire — to get rid of her as quickly as possible. And, moving away from her as far as she could, she said:

"What is the message that you have for me from Franz?" Agnes, obviously piqued, aped her intonation:

"The message that I have for you from Franz? That ought not to be so difficult to guess! Or do you think, perhaps, that they give the patients enough to eat at the hospital? Unless you have tuberculosis, or something like that, they certainly don't! He needs money, to buy a little something to help out his meals. A mother's got to see to that!"

"Why didn't he write, if he is sick? I would have tried to raise it, somewhere!"

"He probably knows why he didn't write!"

"I always helped him, when I could..."

She stopped abruptly. Was it not shameful, after all, to account to such a person for what she had done?

"That's all right. I can imagine that you haven't got anything to blame yourself for. It's always the same story — sometimes one has more, and sometimes less. But you still look good enough. You'll find somebody yet who'll spend something."

Once more the blood rose to Theresa's face. This person! — did she not talk as if Theresa were of her kind? Oh, how Franz must have talked to her and to others about her — the son talking thus of his mother! In what a light he saw her! She tried to find an answer, but could not. At last, helplessly and hesitatingly, she said:

"I am giving lessons!"

"Oh, of course!" Agnes replied. And, with a disparaging look at the books and papers, she added: "I can see that! It's lucky that you had an education. I'd prefer to pick my own man, too!"

Theresa rose.

"Go!" she said. "I will bring Franz what he needs." Agnes, too, got up, slowly, as if offended. But now she seemed to realize that she had employed the wrong tone, and she did not want to return to Franz with empty hands. So she said:

"Very well. If you want to visit him in the hospital, do so. But that is probably something that he doesn't expect. And you didn't think of it, either!"

"I did not know that he was in the hospital!"

"Nor did I. I found him accidentally. I was calling on an old friend of mine, to take him some food. Yes, the likes of me have got to save a little, too, and we've got to earn it hard enough, Fraulein Theresa — harder than by lessons! Well, you can imagine my surprise when I saw Franz lying there, across from my friend. He was glad to see me, too. Old love doesn't rust! Well, and after one word had followed the other, I asked him if he didn't need anything from outside, and then he said: 'Perhaps you would go to my mother, and see if she can't send me a little money for food.' 'Why not,' I said, 'your mother will probably remember me. And she may prefer to send something by me, rather than come here herself. That's disagreeable for people who aren't accustomed to it!"

Theresa had a few gulden in her purse.

"Here, take this. I am sorry, but I have no more."

She noticed that Agnes glanced at the chest of drawers. So Franz had told her about that, too! And, with trembling lips, she added:

"In there, I have nothing, either! Perhaps for Christmas... But then, I shall come myself."

"By Christmas, he may be free again. I'm telling you, Fraulein Theresa, this time they haven't got anything on him! Well, anyhow, I thank you many times, in his name. And we understand each other, don't we? Haven't you got a few cigarettes for me?"

Theresa's first impulse was to answer that she had none, but then she remembered that a half empty box Wohlschein had once left was still somewhere around. She disappeared into the next room, and returned with a handful of cigarettes.

"That will please Franz particularly," Agnes said, and thrust them into her muff. "And I'll smoke one now if I may?"

Theresa did not reply, but offered her hand. She no longer had any ill feeling nor did she feel any superiority over the girl. There was really not such a tremendous difference between her and Agnes. After all, hadn't she sold herself to Wohlschein?

Give him my regards, Agnes, she said, gently.

It was dark on the stairs. Theresa guided Agnes through the hall. And before the janitor came to open the door, Agnes raised the collar of her astrakhan jacket. Theresa knew that she did so to save her from embarrassment.

That night, she sat awake for a long time. Now she had gone through that, too. Why, after all, did it seem extraordinary? She had a son who was a good-for-nothing, who kept company with strumpets and thieves, and was occasionally wanted by the police, arrested at intervals, and who was now at the hospital with a foul ailment. She might have accepted that, by now. And yet, he was her son! Time and again — she might fight against it as best she could — in her own heart she felt pity, she felt guilt, when he suffered and did evil. Guilt; that was it! Strange, that in moments like this she always thought of her own guilt only, as if she who had borne him were alone responsible for what he did; as if the man who had begotten him and then disappeared into the darkness of his existence had had nothing at all to do with it! Well, yes! For Kasimir Tobisch, the embrace which had begotten her son had been one of many — not happier and not of greater importance than any of the others which he had enjoyed. He did not know that the man for whose existence in this world he was responsible, was a scoundrel; he did not even know that he had a son. And if, by chance, he had learned it — what would he have understood of it all? What had this lost soul at the criminal hospital to do with the aging man who, after twenty dark, stupid years of swindling, was playing the 'cello at a cheap music-hall and drinking the piano player's beer? How was he to feel any relationship, when even she herself could imagine only with great difficulty that from a fleeting moment of lust a man had sprung who was her son? That union of a moment long since forgotten, and this one of today — how was it possible to employ the same word for them? And yet, that which for years had been absolutely unimportant, suddenly took on an incredible importance and meaning for her, as if the moment that Kasimir, too, should know of the existence of their child, her own life would take on a new substance, a new sense, a new form. She felt like one standing beside the bed of a sleeper, uncertain whether merely to stroke his forehead quietly and take leave without disturbing his slumber, or whether to shake him awake to life and responsibility. Then she reflected that Kasimir Tobisch was only a dreamer, who knew nothing of the essence of his own existence. Doubtless there had been other women in his life. Perhaps he had still other children; perhaps he knew of one or two of them, for he might not always have succeeded in sneaking away. But for the one whom he had forgotten completely, suddenly to stand before him, twenty years after he had left her, and say: "Kasimir, you and I have a child!" — that was certainly something which had never happened to him before. And, as in a picture, she saw it all played out before her mind's eye: how she aroused him from his slumber; how she took his hand and led him through innumerable streets symbolic of the many crossways of his life; how she, with him, knocked at a door, the door of the criminal hospital, and how she led him forward to the bed of a sick boy who was his son; how he opened his eyes wide in surprise, beginning to understand, and finally, how he sank on his knees at the bedside and turning round to her, whispered: "Forgive me, Theresa!"

The first Christmas holiday, she went to the cemetery. It was deceptive spring weather. A lukewarm wind was blowing over the graves, and the ground was wet with melted snow. She had brought asters, white ones for Thilda, and violet ones for herself. She did not find Wohlschein's grave as easily as she had expected. The tombstone was not yet erected. Only a number told her where Thilda's father lay buried. Thilda's father, she thought; then she realized that it was her lover who lay here in his eternal slumber. Now we would have been married almost three-quarters of a year, she thought. Today I would be sitting in a warm, nicely furnished room, and, like Thilda, I would be looking through a clean window at the street outside, and would have no difficulties at all. But she hardly felt regret that it had not happened that way; and she thought of the deceased without tenderness. Am I so ungrateful, she asked herself — so cold, so extinguished? But the fancied images of other men arose before her — men to whom she had belonged. And today she knew that it was only memories of these others that had lent a passing joy to the hours which she had spent with Wohlschein.

And suddenly — but she remembered at once that even during his lifetime she had felt similar reactions — she asked herself whether her lover had not surmised this repeated and deep infidelity, and had disintegrated in a moment when the pitiful rôle he played had become painfully apparent in his mind — that he had then, as they termed it, died of heart-failure! Oh, such connections existed; of that she felt certain! Theresa's was a mysterious, deeply hidden guilt, which burned only occasionally, far down in her soul, and was extinguished again almost immediately. She felt as if her responsibility for Wohlschein's end were not the only one smouldering like an uncertain, pale flame in the abyss of her soul. The knowledge of a great, dark guilt was slumbering within her; and after a long, long time, she thought once more of a far-distant night when she had given birth to her son and when she had murdered him. But this dead man, who had been her son, was still playing the ghost in this world. Even now he was lying in a bed at the criminal's hospital, waiting for his mother, the murderess, to come and confess her guilt.

The violet and white asters fell from her hands and, with eyes staring like those of a mad woman, she gazed into space.

And yet it was the same person who sat, that night, with the family of the department store owner before a well-laid table, and who talked of everyday trifles with the husband and wife and with another middle-class couple who had been invited: she chatted about the snowy weather, prices, teaching in grammar, and the high schools, and she no longer took thought of her dead.

CIV

DURING THE NEXT few days, Theresa considered the question of writing to Kasimir Tobisch. Perhaps that was not even his name. In any case, it was by no means certain whether he was now using that or some other name. Moreover, it was possible that he would pay no attention to the letter at all, especially if he fully realized who sent it. So it seemed wisest to wait for him, some evening, after the performance. She might act as if she had met him accidentally.

One night, at eleven o'clock she stood beneath the lighted sign of the Universum. At the entrance stood a gigantic porter in a shabby green livery with gold buttons, a long stick with a silver balloon in his hand. The performance was not yet over. Theresa looked for the door through which Kasimir Tobisch would have to leave the hall. It was easily discovered: round the corner, another street; around the next corner, in another dimly lighted lane, over a glass door, she found the inscription: "Stage Entrance." At that moment a woman was leaving it — an emaciated, common looking creature in a poor, much too thin raincoat. She disappeared round the corner. To tell the truth, her own coat was not quite correct for snowy weather, either. She wore the elegant spring coat which Thilda had given her, and underneath it, a heavy woolen sweater. Oh well, after all, she was better dressed than many another woman in her circumstances. Her feet grew wet and cold. She should have taken her heavy shoes which she had last worn in the country when she was with Wohlschein. In spite of her continuous pacing up and down, she felt frozen. Perhaps it would have been more sensible to have bought a cheap seat and waited inside for the end of the performance. And she kept pacing up and down round the building, in the snow-covered streets, keeping her eye on both the main door and the stage entrance. For a moment, her waiting seemed ridiculous and senseless to her. What did she want? Whom did she expect? An old musician playing the 'cello within, or a young man in a soft black hat, whose moustache smelled of perfume? He had nothing to do with her; and yet it was as if just such a young man would come through the glass door in the next moment: a man in a wide coat, with a soft black hat in his hand. And she, upon her part, fancied herself as the pretty miss who is free on a Sunday, and anticipates a tryst with her lover. Of course, it had then been spring, too. But what was she doing here? It was not spring, nor was she the pretty miss any more. Was she not really that very Fraulein Steinbauer, whom she had pitied so much at the time, because she had no lover? She was not that girl and he was not that man; then what did they want of each other? No, truly in all her life she had not done anything quite as stupid as this. Would it be better to give it up entirely, and return some other time, when she would be in a better frame of mind?

She was already on the point of leaving the building, when she regretted her decision and again turning round, noticed that the performance had just come to an end. The porter had taken up his position, with his stick held stiff and the balloon swaying in the wind. People poured out of the door; carriages drove up. Quickly, Theresa crossed the street, ran toward the stage entrance, and took a position on the opposite side, where she could keep her eye on it.

Kasimir was the first to leave. Tall, swathed in his coat, with his soft, black hat in his hand and a cigarette between his lips, he hardly looked different from the man whom she had known twenty years ago. It was like a miracle. He looked round on all sides, then gazed up at the sky, and shook his head, as if surprised and disgusted at seeing the snow. He put his hat on; then, suddenly, as if realizing that somebody was waiting for him on the other side of the street, he crossed, with long strides, directly toward Theresa, passed her with a superficial glance, and had gone.

“Kasimir!” she cried.

He did not even turn, and walked quickly away.

“Kasimir Tobisch!” she shouted.

He stopped, turned round, came toward Theresa, and looked into her face. She smiled, although now he looked quite different and older than he really was, with many wrinkles on his forehead and still deeper ones between his nose and the corners of his mouth. Now he recognized her.

“What do my eyes see?” he cried. “This is — this is — Her Highness the Princess!”

Her smile remained. It was this that first occurred to him after twenty years — that when he had first met her, he had acted as if he had taken her for an archduchess or a princess! Well, at least, she had changed less than she had feared. She nodded in confirmation. Then her smile became empty, and she said:

“Yes, I am Theresa!”

“This is indeed a surprise!” he said, and shook her hand. She would have recognized him by the hard touch of his long fingers. “And where do you come from?”

“I happened to attend the performance, and recognized you.”

She paused.

“And recognized me?”

“Naturally! You have hardly changed.”

“Nor you!”

He lifted her chin and, with glassy eyes, stared into her face. His breath reeked of sour beer. “So this is really Theresa! That we two should meet again! How have you been, Theresa?”

She was still conscious of the smile on her lips. She could not efface it, although it signified nothing whatsoever.

“That is not so easily told.”

“Surely, surely!” he assured her. “It’s half an eternity, after all, since we met the last time.”

She nodded.

“Almost twenty years!”

“Yes, much can happen in twenty years! You are probably married. Children?”

“One.”

“Really? I have four!”

“Four?”

“Yes, two boys and two girls. But shouldn’t we walk on? It’s too cold to stand here!”

She nodded. Suddenly, she realized again that her feet were cold.

“Where is your companion?” he asked, stopping abruptly.

She looked at him without understanding.

“You haven’t been alone in such a place as this? You were probably with your husband?”

“No, my husband unfortunately is dead. A long time ago. I was with friends, but they had to leave before the end.”

“Not very polite friends, if I may say so. May I take you to the street car?”

They went down the street, Theresa Fabiani and Kasimir Tobisch, as they had gone down many a street twenty years before. They had little to say to one another.

“This is really a surprise,” Kasimir began again. “So you are married, or rather, widowed?”

She noticed that he estimated her spring coat through the corner of his eye. His glance became dull when he looked down and noticed her shoes.

“I didn’t know that you played the ‘cello, too,” she said, quickly.

“You don’t mean it!”

“You were a painter, then.”

“A painter and a musician. I am still a painter, though now that is more a trade than an art, to tell you the truth. One always needs extra money!”

“I can imagine! With four children, it can’t be too easy.”

“Two are already grown. My oldest is assistant to a dentist.”

“How old is he?”

“Twenty-two.”

“How old?”

They now stood at the street car stop.

“Twenty-two? Then you were married when we met?” She laughed.

“My, my!” he replied, and joined in her laughter. “I think I have said too much.”

“Never mind,” she answered. And his information really, had hardly moved her. She simply thought: So he had a wife and children even then! That’s why he used a false name and fled. For now she realized that Kasimir Tobisch had never been his name. What was the name of this man? Who was this man at her side, by whom she had had a son now lying at the criminal hospital, and whom she had intended to introduce to him. Now she might have asked him his real name, and perhaps he would have told her the truth. But it was utterly unimportant what his name was, whether he was painter or musician, whether he had four children or ten. He was a poor, silly devil, and he did not even realize it. In a certain sense, even she was better off than he — or was she worse off?

“There is the street car now,” he said, obviously breathing more freely.

“Yes, here it is,” she repeated, amused. But now she began to regret that this interlude was at an end, and that Kasimir Tobisch, or whatever his name might be, would again disappear among the other nameless ones — forever. The street car stopped, but she did not board it, although his look politely invited her to do so. And she said:

“I would have liked to talk with you a little longer. Wouldn’t you care to call on me, some time?”

He looked at her. Oh, he no longer bothered to act for her benefit. In his look, she read quite clearly: To what end? As a woman, you don’t count for me; and as for your spring coat, that does not attract me, either! Still, he seemed caught by the fear in her eyes, and courteously replied:

“Gladly, if I may take that liberty.”

She gave him her address.

“You probably remember my name, don’t you?” she added, a little sadly. She smiled, and whispered:

“My name is Theresa!”

“Surely,” he said, “I remember. But the family name?”

“That you forget?”

“Not at all, but now your name is probably different.”

“No, my name is still Theresa Fabiani!”

“Then you aren’t married?”

She shook her head.

“But didn’t you say that you had a child?”

“Yes, I have a child!”

“Well, well...”

Another street car came, Theresa looked Kasimir Tobisch straight into the eyes. Now he might have asked more; now he could have asked, now he should have asked! And something like a question did appear in his eyes; something even like understanding. Surely it was understanding, and for that reason he did not ask.

The street car stopped. Theresa boarded it. From the platform, she said, quickly:

"You might telephone me."

"You have a telephone? You must be well off! I must go next door, to the store, when I want to telephone! There, then, au revoir!"

The street car rolled on. For a while, Kasimir Tobisch stood where he was and waved after Theresa. Suddenly, her smile disappeared. Without responding to his gestures, gravely and coldly, she kept her eyes on him, and saw him turn and walk away. Softly, in dense flakes, the snow fell. The streets were almost deserted. And the man who had for so long a time been Kasimir Tobisch, the father of her child, disappeared, nameless now, among the other nameless ones — disappeared for ever.

CV

THE SMALL SUM which Theresa had mailed to Franz after Agnes Leutner had called on her, was returned to her. The addressee had been dismissed from the hospital, and the post office was unable to trace him. So they had set him free again? It was not a comforting thought for Theresa. And — not for the first time — she wondered if it would not be wise for her to change her lodgings. But what would that avail? He would know how to find her out! Unluckily, it was an even more pressing question whether she would be able to keep her present flat. The rent had gradually become too high for her. It was due again in February and she did not know how she would scratch it together again. Her classes had gone to pieces, perhaps because the parents were no longer satisfied with the results which she obtained. Well, what she was able to do — that she had always realized — had never been too much. Only her conscientiousness, her friendly way of dealing with children, had enabled her to compete against better teachers than she. How sadly she had retrogressed during the last few months, she knew only too well.

Shortly before her rent was due, the notary informed her that a small sum was waiting for her from the sale of her mother's furniture. Until autumn then, she could feel secure. That improved her mood, so that she could return to her efforts with renewed perseverance. In March, she found two new, if poorly paying, pupils in the suburbs.

Then, once again, news came from Franz. An old woman brought the letter. He was about to take a position, and his mother should help him now for the last time. He named a definite sum — 150 gulden. This demand shocked her. Apparently he knew that she had inherited something. Without a word, she sent him the fifth part of what he had requested, and the next day she took what was left — about 500 gulden — to the savings bank. She breathed more freely, once that was done.

Spring had come again. And with the first caressingly warm days, the familiar weariness and a melancholy of a deeper kind than she had ever known before, overcame her. Everything that, thus far, had made life easier for her, now merely made her the more sad: short walks, and even a theatre performance which she once attended. More depressing than anything else, though, was a letter from Thilda — a belated answer to one of her own, informing her that she had adorned her father's grave with flowers. It contained the news that Thilda was pregnant. Theresa felt only one thing: how empty and hopeless her own life was. And it happened, during these days, after long months of quietude, that — uncertainly, without actual desire, and yet strangely tormenting — her senses reawakened. She had carnal dreams, ugly and beautiful, but always of unknown persons, men without distinguishable faces, in whose arms she dreamed she lay. Only once it happened that she dreamed of walking with Richard along the Danube, where she had been his. This particular dream lacked all animal elements, but she felt enveloped by the tenderness which she had always longed for from him, and which she had never known. A tormentingly unfulfillable tenderness and the apprehension of endless solitude remained.

CVI

LATE ONE EVENING in May, her door bell rang again. She was startled. For the payment of a bill which was due the next day she happened to have a somewhat large sum of money in the house, which she had just fetched from the bank. And for that very reason, she did not doubt that it was Franz who was standing outside the door. She vowed to herself that he should not get a kreutzer. Besides, she had hidden it so carefully that she was sure he would not be able to find it. The window was open, and if the worst came to the worst, she would shout for help. She tiptoed to the door, but did not even dare to look through the keyhole. He knocked so violently that she feared the neighbours might hear him, and so she opened it.

At first view, Franz appeared to be better dressed than usual, but he looked more sick and pale than she had ever seen him before.

"Good evening, Mother," he said, and attempted to enter. But Theresa restrained him.

"Well, what is the matter?" he asked, looking at her viciously.

"What do you want?" she asked, harshly.

He closed the door behind him. "No money," he replied, laughing derisively, "but if you would let me stay over night..."

She shook her head.

"For one night, Mother! Tomorrow, you'll be rid of me for ever."

"I have heard that before!"

"Oh! Perhaps some one is here already! Perhaps somebody is lying on the couch!"

He shoved her aside, opened the door to the living room, and looked round on all sides.

"You won't sleep in my house again," Theresa said. "Just this one night, Mother."

"You have some sort of lodging. What do you want from me?"

"They have sent me away for the night. Things like that happen, and I haven't got money enough for a hotel."

"Whatever you want for a hotel, I can give you."

His eyes glistened.

"Well, then, give it to me!"

She took her purse and gave him a few gulden.

"Is that all?"

"With that, you can stay at a hotel for three nights!"

"All right, then, I'll go."

But he did not go. She looked at him questioningly. He proceeded, with a mocking laugh:

"Yes, I'll go, if you will give me my share of the inheritance!"

What inheritance? Are you crazy:

"Oh, no! I want my share of my grandmother's money!"

"What are you entitled to?"

He came quite close to her.

"Well, then, listen to me, Mother. You heard me say this before. You are seeing me for the last time tonight. I have a position — not here in town, but somewhere outside. And I'll never come back. How am I to get my inheritance, if you won't give it to me now?"

“What are you talking about? What kind of inheritance do you claim, since I have inherited nothing myself?”

“Do you really think I’m so stupid? Don’t you think I know that you have received money from Wohlschein and from your mother? And am I to beg for the few gulden I need so badly? Is that the way a mother treats her son?”

“I have nothing!”

“Well, we’ll see whether or not you have anything!”

He went to the chest of drawers.

“How dare you!” she cried, and seized him by the arm with which he was fumbling in the drawers.

“Give me the key!”

She let him go and, running to the window, bent out as if to cry for help. He rushed over to her, pushed her back, and closed the window. She hurried to the door. In an instant he was at her side. He turned the key and put it into his pocket. Then he grasped both of her hands.

“Give it to me voluntarily, Mother!”

“I have nothing!” she whispered through set teeth.

“I know that you have something. I know that you have it! Give me something, Mother!”

She was mad. She was not afraid now. She hated him. “If I had a thousand gulden, there would not be a kreutzer for one like you!”

For a moment he let go of her, seemingly sobered. “Mother, I’ll tell you something. Give me half of what you have. I need it for my trip. I have no position! I’ve got to disappear! If they get me this time, they’ll give me a year or two.”

“So much the better!” she cried.

“So? You think so? All right!”

And again he rushed to the chest of drawers, striking at it with his clenched fist. The drawer still held. He hesitated for a moment. Then he took a jimmy from his pocket, and broke it open. Again Theresa tried to interfere, to hold his hands. He pushed her aside and plunged his arms into the linen, throwing piece after piece on the floor.

Meanwhile, Theresa had opened one of the inner windows, and was about to open the outer one when he tore her back.

“Robbers!” she shouted. “Thieves!”

Franz, with inflamed eyes, stood before her.

“Will you give it to me or not?”

“Robbers!” She shouted again.

Now he grasped her, pressed one of his hands over her (mouth, and dragged her, pushed her into her small bedroom, at the foot of her bed.

“Have you got it in here? In the mattress? In the pillows?”

Again he had to let her go in order to ransack the bed. And again she shouted:

“Robbers! Thieves!”

With one hand he now grasped her wrists, closing her mouth with the other. She kicked at him. He let go her hands, and grasped her by the throat.

“Robbers! Thieves!”

She shouted again and again. Then Franz began to choke her. She sank down to the floor by the side of her bed. He loosened his grip on her throat, and taking a handkerchief, folded it and thrust it into her mouth, then he took a towel hanging near the wash stand and bound her hands.

She panted for breath. Her big, staring eyes shone up at him through the darkness. A ray of light came in from the next room. Like a madman, he searched the bed, tore the cases off the pillows and looked in the wash-basin, in the pitcher, under the chest of drawers, under the carpet.

Suddenly he stopped. The outside bell was ringing. Through the closed doors, he heard voices. No doubt they had heard his mother shout, and perhaps they had also heard the noise which he had made with his fists and with his jimmy. Quickly he unwound the towel from her hands and tore the gag from her mouth. She lay prone on the floor, gasping.

"Nothing has happened, Mother," he cried.

Her eyes were open. She looked; she stared. No, she was not dead. But little could have happened.

Again the bell rang three times, five times, ever more persistently. What was he to do now? Through the window? Three flights! He looked again at his mother. No, there was nothing the matter with her. She looked at him with open eyes, moving her arms. Her lips were trembling. The bell rang incessantly. There was nothing to be done but open the door. Then he might still rush through the people, run down the stairs and reach the street. If only she were not lying there, like one dead! He bent down and tried to lift her. But it seemed that she still fought against him! She even shook her head. No, she was not dead! She had merely swooned. Or had she only pretended to faint, so as to defeat his purposes?

The bell kept on ringing. There were knocks at first, then bangs against the door.

"Open! Open!" they shouted outside.

Franz opened the inner door and rushed into the anteroom. The main door shook under the banging fists. No recourse was left to him; he had to open. Was it possible? Only two women were standing outside, staring at him, horror-stricken. He pushed them aside and dashed down the stairs. He heard them shout behind him: "Stop him!"

A man's voice joined in. It came from above. And before he had reached the house door, somebody had seized him from behind by the shoulders. He could not free himself. He shouted and cursed. Then he became silent. It was over. But his mother was not dead. She had merely swooned. What did they want of him? Nothing had happened to his mother. People thronged around him. A policeman, too, was there.

Meanwhile, the two young women had rushed into the flat and found Fraulein Theresa Fabiani stretched out beside her bed. Directly behind them came others — another woman and another man. They lay Theresa on the disordered bed. She looked around unable to speak. She hardly recognized the people who were gradually filling the room — the neighbours, the police captain, the police doctor. She probably did not understand the questions which they asked her. So they did not insist on confronting her with her son. The physician established the fact that no fatal wound had been inflicted. The flat was sealed by the police, and Theresa was taken to the hospital that same night.

There they found that a cartilage in her neck had been broken — a circumstance which made the outlook for both her and Franz very much worse. Depositions by the neighbours established the fact that the teacher Theresa Fabiani was a sister of Representative Faber. He, too, was informed, in the course of the night, that a crime had been committed against his sister. Early the next morning, he appeared together with his wife at the bedside of his sick sister, who had been placed in a special room. She had a high temperature, which the doctors attributed to the shock rather than to her injuries. Apparently, she had not completely regained consciousness. She did not recognize her visitors who departed shortly after they had come.

CVII

TOWARD NOON, ALFRED presented himself at her bedside. He had read of the crime in the papers. Although her temperature was already lower, Theresa was delirious. Restlessly, she tossed her body to and fro. Her eyes alternately opened and closed. She whispered incoherent words. Nor did she at first appear to recognize her latest visitor.

After the physician in charge had informed Professor Doctor Nuellheim of the details of the case he left him alone with the patient. Alfred sat down beside her and felt her pulse which was weak and irregular.

And now, as if the touch of this once beloved hand had an efficacy that other and more casual touches did not possess, the patient's restlessness seemed to subside. When, without any particular purpose, he kept his eyes fastened upon her forehead and her eyes, something still more extraordinary occurred. Those eyes which until now, even while open, had failed to recognize any one, shone as if with mounting consciousness. The withered features grew softer, younger.

When Alfred bent closer to her, she whispered:

"Thank you!" He protested, took her hands, and uttered the words of consolation that came to his lips. She shook her head, more and more vigorously, not only as if she did not wish to be consoled, but as if she wished to confide something to him. He bent down to hear her.

"Promise me that you will say in court—" she began.

He thought that her delirium was about to begin afresh, and rested a hand on her forehead. She continued, however, to talk, or rather to whisper, not able to speak aloud:

"They will believe you — a doctor. He is innocent. He has only repaid what I did to him. They must not punish him too severely!"

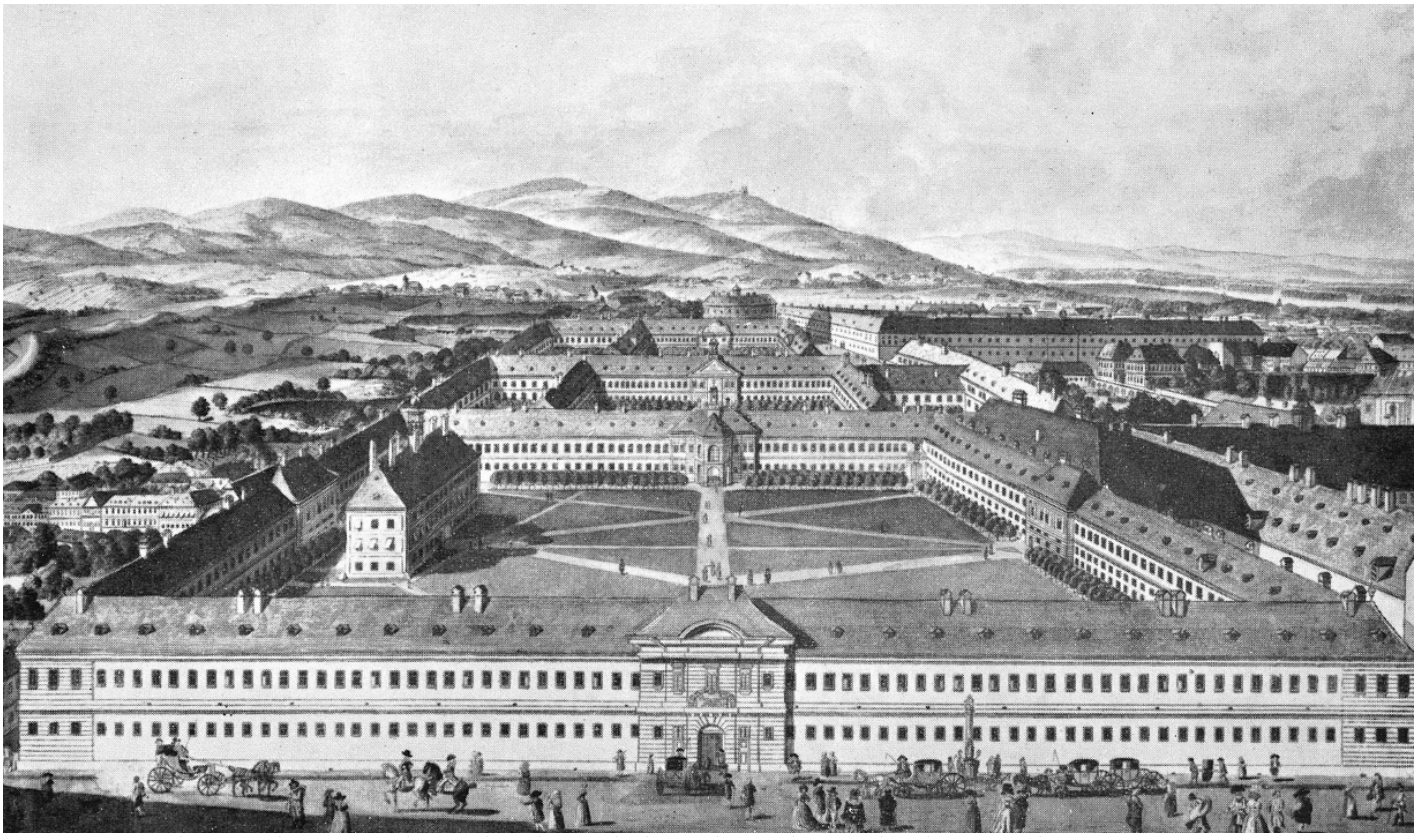
Again Alfred tried to quiet her. But she continued, hurriedly, as if realizing how limited was her time.

What she had begun to do but never finished was described; that which her desire had craved but her will refused, and which she always remembered but had never dared definitely to recall — that hour, perhaps it had been a swift second, when she had murdered her child in her heart. All this she lived again, vividly, as if she were just living through it at that moment. From her lips Alfred was able to read a few words, though without completely understanding their purport. But he interpreted them as an attempt to absolve her son of all guilt. Whether this secret palliation would stand before a heavenly or an earthly tribunal, it did exist for this dying woman — and dying she would be, whether she lived ten years longer or died that very instant. Alfred realized that the confession of her guilt did not oppress her in this hour, but rather liberated her, since it made her end less meaningless.

He did not even attempt to offer her words of encouragement or of solace. They would not have reached her consciousness in this hour. He sensed that she had at last found her son, so long lost to her, at the moment when he had become the instrument of an eternal justice.

Her plea finished, she fell back exhausted. Alfred felt her consciousness gradually receding farther and farther into the darkness until she no longer recognized him.

During the next few hours her condition grew worse. This was as the physicians had expected. Suddenly, unexpectedly she died, before an operation could be performed.



Alfred talked to the attorney who had been appointed to defend Franz. The obliging counsellor tried to introduce Theresa's confession at the trial as a mitigating circumstance. It found little favour with the court.

Half mockingly, the district attorney pointed out that the defendant had probably not retained any memory of this first hour of his life, and spoke disparagingly of certain metaphysical tendencies in these days to veil, with the best of intentions, obvious proofs of guilt and thus circumvent justice. The motion to consult an expert was overruled, if for no other reason than that it was impossible to decide whether to call a physician, a priest, or a philosopher for this responsible task.

The court only permitted the defendant's illegitimate birth and his consequent lack of a proper education to be advanced in his behalf. So Franz was sentenced to twelve years of solitary confinement in prison, with bread and water to be served him on the anniversary of the day the crime had been committed.

Theresa Fabiani, of course, was buried long before the trial began. Beside a cheap, withered evergreen wreath, bearing the inscription, "To my unfortunate sister," there lay a cluster of spring flowers. The beautiful flowers had arrived from Holland — too late.

The Short Stories

Vienna General Hospital, 1784 — where Schnitzler worked as a doctor, before abandoning medicine to pursue a career in writing

The Dead are Silent (1897)

Original German Title: 'Die Toten schweigen'

Translated by Courtland H. Young, 1907

HE COULD ENDURE the quiet waiting in the carriage no longer; it was easier to get out and walk up and down. It was now dark; the few scattered lamps in the narrow side street quivered uneasily in the wind. The rain had stopped, the sidewalks were almost dry, but the rough-paved roadway was still moist, and little pools gleamed here and there.

"Strange, isn't it?" thought Franz. "Here we are scarcely a hundred paces from the Prater, and yet it might be a street in some little country town. Well, it's safe enough, at any rate. She won't meet any of the friends she dreads so much here."

He looked at his watch. "Only just seven, and so dark already! It is an early autumn this year... and then this confounded storm I..." He turned his coat-collar up about his neck and quickened his pacing. The glass in the street lamps rattled lightly.

"Half an hour more," he said to himself, "then I can go home. I could almost wish — that that half-hour were over." He stood for a moment on the corner, where he could command a view of both streets. "She'll surely come to-day," his thoughts ran on, while he struggled with his hat, which threatened to blow away. "It's Friday.... Faculty meeting at the University; she needn't hurry home." He heard the clanging of street-car gongs, and the hour chimed from a nearby church tower. The street became more animated. Hurrying figures passed him, clerks of neighboring shops; they hastened onward, fighting against the storm. No one noticed him; a couple of half-grown girls glanced up in idle curiosity as they went by. Suddenly he saw a familiar figure coming toward him. He hastened to meet her.... Could it be she? On foot?

She saw him, and quickened her pace.

"You are walking?" he asked.

"I dismissed the cab in front of the theatre. I think I've had that driver before."

A man passed them, turning to look at the lady. Her companion glared at him, and the other passed on hurriedly. The lady looked after him. "Who was it?" she asked, anxiously.

"Don't know him. We'll see no one we know here, don't worry. But come now, let's get into the cab."

"Is that your carriage?"

"Yes."

"An open one?"

"It was warm and pleasant when I engaged it an hour ago."

They walked to the carriage; the lady stepped in.

"Driver!" called the man.

"Why, where is he?" asked the lady.

Franz looked around. "Well, did you ever? I don't see him anywhere."

"Oh—" her tone was low and timid.

"Wait a moment, child, he must be around here somewhere."

The young man opened the door of a little saloon, and discovered his driver at a table with several others.

The man rose hastily. “In a minute, sir,” he explained, swallowing his glass of wine.

“What do you mean by this?”

“All right, sir... Be there in a minute.” His step was a little unsteady as he hastened to his horses. “Where’ll you go, sir?”

“Prater — Summer-house.”

Franz entered the carriage. His companion sat back in a corner, crouching fearsomely under the shadow of the cover.

He took both her hands in his. She sat silent. “Won’t you say good evening to me?”

“Give me a moment to rest, dear. I’m still out of breath.”

He leaned back in his corner. Neither spoke for some minutes. The carriage turned into the Prater Street, passed the Tegethoff Monument, and a few minutes later was rolling swiftly through the broad, dark Prater Avenue.

Emma turned suddenly and flung both arms around her lover’s neck. He lifted the veil that still hung about her face, and kissed her.

“I have you again — at last!” she exclaimed.

“Do you know how long it is since we have seen each other?” he asked.

“Since Sunday.”

“Yes, and that wasn’t good for much.”

“Why not? You were in our house.”

“Yes — in your house. That’s just it. This can’t go on. I shall not enter your house again.... What’s the matter?”

“A carriage passed us.”

“Dear girl, the people who are driving in the Prater at such an hour, and in such weather, aren’t noticing much what other people are doing.”

“Yes — that’s so. But some one might look in here, by chance.”

“We couldn’t be recognized. It’s too dark.”

“Yes — but can’t we drive somewhere else?”

“Just as you like.” He called to the driver, who did not seem to hear. Franz leaned forward and touched the man.

“Turn around again. What are you whipping your horses like that for? We’re in no hurry, I tell you. Drive — let me see — yes — drive down the avenue that leads to the Reichs Bridge.”

“The Reichsstrasse?”

“Yes. But don’t hurry so, there’s no need of it.”

“All right, sir. But it’s the wind that makes the horses so crazy.”

Franz sat back again as the carriage turned in the other direction.

“Why didn’t I see you yesterday?”

“How could I?”...

“You were invited to my sister’s.”

“Oh — yes.”

“Why weren’t you there?”

“Because I can’t be with you — like that — with others around. No, I just can’t.” She shivered. “Where are we now?” she asked, after a moment.

They were passing under the railroad bridge at the entrance to the Reichsstrasse.

“On the way to the Danube,” replied Franz. “We’re driving toward the Reichs Bridge. We’ll certainly not meet any of our friends here,” he added, with a touch of mockery.

“The carriage jolts dreadfully.”

“We’re on cobblestones again.”

“But he drives so crooked.”

“Oh, you only think so.”

He had begun to notice himself that the vehicle was swaying to and fro more than was necessary, even on the rough pavement. But he said nothing, not wishing to alarm her.

“There’s a great deal I want to say to you today, Emma.”

“You had better begin then; I must be home at nine o’clock.”

“A few words may decide everything.”

“Oh, goodness, what was that!” she screamed. The wheels had caught in a car-track, and the carriage turned partly over as the driver attempted to free it. Franz caught at the man’s coat. “Stop that!” he cried. “Why, you’re drunk, man!”

The driver halted his horses with some difficulty. “Oh, no — sir—”

“Let’s get out here, Emma, and walk.”

“Where are we?”

“Here’s the bridge already. And the wind is not nearly as strong as it was. It will be nicer to walk a little. It’s so hard to talk in the carriage.”

Emma drew down her veil and followed him. “Don’t you call this windy?” she exclaimed as she struggled against the gust that met her at the corner.

He took her arm, and called to the driver to follow them.

They walked on slowly. Neither spoke as they mounted the ascent of the bridge; and they halted where they could hear the flow of the water below them. Heavy darkness surrounded them. The broad stream stretched itself out in gray, indefinite outlines; red lights in the distance, floating above the water, awoke answering gleams from its surface. Trembling stripes of light reached down from the shore they had just left; on the other side of the bridge the river lost itself in the blackness of open fields. Thunder rumbled in the distance; they looked over to where the red lights soared. A train with lighted windows rolled between iron arches that seemed to spring up out of the night for an instant, to sink back into darkness again. The thunder grew fainter and more distant; silence fell again; only the wind moved, in sudden gusts.

Franz spoke at last, after a long silence. “We must go away.”

“Of course,” Emma answered, softly.

“We must go away,” he continued, with more animation. “Go away altogether, I mean—”

“Oh, we can’t!”

“Only because we are cowards, Emma.”

“And my child?”

“He will let you have the boy, I know.”

“But how shall we go?” Her voice was very low. “You mean — to run away—”

“Not at all. You have only to be honest with him; to tell him that you cannot live with him any longer; that you belong to me.”

“Franz — are you mad?”

“I will spare you that trial, if you wish. I will tell him myself.”

“No, Franz, you will do nothing of the kind.”

He endeavored to read her face. But the darkness showed him only that her head was turned toward him.

He was silent a few moments more. Then he spoke quietly: “You need not fear; I shall not do it.”

They walked toward the farther shore. “Don’t you hear a noise?” she asked. “What is it?”

“Something is coming from the other side,” he said.

A slow rumbling came out of the darkness. A little red light gleamed out at them. They could see that it hung from the axle of a clumsy country cart, but they could not see whether the cart was laden or not and whether there were human beings on it. Two other carts followed the first. They could just see the outlines of a man in peasant garb on the last cart, and could see that he was lighting his pipe. The carts passed them slowly. Soon there was nothing to be heard but the low rolling of the wheels as their own carriage followed them. The bridge dropped gently to the farther shore. They saw the street disappear into blackness between rows of trees. Open fields lay before them to the right and to the left; they gazed out into gloom indistinguishable.

There was another long silence before Franz spoke again. “Then it is the last time—”

“What?—” Emma’s tone was anxious.

“The last time we are to be together. Stay with him, if you will. I bid you farewell.”

“Are you serious?”

“Absolutely.”

“There, now you see, it is you who always spoil the few hours we have together? — not I.”

“Yes, you’re right,” said Franz. “Let’s drive back to town.”

She held his arm closer. “No,” she insisted, tenderly, “I don’t want to go back. I won’t be sent away from you.”

She drew his head down to hers, and kissed him tenderly. “Where would we get to if we drove on down there?” she asked.

“That’s the road to Prague, dear.”

“We won’t go quite that far,” she smiled, “but I’d like to drive on a little, down there.” She pointed into the darkness.

Franz called to the driver. There was no answer; the carriage rumbled on, slowly. Franz ran after it, and saw that the driver was fast asleep. Franz roused him roughly. “We want to drive on down that street. Do you hear me?”

“All right, sir.”

Emma entered the carriage first, then Franz. The driver whipped his horses, and they galloped madly over the moist earth of the road-bed. The couple inside the cab held each other closely as they swayed with the motion of the vehicle.

“Isn’t this quite nice?” whispered Emma, her lips on his.

In the moment of her words she seemed to feel the cab mounting into the air. She felt herself thrown over violently, readied for some hold, but grasped only the empty air. She seemed to be spinning madly like a top, her eyes closed, suddenly she found herself lying on the ground, a great silence about her, as if she were alone, far away from all the world. Then noises began to come into her consciousness again; hoofs beat the ground near her; a low moaning came from somewhere; but she could see nothing. Terror seized her; she screamed aloud. Her terror grew stronger, for she could not hear her own voice. Suddenly she knew what had happened; the carriage had hit some object, possibly a mile-stone; had upset, and she had been thrown out. Where is Franz? was her next thought. She called his name. And now she could hear her voice, not distinctly yet, but she could hear it. There was no answer to her call. She tried to get up. After some effort she rose to a sitting posture, and, reaching out, she felt something, a human body, on the ground beside her. She could now begin to see a little through the dimness. Franz lay beside her, motionless. She put out her hand and touched his face; something warm and wet covered it. Her heart seemed to stop beating — Blood? — Oh, what had happened? Franz was wounded and unconscious. Where was the coachman? She called him, but no answer came. She still sat there on the ground. She did not seem to be injured, although she ached all over. "What shall I do?" she thought; "what shall I do? How can it be that I am not injured? Franz!" she called again. A voice answered from somewhere near her.

"Where are you, lady? And where is the gentleman? Wait a minute, Miss — I'll light the lamps, so we can see. I don't know what's got into the beasts to-day. It ain't my fault, Miss, sure — they ran into a pile of stones."

Emma managed to stand up, although she was bruised all over. The fact that the coachman seemed quite uninjured reassured her somewhat. She heard the man opening the lamp and striking a match. She waited anxiously for the light. She did not dare to touch Franz again. "It's all so much worse when you can't see plainly," she thought. "His eyes may be open now — there won't be anything wrong...."

A tiny ray of light came from one side. She saw the carriage, not completely upset, as she had thought, but leaning over toward the ground, as if one wheel were broken. The horses stood quietly. She saw the milestone, then a heap of loose stones, and beyond them a ditch. Then the light touched Franz's feet, crept up over his body to his face, and rested there. The coachman had set the lamp on the ground beside the head of the unconscious man. Emma dropped to her knees, and her heart seemed to stop beating as she looked into the face before her. It was ghastly white; the eyes were half open, only the white showing. A thin stream of blood trickled down from one temple and ran into his collar. The teeth were fastened into the under lip. "No — no — it isn't possible," Emma spoke, as if to herself.

The driver knelt also and examined the face of the man. Then he took the head in both his hands and raised it. "What are you doing?" screamed Emma, hoarsely, shrinking back at the sight of the head that seemed to be rising of its own volition.

"Please, Miss — I'm afraid — I'm thinking — there's a great misfortune happened—"

"No — no — it's not true!" said Emma. "It can't be true! — You are not hurt? Nor am I—"

The man let the head he held fall back again into the lap of the trembling Emma. "If only some one would come — if the peasants had only passed fifteen minutes later."

"What shall we do?" asked Emma, her lips trembling.

"Why, you see, Miss, if the carriage was all right — but it's no good as it is — we've got to wait till some one comes—" he talked on, but Emma did not hear him. Her brain seemed to awake suddenly, and she knew what was to be done. "How far is it to the nearest house?" she asked.

"Not much further, Miss — there's Franz-Josef's land right there. We'd see the houses if it was lighter — it won't take five minutes to get there."

"Go there, then; I'll stay here — Go and fetch some one."

"I think I'd better stay here with you, Miss. Somebody must come; it's the main road."

"It'll be too late; we need a doctor at once."

The coachman looked down at the quiet face, then he looked at Emma, and shook his head.

"You can't tell," she cried.

"Yes, Miss — but there'll be no doctor in those houses."

"But there'll be somebody to send to the city—"

"Oh, yes, Miss — they'll be having a telephone there, anyway! We'll telephone to the Rescue Society."

"Yes, yes, that's it. Go at once, run — and bring some men back with you. Why do you wait? Go at once. Hurry!"

The man looked down again at the white face in her lap. "There'll be no use here for doctor or Rescue Society, Miss."

"Oh, go! — for God's sake go!"

"I'm going, Miss — but don't get afraid in the darkness here."

He hurried down the street. "'Twasn't my fault," he murmured as he ran. "Such an idea! to drive down this road this time o' night."

Emma was left alone with the unconscious man in the gloomy street.

"What shall I do now?" she thought "It can't be possible — it can't." The thought circled dizzily in her brain— "It can't be possible." Suddenly she seemed to hear a low breathing. She bent to the pale lips — no — not the faintest breath came from them. The blood had dried on temple and cheek. She gazed at the eyes, the half-closed eyes, and shuddered. Why couldn't she believe it?... It must be true — this was Death! A shiver ran through her — she felt but one thing— "This is a corpse. I am here alone with a corpse! — a corpse that rests on my lap!" With trembling hands she pushed the head away, until it rested on the ground. Then a feeling of horrible alone-ness came over her. Why had she sent the coachman away? What should she do here all alone with this dead man in the darkness? If only some one would come — but what was she to do then if anybody did come? How long would she have to wait here? She looked down at the corpse again. "But I'm not alone with him," she thought, "the light is there." And the light seemed to her to become alive, something sweet and friendly, to which she owed gratitude. There was more life in this little flame than in all the wide night about her. It seemed almost as if this light was a protection for her, a protection against the terrible pale man who lay on the ground beside her. She stared into the light until her eyes wavered and the flame began to dance. Suddenly she felt herself awake — wide awake. She sprang to her feet. Oh, this would not do! It would not do at all — no one must find her here with him. She seemed to be outside of herself, looking at herself standing there on the road, the corpse and the light below her; she saw herself grow into strange, enormous proportions, high up into the darkness. "What am I waiting for?" she asked herself, and her brain reeled. "What am I waiting for? The people who might come? They don't need me. They will come, and they will ask questions — and I — why am I here? They will ask who I am — what shall I answer? I will not answer them — I will not say a word — they cannot compel me to talk."

The sound of voices came from the distance.

"Already?" she thought, listening in terror. The voices came from the bridge. It could not be the men the driver was bringing with him. But whoever it was would see the light — and they must not see it, for then she would be discovered. She overturned the lantern with her foot, and the light went out. She stood in utter darkness. She could see nothing — not even him. The pile of stones shone dimly. The voices came nearer. She trembled from head to foot; they must not find her here. That was the only thing of real importance in all the wide world — that no one should find her here. She would be lost if they knew that this — this corpse — was her lover. She clasps her hands convulsively, praying that the people, whoever they were, might pass by on the farther side of the road, and not see her. She listens breathless. Yes, they are there, on the other side — women, two women, or perhaps three. What are they talking about? They have seen the carriage, they speak of it — she can distinguish words. "A carriage upset—" What else do they say? She cannot understand — they walk on — they have passed her — Ah — thanks — thanks to Heaven! — And now? What now? Oh, why isn't she dead, as he is? He is to be envied; there is no more danger, no more fear for him. But so much — so much for her to tremble for. She shivers at the thought of being found here, of being asked, "Who are you?" She will have to go to the police station, and all the world will know about it — her husband — her child. She cannot understand why she has stood there motionless so long. She need not stay here — she can do no good here — and she is only courting disaster for herself. She makes a step forward — Careful! the ditch is here — she crosses it — how wet it is — two paces more and she is in the middle of the street. She halts a moment, looks straight ahead, and can finally distinguish the gray line of the road leading onward into darkness. There — over there — lies the city. She cannot see it, but she knows the way. She turns once more. It does not seem so dark now. She can see the carriage and the horses quite distinctly — and, looking hard, she seems to see the outline of a human body on the ground. Her eyes open wide. Something seems to clutch at her and hold her here — it is he — she feels his power to keep her with him. With an effort she frees herself. Then she perceives that it was the soft mud of the road that held her. And she walks onward — faster — faster — her pace quickens to a run. Only to be away from here, to be back in the light — in the noise — among men. She runs along the street, raising her skirt high, that her steps may not be hindered. The wind is behind her, and seems to push her along. She does not know what it is she flees from. Is it the pale man back there by the ditch? No, now she knows, she flees the living, not the dead, the living, who will soon be there, and who will look for her. What will they think? Will they follow her? But they cannot catch up with her now, she is so far away, she is nearing the bridge, there is danger. No one can know who she was, no one can possibly imagine who the woman was who drove down through the country road with the dead man. The driver does not know her; he would not recognize her if he should ever see her again. They will not take the trouble to find out who she is. Who cares? It was wise of her not to stay — and it was not cowardly either. Franz himself would say it was wise. She must go home; she has a husband, a child; she would be lost if any one should see her there with her dead lover. There is the bridge; the street seems lighter — she hears the water beneath her. She stands there, where they stood together, arm in arm — when was it? How many hours ago? It cannot be long since then. And yet — perhaps she lay unconscious long, and it is midnight now, or near morning, and they have missed her at home. Oh, no — it is not possible. She knows that she was not unconscious, she remembers everything clearly. She runs across the bridge, shivering at the sound of her own steps. Now she sees a figure coming toward her; she slows her pace. It is a man in uniform. She walks more slowly, she does not want to attract attention. She feels the man's eyes resting on her — suppose he stops her! Now he is quite near; it is a policeman. She walks calmly past him, and hears him stop behind her. With an effort she continues in the same slow pace. She hears the jingle of street-car bells — ah, it cannot be midnight yet. She walks more quickly — hurrying toward the city, the lights of which begin there by the railroad viaduct — the growing noise tells her how near she is. One lonely stretch of street, and then she is safe. Now she hears a shrill whistle coming rapidly nearer — a wagon flies swiftly past her. She stops and looks after it; it is the ambulance of the Rescue Society. She knows where it is going. "How quickly they have come," she thinks; "it is like magic." For a moment she feels that she must call to them, must go back with them. Shame, terrible, overwhelming shame, such las she has never known before, shakes her from head to foot — she knows how vile, how cowardly she is. Then, as the whistle and the rumble of wheels fade away in the distance, a mad joy takes hold of her. She is saved — saved! She hurries on; she meets more people, but she does not fear them — the worst is over. The noise of the city grows louder, the street is lighter, the skyline of the Prater street rises before her, and she knows that she can sink into a flood tide of humanity there and lose herself in it. When she comes to a street lamp she is quite calm enough now to take out her watch and look at it. It is ten minutes to nine. She holds the watch to her ear — it is ticking merrily. And she thinks: "Here I am, alive, unharmed — and he — he — dead. It is Fate." She feels as if all had been forgiven — as if she had never sinned. And what if Fate had willed otherwise? If it were she lying there in the ditch, and he who remained alive? He would not have run away — but then he is a man. She is only a woman, she has a husband, a child — it was her right — her duty — to save herself. She knows that it was not a sense of duty that impelled her to do it. But what she has done was right — she had done right instinctively — as all good people do. If she had stayed she would have been discovered by this time. The doctors would question her. And all the papers would report it next morning; she would have been ruined forever, and yet her ruin could not bring him back to life. Yes, that was the main point, her sacrifice would have been all in vain. She crosses under the railway bridge and hurries on. There is the Tegethoff Column, where so many streets meet. There are but few people in the park on this stormy evening, but to her it seems as if the life of the city was roaring about her. It was so horribly still back there. She had plenty of time now. She knows that her husband will not be home before ten o'clock. She will have time to change her clothes. And then it occurs to her to look at her gown. She is horrified to see how soiled it is. What shall she say to the maid about it? And next morning the papers will all bring the story of the accident, and they will tell of a woman. Who had been in the carriage, and who had run away. She trembled afresh. One single carelessness and she is lost, even now. But she has her latch-key with her; she can let herself in; no one will hear her come. She jumps into a cab and is about to give her address, then suddenly she remembers that this would not be wise. She gives any number that occurs to her.

As she drives through the Prater street she wishes that she might feel something — grief-horror — but she cannot. She has but one thought, one desire — to be at home, in safety. All else is indifferent to her. When she had decided to leave him alone, dead, by the roadside — in that moment everything seemed to have died within her, everything that would mourn and grieve for him. She has no feeling but that of fear for herself. She is not heartless — she knows that the day will come when her sorrow will be despair — it may kill her even. But she knows nothing now, except the desire to sit quietly at home, at the supper table with her husband and child. She looks out through the cab window. She is driving through the streets of the inner city. It is brilliantly light here, and many people hurry past. Suddenly all that she has experienced in the last few hours seems not to be true, it is like an evil dream; not something real, irreparable. She stops her cab in one of the side streets of the Ring, gets out, turns a corner quickly, and takes another carriage, giving her own address this time. She does not seem able to think of anything any more. "Where is he now?" She closes her eyes and sees him on the litter, in the ambulance. Suddenly she feels that he is here beside her. The cab sways, she feels the terror of being thrown out again, and she screams aloud. The cab halts before the door of her home. She dismounts hastily, hurries with light steps through the house door, unseen by the concierge, runs up the stairs, opens her apartment door very gently, and slips unseen into her own room. She undresses hastily, hiding the mud-stained clothes in her cupboard. To-morrow, when they are dry, she can clean them herself. She washes hands and face, and slips into a loose housegown.

The bell rings. She hears the maid open the door, she hears her husband's voice, and the rattle of his cane on the hat-stand. She feels she must be brave now or it will all have been in vain. She hurries to the dining-room, entering one door as her husband comes in at the other.

"Ah, you're home already?" he asks.

"Why, yes," she replies, "I have been home some time."

"They evidently didn't hear you come in."

She smiles without effort. But it fatigues her horribly to have to smile. He kisses her forehead.

The little boy is already at his place by the table. He has been waiting some time, and has fallen asleep, his head resting on an open book.

She sits down beside him; her husband takes his chair opposite, takes up a paper, and glances carelessly at it. Then he says: “The others are still talking away there.”

“What about?” she asks.

And he begins to tell her about the meeting, at length. Emma pretends to listen, and nods now and then. But she does not hear what he is saying, she feels dazed, like one who has escaped terrible danger as by a miracle; she can feel only this: “I am safe; I am at home.” And while her husband is talking she pulls her chair nearer the boy’s and lifts his head to her shoulder. Fatigue inexpressible comes over her. She can no longer control herself; she feels that her eyes are closing, that she is dropping asleep.

Suddenly another possibility presents itself to her mind, a possibility that she had dismissed the moment she turned to leave the ditch where she had fallen. Suppose he were not dead! Suppose — oh, but it is impossible — his eyes — his — lips — not a breath came from them! But there are trances that are like death, which deceive even practised eyes, and she knows nothing about such things. Suppose he is still alive — suppose he has regained consciousness and found himself alone by the roadside — suppose he calls her by her name? He might think she had been injured; he might tell the doctors that there was a woman with him, and that she must have been thrown to some distance. They will look for her. The coachman will come back with the men he has brought, and will tell them that she was there, unhurt — and Franz will know the truth. Franz knows her so well — he will know that she has run away — and a great anger will come over him. He will tell them her name in revenge. For he is mortally injured, and it will hurt him cruelly that she has left him alone in his last hour. He will say: “That is Mrs. Emma —— —. I am her lover. She is cowardly and stupid, too, gentlemen, for she might have known you would not ask her name; you would be discreet; you would have let her go away unmolested. Oh, she might at least have waited until you came. But she is vile — utterly vile — ah!—”

“What is the matter?” asks the Professor, very gravely, rising from his chair.

“What? What?”

“Yes, what is the matter with you?”

“Nothing.” She presses the boy closer to her breast.

The Professor looks at her for a few minutes steadily.

“Didn’t you know that you had fallen asleep, and—”

“Well? — And—”

“And then you screamed out in your sleep.”

“Did I?”

“You screamed as if you were having a nightmare. Were you dreaming?”

“I don’t know—”

And she sees her face in a mirror opposite, a face tortured into a ghastly smile. She knows it is her own face, and it terrifies her. She sees that it is frozen; that this hideous smile is frozen on it, and will always be there, all her life. She tries to cry out. Two hands are laid on her shoulders, and between her own face and the mirrored one her husband’s face pushes its way in; his eyes pierce into hers. She knows that unless she is strong for this last trial all is lost. And she feels that she is strong; she has regained control of her limbs, but the moment of strength is short. She raises her hands to his, which rest on her shoulders; she draws him down to her, and smiles naturally and tenderly into his eyes.

She feels his lips on her forehead, and she thinks: “It is all a dream — he will never tell — he will never take revenge like that — he is dead — really dead — and the dead are silent—”

“Why did you say that?” she hears her husband’s voice suddenly.

She starts. “What did I say?” And it seems to her as if she had told everything, here at the table — aloud before every one — and again she asks, shuddering before his horrified eyes, “What did I say?”

“The dead are silent,” her husband repeats very slowly.

“Yes,” she answers.

And she reads in his eyes that she can no longer hide anything from him. They look long and silently at each other. “Put the boy to bed,” he says at last. “You have something to tell me, have you not?”

“Yes—”

She knows now that within a few moments she will tell this man everything — this man, whom she has deceived for many years.

And while she goes slowly through the door, holding her boy, she feels her husband’s eyes still resting on her, and a great peace comes over her, the assurance that now many things would be right again.

None but the Brave (1900)

Original German Title: 'Leutnant Gustl'

Translated by Richard L. Simon, 1926

How long is this thing going to last? Let's see what time it is... perhaps I shouldn't look at my watch at a serious concert like this. But no one will see me. If anyone does, I'll know he's paying just as little attention as I am. In that case I certainly won't be embarrassed.... Only quarter to ten?... I feel as though I'd been here for hours. I'm just not used to going to concerts.... What's that they're playing? I'll have a look at the program.... Yes that's what it is: an oratorio. Thought it was a mass. That sort of thing belongs in church, and in church only. There's one advantage that church has over a concert: you can leave whenever you want to. — I wish I were sitting on the aisle! Steady, steady! Even oratorios end some time. Perhaps this one's very beautiful, and I'm just in the wrong mood. Well, why not? When I think that I came here for diversion... I should have given my ticket to Benedek. He likes this sort of thing. Plays violin. But in that case Kopetzsky would have felt insulted. It was very nice of him; meant well, at least. He's a good fellow, Kopetzsky! The only one I can really trust.... His sister is singing up there on the platform. There are at least a hundred women up there — all of them dressed in black. How am I to know which one is Kopetzsky's sister? They gave him a ticket because she was singing in the chorus.... Why then, didn't Kopetzsky go? — They're singing rather nicely now. It's inspiring! Bravo! Bravo!... Yes, I'll applaud along with the rest of them. The fellow next to me is clapping as if he were crazy. Wonder if he really likes it as much as all that? — Pretty girl over there in the box! Is she looking at me or at the man with the blond beard?... Ah, here we have a solo! Who is it? ALTO: FRÂULEIN WALKER, SOPRANO: FRÂULEIN MICHALEK... that one is probably the soprano... I haven't been at the opera for an awfully long time. Opera always amuses me, even when it's dull. I might go again the day after tomorrow. They're playing Traviata. No, day after tomorrow I'll probably be dead! Oh, nonsense; I can't even believe that myself! Just wait, Doctor, you'll stop making remarks like that! You'll get what's coming to you!...

I wish I could see the girl in the box more clearly. I'd like to borrow an opera glass. But this fellow next to me would probably eat me if I broke in on his reveries.... Wonder where Kopetzsky's sister is sitting? Wonder if I'd recognize her? I've met her only two or three times, the last time at the Officers' Club. Wonder if they're all good girls, all hundred of them? Oh, Lord!... ASSISTED BY THE SINGING CLUB — Singing Club... that's a good one! I'd always imagined that members of a Singing Club would be something like Vienna chorus girls; that is, I might have known they'd be nothing like them at all! Pleasant recollection! That time at Green Gate... What was her name? And then she once sent me a post card from Belgrade... that's a good place too! Well, Kopetzsky's lucky right now, sitting in the café, smoking a good cigar!

Why's that fellow staring at me all the time? I suppose he notices how bored I am... I'll have you know that if you keep on looking fresh like that I'll meet you in the lobby later and settle with you! He's looking the other way already! They're all afraid of my eyes... "You have the most beautiful eyes I've ever seen!" Steffi said that the other day.... Oh Steffi, Steffi, Steffi! — It's Steffi's fault that I'm sitting here bored by the hour. Oh, these letters from Steffi postponing engagements — they're getting on my nerves! What fun this evening might have been! Think I'll read Steffi's letter again. There, I've got it. But if I take it out of my pocket, I'll annoy the fellow next to me. — I know what's in it... she can't come because she has to have dinner with "him."... That was funny a week ago when she was at the garden party with him, and I was sitting opposite Kopetzsky; she was continually flirting with me. He didn't notice a thing — why, it's amazing! He's probably a Jew. Works in a bank. And his black moustache.... Probably a lieutenant in the reserve as well! Well, he'd better not come to practice in our regiment! They keep on commissioning too many Jews — that's the cause of all this anti-Semitism. The other day at the club, when the affair came up between the Doctor and the Mannheimers... they say the Mannheimers themselves are Jews, baptized, of course... they don't look it — especially Mrs. Mannheimer... blond, beautiful figure.... It was a good party, all in all. Wonderful dinner, excellent cigars.... They must have piles of money.

Hooray! It'll soon be over! Yes, the whole chorus is rising... looks fine — imposing! — Organ too! I like the organ.... Ah! that sounds good! Fine! It's really true, I ought to go to concerts more often.... I'll tell Kopetzsky how beautiful it was.... Wonder whether I'll meet him at the café today? — Oh Lord, I don't feel like going there; I got enough of it yesterday! A hundred and sixty Gulden on one card — it was stupid! And who won all the money? Ballert. Ballert, who needed it least of all.... It's Ballert's fault that I had to go to this rotten concert.... Otherwise I might have played again today, and perhaps won back something. But I'm glad I've promised myself to stay away from cards for a whole month.... Mother'll make a face again when she gets my letter! — Ah, she ought to go and see Uncle. He's rich as Croesus; a couple of hundred Gulden never worried him. If I could only get him to send me a regular allowance... But, no, I've got to beg for every crown. Then he always says that crops were poor last year!... Wonder whether I ought to spend a two weeks' vacation there again this summer? I'll be bored to death there.... If the... What was her name?... Funny, I can't remember a single name! Oh, yes: Etelka!... Couldn't understand a word of German... nor was it necessary.... There was nothing to say!... Yes, it ought to be all right, fourteen days of country air and fourteen nights with Etelka or someone else.... But I ought to be with Papa and Mamma for at least a week. She looked badly last Christmas.... Well, she'll be over her worries by now. If I were in her place I'd be happy that Papa's been retired on pension. — And Clara'll be married some time. Uncle will contribute something.... Twenty-eight isn't so old.... I'm sure Steffi's no younger.... It's really remarkable: the fast girls stay young much longer. Maretti, who played in Sans Gêne recently, — she's easily thirty-seven, and looks... Well, I wouldn't have said no! Too bad she didn't ask me....

Getting hot! Not over yet? Ah, I'm looking forward to the fresh air outside. I'll take a little walk around the Ring.... Today: early to bed, so as to be fresh for tomorrow afternoon! Funny, how little I think of it; it means nothing to me! The first time it worried me a bit. Not that I was afraid, but I was nervous the night before.... Lieutenant Bisanz was a tough opponent. — And still, nothing happened to me!... And it's already a year and a half since then! Well, if Bisanz did nothing to me, the doctor certainly won't! Still, these inexperienced fencers are often the most dangerous ones. Doschintzky's told me that on one occasion a fellow who had never had a sword in his hand before almost killed him; and today Doschintzky is the fencing instructor of the militia. —

I wonder whether he was as good then as he is now?... Most important of all: keep cool. I don't feel the least angry now — but he was impudent — unbelievably impudent. He'd probably not have done it if he hadn't been drinking champagne.... Such insolence! He's probably a Socialist. All the enemies of law and order are Socialists these days. They're a gang.... They'd like to do away with the whole army; but they never think of who could help them out if the Chinese ever invaded the country. Fools! I'll have to make an example of one of them. I was quite right. I'm really glad that I didn't let him get away with that remark. I'm furious whenever I think of it! But I behaved superbly. The Colonel said it was absolutely correct. I'll get something out of this affair. I know some who would have let him get away with it. Muller certainly would have taken it "objectively," or whatever they call it. This being "objective" is a lot of nonsense. "Lieutenant" — just the way in which he said "Lieutenant" was annoying. "You will have to admit—"... — How did the thing start? How did I ever start talking to a Socialist?... As I recall it, the brunette I was taking to the buffet was with us, and then this young fellow who paints hunting scenes — what is his name?... Good Lord, he's to blame for it all! He was talking about the manoeuvres; and it was only then that the Doctor joined us and said something or other I didn't like — about playing at war — something like that — but I couldn't say anything just then.... Yes, that's it.... And then they were talking about the Military School.... Yes, that's the way it was.... And I was telling them about a patriotic rally.... And then the Doctor said — not immediately, but it grew out of my talk about the rally— "Lieutenant, you'll admit, won't you, that all of your friends haven't gone into military service for the sole purpose of defending our Fatherland!" What a nerve of anyone to dare say a thing like that to an officer! I wish I could remember exactly how I answered him — Oh, yes, something about "fools rushing in where angels fear to tread"... Yes, that was it.... And there was a fellow there who wanted to smooth over matters — an elderly man with a cold in the head — but I was wild! The Doctor had said it in a tone that meant he was talking about me, and me only. The only thing he could have added was that they had expelled me from college and for that reason I had to go into military service.... Those people don't understand our point of view. They're too dull-witted.... Not everyone can experience the thrill I did the first time I wore a uniform.... Last year at the manoeuvres — I would have given a great deal if it had suddenly been in earnest.... Mirovic told me he felt exactly the same way. And then when His Majesty rode up at the front and the Colonel addressed us — only a nincompoop wouldn't have been thrilled by it.... And now a boor comes along who has been a bookworm all his life and has the temerity to make a fresh remark.... Oh, just wait. Just see how fit you'll be for the duel!...

Well, what's this? It must be over by now.... "Ye, his Angels, praise the Lord" — Surely, that's the final chorus... Beautiful, really beautiful! And here I've completely forgotten the girl in the box who was flirting with me before... Where is she now?... Already gone.... That one over there seems rather nice.... Stupid of me — I left my opera glasses at home. I wish the cute little one over there would turn around. She sits there so properly. The one next to her is probably her mother.... I wonder whether I ought to consider marriage seriously? Willy was no older than I when he married. He's done well by himself — and always a pretty wife at home....Too bad that just today Steffi had no time! If I only knew where she were. I'd like to have a little tête-à-tête with her. There'd be a fine how-do-you-do! If he'd ever catch me, he'd palm her off on me. When I think what it must cost Fleiss to keep the Winterfeld woman! — and even at that, she's unfaithful to him right and left. Some day she'll get the fright that's coming to her.... Bravo, bravo! Ah, it's over.... Oh, it feels good to get up and stretch. Well! How long is he going to take to put that opera glass into his pocket?

"Pardon me, won't you let me pass?"

What a crowd! Better let the people go by.... Gorgeous person.... Wonder whether they're genuine diamonds?... That one over there's rather attractive.... The way she's flirting with me!... Why, yes, my lady, I'd be glad to!... Oh, what a nose! — Jewess.... Another one. It's amazing, half of them are Jews. One can't even hear an oratorio unmolested these days.... Now we're crowding together.

Why is that idiot back of me pushing so? I'll teach him better manners.... Oh, it's an elderly man!... Who's that bowing to me over there?... How do you do. Charmed! I haven't the slightest idea who he is.... I think I'll go right over to Leidinger's for a bite. Maybe Steffi'll be there after all. Why didn't she write and let me know where she's going with him? She probably didn't know herself. Oh, it's fierce, this day-to-day existence....

Poor thing — So, here's the exit.... Ah! that one's pretty as a picture! All alone? She's smiling at me. There's an idea — I'll follow her!... Now, down the steps.... Oh, a Major — a recent graduate — very nice, the way he returned my salute. I'm not the only officer here after all.... Where did the pretty girl go?... There she is, standing by the banister.... Now to the wardrobe... Better not lose her.... She's nabbed him already. What a hussy! Having someone call for her, and then laughing at me out of the side of her face! They're all worthless.... Good Lord, what a mob there at the wardrobe. Better wait a little while. Why doesn't the idiot take my check?

"Here, Number 224! It's hanging there! What's the matter — are you blind? Hanging there! There! At last.... Thank you." That fatty there is taking up most of the wardrobe.... "If you please!"...

"Patience, patience."

What's the fellow saying?

"Just have a little patience."

I'll have to answer him in kind. "Why don't you allow some room?"

"You'll get there in time." What's he saying? Did he say that to me? That's rather strong! I won't swallow that. "Keep quiet!"

"What did you say?"

That's a fine way to talk! This has got to stop right now.

"Don't push!"

"Shut your mouth!" I shouldn't have said that. That was a bit rough.... Well, I've done it now.

"Exactly what did you mean by that?"

Now he's turning around. Why I know him! — Heavens, it's the baker, the one who always comes to the café.... What's he doing here? He probably has a daughter or something in the chorus. Well, what's this? — What's he trying to do? It looks as though... Yes, Great Scott, he has the hilt of my sword in his hand! What's the matter? Is the man crazy?... "You Sir!..

"You, Lieutenant, just be altogether quiet."

What's he saying? For Heaven's sake, I hope no one's heard it. No, he's talking very softly.... Well, why doesn't he let go of my sword? Great God! This is getting rough. I can't budge his hand from the hilt. Let's not have a rumpus here! Isn't the Major behind him? Can anyone notice that he's holding the hilt of my sword? Why, he's talking to me! What's he saying!

"Lieutenant, if you dare to make the slightest fuss, I'll pull your sword out of the sheath, break it in two and send the pieces to your Regimental Commander. Do you understand me, you young fathead?"

What did he say? Am I dreaming? Is he really talking to me? How shall I answer him? But he's in earnest. He's really pulling the sword out. Great God! he's doing it!... I can feel it! He's already pulling it! What is he saying? For God's sake, no scandal! — What's he forever saying?

"But I have no desire to ruin your career.... So just be a good boy.... Don't be scared. Nobody's heard it.... Everything's all right.... And so that no one will think we've been fighting I'll act most friendly toward you.... I am honored, Sir Lieutenant. It has been a pleasure — I am honored."

Good God, did I dream that?... Did he really say that?... Where is he?

.. There he goes.... I must draw my sword and run him through — Heavens, I hope nobody heard it.... No, he talked very softly — right in my ear. Why don't I go after him and crack open his skull?

.. No, it can't be done. It can't be done.... I should have done it at once.... Why didn't I do it immediately?... I couldn't.... He wouldn't let go the hilt, and he's ten times as strong as I am.... If I had said another word he would actually have broken the sword in two. I ought to be glad that he spoke no louder. If anyone had heard it, I'd have had to shoot myself on the spot.... Perhaps it was only a dream. Why is that man by the pillar looking at me like that? — Did he really hear it?... I'll ask him... ask him?! — Am I crazy? — Do I look queer? — I must be pale as a sheet — Where's the swine? I've got to kill him!... He's gone.... The whole place is empty.... Where's my coat?... Why, I'm already wearing it.... I didn't even notice it.... Who helped me on with it?... Oh, that one there. I'll have to tip him.... So. But what's it all about? Did it really happen? Did anyone really talk to me like that? Did anyone really call me a fat-head? And I didn't cut him to pieces on the spot?... But I couldn't.... He had a fist like iron. I just stood there as though I were nailed to the floor. I think I must have lost my senses. Otherwise, I would have used my other hand.... But then he would have drawn out my sword, and broken it, and everything would have been over.... Over and done with! And afterwards, when he walked away, it was too late.... I couldn't have run my sword through him from the back.

What, am I already on the street? How did I ever get here? — It's so cool.... Oh, the wind feels fine!... Who's that over there? Why are they looking over at me? I wonder whether they really heard it.

.. No, no one could have heard it.... I'm sure of it — I looked around immediately! No one paid any attention to me. No one heard a thing.... But he said it anyhow. Even if nobody heard it, he certainly said it. I just stood there and took it as if someone had knocked me silly.... But I couldn't say a word — couldn't do a thing. All I did was stand there —, quiet, absolutely quiet!... It's awful; it's unbearable; I must kill him on the spot, wherever I happen to meet him!... I let a swine like that get away with it! And he knows me... Great Heavens, he knows me — knows who I am!... He can tell everybody just exactly what he said to me!... No, he wouldn't do that. Otherwise, he wouldn't have talked so quietly.... He just wanted me to hear it alone!... But how do I know that he won't repeat it today or tomorrow, to his wife, to his daughter, to his friends in the café — For God's sake, I'll see him again tomorrow. As soon as I step into the café tomorrow, I'll see him sitting there as he does every day, playing Tarok with Schlesinger and the fancy flower merchant. No, that can't happen. I won't allow it to. The moment I see him I'll run him through.... No, I can't do that.... I should have done it right then and there!... If I only had! I'll go to the Colonel and tell him about the whole affair.... Yes, right to the Colonel.... The Colonel is always friendly — and I'll say to him — Colonel, I wish to report, Sir. He grasped the hilt of my sword and wouldn't let go of it; it was just as though I were completely unarmed.... What will the Colonel say? — What will he say? There's just one answer: dishonourable discharge!... Are those recruits over there? Disgusting. At night they look like officers.... Yes, they're saluting! — If they knew — if they really knew!... There's the Hochleitner Café. Probably a couple of officers in my company are there now.... Perhaps one or more whom I know.... Wonder if it wouldn't be best to tell the first one I meet all about it — but just as if it had happened to someone else?... I'm already growing a bit crazy.... Where the devil am I walking? What business have I out here in the street? — Where should I go? Wasn't I going to the Leidinger Café? Haha! If I were to sit down with them I'm sure everyone would see what had happened to me.... Well, something must happen.... But what?... Nothing, nothing at all — no one heard it. No one knows a thing. At least for the time being.... Perhaps I ought to visit him at his home and beg him to swear to me that he'll never tell a soul. — Ah, better to put a bullet through my head at once. That would be the cleverest way of all — the cleverest! — there's just nothing else left for me — nothing. If I were to ask the Colonel or Kopetzsky, or Blany, or Freidmair: — they'd all tell me the same thing. How would it be if I were to talk it over with Kopetzsky? Yes, that seems the most sensible thing to do. But what about tomorrow — tomorrow — yes, that's right, tomorrow — at four o'clock, in the armory, I'm to fight a duel. But I can't do it, I'm no longer qualified for duelling. Nonsense, nonsense, not a soul knows it, not a soul! — There are hundreds of people walking around to whom worse things have happened.... What about all those stories I've heard about Deckener — how he and Rederow fought with pistols.... And the duelling committee decided that the duel could take place at that.... But what will the committee decide about me? — Fathead, fathead, and I just stood there and took it —! Great Heavens, it makes no difference whether anyone knows it or not! The chief thing is: I know he said it! I feel as though I'm not the same man I was an hour ago — I know that I'm not qualified for duelling, and that I must shoot myself. I wouldn't have another calm moment in my life. I'd always be afraid that someone might know about it in some way or another, and that some time someone might tell me about this evening's affair! — What a happy man I was an hour ago!... Just because Kopetzsky gave me a ticket, and just because Steffi postponed her date — destiny hangs on things like that.... This afternoon, all was sailing smoothly, and now I am a lost man about to shoot himself.... Why am I running this way? No one is chasing me. What's the time there? 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.... Eleven, Eleven.... I ought to go and get something to eat.... I'll certainly land somewhere. I might go and sit down in some little restaurant where no one would know me. — At any rate, a man must eat even though he kill himself immediately after. Haha! Death is no child's play.... Who said that recently? — It makes no difference.

I wonder who'll worry about me most,.. Mama or Steffi?... Steffi, Great God, Steffi!... She won't allow anyone to notice how she feels. Otherwise "he" will throw her out.... Poor little thing! — At my regiment.... No one will have the slightest idea why I did it. They'll all have their theories on why Gustl committed suicide. But no one will hit upon the real solution: that I had to shoot myself because a miserable baker, a low person who just happened to have a strong fist... It's too silly — too silly for words! — For that reason, a fellow like myself, young and fit.... Well, they'll all say he didn't have to commit suicide for a silly reason like that. It's a pity! But if I were to ask anyone right now, they'd all give me the same answer.... And if I were to ask myself.... Oh, the devil, we're absolutely helpless against civilians. People think that we're better off just because we carry swords, and if one of us ever makes use of a weapon, the story goes around that we're all born murderers. The paper will carry a story:

"Young Officer Suicide"... How do they always put it?... "Motive Concealed"... Haha!... "Mourning at his Coffin."... — But it's true. I feel as if I were forever telling myself a story.... It's true.... I must commit suicide. There's nothing else left to do — I can't allow Kopetzsky and Blany to come tomorrow morning and say to me: — Sorry, we can't be your seconds. I'd be a fool if I'd give them the chance — fool that I am, standing quietly by and letting myself be called a fathead.... Tomorrow everyone will know it. Fancy myself believing for a moment that a person like that won't repeat it everywhere.... Why, his wife knows it already! Tomorrow everyone in the café will know it. All the waiters will know it. Schlesinger will know it — so will the cashier girl — And even if he promised that he wouldn't tell anybody, he'll certainly tell them the day after tomorrow.... And if not then, in a week from now.... And if he were to get apoplexy tonight, I'd know it.... I'd know it. And I could no longer wear a cape and carry a sword if such a curse were on me!... So, I've got to do it — I've got to do it — what else? — Tomorrow afternoon the doctor might just as well run his sword through me.... Things like this have happened before.... And Bauer, poor fellow, lost his mind and died three days later.... And Brenitsch fell off his horse and broke his neck.... And furthermore, there's nothing else to do, not for me anyhow, certainly not for me! — There are men who would take it more lightly.... But God, what sort of men are they!... Fleischsalcher slapped Ringeiner's face when he caught him with his wife, whereupon Ringeiner quit and is now somewhere out in the country, married.... There are women, I suppose, who'll marry people like that!... On my word, I'll never shake hands with him if he ever returns to Vienna!... Well, you've heard it, Gustl: — life is over for you — finished, once and for all. I know it now, it's a simple story.... So! I'll be altogether calm.... I've always known it: if the occasion were ever to arise, I'd be calm, altogether calm.... But I would never have believed that it would come to this.... — That I'd have to kill myself just because a... Perhaps I didn't understand him correctly.... He was talking in an altogether different tone at the end.... I was simply a little out of my mind on account of the singing and the heat.... Perhaps I was momentarily demented, and it's all not true.... Not true, haha! Not true! — I can still hear it.... It's still ringing in my ears, and I can still feel in my fingers how I tried to move his hand from the hilt of my sword. He's a husky brute.... I'm no weakling myself. Franziski is the only man in the regiment who's stronger than I.

Already at the bridge?... How far am I running? If I keep on this way I'll be at Kagran by midnight.... Haha!... Good Lord, how happy we were last September when we entered Kagran. Only two hours more, and Vienna!... I was dead tired when we got there.... Had slept like a log all afternoon, and by evening we were already at Ronacher's.... Kopetzsky and Ladsiner.... Who else was along with us at the time? — Yes, that's right... that volunteer, the one who told us the Jewish stories while we were marching. Sometimes they're pleasant fellows, these one-year men.... But all of them ought to become substitutes. For what sense is there to it: all of us slave for ages, and a fellow like him serves a year and receives the same distinction as we.... It's unfair! — But what's it to me? Why bother about it all? A private in the hospital corps counts for more than I do right now.... I no longer belong on the face of the earth.... All is over with me. Honor lost — all lost!... There's nothing else for me to do but load my revolver and... Gustl, Gustl, you're not thinking this thing out properly! Come to your senses!

.. There's no way out.... No matter how you torture your brain, there's no way out! — The point is, now that the end is here, behave like an officer and a gentleman so that the Colonel will say: — He was a good fellow, we'll always think well of him!... How many companies attend the funeral of a lieutenant?... I really must know that.... Haha! Even if the whole battalion turns out, even if the whole garrison turns out, and they fire twenty salutes, I'll never wake up! Last summer, after the Army Steeple-chase, I was sitting in front of the café with Engel.... Funny, I've never seen the fellow since.

.. Why did he have his left eye bandaged? I always wanted to ask him, but it didn't seem proper.... There go two artillery-men.... They probably think I'm following that woman.... Does she have to solicit me?... Oh, Lord! I wonder how that one can possibly earn a living.... I'd sooner... However, in time of need a person-will do almost anything... In Przemsyl — I was so horrified that I swore I'd never look at a woman again.... That was a ghastly time up there in Galicia.... Altogether a stroke of fortune that we ever returned to Vienna. Bokonny is still in Sambor, and will stay for ten years more, getting old and grey.... What happened to me today would never have happened if I'd remained there myself, and I'd far sooner grow old in Galicia than... Than what? Than what? — What is it? What is it? Am I crazy — the way I always forget? — Good God, I forget it every moment.... Has it ever happened before that a man within two hours of putting a bullet through his head digresses on all conceivable matters that no longer concern him? I feel as if I were drunk. Haha, drunk indeed! Drunk with death! Drunk with suicide! Ha, trying to be funny! Yes, I'm in a good mood — must have been born with one. Certainly, if I ever told anybody they'd say I were lying. — I feel as if I already had the revolver at my head.... Now, I'd pull the trigger — in a second all is over.... Not everyone gets over it so easily — others brood over it month after month. My poor cousin, on his back two years, couldn't move, had the most excruciating pains, what a time!... Care, is the only thing necessary; to aim well, so that nothing unforeseen happens, as it did to that substitute last year.... Poor devil, didn't die, but became blind.... What ever happened to him? Wonder where he's living now. Terrible to run around the way he — that is, he can't run around, he's led. A chap like him — can't be more than twenty years old right now. He shot at the girl more accurately.... She was dead at once.... Unbelievable, the reasons people have for killing. How can anyone be jealous?... I've never been jealous in my whole life. At this very moment Steffi is sitting comfortably at the dance hall; then she will go home with "him".... Doesn't mean a thing to me.... Not a thing. She has a nicely furnished place — a little bathroom with a red lamp — When she recently came in, in her green kimono.... I'll never see the green kimono again — Steffi, herself, I'll never see again — And I'll never go up the fine broad steps in Gusshaus Strasse. Steffi will keep on amusing herself as if nothing had happened; she shan't tell a soul that her beloved Gustl committed suicide. But she'll weep — oh, yes, she'll weep. A great many people will weep.... Good God, Mamma! — No, no, I can't think about it. Oh, no, I can't bear to.... You're not to think about home at all, Gustl, you understand? Not — at — all.

This isn't bad. I'm now on the way to the Prater. Midnight.... That's another thing I didn't think of this morning, that tonight I'd be taking a walk in the Prater.... Wonder what the watchman there thinks....Well, I'll walk on. It's rather nice here. No fun to take a bite; no fun in the café. The air is pleasant and it's quiet.... Indeed, I'll have a great deal of quiet — as much as I could possibly want. Haha! — But I'm altogether out of breath. I must have been running like crazy.... Slower, slower, Gustl, you'll miss nothing, there's nothing more to do, nothing, absolutely nothing! What's this, am I getting a chill? — Probably on account of worrying, and I haven't eaten a thing. What's that beautiful smell?... Are the blossoms out yet? — What's today? — The fourth of April. It's been raining a great deal the last few days, but the street is almost entirely bare and it's dark. Hooh! Dark enough to give you the shivers.... That was really the only time in my whole life I was scared — when I was a little kid that time in the woods.... But I wasn't so little at that.... Fourteen or fifteen.... How long ago was it? — Nine years.... Easily. At eighteen I was a substitute; at twenty a lieutenant and next year I'll be... What'll I be next year? What do I mean; next year? What do I mean; next week? What do I mean; tomorrow?... What's this? Teeth chattering? Oh! — Well! let them chatter a while. Lieutenant, you are altogether alone right now and have no reason for showing off.... It's bitter, oh, it's bitter....

I'll sit on that bench..... Ah.... How far have I come? — How dark it is! That behind me there, that must be the second café.... I was in there last summer at the time our band gave a concert.... With Kopetzsky and with Ruttner — there were a couple of others along.... — Lord, I'm tired.... As tired as if I'd been marching for the last ten hours.... Yes, it would be fine to go to sleep now. — Ha, a lieutenant without shelter!... Yes, I really ought to go home.... What'll I do at home? — But what am I doing in the Prater? — Ah, it would be best never to get up at all — to sleep here and never wake up.... Yes, that would be comfortable! But, Lieutenant, things aren't going to be as comfortable as that for you.... What next? — Well I might really consider the whole affair in orderly sequence.... All things must be considered.... Life is like that.... Well, then, let's consider.... Consider what?... — No, the air feels fine.... I ought to go to the Prater more often at night.... That should have occurred to me sooner. It's all a thing of the past — the Prater, the air and taking walks.... Well, then, what next? — Off with my cap. It's pressing on my forehead.... I can't think properly.... Ah.... So!... Now, Gustl, collect your thoughts, make your final arrangements! Tomorrow morning will be the end.... Tomorrow morning at seven... seven o'clock is a beautiful hour. Haha! — At eight o'clock when school begins, all will be over.... Kopetzsky won't be able to teach — he'll be too broken up.... But naturally he'll know nothing about it.... He may not have heard of it.... They found Max Lippay only in the afternoon, and in the morning he had shot himself, and not a soul heard of it.... But why bother about whether Kopetzsky will teach school tomorrow.... Ha! — Well, then, at seven o'clock — Yes.... Well, what next?... Nothing more to consider. I'll shoot myself in my room and then — basta! The funeral will be Monday.... I know one man who'll enjoy it: the Doctor. The duel can't take place on account of the suicide of one of the combatants.... Wonder what they'll say at Mannheimers? — Well, he won't make much of it.... But his wife, his pretty, blond... She was worth considering.... Oh, yes, I would have had a chance with her if I'd only taken a little better care of myself.... Yes, with her it might have been something altogether different from Steffi.... Be on your toes all the time: that is, court in the proper way, send flowers, talk decently... not: meet me tomorrow afternoon at the barracks!... Yes, a decent woman like her — that might have been something. The captain's wife at Przemsyl wasn't decent.... I could swear that Lubitzsky and Wermutek... and the shabby substitute — she was unfaithful with him too.... But Mannheimer's wife.... Yes, that would be entirely different. That would have been an experience that might almost have made me a different man — she might have given me more polish — or have given me more respect for myself — But always that kind... and I began so young — I was only a boy that time on my first vacation when I was home with my parents in Graz.... The Reidl woman was also along — she was Bohemian.... Must have been twice as old as I — came home only the following morning.... The way Father looked at me.... And Clara. I was most ashamed of all before Clara.... She was engaged at the time.

.. Wonder why the engagement never materialized. I didn't worry much about it at the time. Poor thing, never had much luck — and now she's going to lose her only brother.... Yes, you'll never see me again, Clara — it's all over. You didn't think, little sister, did you, when you saw me at the station on New Year's Day that you'd never see me again? — And Mother... Good God! Mother!... No, I can't allow myself to think of it. Ah, if I could only go home first.... Say I have a day's leave.... See Papa, Mama, Clara again before it's all over....Yes, I could take the first train at seven o'clock to Graz. I'd be there at one.... God bless you, Mama.... Hello, Clara!... How goes everything?... Well this is a surprise.... But they'll notice something.... If no one else, at least Clara will.... Surely, Clara.... Clara's a smart girl.... She wrote me such a sweet letter the other day, and I still owe her an answer — and the good advice she always gives me. Such a wholehearted creature.... Wonder whether everything wouldn't have turned out differently if I'd stayed at home. I might have studied political economy and gone into my uncle's business.... They all wanted me to do that when I was a kid.... By this time I'd be happily married to a nice, sweet girl.... Perhaps Anna — she used to like me a lot.... I just noticed it again the last time I was home — in spite of her husband and two children.... I could see it, just the way she looked at me.... And she still calls me "Gustly," the same way she used to.... It will hit her hard when she finds out the way I ended up — but her husband will say: — I might have known as much — a no-account like him! — They'll all think it was because I owed money.... It's not true. I've paid all my debts.... except the last hundred and sixty gulden — and they'll be here tomorrow. Well I must see to it that Ballert gets his hundred and sixty gulden — I must make a note of that before I shoot myself.... It's terrible, it's terrible!... If I only could run away from it all, and go to America where nobody knows about it. In America no one will know what happened here this evening.... No one will care. Just recently I read in the paper about Count Runge, who had to leave because of some nasty stories that were going around about him. He now owns a hotel over there and doesn't give a hoot for the whole bunch.... And in a couple of years I might return.... Not to Vienna, of course.... Nor to Graz... but I could go out to the farm.... And Mama and Papa would a dozen times rather have it that way — just so long as I stay alive.... And why worry about the other people at all? Who ever cares about me? — Kopetzsky's the only one who'd ever miss me.... Kopetzsky — the one who gave me the ticket today... and the ticket's to blame for it all. If he hadn't given it to me, I wouldn't have gone to the concert, and all this would never have happened.... What happened? It's just as if a whole century had passed — and it's only two hours ago. Two hours ago someone called me a fathead and wanted to break my sword. Great God, I'm starting to shout here at midnight! Why did it all happen? Couldn't I have waited longer until the whole wardrobe had emptied out? And why did I ever tell him to shut up? How did it ever slip out of me? I'm generally polite. I've never been so rude, even to my orderly.... But of course I was nervous: all the things that happened just at the same time.... The tough luck in gambling and Steffi's eternal stalling — and the duel tomorrow afternoon — and I've been getting too little sleep lately, and all the noise in the barracks.... I couldn't keep on standing it forever!... Before long I would have become ill — would have had to get a furlough.... Now it's no longer necessary.... I'll get a long furlough now — without pay — Haha!...

How long am I going to keep on sitting here? It must be after midnight.... Didn't I hear the clock strike midnight a while ago? — What's that there? A carriage driving by? At this hour? I can already imagine... They're better off than I. Perhaps it's Ballert with his Bertha.... Why, of all people, Ballert? — Go ahead, right on! That was a good looking carriage His Highness had in Przemsyl.... He used to ride in it all the time on his way to the city to see Rosenberg. He was a good mixer, His Highness — chummy with everyone, a good drinking companion. Those were good times.... Although... It was in a lonely section and the weather was hot enough in the summer to kill you.... One afternoon three men were overcome by the heat.... Even the corporal in my own company — a handy fellow he was.

.. During the afternoon we used to lie down naked on the bed. Once Wiesner came into the room suddenly; I must just have been dreaming. I stood up and drew my sword — it was lying next to me.... Must have looked funny!... Wiesner laughed himself sick. He's now the riding master — sorry I didn't go into the cavalry myself. The old man didn't want me to — it would have been too expensive — but it makes no difference now.... Why? — Yes, I know: — I must die, that's why it makes no difference — I must die.... How then? — Look here, Gustl, you especially came down here to the Prater in the middle of the night so that not a soul would bother you — you can think over everything quietly.... That's all a lot of nonsense about America and quitting the service, and you haven't brains enough to start on another career. And when you reach the age of a hundred and think back to the time that a fellow wanted to break your sword, and called you a fathead and you stood there and couldn't do a thing — no, there's nothing more to think about — what's happened has happened. — That's all nonsense about Mama and Clara — they'll get over it — people get over everything.... Oh, Lord, how Mama wept when her brother died — and after four weeks she never thought of it again. She used to ride out to the cemetery... first, every week, then every month, and now only on the day of his death. Tomorrow is the day of my death — April 5th. Wonder whether they'll take my body to Graz — Haha! The worms in Graz will enjoy it! — But that's not my problem — I'll let others worry about that....Well then, what else is there to worry about?... Oh yes, the hundred and sixty gulden for Ballert — that's all decided — then I have no debts to meet. — Are there letters to write? Why? To whom?... Say good-bye? The devil I will — it's clear enough that a man's gone after he's shot himself! Everyone will soon notice that he's taken his leave.

.. If people only knew how little the whole thing bothers me, they wouldn't feel sorry — No use pitying me.... What have I had out of life? — One thing I'd like to have experienced: being in war — but I would have had to wait a long time for that.... Outside of that I've experienced everything. Whether a person's called Steffi or Kunigunde makes no difference.... And I've heard all the best operettas — and Lohengrin twelve times — and this evening I even heard an oratorio — and a baker called me a fathead. — Good God, I've had enough! Life's opened up all its secrets to me.... Well then, I'll go home slowly, very slowly, there's really no hurry. — I'll rest for a few minutes on the bench here in the Prater, and think about — just nothing at all. I'll never lie down in bed again. I'll have enough time to sleep. — This wonderful air! There'll be no more air...

WELL, what's this? — Hey, there, Johann, bring me a glass of fresh water.... What's this?... Where?... Am I dreaming? My head. Oh, Good Lord.... I can't see straight! — I'm all dressed! — Where am I sitting? — Holy God, I've been sleeping! How could I have been sleeping? It's already growing light. How long have I been sleeping? I mustn't ask — must look at my watch — can't see a thing.... Where are my matches? Won't a single one of them light?... Three o'clock, and I'm to have my duel at four. — No, not a duel — a suicide! It has nothing to do with a duel; I must shoot myself because a baker called me a fathead.... What, did it actually happen? — My head feels so funny.... My throat's all clogged up — I can't move at all — my right foot's asleep. — Get up! Get up!... Ah, that's better! It's already growing light, and the air... Just like that morning when I was doing picket duty when we were camping in the woods. I woke up feeling differently that time.

There was a different sort of day ahead of me.... I wonder whether I get it all straight. There's the street — gray, empty — just now I'm the only person in the Prater. I was here once at four o'clock in the morning with Pansinger. — We were riding. I was on Colonel Mirovic's horse and Pansinger on his own nag. — That was May, a year ago — everything was in bloom — everything was green. Now it's still cold, but Spring will soon be here — it will be here in just a few days. — Lilies-of-the-valley, violets — pity I'll never see them again. Everyone else will enjoy them, but I must die! Oh, it's miserable! And others will sit in the café eating, as if nothing had happened — just the way all of us sat in the café on the evening of the day they buried Lippay.... And they all liked Lippay so much.... He was more popular in the regiment than I. — Why shouldn't they sit in the café when I kick off? — It's quite warm — much warmer than yesterday and there's a fragrance in the air — the blossoms must be out.... Wonder whether Steffi will bring me flowers? — It will never occur to her! She'll just ride out to... Oh, if it were still Adele... Adele! I'm sure I haven't thought of her for the last two years.... As long as I lived I never saw a woman weep the way she did.... That was absolutely the tenderest thing I ever lived through... she was so modest, so unassuming. — She loved me, I swear she did. — She was altogether different from Steffi.... I wonder why I ever gave her up.... It was too tame for me, yes, that was the whole thing.... Going out with the same person every evening.... Then perhaps I was afraid that I'd never be able to get rid of her — she always whimpered so. — Well, Gustl, you could have waited a long time until you found anyone who loved you as much as Adele. Wonder what she's doing now. Well, what would she be doing — probably has someone else now. This, with Steffi, is much more comfortable. I am with her only when I want to be — someone else can have all the unpleasantness — I'll take the pleasant part.... Well, in that case I certainly can't expect her to come to the cemetery. Wonder if there's anyone who'd go without feeling obliged to. Kopetzsky, perhaps — and that's all! Oh, it's sad, to have no one.... Nonsense! There's Papa and Mama and Clara. It's because I'm a son and a brother.... What more is there to hold us together? They like me of course — but what do they know about me? — That I'm in the service, that I play cards, and that I run around with fast women.... Anything more? Yes — that I often get good and sick of myself — though I never wrote anything to them about that — perhaps the reason is because I have never realized it myself. Well, Gustl, what sort of stuff are you muttering to yourself? It's just about time to start crying.... Disgusting! — Keep in step.... So! Whether a man goes to a rendezvous or on duty or to battle.... Who was it said that?... Oh yes, it was Major Lederer. When they were telling us that time at the canteen about Wingleder — the one who grew so pale before his first duel — and vomited.... Yes, a true officer will never betray by look or step whether he goes to a rendezvous or certain death! — Therefore, Gustl — remember the major's words! Ha! — Always growing lighter.... What's that whistling there? — Oh yes, there's the North Railroad Station.... It's never looked so long before.... There are the carriages. Nobody except street cleaners around. They're the last street cleaners I'll ever see — Ha! I always laugh when I think of it.... I don't understand myself.... Wonder whether it's that way with everybody, once they're entirely sure. Four thirty by the clock at the North Railroad Station.... The only question now is whether I'm to shoot myself at seven o'clock railroad time or Vienna time.... Seven o'clock.... Well, why exactly seven?... As if it couldn't be any other time as well.... I'm hungry — Lord, I'm hungry — No wonder.... Since when haven't I eaten?... Since — not since yesterday at six o'clock in the café! When Kopetzsky handed me the check — coffee and two rolls. — Wonder what the baker will say when he hears about it?... Damned swine. He'll know — he'll realize what it means to be an Austrian officer — a fellow like that can be beaten in the open street and think nothing of it. And if an officer is insulted even in secret, he's as good as dead.... If a rascal like him would only fight a duel — but no, then he'd be very careful — he wouldn't take a chance like that. The fellow keeps on living quietly and peacefully while I — it's the end for me! He's responsible for my death.... Do you realize, Gustl, it is he who is responsible for your death! But he won't get off as easily as that! — No, no, no! I'll send Kopetzsky a letter telling him the whole story.... Better yet: — I'll write to the Colonel. He'll make a report to the officer in command....Just like an official report.... Just wait — you think, do you, that a matter like this can remain secret! — You're just wrong. — It will be reported and remembered forever. After that I'd like to see whether you'll venture into the café! — Ha!— "I'd like to see" is good! There are lots of things I'd like to see which unfortunately I won't be able to — Out! It's all over! —

At this moment Johann must be coming to my room. He notices that the Lieutenant hasn't slept at home. — Well he'll imagine all sorts of things. But that the Lieutenant has spent the night in the Prater — that, Good Lord, will never occur to him.... Ah, there goes the Fourty-fourth! They're marching out to target practice. Let them pass. — So, I'll remain right here.... A window is being opened up there. — Pretty creature. — Well I, at least, would want to put something around me, going to an open window. Last Sunday was the last time. I'd never have dreamt that Steffi would be the last. Oh God, that's the only real pleasure. Well, now the Colonel will ride after them in two hours in his grand manner. These big fellows take life easy. — Yes, yes, eyes right! Very good. If you only knew how little I care about you all. Ah, that's not bad at all: there goes Katzer. Since when has he been transferred to the Forty-fourth? — How do you do, good morning! What sort of a face is he making? Why is he pointing at his head? — My dear fellow, your skull interests me not at all.... Oh, it's that way. No, my good chap, you're mistaken: I've just spent the night in the Prater.... You will hear about it in the evening paper. "Impossible!" he'll say, "Early this morning as we were marching out to target practice I met him on the Prater Strasse" — Who'll be put in command of my platoon? I wonder whether they'll give it to Walter. Well that would be a fine how-do-you-do! A fellow totally devoid of imagination — should have been a plumber. — What, the sun coming up already! — This will be a beautiful day — a real Spring day. The devil — on a day like this! — Every cab driver will be in the world at eight o'clock this morning and I — well, what about me? Now really, it would be funny if I lost my nerve at the last minute just because of cab drivers.... What's up now? — Why's my heart thumping this way? — Not on account of the cab driver. No, oh no, it's because I haven't eaten since yesterday. But Gustl, be honest with yourself: you're scared — scared because you have never tried it before.... But that doesn't help. Being scared never helped anybody. Everyone has to experience it once. Some sooner, some later, and you just happen to have to experience it sooner. As a matter of fact you never were worth an awful lot, so the least you can do is to behave decently at the very end. In fact I demand that you do. I'll have to figure it out — figure out what?... I'm always trying to figure out.... It's lying in the drawer of my table — loaded — just: pull the trigger — certainly not very complicated!

That girl over there's already going to work... the poor girls!... Adele also used to have to go to work — I called for her a few times in the evening. When they have a job they don't play around so much with men. If Steffi had only listened to me. I always urged her to become a modiste.... Wonder how she'll find out about it? — The newspaper! She'll be angry that I didn't write to her about it. I believe I'm beginning to lose my mind. Why bother about whether she'll be angry or not? How long has the whole affair lasted?... Since January.... No, it must have begun before Christmas. I brought her some candy from Graz, and she sent me a note at New Year's.... Good Lord, that's right, I have her letters at home. Are there any I should have burned?... 'Mm, the one about Fallsteiner. If that letter is found — the rascal will get into trouble. Why should that bother me! — Well it wouldn't be much of an exertion.... But I can't look through all that scrawl.... It would be best to burn the whole bunch.... Who'll ever need them? They're all junk. — My few books I could leave to Blany— “Through Night and Ice” — too bad I’ll never be able to finish it.... Didn’t have much chance to read these last few months....

Organ playing? In the church there.... Early Mass — haven’t been to one in an age.... Last time it was in February when the whole platoon was ordered to go. But it didn’t mean anything. — I was watching my men to see if they were religious and behaving properly.... I’d like to go to church... there’s something substantial about it after all.... Well, this afternoon I’ll know all about it. Ah, “this afternoon” is good! — what shall I do — go in? I think it would be a comfort to Mother if she knew!... It wouldn’t mean as much to Clara.... Well, in I go. It can’t hurt! Organ playing — singing — hm! — what’s the matter! I’m growing dizzy.... Oh God, Oh, God, Oh, God! I want somebody whom I can talk to before it happens! — How would it be — if I went to confession! The Father would certainly open his eyes if he heard me say at the end, “Pardon, Reverend Father; I am now going to shoot myself!”... Most of all I want to lie down there on the stone floor and cry my eyes out.... Oh no, I don’t dare do that. But crying sometimes helps so much.... I’ll sit down a moment, but I won’t go to sleep again as I did in the Prater!... — People who have religion are much better off.... Well, now my hands are beginning to tremble! If it keeps on this way, I’ll soon become so disgusted at myself that I’ll commit suicide out of pure shame! That old woman there — What is she still praying about?... It would be a good idea to say to her: You, please include me too.... I never learned how to do it properly. Ha! It seems that dying makes one stupid! — Stand up! Where have I heard that melody before? — Holy God! Last night! — It’s the melody from the oratorio! Out, out of here, I can’t stand it any more. ‘Pst! Not so much noise letting that sword drag — don’t disturb the people in their prayers — so! — It’s better in the open.... Light.... The time’s always growing shorter. Wish it were over already! — I should have done it at once in the Prater.... I should never go out without a revolver.... If I’d had one yesterday evening.... Good Lord! — I might take breakfast in the café.... I’m hungry. It always used to seem remarkable that people who were doomed to die drank coffee and smoked a cigar in the morning.... Heavens, I haven’t even smoked! I haven’t even felt like smoking! — This is funny: — I really feel like going to the café.... Yes, it’s already open and there’s none of our crowd there right now... and if there were — it would be a magnificent sign of cool headedness! “At six o’clock he was eating breakfast in the café and at seven he killed himself.”... — I feel altogether calm again. Walking is so pleasant — and best of all, nobody is compelling me. If I wanted to I could still chuck the whole business.... America.... What do I mean, “whole business”? What is a “whole business”? I wonder whether I’m getting a sunstroke. Oho! — am I so quiet because I still imagine that I don’t have to?... I do have to! I must! No, I will! Can you picture yourself, Gustl, taking off your uniform and beating it, and the damned swine laughing behind your back? And Kopetzsky not even shaking hands with you?... I blush just to think of it. — The watchman is saluting me.... I must acknowledge it.... “Good morning!” There, I’ve said “Good morning” to him!... It always pleases a poor devil like him.... Well, no one ever had to complain about me.... Off duty I was always pleasant.

.. When we were at the manœuvres I let off the officers of the Kompagnie Britannika. One time at drill I heard an enlisted man behind me say something about “the damned drudgery” and I didn’t even report him. — I merely said to him, “See here, be careful — some one else might hear it, and then you’ll be in hot water.”... The Burghof.... Wonder who’s on guard today? — The Bosniacs — they look good. Just recently the Lieutenant Colonel said “When we were down there in ’78, no one would have believed that they’d ever come up to us the way they have.” Good God, that’s a place I’d like to have been! Those fellows are all getting up from the bench. I’ll salute. It’s too bad that our company couldn’t have been there — that would have been so much more wonderful — on the field of battle for the Fatherland, than... Yes, Doctor, you’re getting off easily!... Wonder if someone couldn’t take my place? Great God, there’s an idea — I’ll leave word for Kopetzsky or Wymetal to take my place in the duel!... He won't get off as easily as all that! — Oh well, what difference does it make what happens later on? I'll never hear anything about it! — The trees are beginning to bud.... I once picked up a girl here at the Volksgarten — she was wearing a red dress — lived in the Strozzigasse — later Roschlitz took her off my hands.... I think he still keeps her, but he never says anything about it — probably ashamed of it.... Steffi's still sleeping, I suppose.... She looks so pretty when she's asleep — just as if she couldn't count to five! — Well, they all look alike when they're asleep! — I ought to drop her a line.... Why not? Everyone does it... writes letters just before — I also want to write Clara to console Papa and Mama and the sort of stuff that one writes! — And to Kopetzsky. My Lord, I'll bet it would have been much simpler if I'd said good-bye to a few people... and the announcement to the officers of the regiment. — And the hundred and sixty gulden for Ballert.... Still lots of things to do. Well, nobody insists that I do it at seven.... There's still time enough after eight o'clock for being deceased! Deceased! That's the word — Then there's nothing else that a fellow can do.

Ringstrasse — I'll soon be at my café.... Funny, I'm actually looking forward to breakfast.... Unbelievable. — After breakfast I'll light a cigar, then I'll go home and write.... First of all I'll make my announcement to the officers of the regiment; then the letter to Clara — then the one to Kopetzsky — then the one to Steffi. What on earth am I going to write her?... My dear child, you should probably never have thought... Lord, what nonsense! — My dear child, I thank you ever so much.... — My dear child, before I take my leave, I will not overlook the opportunity.... — Well, letter writing was never my forte.... My dear child, one last farewell from your Gustl.

.. — What eyes she'll make! It's lucky I wasn't in love with her.... It must be sad if one loves a girl and then.... Well, Gustl, let well enough alone: it's sad enough as it is.... Others would have come along after Steffi, and finally there would have been one who'd have been worth something — a young girl from a good, substantial family — it might have been rather nice.... — I must write Clara a detailed letter explaining why I couldn't do otherwise.... You must forgive me, my dear sister, and please console our dear parents. I know that I caused you all a good deal of worry and considerable pain; but believe me, I always loved all of you, and I hope that some time you will be happy, my dear Clara, and will not completely forget your unhappy brother.... — Oh, I'd better not write to her at all!... No, it's too sad. I can already feel the tears in my eyes, when I think.... At least I'll write to Kopetzsky.... A man to man farewell, and he'll let the others know.... — Already six o'clock — Oh no, half past five — quarter to. — If that isn't a charming little face! — The little dear, with her black eyes. I've met her so often in the Florianigasse! — Wonder what she'll say? — And she doesn't even know who I am — she'll only wonder why she doesn't see me any more.... Day before yesterday I made up my mind to speak to her the next time I met her. — She's been flirting enough.... She was so young — but I'll bet no angel at that!... Yes, Gustl! Don't put off till tomorrow what you can do today.... That fellow over there probably hasn't slept all night. — Well, now he'll go home comfortably and lie down. — So will I! — Haha! This is getting serious, Gustl! Well if there weren't a little fear connected with it, there'd be nothing to do at all — and on the whole I must say in behalf of myself that I have been behaving very nobly....

Where'll I go now? There's my café.... They're still sweeping.... Well, I'll go in.

There's the table where they always play Tarok.... Remarkable, I can't imagine why that fellow who's always sitting next to the wall should be the same one who... — Nobody here yet.... Where's the waiter?... Ha! — There's one coming out of the kitchen.... Quickly putting on his apron.... It's really no longer necessary!... Well, it is, for him.... He'll have to wait on other people today. "Good morning, Lieutenant."

"Good morning."

“So early today, Lieutenant?”

“Oh that’s all right, — I haven’t much time, I’ll just sit here with my cloak on.”

“Your order, Sir?”

“A cup of coffee.”

“Thank you — right away, Lieutenant.” Ah, there are the newspapers... are they out as early as this?... Wonder if there’s anything in them about me?... Well what would there be — Think I’ll look and see if there’s anything about my committing suicide! Haha! — Why am I still standing up?... Sit down by the window.... He’s already brought in the coffee. There, I’ll pull the curtain. I feel uncomfortable with people gaping in. But no one is passing by.... Ah, this coffee tastes good — it wasn’t a bad idea, this breakfast!... I feel like a new man. — The whole trouble was that I didn’t eat anything last night. Why has the fellow come back as soon as this? Oh, he’s also brought some rolls....

“Has the Lieutenant already heard?”

“Heard what?” For God’s sake, does he know something about it already?... Nonsense, it’s absolutely impossible!

“Herr Habetswallner—” What, what’s that? That’s the baker’s name.... What’s he going to say now?... Has he been here already? Was he here yesterday telling them the whole story?... Why doesn’t he tell me more?... He’s going to....

“ — had a stroke last night at twelve o’clock.”

“What?”... I mustn’t shout this way.... No, I can’t allow anybody to notice it.... But perhaps I’m dreaming.... I must ask him again....

“Who did you say had a stroke?” — Rather good, that! — I said it quite innocently! —

“The baker, Lieutenant. You must know him.... Don’t you remember the fat fellow who played Tarok with the officers here every afternoon... with Herr Schlesinger? Don’t you remember the one who used to sit opposite Herr Wasner — the one in the artificial flower business!”

I’m completely awake — everything seems to check up — and still I just can’t believe him. — I’ll have to ask him again.... Altogether innocently....

“You say that he was overcome by a stroke?... How did it happen? Who told you about it?”

“Who could know it sooner than we here, Lieutenant? — That roll you are eating there conies from Herr Habetswallner’s own bakery. His delivery man who comes here at half past four in the morning told us about it.”

Look out! I mustn’t give myself away.... I feel like shouting.... I’ll burst out laughing in a minute. In another second I’ll kiss Rudolph.... But I must ask him something else! Having a stroke doesn’t mean that he’s dead.... I must ask him — if he’s dead.... Altogether calmly — why should the baker concern me? — I must glance over the paper while I’m asking the waiter.

“You say he’s dead?”

“Why certainly, Lieutenant, he died immediately.”

Wonderful, wonderful!... It’s all because I went to church....

“He went to the theatre last night. On the way out he fell on the stairs — the janitor heard him fall.... Well, they carried him to his home, and he died long before the doctor ever arrived.”

“That’s sad — too bad. He was still in the prime of life.” I said that marvellously — not a soul would notice.... And I have to do everything to keep from shouting my lungs out and jumping up on the billiard table....

“Yes, Lieutenant, it is very sad. He was such a lovable gentleman; he’s been coming to this place for the last twenty years — he was a good friend of the boss. And his poor wife....”

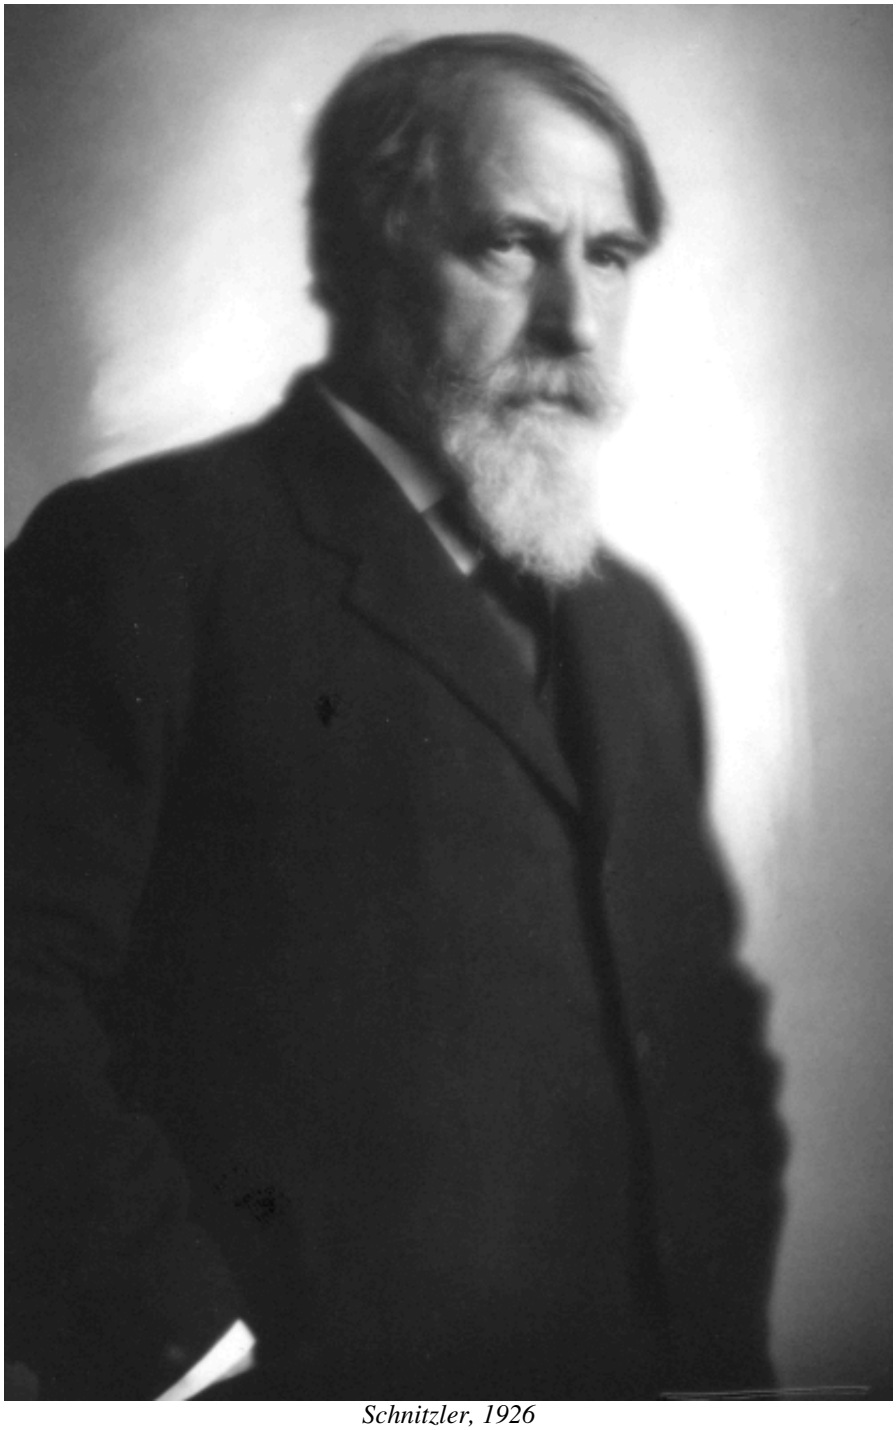
I don’t think I’ve felt as happy as this as long as I’ve lived. He’s dead — dead! Nobody knows about it, and nothing’s happened! — What a piece of luck that I came into the café.... Otherwise I’d certainly have shot myself — it’s like a benediction from heaven.... Where did Rudolph go? Oh, he’s talking to the furnace man.

.. — Well, he’s dead — dead. I just can’t seem to believe it! I’d better go and take a look at him myself. — He was probably overcome by a stroke of anger — couldn’t control himself.... Well, what difference does it make what he was! The main thing is he’s dead, and I can keep on living, and everything’s all right!... Funny, the way I keep on crumbling the roll — the roll Habetswallner baked himself! It tastes very good too, Herr Habetswallner. Splendid! — Ah, now I’ll light a cigar....

“Rudolph! Hey, Rudolph! Don’t argue so much with the furnace man.”

“What is it, Lieutenant?”



“Bring me a cigar.”... — I’m so happy, so happy!... What am I doing?... What am I doing?... Something’s got to happen, or I’ll be overcome by a stroke of joy! In a few minutes I’ll wander over to the barracks and let Johann give me a cold rub-down.... At half past seven we have drill and at half past nine formation. — And I’ll write Steffi to leave this evening open for me! And this afternoon at four.... Just wait, my boy, I’m in wonderful trim.... I’ll knock you to smithereens!

Little Novels (1929)

Translated by Eric Sutton, 1929

CONTENTS

THE FATE OF THE BARON
THE STRANGER
THE GREEK DANCING-GIRL
THE PROPHECY
BLIND GERONIMO AND HIS BROTHER
ANDREAS THAMEYER'S LAST LETTER
EDEGONDA'S DIARY
DEAD GABRIEL
THE MURDERER
THE DEATH OF A BACHELOR

Schnitzler, 1926

THE FATE OF THE BARON

IT WAS ON A MILD EVENING IN MAY THAT KLÄRE Hell made her first reappearance as Queen of the Night. The circumstances that had kept the singer away from the stage for nearly two months were well known. On March 15th the Prince Richard Bedenbruck had been thrown from his horse, and after lingering for a few hours, during which Kläre had not stirred from his side, had died in her arms. Kläre's despair had been so terrible that her friends feared first for her life, then for her reason, and, until lately, for her voice. The last anxiety proved as unfounded as the first two. When she appeared on the stage she was greeted with friendly curiosity, but after the first great aria it was clear that her intimate friends could safely accept the congratulations of her more distant acquaintances. In the gallery the childish face of little Fräulein Fanny Ringeiser could be seen glowing with delight, and the regular opera-goers in the upper tiers smiled knowingly at their little friend. They all knew that Fanny, although she was only the daughter of a shop assistant on the Mariahilferstrasse, belonged to the beloved singer's inner circle, had often been invited to parties at her house and had been secretly in love with the dead Prince. In the interval, Fanny explained to her many male and female friends that Baron von Leisenbohg had suggested to Kläre the idea of choosing the Queen of the Night for her first part — thinking that the dark costume would be most in harmony with her state of mind.

The Baron himself took his usual stall, the corner seat on the gangway in the first row, and acknowledged the greetings of his acquaintances with a cordial, but almost melancholy, smile. Her mind was full of many memories that evening. He had first met Kläre ten years ago. At that time he was making himself responsible for the artistic training of a slim young lady with red hair, and had looked in one evening for a performance at the Eisenstein School of Singing, in which his protégée was making her first public performance as Mignon. On that same evening he saw and heard Kläre who was singing Philine in the same scene. He was then twenty-five years old, independent, and impulsive. He took no further interest in Mignon, made Frau Natalie Eisenstein introduce him to Philine after the performance and told her that his heart, his fortune, and his influence with the management of the Opera were all at her disposal. At that time Kläre was living with her mother, the widow of a higher official in the Post Office, and was in love with a young medical student, with whom she often went to tea in his room out in the Alser district. She rejected the Baron's impetuous proposals, but Leisenbohg's homage inclined her to a more complaisant attitude of mind, and she became the medical student's mistress. She made no secret of this to the Baron, who returned to his red-haired protégée, but pursued his acquaintance with Kläre. On all festivals that gave him any sort of excuse, he sent her presents of flowers and sweets, and from time to time he paid a formal call at the house of the postal official's widow.

In the autumn of that year, Kläre got her first engagement at Detmold. Baron von Leisenbohg, who at that time still had a post under the Government, took advantage of his first Christmas leave to pay Kläre a visit in her new abode. He knew that the medical student had become a doctor and had married in September, and he was tempted to hope once more. But Kläre, with her usual straightforwardness, told the Baron immediately he arrived that she had established tender relations with the tenor at the Court Theatre: thus it befell therefore, that the only memories Leisenbohg could carry away from Detmold were of a platonic stroll in the little public park, and a supper at the theatre restaurant with a few fellow artists of both sexes. In spite of this, he made several more journeys to Detmold, took great pleasure in Kläre's devotion to her art and the unmistakable progress that she made, and, moreover, hoped for better luck next season, for which the tenor was under contract to sing in Hamburg. But that year, too, he was disappointed, as Kläre felt obliged to yield to the solicitations of a Dutch merchant in a large way of business, by the name of Louis Verhajen.

When Kläre, in her third season, was offered an engagement at the Dresden Court Theatre, in spite of his youth the Baron gave up a very promising official career and migrated to Dresden. He spent every evening with Kläre and her mother, who had always known how to maintain the most admirable detachment in all her relations with her daughter, and began to hope again. Unfortunately the Dutchman had the unpleasant habit whenever he wrote of announcing his arrival for the following day, and informing his beloved that she was surrounded by an army of spies, and threatening her with every variety of painful death, if she was not faithful to him. As he never came, and Kläre was gradually getting into an extremely nervous state, Leisenbohg decided to end the business at any cost, and went to Detmold to try to see the man personally. To his amazement, the Dutchman explained that he had sent these passionate and threatening missives purely from a sense of chivalry, and that he would really be exceedingly relieved to be freed from any further responsibility. In high satisfaction Leisenbohg took the train back to Dresden, and informed Kläre of the agreeable outcome of the interview. She thanked him warmly, but avoided the Baron's attempts at tender advances in so decided a manner that he was quite taken aback. After a few brief and searching questions she finally admitted that during his absence no less a person than Prince Kajetan had conceived a violent passion for her and had sworn to do himself an injury if she did not take pity on him. So, of course, she had had at last to give way, to avoid plunging the ruling family and the nation into the most unspeakable grief.

With a heart that showed signs of breaking, Leisenbohg left the city and went back to Vienna. Here he began to pull wires, and it was not a little due to his persistent efforts that Kläre received an offer from the Vienna Opera for the very next year. After a successful tour, she took up her engagement in October, and the Baron's magnificent basket of flowers, that she found on the evening when she first entered her dressingroom, seemed like the expression of an entreaty and a hope. But her generous admirer had once again to endure the experience of having come too late. The fair-haired gentleman who played for her while she had been practising during the last few weeks — he was pretty well known as a song composer — had acquired rights over her which she was bound in honour to respect. Since then seven years had passed. The accompanist had been succeeded by Herr Klemens von Rhodoewyl, the dashing gentleman-jockey; Herr von Rhodoewyl was followed by Vincenz Klaudi, the conductor, who often sang the music of the operas he was conducting, so loudly that the singers could not be heard; after him came the Count von AlbanRattony, who had gambled away his Hungarian estates at cards, but had made up for it by winning a castle in Lower Austria; the next was Herr Edgar Wilhelm, who wrote ballet librettos (for which highly paid composers wrote the music), tragedies produced at his own expense at the Jansch theatre, and poems printed in elegant type in the stupidest kind of Court journal. Herr Wilhelm was succeeded by a gentleman named Amandus Meier, who had nothing to recommend him but his age, which was nineteen, and his appearance, which was charming, and whose sole possession was a fox-terrier that could stand on its head; after Herr Meier came the best dressed man in the kingdom — Prince Richard Bedenbruck.

Kläre had never made any secret of these affairs. Hers was, and continued to be, a simple bourgeois household in which the master changed from time to time. Her public popularity was extraordinary. In higher circles she was looked on with not a little favour for going to Mass every Sunday, confessing twice a month, wearing on her bosom as an amulet a picture of the Madonna blessed by the Pope, and never going to bed without saying her prayers. There were few bazaars at which she was not in charge of a stall, and ladies of the aristocracy, as well as those of Jewish financial circles, were delighted to be able to offer their wares under the same marquee as Kläre. She bestowed fascinating smiles on youthful enthusiasts of both sexes who waited for her by the stage door. She distributed her bouquets among the patient crowd, and once, when she had left the flowers behind her in her dressing-room, she said in that refreshing Viennese of hers that seemed to suit her looks so well: “Oh God, I’ve left the stuff up in my room; come tomorrow afternoon, my dears, if you still want any.” Then she jumped into her carriage, put her head out of the window, and cried as she drove off: “You’ll get some coffee, too!”

Fanny Ringeiser had been one of the few who had had the nerve to accept this invitation. Kläre fell into a chaffing conversation with her, enquired about her family with all the affability of an archduchess, and found the ingenuous and adoring girl’s chatter so much to her liking that she asked her to come again soon. Fanny did so, and it came about that she soon achieved a position of importance in the singer’s household; and she managed to keep it, mainly because, though Kläre was very ready with her confidences, Fanny never fully confided in her in return. In the course of years, Fanny had received a succession of proposals, mostly from the young sons of the Mariahilferstrasse shopkeepers with whom she used to go to dances. But she rejected them all, owing to the fact that she fell, with irrevocable regularity, in love with Kläre’s admirer for the time being.

Kläre had in fact loved Prince Bedenbruck just as faithfully but much more passionately than his predecessors, and Leisenbohg, who in spite of his innumerable disappointments had never given up hope, had begun to be seriously afraid that the happiness he had yearned for these ten long years would never blossom now. Whenever he saw anyone falling out of her favour, he had always discharged his mistress so as to be ready for all contingencies, and at any moment. And he did so after Prince Richard’s sudden death; but, for the first time, more from habit than conviction. For Kläre’s grief seemed so boundless that everyone could not help believing that she had finished for ever with the delights of love. She drove out to the cemetery every day and laid flowers on the grave of the departed. She flung away all her gay clothes and locked up her jewelry in the innermost drawers of her writing-table. Much serious expostulation was needed to dissuade her from leaving the stage for ever.

After her first reappearance, which had gone off so brilliantly, her life, outwardly at any rate, resumed its wonted course. Her original circle of less intimate acquaintances gathered round once more. The music critic, Bernhard Feuerstein, appeared, his coat stained with spinach or tomato, in accordance with what he might have had for lunch, and, to Kläre’s unconcealed delight, abused her fellow artists of both sexes, including the Director himself. She allowed Prince Richard’s two cousins, Lucius and Christian, Bedenbrucks of the other line, to make love to her in their usual light-hearted but respectful way; a gentleman from the French Embassy and a young Czech pianist were brought to see her, and on June 10th she drove to the races again for the first time. But, as Prince Lucius, who had a touch of poetry about him, expressed it, only her soul was awake, her heart was still sunk in slumber. It was true that if one of her younger or older friends ventured the slightest suggestion that there were such things as love and passion in the world, every trace of a smile vanished from her face, she stared darkly in front of her, and from time to time raised her hand in a strange gesture of repulsion which seemed intended to apply to all men, and for ever.

In the latter half of the month of June it so happened that a singer from the north, named Sigurd Oise, sang Tristan at the Opera. His voice was clear and powerful, though it was not really first-rate; he was almost a giant in stature, though inclining towards stoutness, and, in repose, his face was lacking in individual expression; but as soon as he began to sing, his steel-grey eyes flashed with a sort of secret inner light, and his voice and look seemed to reduce everybody, more especially women, to a state of ecstatic admiration.

Kläre sat in the theatre-box with some of her fellow artists who were not singing that night. She alone seemed to remain unmoved. Next morning Sigurd Ölse was introduced to her in the manager’s office. She spoke kindly, but quite coldly about his performance on the previous evening. The same afternoon he called upon her, though she had not invited him to do so. Leisenbohg and Fanny Ringeiser were present and Sigurd drank tea with them. He spoke of his parents who were fisher-folk living in a little Norwegian village, of the marvellous discovery of his talent as a singer by a passing Englishman who had landed from a white yacht in that far-distant fjord; of his wife, an Italian, who had died on the Atlantic Ocean during their honeymoon and who had been buried at sea. After he had taken his departure the others stayed for some time in silence. Fanny stared gravely into her empty tea cup, Kläre sat down at the piano with her elbows on the closed keyboard, while the Baron sank into a silent and anxious meditation as to why, during the account of Sigurd's honeymoon, Kläre had omitted that strange gesture by which, since the Prince's death, she indicated that any suggestion of passion or affection could have no place whatever in her future life.

The next parts that Sigurd Ölse sang were Siegfried and Lohengrin. On each occasion Kläre sat in her box and made no sign. But the singer, whose only other acquaintance was the Norwegian Ambassador, appeared at Kläre's house every afternoon; Fräulein Fanny Ringeiser was usually there, and the Baron von Leisenbohg always.

On June 27th he sang Tristan for the last time. Kläre sat in the theatre-box and made no sign. The next day she drove with Fanny to the cemetery and laid a gigantic cross on the Prince's grave; and in the evening she gave a party in honour of the singer who was to leave Vienna on the morrow.

Her circle of friends was present in full strength. The passion that Sigurd had conceived for Kläre was obvious to everyone; as his custom was, he was voluble and excited. He mentioned incidentally that while on the ship crossing to the Continent an Arabian lady, married to a Russian Grand Duke, had read his hand and prophesied that the immediate future would be the most fateful period in his life. He believed firmly in this prophecy, and, indeed, superstition seemed to him something more than a means of exciting interest. He also said it was generally known that last year, on landing in New York, where he had gone to fulfil an engagement, that every day — that every hour in fact — notwithstanding the enormous fine involved, he boarded a ship for Europe simply because a black cat had walked between his legs on the gangway. He had certainly every reason to believe in the secret connections between such inexplicable omens and the fates of men. One evening at the Covent Garden Theatre in London, before going on the stage he had omitted to repeat a certain magic formula he had received from his grandmother, and his voice had suddenly failed him. One night a winged genius in pink tights had appeared to him in a dream and predicted the death of his favourite barber, and sure enough the unfortunate man was found hanged the next morning. Moreover, he always carried about with him a short but highly significant missive which had been handed to him at a spiritualist séance in Brussels by the spirit of the dead singer, Cornelia Lujan, and contained a prophecy, in fluent Portuguese, that he was destined to become the greatest singer in the Old and New Worlds.

All these experiences he related that evening; and when the spirit letter (written on rose-coloured paper manufactured by Glienwood & Co.) was passed from hand to hand, the effect on the company was profound and universal. Kläre did not move a muscle, but merely nodded indifferently once or twice. In spite of this Leisenbohg's anxiety grew more and more acute. To his penetrating eyes the signs of threatening danger grew ever more ominous. Worst of all, Sigurd, like all Kläre's previous lovers, conceived an extraordinary liking for him during supper, invited him to his house on the Molde-Fjord, and ended by addressing him as "du." Moreover, Fanny trembled all over when Sigurd spoke a word to her, her colour came and went when he looked at her with his great steel-grey eyes, and when he spoke of his approaching departure she burst openly into tears. But Kläre remained perfectly quiet and serious. She barely returned Sigurd's burning glances, she spoke to him no more eagerly than to the rest, and when he at last kissed her hand and then looked up at her with eyes that seemed full of prayers and promises and desperation, her own remained veiled and her expression unmoved. Leisenbohg observed all this with suspicion and anxiety. But when the party came to an end and all the guests departed, something unexpected happened that took the Baron completely by surprise. He was the last of all to take Kläre's hand in farewell, and hurried to depart; but she held his hand fast and whispered: "Come back again." He thought he could not have heard her rightly. But she pressed his hand again, and, with her lips quite close to his ear, repeated, "Come back again; I shall expect you in an hour."

In a state bordering on ecstasy he went out with the rest. He and Fanny accompanied Sigurd to his hotel, and as though from a far distance he heard the tenor raving about Kläre. Then he took Fanny Ringeiser back through the silent streets, in soft cool night air, to Mariahilferstrasse, and he saw, as though through a mist, her girlish cheeks wet with foolish tears. Then he got into a cab and drove up to Kläre's door. He saw the light glimmering through the curtains of her bedroom, he saw her shadow glide past, her head appeared in the gap between the curtain and the window, and she nodded to him. He had not been dreaming: she was waiting for him.

Next morning Baron von Leisenbohg went for a ride in the Prater. He felt young and happy. In the late fulfilment of his passion there seemed to be some deeper meaning. His experience of the past night had been the most marvellous surprise — and yet, again, it was nothing but the climax and the inevitable conclusion of his relations with Kläre hitherto. He now felt that it could not have happened otherwise, and fell to making plans for the immediate and more distant future. "How long will she stay on the stage?" he wondered... "Perhaps for a few years. Then, but not until then, we will get married. We will live together somewhere in the country not far from Vienna, perhaps in St. Veit or in Lainz. I will buy a small house there, or build one to her liking. We shall live a rather retired life, but often take long trips abroad... to Spain, Egypt or India...." Thus he dreamed, as he let his horse canter across the meadows towards the hay-stall. Then he trotted back into the main avenue and got into his carriage at the cross-roads. He told his coachman to stop at Fossatti's and sent Kläre a bouquet of beautiful dark roses. He breakfasted at home alone, as his custom was, in his house on the Schwarzenbergplatz, and when he had finished he lay down on the divan. He was filled with the most fervent longing for Kläre. What meaning had all the other women had for him?... They had served to pass the time, nothing more. And he felt a day would come when Kläre too would say to him: "What were all the others to me? You are the first and only one I ever loved...." And while he lay on the divan with closed eyes, he let the whole succession of them glide past his inner vision. He was sure she had loved none of them before him — perhaps she had loved him always, and in each and all of them!...

The Baron then dressed himself and walked slowly through the familiar streets towards her house, as though to savour their first reunion for a few more seconds. There were a good many people about on the Ring, but still it was observable that the season was coming to an end. And Leisenbohg was glad that summer was there, that he could travel with Kläre and they could see the sea and the mountains together — indeed he had very nearly shouted aloud in his delight.

He stood before her house and looked up at her windows. The light of the afternoon sun was reflected from them and almost blinded him. He walked up the two flights of stairs to her door and rang. No one opened. He rang again. No one opened. Then Leisenbohg noticed that the door was padlocked. What did it mean? Had he made a mistake?... As a matter of fact there was no plate on her door, but opposite was the one he knew so well: "Lt. Colonel von Jeleskowitz."... There could be no doubt: this was her flat and it was shut up. He hurried down the stairs and flung open the door of the porter's lodge. The porter's wife was sitting in the half-darkness on a bed, one child was peering up at the street through the small underground window, the other was blowing an unrecognisable tune on a comb.

"Is Fräulein Hell not at home?" asked the Baron.

The woman stood up. "No, Herr Baron, Fräulein Hell has gone away."

"What!" cried the Baron.... "Oh, yes, of course," he added quickly. "She went about three o'clock, didn't she?"

"No, Herr Baron, about eight o'clock this morning."

"Where did she go?... I mean did she go straight..." he was talking at random... "did she go straight to Dresden?"

"No, Herr Baron; she left no address. She said she would write and say where she was."

"Ah... yes — yes... of course. Thank you very much."

He hurried away and went out into the street: unconsciously he looked back at the house. The evening sunlight shining in those windows looked very different now! And the sultry summer evening lay like a pall of oppression over the city. Kläre had gone?

... Why?... Had she fled from him? What did it mean?... His first thought was to go to the Opera House. But it occurred to him that the vacation began the day after to-morrow, and that Kläre was not singing the last two days. Then he went to 76 Mariahilferstrasse where the Ringeisers lived. An elderly cook opened the door to him and looked at the well-dressed visitor with a certain mistrust. He asked her to call Frau Ringeiser.

"Is Fräulein Fanny at home?" he asked in a tone of excitement that he could no longer control.

"I beg your pardon?" said Frau Ringeiser sharply.

He introduced himself.

"Ah, of course," said Frau Ringeiser. "Please come in, Herr Baron."

He remained standing in the hall and asked once more:

"Is Fräulein Fanny not at home?"

"But the Herr Baron must come in." Leisenbohg had to follow her, and found himself in a dark low-ceilinged room with furniture covered in blue velvet and rep window curtains of the same colour. "No," said Frau Ringeiser, "Fanny is not at home. Fräulein Hell has taken her away for a holiday trip."

"Where?" asked the Baron, and stared at a photograph of Kläre that stood on the piano in a gold frame.

"I don't know where," said Frau Ringeiser. "Fräulein Hell was here at eight o'clock this morning and begged me to let Fanny go with her.... And she begged so nicely that I could not say No."

"But where have they gone — where have they gone?" persisted Leisenbohg.

"That I can't tell you. Fanny is going to telegraph as soon as Fräulein Hell has made up her mind where she is going to stay. Perhaps to-morrow or the day after."

"Ah," said Leisenbohg, and dropped on to a kind of cane stool in front of the piano. He was silent for a few moments, then he suddenly stood up, shook hands with Frau Ringeiser, asked her to excuse him for having disturbed her, and went slowly down the dark staircase of the old house.

He shook his head. She had indeed been careful... more careful than was necessary.... She might have known that he would not come where he was not wanted.

"Where to now, Herr Baron?" asked the coachman, and Leisenbohg realised that he had been sitting in the open carriage, staring in front of him, for some minutes. And, following a sudden instinct, he answered: "Hotel Bristol."

Sigurd Ölse had not yet gone. He invited the Baron up to his rooms, greeted him eagerly and asked him to spend the last evening in Vienna in his company. Leisenbohg was much struck by the fact that Sigurd Ölse was still actually in Vienna, and the singer's friendliness positively stirred him to tears. Sigurd began at once to talk about Kläre. He asked Leisenbohg to tell him all he knew about her — he knew that the Baron was her oldest and most faithful friend. So Leisenbohg sat down on one of his host's trunks and began to speak of Kläre. It did him good to be able to talk about her. He told the singer almost everything, except such matters as he felt bound in honour not to mention. Sigurd listened and appeared enraptured.

At supper the singer invited his friend to leave Vienna with him that very evening, and go with him to his estate near Molde. The Baron felt wonderfully comforted. He excused himself for the time being, but promised Ölse to visit him in the course of the summer.

They drove to the station together. "You will take me for a simpleton," said Sigurd, "but I want to pass her window once again."

Leisenbohg threw a sidelong glance at him. Was this perhaps an attempt to make a fool of him, or was it a final proof of the singer's honesty?... As they went by Kläre's house, Sigurd flung a kiss at the closed windows. Then he said: "Say good-bye for me once more."

Leisenbohg nodded. "I will give her your message when she comes back."

Sigurd looked at him in amazement.

"As a matter of fact she has gone away," Leisenbohg continued. "She went off early this morning — without a word to anyone. It is a habit of hers," he added, untruthfully.

"Gone away?" repeated Sigurd, and sank into thought.

Then they were both silent.

Before the departure of the train they embraced like old friends.

That night the Baron wept as he lay in bed, more bitterly than he had done since his childhood. The hour of delight that he had spent with Kläre seemed to him beset by gloom and terror. There had been, he thought, a gleam of madness in her eyes last night. Now he understood. He had obeyed her summons too soon. The shadow of Prince Bedenbruck still had power over her, and Leisenbohg felt that he had possessed Kläre only to lose her for ever.

He wandered about Vienna for a few days without knowing what to do with his days and nights: everything that used to occupy his time — the newspapers, bridge and riding, had become completely indifferent to him. He realised that the meaning of his whole existence depended on Kläre, and even that his relations with other women had their being only as reflections of his passion for her. An eternal grey mist seemed to hang over the city; the people to whom he spoke had hushed voices and stared at him in a strange, almost treacherous way. One evening he drove to the station and almost mechanically took a ticket to Ischl. There he met acquaintances who asked him unsuspectingly for news of Kläre; he answered in an irritable and offensive tone, and had to fight a duel with one man who did not interest him in the least. He went nonchalantly into the field, heard the bullet whistle past his ear, fired in the air and left Ischl half an hour afterwards. He travelled to Tyrol, the Engadine and the Bernese Oberland, and to Lake Geneva, swam, crossed mountain passes, climbed mountains, and remembered nothing from one day to the next.

One day he received a telegram that had been sent on from Vienna. He opened it with feverish fingers. In it were these words: "If you are my friend, keep your word and come to me quickly, for I need a friend. Sigurd Ölse." Leisenbohg did not doubt for a moment that the contents of this telegram must have some sort of connection with Kläre. He packed as quickly as possible and left Aix, where he then happened to be, at the earliest opportunity. He travelled straight through to Hamburg via Munich, and took the boat via Stavanger to Molde, where he arrived on a fine summer evening. The journey had seemed interminable, and the beauties of the scenery had left him quite unmoved. Moreover, latterly he had not been able to remember Kläre's voice when she sang, or even her features. It seemed like a year, ten years, since he had left Vienna. But when he saw Sigurd standing on the shore in a white flannel suit and white cap, he felt as though he had seen him only the evening before. And, dishevelled as he was, he smilingly returned Sigurd's greeting from where he was standing on the deck, and walked cheerfully down the gangway.

"I thank you a thousand times for coming so promptly," said Sigurd; and then he added simply: "I'm done for."

The Baron eyed him. Sigurd looked very pale and the hair on his temples had grown astonishingly grey. Over his arm he was carrying a green rug of dimly iridescent material.

"What is it? What has happened?" asked Leisenbohg with a fixed smile.

"I will tell you the whole story," said Sigurd Ölse. It struck the Baron that Sigurd's voice was less resonant than it had been. They drove in a small carriage along the lovely avenue along the shore of the blue sea. Both were silent. Leisenbohg did not dare to ask a question. He stared vacantly at the water which was almost motionless. The strange and (as it proved) impossible idea of counting the ripples came into his mind; then he looked up into the sky and it seemed as though the stars were dropping slowly down to earth. At last it also occurred to him that a singer, by name Kläre Hell, was wandering somewhere about in the wide world — a fact which did not matter much. Then the carriage stopped with a jerk before a simple white house entirely surrounded by trees and foliage. In the evening they dined upon a verandah that looked out upon the sea. A servant with a stern, and, as he poured out the wine, almost a menacing expression, waited on them. The distant horizon slept under the clear northern light.

"Well?" asked Leisenbohg, in a sudden burst of impatience.

"I am a lost man," said Sigurd Ölse, and stared in front of him.

"What do you mean by that?" asked Leisenbohg in a toneless voice, 'and what can I do for you? "he added mechanically.

"Not much. I don't know yet," and he looked beyond the tablecloth, the balustrade, the garden and the garden fence, the road, and the sea into the far distance.

Leisenbohg felt numb within him... all manner of notions flashed across his mind... what was going to happen?... was Kläre dead?... had Sigurd murdered her?... thrown her into the sea?... Or was Sigurd dead?... No, that was impossible — there he was sitting opposite.... But why didn't he speak?... and suddenly, in an access of terror, Leisenbohg burst out, "Where is Kläre?"

The singer turned slowly towards him. His rather fleshy face began to light up with a sort of inner glow and seemed to smile, unless it was the moonlight playing over it. In any case, at that moment, it seemed to Leisenbohg that the man sitting near him leaning back in his chair with his hands in his pockets and his legs outstretched under the table, and gazing at him with veiled eyes, looked exactly like a Pierrot. The green shawl hung down over the balustrade of the verandah and at that moment seemed to the Baron so like an old acquaintance.... But what on earth had this ridiculous old shawl to do with him? Was he dreaming perhaps?... he was in Molde; it was all very strange; if he had been sensible he ought really to have telegraphed to the singer from Aix: "What is the matter? What do you want me to do for you, Pierrot?" And he suddenly repeated his earlier question only in a much politer and calmer tone: "Where is Kläre?"

The singer nodded several times. "Yes," he said, "it is something to do with her, of course. Are you a friend of mine?"

Leisenbohg nodded, he felt slightly chilly; a light wind was blowing in from the sea. "I am your friend.

What do you want of me?"

"Do you remember the evening I left Vienna, Baron, when we had supper together at the Bristol, and you went with me to the station?"

Leisenbohg nodded once more.

"You had no idea, of course, that Kläre Hell was leaving Vienna in that same train?"

Leisenbohg let his head sink heavily on his chest....

"Nor had I," went on Sigurd. "I saw Kläre for the first time next morning at the station where we stopped for breakfast. She was sitting with Fanny Ringeiser in the dining-room drinking coffee. Her demeanour led me to suppose that this meeting was a fortunate accident. It was not an accident at all."

"Go on," said the Baron, looking at the green shawl which was moving slightly.

"Later on, of course, she confessed that it was not an accident. From that morning we all stayed together, Kläre, Fanny and I. We settled down by one of your enchanting little Austrian lakes, in a charming house between the shore and the forest, quite by ourselves. We were very happy."

He spoke so slowly that Leisenbohg thought he was going mad.

"Why did he send for me?" he thought. "What does he want of me? Had she confessed? What's the matter with him? Why is he staring at me like that?... Why am I sitting here at Molde on a verandah with a Pierrot? Can it be all a dream after all? Perhaps I am still asleep in Kläre's arms. Perhaps that night of ours has not yet ended after all."... And he unconsciously opened his eyes wide.

"Will you avenge me?" said Sigurd, suddenly.

"Avenge you? Whatever for? What has happened?" asked the Baron, and his words sounded as if they came from a distance.

"Because she has destroyed me, and I am a lost man."

"Tell me all about it," said Leisenbohg in a hard, dry voice.

"Fanny Ringeiser was with us," Sigurd went on. "She is a good girl, isn't she?"

"Yes, she is a good girl," answered Leisenbohg, and all at once he saw a dim room with furniture covered in blue velvet and rep curtains where, several hundred years before, he had spoken to Fanny's mother.

"She is rather a stupid girl, is she not?"

"I believe she is," answered the Baron.

"I am sure of it," answered Sigurd. "She did not realise how happy we were." And he was silent for some while.

"Go on," said Leisenbohg, and waited.

"One morning Kläre was still asleep," began Sigurd afresh. "She always slept late into the morning. But I had gone for a walk into the forest. Suddenly Fanny came running up behind me: 'Fly, Herr Ölse, before it is too late; leave this place, for you are in dreadful danger!' Strangely enough, to begin with she absolutely refused to say any more. But I persisted and at last found out what kind of danger it was that she believed to be threatening me. You see, she believed that I could still be saved or she would certainly have told me nothing!"

The green shawl on the balustrade bellied out like a sail, and the lamp flickered a little on the table.

"What did Fanny tell you?" asked Leisenbohg in a rasping tone.

"Do you remember the evening," asked Sigurd, "when we were all at Kläre's house? On the next day Kläre drove out with Fanny to the cemetery, and on the Prince's grave she confided the dreadful secret to her friend."

"The dreadful secret...?" stammered the Baron.

“Yes. You know how the Prince died? He was thrown from his horse and lingered for an hour.”

“I know.”

“Nobody was with him but Kläre.”

“That also I know.”

“He would see no one but her, and on his deathbed he uttered a curse.”

“A curse?”

“A curse. ‘Kläre,’ said the Prince, ‘do not forget me. I shall have no peace in the grave if you forget me.’— ‘I will never forget you,’ replied Kläre. ‘Do you swear you will never forget me?’— ‘I swear it.’— ‘Kläre, I love you and I must die!’”

“Who is it speaking?” cried the Baron.

“I am,” said Sigurd; “I am telling you what Fanny said; Fanny told me what Kläre said, and Kläre told her what the Prince said. Don’t you understand?”

Leisenbohg listened with strained attention: it seemed as though he could hear the voice of the dead Prince ringing out from the triply-sealed coffin into the night.

“‘Kläre, I love you, and I must die! You are so young, and I must die.... And after me another man will come.... I know it will be so, another man will hold you in his arms and be happy with you... he must not be — he shall not be — I lay my curse on him, do you hear, Kläre? I curse him! — The first man that kisses those lips and holds that body in his arms when I am gone shall go down to hell! Kläre, Heaven hears the curses of dying men. Beware — and let him beware; he shall go down to hell in madness, misery and death! Woe be to that man — woe!’”

Sigurd, from whose mouth the dead man’s voice thundered out, had got up from his chair and stood, a tall heavy figure in his white flannel suit, staring into the clear night. The green shawl slipped down from the balustrade into the garden. An icy chill came over the Baron; he felt as though his whole body was growing stiff; he would gladly have cried out, but though he opened his mouth wide no sound came... in a flash he was back again in Frau Eisenstein, the singing teacher’s, little room where he had seen Kläre for the first time. On the stage stood a Pierrot, and shouted out: ‘With this curse on his lips Prince Bedenbruck died, and the unhappy man in whose arms she lay, the wretch upon whom the curse must be fulfilled, is I — I!’”

Then the stage collapsed with a loud crash and sank before Leisenbohg’s eyes into the sea. But he, without a word, fell backwards with his chair, like a marionette.

Sigurd leapt up and shouted for help. Two servants came, picked up the unconscious man and laid him out in an armchair that stood beside the table; one of them went for a doctor, and the other brought some water and vinegar. Sigurd rubbed the Baron’s forehead and temples, but he did not stir. Then the doctor came and began his examination. It did not last long. When he had finished he said: “This gentleman is dead.”

Sigurd Ölse was much upset, asked the doctor to make the necessary arrangements and left the verandah. He walked through the drawing-room, went upstairs, entered his bedroom, lit a lamp and hurriedly wrote the following words: “Kläre! I found your telegram waiting for me in Molde where I had fled without stopping on the way. I will confess that I did not believe you; I thought that you were trying to set my mind at rest by a lie. Forgive me; I no longer doubt you. Baron von Leisenbohg has been here. I asked him to come, but I did not question him because as an honourable man he would have had to lie. I had an ingenious idea. I told him about the dead Prince’s curse. The effect was amazing. The Baron fell backwards as he sat, and died on the spot.”

Sigurd paused for a moment, looked very serious and seemed to be reflecting. Then he took up his stand in the middle of the room and began to sing. At first his voice sounded timid and subdued, but gradually it grew clearer and rang out strong and splendid into the night — so powerfully at last that it seemed full of the thunder of the sea. A satisfied smile spread over Sigurd's features and he breathed a deep sigh of relief. Once more he sat down at the writing-table, and added the following words to his letter: "Darling Kläre! Forgive me — all is well again. I shall be with you in three days...

THE STRANGER

WHEN ALBERT AWOKE AT SIX O'CLOCK IN THE morning the bed beside him was empty and his wife was gone. On the small table lay a note in her handwriting. Albert reached out for it and read the following words: "My dear, I woke up earlier than you. Good-bye. I am going. Whether I shall ever come back I do not know. Farewell. Katherina."

Albert let the note drop on to the white coverlet and shook his head. Whether she came back to-day or not — it did not really matter. Neither the tone nor the contents of the letter surprised him. It had merely come a little earlier than he expected. His happiness had lasted just a fortnight. Well, he was ready.

Slowly he got out of bed, put on his dressing gown, walked across to the window and opened it. The city of Innsbruck lay at his feet in the peaceful still morning light, and far away a confusion of rocky heights towered up into the blue light. Albert folded his arms and stared into the distance. He reflected that full foreknowledge, and even a set determination, did not lighten the burden of man's fate, though they made it easier to face. He hesitated for a while. And yet what had he to wait for now? Would it not be best to make an end at once? Was not the curiosity that tortured him a betrayal of his resolution? His fate must be fulfilled. It had been decided two long years ago at a dance when he felt the breath of her mysterious lips brush past his cheeks.

He remembered how that night he had gone back home with his friend Vincent. He must think of everything that Vincent then had told him; and the gentle tones of that long-distant warning rang once more in his ears. Vincent knew all sorts of things about Katherina and her family. The father had been colonel of an artillery regiment, ennobled during the Bosnian campaign, and had fallen by a rebel's bullet. Her brother had been a lieutenant of cavalry, and had quickly gone through his inheritance; later on the mother had sacrificed her whole fortune to save her son from disaster; but this did not serve him for long, and soon after the young officer shot himself.

About that time a Baron Maasburg, who passed for Katherina's betrothed, began his visits to the house.

This was attributed not merely to the poor circumstances of the family, which then came to light, but also to a remarkable scene that had taken place during the funeral. Katherina had fallen sobbing into the arms of a brother officer of the dead youth whom she did not know, just as though he had been a friend of hers, or her fiancé. A year later she was seized by violent infatuation for the organist Banetti. He left Vienna before she had ever spoken to him. One morning she told her mother that she had dreamt that Banetti had come into her room, played a fugue of Bach on the piano, then fallen backwards on to the floor, dead, while the ceiling opened and the piano floated up to Heaven. On the very same day they heard that Banetti had thrown himself from the church tower of a little Lombard town, into the graveyard, and was found dead lying at the foot of a cross.

Soon afterwards Katherina began to show signs of melancholia, which gradually increased to a state of utter prostration; only her mother's insistent opposition and her firm faith in Katherina's recovery prevented the doctor from sending her to an institution. For a whole year Katherina spent the daytime alone and in silence; but at night she sometimes got out of bed and sang simple songs as she used to do. Gradually, and to the doctor's great astonishment, she awoke out of her melancholy. She seemed to have come back to life, and even to pleasure. Soon she began to accept invitations, at first only among a few friends; then the circle of her acquaintance began to widen, and when Albert got to know her at the White Cross Ball she seemed to him so particularly self-possessed that he hardly felt able to believe his friend's stories on their way home.

Albert von Webeling, who had not previously gone about the world much, found it quite easy, thanks to the reputation of his family, and his position as Under-Secretary in a Ministry, to get admittance to Katherina's circle. Every meeting deepened his attraction to her. Katherina had quite a simple way with her, but her height, and more especially her characteristic — almost queenly — way of inclining her head when she listened to anyone, gave her a distinction all her own. She did not say much, and when she was in company her eyes often seemed as though they were looking into a distance that others could not reach. She treated younger men with a certain indifference, and much preferred to talk to older men of rank or reputation. And when another year had passed after she had made Albert's acquaintance, rumour betrothed her to a Count Rummingshaus who had just come back from a journey of exploration in Thibet and Turkestan. Then Albert knew that the day on which Katherina gave another man her hand in marriage would be the last day of his life, and he, whose existence had flowed so peacefully for thirty years, at one stroke became acquainted with all the perils and the madness into which a violent passion can drive the most cautious of men. He was utterly convinced of his unworthiness of Katherina. He had a moderate income and could have lived a very comfortable life as a bachelor, but he could not expect wealth from either side of his family. A secure, but certainly not a very significant, career stood before him. He dressed with the greatest care, without ever looking really smart, talked with a certain cleverness, though he never had anything special to say, and everyone was glad, though not overjoyed, to see him. And so he felt that a creature like Katherina, mysterious and seemingly from another world, would have to demean herself far if he were to win her, and that in any case it was her privilege to make him pay highly for a happiness that he did not deserve. But as he was ready to make any sacrifice, he gradually began to think he was growing worthy of her. One morning he heard that the Count had gone away to Galicia without having declared himself, and with a determination that was quite unlike his usual self he considered the right moment had come, and went off to see Katherina.

How far away that hour seemed now!

He saw before him the long low-vaulted room on the Schottenhof, with its old well-polished furniture; he saw the solitary dark red armchair standing in the window; the piano with some music above the open keyboard; the round mahogany table and on it the album bound in mother-of-pearl and the card tray of Alt-Meissner porcelain. And he remembered how he had looked down into the broad square which was just then full of people coming out of the Palm Sunday Mass in the Schotten Church opposite. While the bells were ringing, Katherina and her mother came out of the next room and were not so astonished at his visit as he really expected. She listened to him kindly and accepted his proposal without much emotion, as though he had come to invite her to a ball. The mother, wearing the continuously benevolent smile of those hard of hearing, sat silent in the corner of the sofa, and from time to time raised her small black silk fan to her ear. During the whole conversation in that cool room, so full of sunlit quiet, Albert had the sensation that he had come to a place that for a long time had been ravaged by violent storms, and now breathed a great longing for peace. And when, later on, he walked down the grey staircase, he had no blissful sensation of a desire fulfilled, but merely the consciousness that he had entered upon a wonderful, indeed, but uncertain and dark epoch of his existence. And, as on that Sunday morning, he wandered from street to street, through gardens and avenues, with the sky of spring above him, and so many gay and careless people passed him by, he felt that thenceforward he belonged to them no more, that a destiny of another and a stranger kind had begun to rule him.

Every evening he had sat up there in that vaulted room. Sometimes Katherina would sing in a pleasant but almost wholly expressionless voice, simple, mostly Italian, folk-songs, which he accompanied on the piano.

Then he would often stand with her at the window until late in the evening looking down into the quiet square, where the trees were growing green and beginning to blossom. On fine afternoons he constantly met her in the Belvedere garden: she had usually been sitting there for some time, watching the children play. When she saw him coming she would get up, and then they walked together up and down the sunny gravel paths. In the early days he often told her about his former life, his boyhood in his parents' house at Gratz, his student days in Vienna, his holidays in the summer, and as he searched his memory he was only surprised how shadowy and formless his earlier life now seemed. Perhaps this was partly because Katherina did not show the slightest interest in all these things.

Strange things happened, that might be without importance, but at any rate were never explained. One day, for instance, about noon, Albert met his betrothed on the Stephansplatz in the company of an elegant gentleman dressed in mourning, whom he had never seen before. Albert stopped short, but Katherina greeted him coolly, and without more ado walked on with the strange man. Albert followed her for a little, the gentleman got into a carriage that was waiting for him at a street corner and drove off. Katherina went home. When Albert asked her that evening who the man was, she looked at him with astonishment, uttered a Polish name he had never heard before and departed to her own room for the rest of the evening. Another time, one evening, she kept him waiting and waiting and never came. At last she appeared, as ten o'clock was striking, with a bunch of wild flowers in hand, and told him she had been into the country and gone to sleep in a field. She threw the flowers out of the window. Once she went to the Künstlerhaus with Albert and stood with him for a long time in front of a picture representing a green hilly landscape with white clouds above it. A few days afterward she talked about the place, as though she had really wandered over those hills as a child and in the company of her dead brother. Albert at first thought she was not serious, but he gradually noticed that the picture had become for her a living part of her experience; and then he knew that his surprise was beginning to change into feelings of grief and horror. But as the essence of her slipped further from his grasp, the more despairingly insistent his desire cried out for her.

Sometimes he succeeded in making her speak of her youth. But all she described to him — stories of real events and confessions of far-off dreams — seemed to hover in the same dim radiance, so that Albert did not know who or what had most vividly impressed her: the organist who had thrown himself down from the church tower, the young Duke of Modena who had once ridden past her in the Prater, or a youth by Van Dyck whose picture she had seen as a girl in the Liechtenstein Gallery. And in that half-light of her being she seemed still to be reaching after unknown or uncertain purposes, and Albert suspected that he meant no more to her than someone who might offer her his arm for a turn round the room at a reception. And as he made every effort to extricate her from this hazy sort of existence, he began at last to feel that the narcotic breath of her personality had cast a spell on him; he was gradually thinking in her fashion, and even behaving as she did; he was beginning to deny the plain necessities of daily life.

It began by his buying things for their future housekeeping that far exceeded his means; and he sent his betrothed costly jewels. The day before his wedding he bought a small house in a garden suburb which had taken his fancy as he walked past it one day, and the same evening he gave her a gift of a deed transferring it to her absolute possession. But she took it all with the same friendliness and composure with which she had accepted his hand. She certainly thought him richer than he was. At the outset he had of course intended to talk to her about his financial position. He put it off from day to day because the words would not come; but finally the time arrived when he realised that any discussion of such matters was unnecessary. For when she spoke about her future, she did not do so like one who sees an appointed road leading into the distance: she did so as though all possibilities would be open to her then as before, and nothing in her behaviour suggested any inward or outward obligation. So one day Albert knew that a happiness uncertain and short lay before him, but he also knew that what might happen to him when Katherina had disappeared would be devoid of any meaning. For an existence without her had become completely unthinkable for him, and it was his firm intention simply to leave the world as soon as he lost Katherina. In this certainty he found his only foothold in this time of confusion and desire, but it served him well.

On the morning when Albert fetched Katherina for the wedding, she was just as strange to him as on the evening when he had first got to know her. She became his without passion and without resistance. They travelled together in the mountains. They drove through summer-like valleys that broadened and then grew narrow; they walked on the sunny shores of rippling lakes and wandered on forgotten paths through whispering woodlands. They stood at many a window, looked down on to the silent streets of magic cities, and gazed beyond them along mysterious rivers towards the silent mountains over which pale clouds dissolved in mist. And they talked about the daily affairs of life like any other young couple, walked arm in arm, lingered in front of buildings and shop windows, made plans, smiled, clinked brimming glasses, and sank — cheek upon cheek — into happy sleep. But time and time again she left him, in some half-lit hotel dining-room that glimmered with all the horror of the unknown, or on some stone bench in a garden among people who were enjoying the fragrance of a lovely day, or in some lofty hall in front of the blackened portrait of a knight or a Madonna; and he never knew when she would come back, or whether she would come back at all. For, insistent and inevitable as the beating of his heart, was the feeling within him that nothing had changed since the first day, that she was as free as ever, while he was dedicated to her.

Thus it was that her disappearance early that morning after a fortnight's honeymoon and her strange letter had only shaken him; they had not really surprised him. To search for her would, he thought, be degrading to both of them. Who or whatever had taken her from him — a caprice, a dream, or a living person — was utterly indifferent to him. All he knew and all he needed to know was that she was no longer his. Perhaps it was really for the best that the inevitable had come so early. His fortune had been reduced to next to nothing by his purchase of the house, and they could not both live on his small salary. It would have been quite impossible for him to talk to her about economies and the ordinary cares of daily life. For an instant it flashed through his mind that he would leave her. His gaze fell on the coverlet on which lay her note. A fleeting idea came to him to write a brief word of explanation on the blank side of the paper. But he was perfectly well aware that such a message could have not the slightest interest for Katherina, and he dismissed the notion. He opened his valise, put his small revolver in his pocket, and decided to wander somewhere outside the city, and there, with decency and without inconvenience to anyone, accomplish his deed.

The clear dark-blue light of a hot morning of summer, come before its time, lay upon the city. Albert went straight out. He was scarcely a hundred yards from the hotel when he saw Katherina's figure in front of him. She held her grey silk parasol in her hand and was walking slowly along the street. Albert's first impulse was to turn off into another street, but a power that was stronger than all his resolutions and reflections forced him to follow her so as to make certain of what, a minute before, he believed he could face with indifference. He actually felt rather afraid that she might turn and discover him. She took the road to the Hof garden, and he kept himself at a careful distance. She had soon reached the Hof Church, the door of which stood open. She went in. Albert followed her after a few moments. He remained standing near the entrance in deep shadow. He watched Katherina walking slowly down the middle aisle between the dark statues of the heroes and queens. Suddenly she stopped. Albert moved from where he had been standing and slipped into a niche behind the great cenotaph of the emperor Maximilian that towers up in the centre of the Church. Katherina stood motionless before the statue of Theodoric. With his left arm supported on his sword, the bronze hero gazed before him with eyes that seemed eternal. His attitude was one of royal weariness as though he were conscious at once of the greatness and the futility of his deeds, and as though all his pride were sinking into sadness.

Katherina stood before the statue and looked steadfastly into the face of the King of the Goths. Albert stayed a little while in his concealment, then he ventured forth. She must have heard his footsteps but she did not turn; she stood where she was as though spell-bound. People came into the church, foreigners with red guide books, and stood talking near her and behind her; she did not hear. Then for a time the place was quieter, but Katherina stood as before, herself like a statue in her immobility. Another quarter of an hour, and another, passed. Katherina did not stir.

Albert went. At the doorway he turned once more: and then he saw that Katherina had gone up to the statue and was touching the bronze foot with her lips. Albert hurried away, smiling. An idea came to him that seemed to stir his heart, and made him glad. He had something more to do for his beloved before he went away. He made his way to an art shop in the Bahnhofstrasse: there he enquired whether a naturalsized bronze reproduction of the Theodoric could be made. As accident would have it, just such a one had been finished a month before: the English lord who had ordered it was dead and his heirs refused to take it. Albert asked the price. It was a sum just about equalling the remainder of his fortune. Albert gave his Vienna address with exact instructions that a reliable agent of the firm was to be sent to superintend its erection in the garden of his villa. Then he departed, hurried through the city, took the road through the suburb of Wilten towards Igls, and shot himself in a small wood, just as the sun had reached the zenith.

Katherina did not return to Vienna until a few weeks after this occurrence. In the meantime Albert had been laid away in the family vault at Gratz. On the evening of her arrival Katherina stood for a while in the garden in front of the statue, which had been admirably placed under some tall trees. Then she went to her room and wrote a long letter to Verona, Poste Restante, to one Andrea Geraldini. Such (so he said) was the name of a gentleman who had followed her from the Hof Church when she left Theodoric the Great, and whose child she bore under her heart. Whether it was his right name she never knew; for she received no answer.

THE GREEK DANCING-GIRL

PEOPLE MAY SAY WHAT THEY LIKE: I DON'T BELIEVE that Frau Mathilde Samodeski died of heart failure; I know better. And I am not going inside the house from which they are to carry her out to-day to the rest for which she longed: I have no wish to see the man who knows as well as I do why she died, to shake his hand and say nothing.

I shall take another road: it means a long walk, but the autumn day is fine and still, and it does me good to be alone. I shall soon be standing by the garden-fence behind which I saw Mathilde for the last time in the spring. The shutters of the villa will all be closed, red leaves will be lying on the gravel path, and somewhere I shall see the glitter of white marble through the trees — the marble out of which the Greek dancing-girl was chiselled.

That evening is much in my mind to-day. It seems now almost like a dispensation that I decided at the last moment to accept the Wartenheimers' invitation, as in the course of the year I had so entirely lost my taste for social activities. Perhaps it was the warm breeze that came down of an evening from the hills into the city, and tempted me into the country. Besides, it was to be an open-air party, a house-warming for the Wartenheimers' villa, and I did not need to fear that it would be any sort of formal function. It is also strange that as I drove out of town I scarcely thought of the possibility of meeting Frau Mathilde, although I knew that Herr von Wartenheimer had bought the Greek dancing-girl from Samodeski for his villa; and I also knew that Frau von Wartenheimer had fallen in love with the sculptor, as indeed most women did.

But apart from this, I might well have thought about Mathilde, for, in the times of her girlhood, I had spent many charming hours in her company. There was more especially a summer on Lake Geneva, seven years ago, exactly a year before her engagement, that I shall not easily forget. It seems, indeed, as if, in spite of my grey hairs, I must have imagined many things, for when she married Samodeski a year later I felt a certain disappointment and was entirely convinced — or actually hoped — that she would not be happy with him. I did not see Mathilde again until the party given by Gregor Samodeski, soon after his return from the honeymoon, in his studio on the Gusshausgasse — it was an amusing affair at which all the guests had to appear in Japanese or Chinese costumes. She greeted me quite unaffectedly, and her whole demeanour gave the impression of repose and cheerfulness. But later on, while she was in conversation with others, I more than once caught a strange expression in her eyes, and after a little reflection I clearly understood its meaning. It said: "My dear friend, you think that he married me for my money, you think he does not love me, you think I am not happy — but you are wrong. You are utterly and entirely wrong. Look how gay I am and how my eyes are shining."

I met her a few times after that, but they were only casual meetings. I once ran across her on a journey: I dined with her and her husband in a station restaurant and he told me all sorts of entertaining stories which did not really make me laugh. I spoke to her once in a theatre — she was then with her mother who is really even more beautiful than she is.... God knows where Herr Samodeski was on that occasion. And last winter I saw her on the Prater: it was a clear, cold winter day. She was walking with her little girl over the snow under the bare chestnut trees. The carriage was following slowly. I happened to be on the other side of the road, and I did not cross it. Probably I was thinking about other matters, and I was no longer particularly interested in Mathilde. And to-day I should very likely not be thinking about her and her sudden death, had it not been for that last encounter at the Wartenheimers'. I recall that evening now with a strange and even painful clarity, just like those old days on Lake Geneva.

It was getting dark when I got to the house. The guests were strolling about the paths. I greeted my host and a few acquaintances. From somewhere came the sound of music from a small chamber orchestra, concealed behind the trees. I soon came upon a small pool, backed by a semi-circle of tall trees; in the centre of it, on a dark pedestal, so that she seemed poised above the water, gleamed the Greek dancing girl: she was, too, rather theatrically lit up by electric rays from the house. I remembered the sensation it had made in the Secession Exhibit the year before: I must confess it even made an impression on me, though I greatly dislike Samodeski, and though I have a strange feeling that it is not really he who creates the beautiful things that he somehow manages to produce, but something else that is within him, some inexplicable, blazing, even daemonic force, that will quite certainly be extinguished when he is no longer young and loved. I believe there are a great many artists of this kind, and for some time this circumstance has filled me with a certain satisfaction.

I met Mathilde near the pool. She was walking on the arm of a young man who looked like a Korps student, and introduced himself as a connection of the house. The three of us fell into a pleasant conversation and strolled up and down the garden, which now began to be lit up with flickering fairy-lights. The lady of the house approached us on the arm of Samodeski. We all stood for a while, and, to my own astonishment, I said a few very appreciative words to the sculptor about his Greek dancing-girl. I was really not responsible for what I said: there was a genial, cheerful atmosphere about, as often happens on such an evening in spring. People who otherwise regard each other with complete indifference are found exchanging the heartiest greetings, and others who are already conscious of a certain bond of sympathy are moved to pour out their hearts in confidences. For instance, when I sat down on a bench and lit a cigarette, a gentleman came up to me whom I only knew very slightly, and who suddenly began to sing the praises of people who make so agreeable a use of their wealth as our hosts. I was entirely of his opinion, although I generally regard Herr von Wartenheimer as a complete and utter snob. I then began, quite without cause, to expound to my companion my views on modern sculpture, about which I understand very little, and in any case they would certainly have been without the slightest interest for him, but under the influence of that seductive spring evening he agreed with them enthusiastically. Later on I met my host's nieces, who thought the party extremely romantic, mainly because the lights were glittering between the leaves and there was a sound of music in the distance. At the moment we were standing near the band, but I still thought the observation quite sensible, so deeply was I under the common spell of that spring evening.

Supper was laid at small tables which, so far as space permitted, were arranged on the large terrace with an overflow into the adjoining dining-room. The three great glass doors stood wide open. I sat at a table in the open air with one of the nieces; on my other side was Mathilde with the gentleman who looked like a Korps student, but was in fact a bank official and an officer of the reserve. Opposite us, but in the dining-room, sat Samodeski between the lady of the house and some other lovely woman whom I did not know. He kissed his hand to his wife with an air of mocking defiance, she nodded to him and smiled. Without quite knowing why, I looked at him rather closely. He was certainly a handsome fellow with his steel-blue eyes and his long black pointed beard, which he would sometimes smooth against his chin with two fingers of his left hand. But I also think that never in my life have I seen a man so enveloped, as one might say, by ardent words and looks and gestures as on that evening. At first it seemed as though he was merely tolerating all this adoration. But I soon saw, by his manner of gently whispering to those women, his intolerably triumphant expression, and especially by the excited gaiety of his companions, that this apparently harmless conversation was fed by a secret fire.

Mathilde must, of course, have noticed this just as clearly as I did, but she appeared to be quite unperturbed as she talked first to her neighbour and then to me. Gradually she turned her whole attention to me, enquired after various external circumstances of my life, and asked me to tell her about my trip to Athens the previous year. Then she began to talk about her little daughter, who had begun to show a remarkable talent for singing Schubert's songs by ear; about her parents who had bought a little house in Heitzing for their old age; about some old church tapestries that she had discovered in Salzburg the year before, and about a hundred other things. But under the surface of all this something quite different had come between us: a silent, bitter conflict: she was trying by her composure to convince me of the serenity of her happiness, and I was struggling not to believe her. I could not help thinking once more of that Chinese-Japanese evening, when she had tried to do this once before. This time she really felt that she was making little impression on my misgivings, and that she must think out some special means of overcoming them. And so it occurred to her to call my attention to the two lovely women's insinuating and affectionate manner to her husband, and she began to talk about his popularity among women as if, like a good comrade, she ought without uneasiness or suspicion to take pleasure in it as she did in his good looks and his genius. But the more she tried to appear contented and at peace, the deeper were the shadows that moved across her brow. When, on one occasion, she raised her glass to Samodeski, her hand trembled. She tried to conceal and overcome it, with the result that for a moment or two not only her hand but her arm — her whole body — was so paralysed that I was almost afraid. She recovered herself, threw a sidelong glance at me, clearly noticed that she was on the point of losing her game at last, and said suddenly, as though in a last despairing attempt:

"I'm certain you think I'm jealous."

And before I had time to answer she added quickly: "Oh, many people think so. At first Gregor thought so himself."

She intentionally spoke quite loudly, and the people at the other table could have heard every word.

"Ah well," she said, looking across into the room, "with a husband like that, handsome and famous... and not being generally considered very pretty oneself.... Oh, you needn't answer.... I know I've got a little prettier since I had my baby."

She was possibly right, but for her husband — I was quite convinced of that — the distinction of her features had never had much meaning, and as for her figure — with the loss of her girlish slimness her sole charm for him had probably disappeared. Of course, I babbled out some hurried words of agreement: she seemed pleased, and went on with increasing confidence:

"But I haven't the slightest talent for jealousy. I did not at once realise this myself. I gradually came to understand it, and more especially a few years ago in Paris.... You knew we were there, of course?"

I remembered.

"It was then that Gregor made the busts of Princess La Hire and of the Minister Chocquet, and many others. We had such a lovely life there, just like young people... well, of course, we're both still young... I mean like a pair of lovers, though we did go out into the world from time to time.... We sometimes called upon the Austrian Ambassador, and visited the La Hires, and a few others. But in general we didn't go about much in Society. We lived, in fact, up in Montmartre, in a rather shabby house where Gregor also had his studio. I assure you that many of the young artists we went about with had no notion that we were married. We ran about everywhere together. I've often sat late into the night with him in the Café Athènes, with Léandre, Carabin, and many others. And we went about sometimes with all sorts of women that I probably should not have cared to know in Vienna... though when all is said and done..." She threw a quick glance across at Frau von Wartenheimer, and continued: "And many of them were very pretty. Sometimes we had with us Henri Chabran's last mistress, who always wore black since his death and had a new lover every week — but they all had to wear deep mourning while they were with her — she insisted on that.... Strange people they were that we got to know. You can imagine that the women ran after my husband just as much as everywhere else: it was truly laughable. But as I was always with him — or at any rate most of the time — they did not make any open advances, especially as I passed as his mistress.... Yes, if they had known that I was only his wife...! And so one day a strange thing happened to me, that you would certainly never have believed, and indeed, speaking candidly, I am still astonished at my courage." She stared in front of her and spoke more softly than before. "Besides it is possible that it is in a way connected with something — well, you shall hear.

"For some weeks I had known that I was about to have a child, and I was unbelievably happy. At first I was not merely gayer but, strangely enough, even more lively than ever before.... Well, I must tell you that one fine evening I had put on men's clothes and gone out with Gregor in search of adventures. Of course, I first made him promise that he would do exactly as he liked... otherwise there would have been no sense in the whole affair. I looked simply splendid — you would not have recognised me... no one did. A friend of Gregor's, a certain Léonce Albert, a young painter, a humpback, called for us that evening. It was lovely weather... May... quite warm, and I was as shameless as you can think! I had calmly taken off my overcoat — a very smart yellow overcoat — and was carry it over my arm... just as men do.... It was indeed beginning to get dark... we dined in a little restaurant on the outer Boulevard, then we went on to the 'Roulotte,' where Legay was then singing, and Montoya... 'Tu t'en iras les pieds devant...' You heard it here lately in the Wiedener Theatre, didn't you?"

At that moment Mathilde threw a quick glance across at her husband, who did not notice it. It was as though she were taking leave of him for a long time. Then, with ever-increasing intensity, she seemed to plunge into the sequel.

"In the 'Roulotte,'" she said, "was a very elegant lady, who was sitting just in front of us: she flirted with Gregor, and in such a way!... Really you couldn't imagine anything more shameless. I shall never understand how her husband did not strangle her on the spot. I would have done so. I think she was a duchess.... Now, don't laugh, she was certainly a lady of the great world, in spite of her behaviour... one can always tell.... And I really wanted Gregor to play up... of course I did!... I should have liked to know how these things start.... I wanted him to write her a note, or do whatever he would have done before he was married. Yes, I did want him to, though it might have got him into trouble. I suppose it's our terrible feminine curiosity.... But Gregor, I am thankful to say, was not interested. We soon went straight out again — out into the lovely May night, and Léonce was still with us. He quite lost his heart to me that evening, and, contrary to his habit, was positively gallant. He was ordinarily very shy — owing to his appearance.... I said, 'It must be the effect of the yellow overcoat that has gone to your head.' And we strolled gaily on like three students.

"Then came the real adventure. We went into the Moulin Rouge which was part of the programme. Something had to happen some time.... We had had no experiences until then, except that a woman had spoken to me — to me, can you believe it? — on the street. But that was nothing. We got to the Moulin Rouge about one. You probably know what the place is like: I had really thought it was worse.... At first nothing happened whatever, and it really looked as if the whole escapade would come to nothing. I began to get peevish. 'Don't be childish,' said Gregor: 'you don't suppose they're going to fall at our feet the moment we come in?' He said 'our' out of courtesy to Léonce: there was not much chance of anyone falling at Léonce's feet. But just as we were all seriously thinking about going home, the affair took a turn. A person came up to me — yes, it was really to me — who had happened to pass us several times already.... She had quite a serious air and looked rather different from most of the women present. She was not at all showily dressed — in white, entirely in white. I had noticed that she did not so much as answer two or three men who spoke to her, but simply walked on without condescending to notice them. She just watched the ballet, quietly and with a detached sort of interest. Léonce, at my request, asked some men he knew whether they had ever met the beautiful creature anywhere, and one of them remembered that he had met her the winter before at one of the Thursday balls in the Latin Quarter. Léonce then went up to her as she stood a little way off, and she answered him.

He then brought her up to us, and we all sat down at a small table and drank champagne. Gregor paid no attention to her whatever — she might not have been there at all. He talked to me and me alone.... That seemed especially to provoke her. She became gayer, more talkative, more unconstrained, and gradually slipped into telling us her entire life-story. The things that such a poor soul can — or perhaps must — go through! One reads of it so often, but when one hears it as a piece of reality from someone sitting near by it seems so strange. I still remember a great deal of it. Someone had betrayed and abandoned her when she was fifteen. Then she became a model, and after that she walked on at a small theatre. The things she told us about the Director!... I should have gone out there and then if I had not been already a little excited by champagne.... Then she fell in with a medical student who was working at anatomy, and she often came to fetch him from the dissecting-room... or more often stayed with him there.... No, really, I can't repeat what she told us. The medical student, of course, left her. That, she decided, should be the end — yes, really! And she tried to commit suicide. She was very amusing... when she described it. I can still hear her voice.

... It did not sound so common as it was. And she pulled her dress aside and showed us a little reddish scar over her left breast. And as we were all looking very gravely at the scar she suddenly said — no, she screamed — to my husband: 'Kiss it!' As I have already told you, Gregor had taken no notice of her. Even while she was telling her story, he hardly listened; he stared about the room, smoked cigarettes, and now when she called out to him he hardly smiled. However, I nudged him, and bothered him — I was really rather tipsy, and it was the most extraordinary experience in my life. And whether he liked it or not, he had to... at any rate he had to make as though he had touched the place with his lips. After that we were gayer and madder than ever. I have never laughed so much as I did that evening, and I never knew why. And I never could have believed it possible that a female creature — and such a one — could fall so madly in love with a man in the course of an hour as that woman did with Gregor. Her name was Madeleine."

I don't know whether Frau Mathilde spoke the name louder on purpose — in any case it seemed as though her husband heard it, for he looked across at us: he looked at his wife in an ordinary sort of way, but our eyes met, and so remained fixed for a space, but without any special understanding. Then he suddenly smiled at his wife, she nodded back, he went on talking to his neighbours, and she turned again to me.

"I can't, of course, remember everything that Madeleine told us later," said she; "it was all so weird. But I will be frank: there was one moment when I was a little put out. That was when Madeleine took my husband's hand and kissed it. But it was soon over. For at that moment, you see, I could not help thinking of our child. And then I felt how indissolubly I and Gregor were bound together: what was the rest? — shadows, unreality, or make-believe, like that evening. And all was well again. Then we went out and sat until dawn in a café on the Boulevard. There I heard Madeleine asking my husband to go home with her. He simply laughed at her. And then, to bring the joke to a good and, in a certain sense, a profitable end — you know what egoists all artists are, where their art is concerned at any rate — well, in a word, he told her he was a sculptor, and asked her to come and see him soon as he would like to model her. And she replied: 'If you're a sculptor, I'll hang myself: but I'll come.'"

Mathilde was silent. But I have never seen the eyes of any woman express — or conceal — so much pain. Then, when she had braced herself to tell what still remained, she went on: “Gregor wanted to insist that I should be in his studio next day. Yes, he actually proposed that I should stay hidden behind a curtain when she came. Well, there are women, many women, I know, who would have accepted. But, I think, either one believes or one does not... and I have decided to believe. Am I not right?” And she looked at me with her great questioning eyes. I merely nodded, and she went on. “Madeleine, of course, came the next day and then came often... as many others came before her, and many others have come since.... And she was one of the loveliest, you may believe me. You yourself stood before her to-day in admiration, out there by the pool.”

“The Dancing-girl?”

“Yes, Madeleine was the model for her. And now do you suppose that I should have been suspicious in such circumstances, or in others like them? Should I not have turned both our lives into a torment if I had? I am very glad that I have no inclination to be jealous.”

Someone was standing in the central door and had started proposing our host’s health in a speech that was no doubt very witty, for the company was laughing heartily. But I was watching Mathilde, who was listening as little as I was. And I saw how she looked across at her husband with an expression that revealed not only an unending love, but also wore a mask of unshakable faith, as though it were truly her highest duty by no means to trouble him in the enjoyment of the life that was his. And he acknowledged her look — smiling and unperturbed, although he, of course, knew as well as I that she was suffering, and had long been suffering like an animal.

And that is why I don’t believe the story of the heart attack. I got to know Mathilde so well that evening, and I am quite convinced, just as from first to last she played the happy wife before her husband, while he deceived her and drove her into madness, so at the end she put up this performance of a natural death, when she threw her life away because she could bear it no longer. And he accepted this last sacrifice, also, as though it had been his due.

I was standing now before the garden-fence.... The shutters were closed and barred. White and as though enchanted stood the little villa in the half-light, and there was the marble glittering between the red boughs.

Perhaps, after all, I may be unjust to Samodeski. He is fundamentally so stupid that he really does not suspect the truth. But it is sad to think that there was no greater joy for Mathilde in her death than to know that her last divine deception had succeeded.

Or might I after all be wrong, and it was natural death?... No, I won’t allow myself to be deprived of the right to hate the man whom Mathilde had so loved. That will probably be for a long while my only solace.

THE PROPHECY

I

NOT FAR FROM BOTZEN, ON SOME RISING GROUND, almost buried in woods and hardly visible from the main road, lies the small property of the Baron von Schottenegg. A friend of mine who had been practising as a doctor in Botzen for the past ten years, and whom I met there again in the autumn, had introduced me to the Baron. The latter was then fifty years of age and an amateur in several arts. He composed a little, played the violin and the piano really well, and could draw quite tolerably. But his most serious pursuit in his earlier days had been acting. It seemed that as a young man he had for several years gone about the Empire with a small touring company under an assumed name. But, from whatever cause, whether his father's persistent opposition, insufficient talent, or bad luck, the Baron had given up his career quite early; very shortly afterwards he had followed the family tradition and entered the service of the State, and there he had remained for the past twenty years as a faithful, if unenthusiastic, official. But when he resigned at scarcely more than forty years of age, immediately after his father's death, it then became clear for the first time how deeply attached he still was to his youthful pursuit. He had the villa on the slope of the Guntschnaberg put in order, and then gathered round him, especially in summer and autumn, an ever-increasing crowd of guests, both men and women, who performed all sorts of plays that were easy to act.

His wife, who came of an old Tyrol middle-class family, took little real interest in artistic matters, but she was clever and had a friendly affection for her husband, whose hobby she regarded with a touch of sarcasm, though quite good-naturedly, for the Baron's interest fell in with her own social inclinations. The company one met at the castle might, to fastidious observers, have seemed a little mixed, but guests whose birth and breeding might otherwise have disposed them to be exclusive took no offence at such a casual assemblage which seemed sufficiently justified by their common interest. In any case the name and reputation of their host and hostess banished any suspicion of any freedom of behaviour. Among many others, whom I can no longer call to mind, I met at the castle a young count attached to the Innsbruck provincial administration, a Jäger officer from Riva, a captain of the General Staff with his wife and daughter, an opera singer from Berlin, a Botzen liqueur manufacturer with two sons, Baron Meudolt who had just come back from his travels round the world, a retired actor from Bückeberg, a widowed Countess Saima, who had been an actress in her youth, her daughter, and the Danish painter, Petersen.

Only a few of the guests lived in the castle. Some of them took lodgings in Botzen, others stayed in a modest hotel at the cross-roads below, where a small lane branched off up to the castle. But the whole company usually met at the castle in the early afternoon, and then, sometimes under the direction of the retired actor, sometimes under that of the Baron, who never acted himself, rehearsals were held that lasted till the evening. They began with jokes and laughter but gradually grew more and more serious until the day of the performance arrived, when, as the weather, caprice, or arrangements might dictate, but as far as possible taking account of the scene of the action, the representation took place either in the meadow beyond the little garden of the castle at the edge of the forest or in the ground-floor hall with its three great bow windows.

When I first called on the Baron I had no other idea than to spend a cheerful day in a fresh place among fresh people. But as happens when a man wanders about aimlessly and in complete freedom, and when, too, he is no longer in his first youth and has no vital ties to call him home, I allowed myself to be persuaded by the Baron to stay for some time. One day became two, and three, and more, and so, to my own astonishment, I took up my abode until far into the autumn up at the little castle where a very comfortably furnished room in a small tower, with a view into the valley, was given up to my use. This first visit of mine to Guntschnaberg was entirely delightful, and remains with me as a very peaceful memory, for I made no more than a fleeting acquaintance of any of the guests, and also, as I felt equally inclined for reflection and for work, I spent a large part of my time in solitary walks in the woods. Not even the circumstance that the Baron, in his courtesy, had one of my little plays performed disturbed my peace, as no one took any notice of me in my character as author. I look upon that evening much rather as a most delightful experience, for with that performance in the green meadow, and under the open sky, a modest dream of my youth came to a late and, indeed by that time, an unexpected fulfillment.

The stir and movement in the castle gradually began to die down, the men's leave — such of them as belonged to a profession — was running out, and we only had a few visits from friends settled in the neighbourhood. It was only then that I began to get better acquainted with the Baron and found in him, to my surprise, a great deal more modesty than is commonly the case with amateurs. He did not in the least try to persuade himself that what went on at his castle was anything else than a higher form of social amusement. But as the course of his life had prevented his entering upon a lasting and serious connection with his beloved art, he allowed himself to be satisfied with the glamour shed, as it were, from a far distance over the harmless theatricalities in the castle, and was moreover glad that they were untainted by the sordid details that professionalism always brings with it.

In the course of one of our walks he mentioned quite incidentally that he hoped one day to see on his open-air stage a play that had been constructed with an eye to the unconfined space and the natural background. This observation fell so nearly in with a plan that I had been meditating for some time that I promised the Baron to carry out his wish.

Soon afterwards I left the castle. In the early days of the next spring I sent to the Baron, with a friendly message recalling my delightful stay the previous autumn, a play that I thought might suit his purpose. I soon got an answer from him, conveying his thanks, and a hearty invitation for the coming autumn. I spent the summer in the mountains, and in the early days of September when the cooler weather set in I went down to the Lake of Garda without realising that I was quite near the Baron von Schottenegg's castle. Yes, it seems to-day as if I had at that time completely forgotten the little castle and all its doings. On September 8th I got a letter from the Baron sent on from Vienna, expressing his mild astonishment at not having heard from me, and informing me that on September 9th the little play I had sent him in the spring was to be performed, and that I must on no account fail to be present. The Baron promised me special pleasure from the children who were playing in the piece; they could not be induced to leave it, and even in between the rehearsals ran about in their costumes and played in the meadow. The chief part, he continued, had, as a result of a series of accidents, fallen to his nephew, Herr Franz von Umprecht, who — as I no doubt remembered — had only twice taken a part in tableaux, but had developed a surprising talent as an actor.

I started off, reached Botzen by evening of the performance. I went up to the castle, where the Baron and his wife received me very graciously. There were also other old acquaintances: the retired actor, the Countess Saima with her daughter, Herr von Umprecht and his lovely wife, and the fourteen-year-old daughter of the forester who was to speak the prologue to my piece. A large company was expected for the afternoon, and at the performance in the evening there would be more than a hundred spectators, not merely personal guests of the Baron, but people from the surrounding neighbourhood, who, as often before, were freely admitted to the rustic theatre. On this occasion a small orchestra had been engaged consisting of professional musicians from Botzen and a few amateurs, who were to play an overture of Weber, and also some incidental music which the Baron had himself composed.

We were all very gay at lunch, only Herr von Umprecht seemed to me more silent than the rest. At first I could hardly call him to mind, and I was astonished to notice that he glanced at me with an air of understanding, and then with a timid sort of expression, without however addressing a word to me. His face gradually grew more familiar, and I suddenly remembered that in one of last year's tableaux he had impersonated a monk sitting with upturned elbows at a chess-board. I asked him whether I were not mistaken. He seemed almost confused when I addressed him: the Baron answered for him, and made some jesting remark about his nephew's newly discovered histrionic talent. At which Herr von Umprecht laughed rather strangely and stared in front of him; then he threw a quick glance at me suggestive of some kind of understanding between us, which I was quite unable to explain. But from that moment he avoided meeting my eye.

II

Soon after lunch I had gone up to my room. I stood once more at the open window as I had so often done in the previous year, and enjoyed the delightful view down into the valley which, quite narrow just below me, gradually widened and then completely opened out to take in the town and the surrounding meadows.

After a short time there was a knock at the door. Herr von Umprecht came in, stopped in the doorway and said with a certain timidity: "Excuse me if I am disturbing you." Then he came nearer and went on: "But as soon as you have listened to me for a quarter of an hour, I am convinced that you will think there was good reason for my visit."

I invited Herr von Umprecht to sit down. He took no notice but continued excitedly: "I am, in fact, in the strangest way your debtor and I feel it my duty to thank you."

Of course I thought — how should I not? — that these words of Herr von Umprecht referred to his part, and as they seemed more than courtesy demanded, I made some deprecatory reply. But Umprecht immediately interrupted me. "You cannot know the intention of my words. Might I ask you to listen to me?" He sat down on the window-seat, crossed his legs, and making an obvious effort to control himself as far as possible, he began: "I am now the owner of an estate, as you perhaps know, but before that I was an officer. And at that time, ten years ago — ten years ago to-day — I met with the incredible adventure under the shadow of which I have in a sense lived until now, and which to-day finds its fulfillment through you, though without your knowledge and aid. Between us two there is indeed some bond that is not of this world, which you will probably be as little able to explain as I am. But you must at least learn of its existence.

"At that time my regiment was stationed in some wretched little hole in Poland. The only distractions beyond our duties, which were not always enough to occupy us, were drink and play. Beyond that, we had before our eyes the possibility of having to stick there for years, and not all of us knew how to face such a comfortless prospect. One of my best friends had shot himself in the third month of our stay there. Another brother officer, once the best fellow among us, suddenly developed into a complete drunkard, became unmannerly, bad-tempered, almost undependable, and had some sort of scene with a lawyer that cost him his commission. The captain of my company was married and — I don't know whether justifiably or not — so jealous that he one day threw his wife out of the window. Mysteriously enough she was not hurt; her husband died in a mad-house. One of our subalterns, who had until then been an excellent lad, though extraordinarily stupid, suddenly took it into his head that he could understand philosophy, studied Kant and Hegel, and learnt whole sections of their works off by heart, as children learn their spelling books. As for me, I did nothing but bore myself, and that so terribly, that often as I lay on my bed of an afternoon I was afraid I might go mad. Our barracks lay outside the town, and consisted of at most thirty scattered huts: the next town, a good hour's ride away, was dirty, disgusting, smelly, and full of Jews. We were forced to have a certain amount to do with them — the hotel-keeper was a Jew, so was the owner of the café, and the shoemaker. You can well imagine that we treated them with as much contempt as possible. They irritated us particularly, because a certain prince who was attached to our regiment as major always returned the Jews' salutes with studied courtesy — whether he did it to amuse himself or whether he really liked them, I do not know — and he also, strange as it seems, took most particular pains to protect our regimental doctor, who was quite obviously of Jewish extraction. I would, of course, not tell you this except that it was precisely this caprice on the part of the prince that brought me into contact with that personage who was called on to create in so mysterious a fashion the bond between yourself and me. He was a conjurer, and in fact the son of a Jewish brandy merchant in the neighbouring small Polish town. As a young man he had been in business at Lemberg, and then gone to Vienna where he had learnt a few cardtricks from somebody. He went on practising by himself, picked up some more conjuring tricks one way and another, and gradually made such progress that he was able to go about the world and appear with success in music-halls or at receptions. In the summer he always came back to his native town to visit his parents. There he never appeared in public, and thus it was that I first saw him in the street, where I was at once astonished by his appearance. He was a small, thin, beardless man, probably at that time about thirty years of age, dressed with a ridiculous elegance quite unsuitable to the season of the year: he walked about in a black frock-coat and a glossy tall hat, and wore magnificently brocaded waistcoats: and in strong sunshine he wore a pair of dark spectacles on his nose.

"One evening some fifteen or sixteen of us were sitting as usual after dinner at our long table in the mess. It was a sultry night and the windows stood open. A few of us had begun to play cards, others leaned against the window and talked, others drank and smoked in silence. Then the corporal of the day came in and announced the conjurer's arrival. We were at first rather astonished, but without more ado our visitor calmly appeared and introduced himself in a few words in his fluent jargon, thanking us for the invitation that had been sent him. As he said this, he turned to the prince, who went up to him and — simply to annoy us, of course — shook hands with him. The conjurer took this as perfectly natural, and then observed that he would show us a few card-tricks, after which he said he would do some experiments in hypnotism and palmistry. He had scarcely finished when some of our officers who were sitting in a corner playing cards noticed that the court cards were not there; at a sign from the conjurer they came flying in through the open window. The tricks that followed were very interesting, and went a good deal beyond anything of the kind I had ever seen. The hypnotic experiments he then carried out seemed to me even more remarkable. We all felt something like horror when we saw our philosophic subaltern put to sleep, and then, in obedience to the magician's orders, jump through the open window, scramble up the smooth wall to the roof, run round the whole quadrangle close to the edge and then slide down into the barrack square. When he stood on the ground again, still in a state of trance, the colonel said to the magician: 'If he had broken his neck, you wouldn't have left the barracks alive, I promise you.' Never shall I forget the contemptuous look which was the Jew's silent reply to this remark. Then he said slowly:

"'Shall I read your hand, sir, and tell you whether you will leave this barracks dead or alive?'

"I don't know how the colonel and the rest of us would have usually answered such an impertinent remark, but there was such a weird, excited feeling in the air that no one was surprised when the colonel reached out his hand to the conjurer and said, imitating the man's dialect: 'Read away.'

“All this took place in the barrack-yard, and the subaltern, still in the trance, stood against the wall with outstretched arms like one crucified. The conjurer took the colonel’s hand and carefully studied the lines.

“‘Can you see all right, Jew?’ asked a lieutenant, who was rather drunk.

“The other glanced at him, and said gravely: ‘My professional name is Marco Polo.’

“The prince laid a hand on the Jew’s shoulder and said: ‘My friend Marco Polo has sharp eyes.’

“‘Well, what do you see?’ asked the colonel more politely.

“‘Must I say?’ asked Marco Polo.

“‘We can’t force you,’ said the prince.

“‘Speak!’ cried the colonel.

“‘I would rather not,’ answered Marco Polo.

“The colonel laughed loudly. ‘Out with it,’ he said, ‘it can’t be as bad as all that. And if it is, it can’t be true.’

“‘It is very bad,’ said the conjurer, ‘and it is also true.’

“All were silent.

“‘Well?’ said the colonel.

“‘You will not have to suffer from the cold any more,’ answered Marco Polo.

“‘What!’ cried the colonel. ‘Is the regiment going to be sent to Riva at last?’

“‘I can see nothing about the regiment, sir. All I can see is that you will be dead by the autumn.’

“The colonel laughed, but all the rest were silent and I assure you we all felt that a mark was set upon the colonel in that moment. Then someone intentionally broke into a loud laugh, the rest did likewise, and with a clatter of noise and laughter we all went back into the mess.

“‘Well,’ said the colonel, ‘my business is settled. Isn’t anyone else curious?’

“One answered jestingly: ‘No, we don’t want to find out anything.’ Another suddenly discovered that having one’s fate foretold like this was strictly contrary to religious principle, and a young lieutenant observed with emphasis that people like Marco Polo ought to be locked up for life. I saw the prince standing smoking in a corner with one of the senior officers and heard him say: ‘Where does the magic begin?’ In the meantime I walked up to Marco Polo who was getting ready to go, and said, without letting anyone else hear:

“‘Prophesy for me.’

“He took my hand almost mechanically. Then he said:

“‘I can’t see properly here.’

“I noticed that the oil lamps had begun to flicker, and that the lines on my hand seemed to quiver.

“‘Come outside into the yard, lieutenant; I can do it better in the moonlight.’ He still held my hand, and I followed him outside through the open door.

“Suddenly a strange thought came into my mind.

“‘Listen, Marco Polo, if what you did for the colonel is all that you can do, I would sooner leave it alone.’

“Without more ado the magician dropped my hand and smiled.

“‘The lieutenant is afraid.’

“I turned quickly to see if anyone had heard us; but we were already through the barracks gate, and on the main road leading to the town.

“‘I want to know something a little more definite,’ I said; ‘that is what I mean. Words can always be interpreted in different ways.’

“Marco Polo looked at me.

“‘What does the lieutenant want?... perhaps the portrait of his future wife?’

“‘Could you manage that?’

“Marco Polo shrugged his shoulders.

“‘It could be done.... It is possible.’

“‘Well, I don’t want to see that,’ I answered. ‘I want to know what will be happening to me some time later on — say in ten years.’

“Marco Polo shook his head.

“‘I can’t do that — but I can do something else perhaps.’

“‘What?’

“‘I can show you a picture of any given moment of your future life, Herr Lieutenant.’

“I did not at once understand.

“‘What do you mean?’

“‘I mean this: I can conjure into existence a moment of your future life, so that we who are standing here can see it.’

“‘What!’

“‘The Herr Lieutenant must just say which moment he wants.’

“I did not quite understand, but I was in a state of great tension.

“‘Good!’ said I; ‘if you can do that, I should like to see what will be happening to me this very second in ten years’ time.... Do you understand, Marco Polo?’

“‘Certainly, Herr Lieutenant,’ said Marco Polo, and looked at me steadily.

“And very soon he was gone... but gone, too, were the barracks, which I had just seen glittering in the moonlight — gone were the mean huts scattered over the moonlit plain, and I saw my own self, as a man often sees himself in dreams — I saw myself ten years older, with a brown beard, a scar on my forehead, stretched out on a bier, in the middle of a meadow — and kneeling at my side a beautiful woman with red hair, holding her hands before her face; near me were a boy and a girl, a dark forest in the background, and not far off stood two huntsmen with torches in their hands.... You’re astonished, eh? aren’t you?”

I was indeed astonished, for what he was describing to me was the scene with which my play was to end this evening at ten o’clock, and in which he was to play the dying hero.

“You don’t believe me,” continued Herr von Umprecht; “and I don’t blame you. But I will soon make you believe me.”

Herr von Umprecht felt in his coat pocket and produced a sealed envelope.

“Please look at what is written on the back.”

I read aloud:

“Sealed and attested on January 4th, 1859, to be opened on September 9th, 1868.” And beneath it was the signature of a Vienna notary personally well known to me, one Dr. Artiner.

“That is to-day,” said Herr von Umprecht. “And it is exactly ten years ago to-day that I had my mysterious adventure with Marco Polo which is now to reach its climax, though it is no less mysterious than ever. Year after year, as though I had been the sport of a capricious fate, I was beset in the strangest way by possibilities that might or might not bring fulfillment of that prophecy: sometimes they threatened to become realities, then vanished, again looked pitilessly certain, then passed into the distance, and again returned.... But I must come back to my story. The vision itself certainly did not last longer than a moment, for the same loud burst of laughter from the lieutenant still echoed in my ears which I had heard before the phantasm appeared. And Marco Polo stood once more before me with a smile on his lips, whether sad or contemptuous I could not say, took off his top hat and said ‘Good evening, Herr Lieutenant, I hope you were pleased,’ turned, and went slowly along the high road in the direction of the town. And in the course of the next few days he went away.

"My first thought was, when I got back to the barracks, that it must have been some supernatural appearance which Marco Polo, perhaps by the help of an unseen assistant, was able to produce by some sort of arrangement of mirrors. As I walked through the barrack-yard I saw to my horror the subaltern still leaning against the wall in an attitude of crucifixion. He had clearly been completely forgotten. I heard the others inside talking and disputing in a great state of excitement. I took the lad by the arm. He immediately woke up, showed no signs of surprise, except that he could not understand his brother officers' excited state of mind. I myself joined, with a kind of dull rage, in the heated but futile conversation that had been started about the strange happenings that we had witnessed, and I talked no more sense than any of the others. Suddenly the colonel cried out:

"'Well, gentlemen, I'll bet I'm alive next spring. Forty-five to one!'

"And he turned to one of our officers, a lieutenant, who enjoyed a certain reputation for betting and gambling. 'Anything doing?' Although it was clear that the other found his proposal hard to resist, he apparently thought it unseemly to make a bet on the death of his colonel with the colonel himself. So he smiled and said nothing. He must have regretted it; for a fortnight later, on the second day of the great imperial manœuvres, our colonel fell from his horse and was killed on the spot. And when this happened we all realised that we had expected nothing else.

"It was not until then, however, that I began to think with a certain disquiet of that nocturnal prophecy, of which with some strange diffidence I had said nothing to anyone. It was at Christmas, while on leave in Vienna, that I opened the matter to a friend — a certain Frederick von Gulant — you have perhaps heard of him, he wrote charming verses, and died very young.... Well, he it was who, with my consent, drew up the document that you will find in this envelope. His view, in fact, was that such events should not be lost to knowledge, whether their hypotheses were finally proved to be true or false. I went with him to Dr. Artiner, in whose presence this envelope was sealed. It has been kept in the lawyer's office until now, and not until yesterday was it handed over to me at my request. I am prepared to confess that the gravity with which Gulant treated the affair somewhat upset me at first, but when we had parted, and especially when he died shortly afterwards, the whole story began to look highly ridiculous.

"In the first place, it was clear to me that I had my fate entirely in my own hands. Nothing in the world could compel me to lie on a bier, wearing a brown heard, at ten o'clock on the evening of September 9th, 1868; I could keep away from forest and meadows, and I did not need to marry a wife with red hair and have children. The only thing that I perhaps could not avoid was an accident, say a duel, which might leave me a scar on my forehead. So, to begin with, I was quite undisturbed.

"A year after this prophecy I married Fräulein von Heimsal, my present wife; soon afterwards I left the service and took up farming. I visited various moderate-sized estates, and — ridiculous as it may sound I took care that they did not include any ground that could resemble the meadow of my dream — for so I was accustomed to think of that phantasmal scene. I was on the point of concluding a purchase when my wife inherited some property, and with it an estate in Carinthia with some excellent shooting. The first day I walked over my new domain I came upon a stretch of meadowland which, edged as it was by forest and gently sloping, seemed to me singularly like the place I had, perhaps, every reason to avoid. I was slightly alarmed. I had said nothing to my wife about the prophecy: she is so superstitious that my confession would certainly have poisoned her whole life until" — here he smiled with something like relief— "until to-day. So, of course, I could not share my anxiety with her. But I comforted myself with the conviction that there was nothing to make me spend September of 1868 on my estate.

“In the year 1860 a son was born to me. From his earliest childhood I believed I could detect in his features some resemblance to those of the boy in my dream: sometimes it seemed to pass, and sometimes to grow more noticeable — to-day I have to confess to myself that the boy who is to stand by my bier at ten o’clock this evening is the very image of the boy of the vision. I have no daughter. But it so happened three years ago that my wife’s widowed sister, who had been living in America, died leaving a small daughter. At my wife’s request I crossed to America, and fetched the child to be brought up at home. When I first caught sight of her, I thought I noticed that she was completely like the girl in the dream. It did occur to me to leave the child among strangers in a strange land, but, of course, I immediately put away so dishonourable a thought and we took the child into our house. I again quite recovered my peace of mind, in spite of the children’s growing resemblance to the children of the apparition, for I told myself that my recollection of such childish faces of a dream might very well be deceptive. For a time my life flowed onward in complete peace. Yes, I had almost given up thinking of that strange evening in that dirty little hole in Poland when, two years ago, I was, not unreasonably, greatly shaken by a fresh warning of fate. I had had to be some months away from home; when I came back my wife met me with red hair, and her resemblance to the lady of the dream, whose face I had indeed never seen, seemed to me complete. I thought it best to hide my fear under an appearance of anger. I intentionally grew more and more furious, for an idea bordering on madness suddenly came into my mind: if I separated from my wife and children, all the danger must disappear, and I should have made a fool of destiny. My wife wept, sank to the ground in a collapse, begged my pardon, and explained the alteration in her appearance. A year before, upon the occasion of a journey to Munich, I became infatuated with the portrait of a red-haired woman in the exhibition there, and my wife had then and there made up her mind that she would take the first opportunity of making herself like the portrait, and would dye her hair. I naturally made her promise to get her hair back to its natural colour as soon as possible, and when that was done all seemed right again. Was it not clear that I had, as before, my fate in my own power?... Could not everything that had happened until now be explained quite naturally?... Had not thousands of other men estates with fields and forests, and a wife and children?... And the only thing that might perhaps have alarmed a superstitious man had not happened, and did not, until this last winter: the scar, that you now see adorning my forehead. I am not a coward — if you will let me say so; I fought two duels when I was an officer, under very dangerous conditions — and again eight years ago, shortly before my marriage, when I had already left the service. But when last year I was challenged on some trivial ground — an alleged want of courtesy in greeting someone — I preferred” — Herr von Umprecht blushed slightly— “to apologise. The affair was, of course, disposed of in due order, but I am perfectly certain that I should have fought on that occasion if I had not been seized by some lunatic fear that my opponent would wound me in the forehead, and slip another trump into the hand of fate.... But as you see, it did not help me: the scar is there. And the moment in which I got that wound was perhaps, in all the last years, the one that brought me the deepest realisation of my defencelessness. It was one evening last winter: I was in a train between Klagenfurt and Villach. Suddenly there was a jingle of glass, and I felt a pain in my forehead: at the same time something hard fell to the ground. I put my hand up to the place — it was bleeding: then I bent quickly down and picked up a pointed stone from the floor. The people in the carriage jumped up. ‘What has happened?’ cried one of them. They noticed I was bleeding and were much concerned. But there was one man — I can see him so clearly — who sat buried in his corner. At the next stop water was fetched, the station doctor put on a makeshift bandage; but while I was, of course, not afraid of dying of the wound, I knew that it must leave a scar. A conversation started in the carriage as to whether the stone was aimed at someone or whether it was just a boyish prank. The man in his corner said nothing and stared in front of him. At Villach I got out. Suddenly I found the man beside me. ‘It was meant for me,’ he said. Before I could answer or even collect myself, he had disappeared; and I have never found out who it was. Someone with persecution-mania perhaps, or someone who had good reason to think himself pursued by some injured husband or brother, and whom I had possibly saved, as the scar was to be my fate.... Who can tell?

... After a few weeks it came out on my forehead exactly where I had seen it in my dream. And it became clearer than ever to me that I was caught in an unequal battle with an unknown mocking power, and with growing uneasiness I waited for the last scene of all.

“In the spring we received my uncle’s invitation. I was quite determined not to accept it as, although I could not recall any definite picture, it seemed not impossible that the dreadful place might be on his property. But my wife would not have understood a refusal, so I decided to come here with her and the children at the beginning of July, with the definite intention of leaving the castle as soon as possible and going further south, to Venice or the Lido. Very soon after we arrived the subject of your play came up, my uncle spoke of the small parts for children it contained, and asked me to let my two act in it. I had no objection. It was then his intention that the hero’s part should be taken by a professional actor. A few days later I was seized with a fear that I might fall dangerously ill and not be able to leave. So one evening I announced that I thought of leaving the castle on the next day for a short time and getting some sea bathing. I had to promise to come back at the beginning of September. The same evening there came a letter from the actor throwing up his part on some trivial ground. My uncle was very annoyed. He asked me to read the play — perhaps I could suggest someone we both knew who would suit the part? So I took the play up to my room and read it.

“Now try to imagine what passed in my mind when I came to the end and found described, word for word, the scene that had been predicted to me for September 9th of this year. I could not wait until the next day to tell my uncle that I wanted to play the part.

I was afraid that he would make objections, for since I had read the piece I felt as though I had come once more into safe keeping, and if I lost the chance of playing in your piece I would again become a victim to that unknown power. My uncle agreed at once and from then everything went on its smooth accustomed way. We have been rehearsing every day for several weeks, and I have gone through the scene that I must act this evening fifteen or twenty times already; I lie on the bier, the young Countess Saima with her lovely red hair, and her hands before her face, kneels before me, and the children stand at my side.”

While Herr von Umprecht uttered these words my eyes fell upon the envelope that lay upon the table still unopened. Herr von Umprecht smiled. “True, I still owe you a proof,” he said, and broke the seal. Inside was a folded paper. Umprecht unfolded it and spread it out on the table. Before me lay a complete plan of the final scene of the play, as I had conceived it myself. The background and wings were sketched out and marked “forest”: in the centre of the plan a horizontal object, with a male figure upon it, was indicated and marked “bier.”... Against the clear sketched-out figure was written in small letters with red ink: “Woman with red hair,”

“boy,”

“girl,”

“torch bearer,”

“man with raised hands.” I turned to Herr von Umprecht. “What does that mean? ‘Man with raised hands’?”

“I had almost forgotten about that,” said Herr von Umprecht slowly. “That figure comes into it in this way: in my vision was an old man lit up by the glare of the torches, completely bald, clean shaven, wearing spectacles and a dark green shawl round his neck, with raised hands and wide-staring eyes.”

This time I was startled. We were silent for a while, then, feeling strangely uneasy, I said: “Who do you think it is? Who could it be?”

“I assume,” said Umprecht calmly, “that it is one of the spectators, perhaps one of my uncle’s servants... or one of the peasants might have been overcome by the end of the play and tried to get on the stage... or perhaps fate has decreed that some lunatic, escaped from the asylum, by one of those coincidences which have nearly ceased to surprise me, is to rush across the stage just at the moment I am lying on my bier.”

I shook my head.

“What did you say?... bald... spectacles... a green shawl? Now the thing seems stranger than ever. There was to have been a character in my play just like the figure you saw, but I suppressed it. It was the wife’s mad father, who is mentioned in the first act and was to rush on to the stage at the end.”

“But his shawl and spectacles?”

“That must have been the actor’s own contribution, don’t you think?”

“Possibly.”

We were interrupted. Frau von Umprecht had sent to say that she would like to speak to her husband before the performance, and he took his leave. I stayed for awhile poring over the stage plan that Herr von Umprecht had left lying on the table.

III

Not long afterwards I made my way to the place where the play was to be performed. It lay behind the small castle and was separated from it by a pleasantly laid-out garden; and by the low edge at the end of it stood about ten long benches of plain wood; the front rows were covered with dark red tapestry. Beyond the first row stood a few music-stands and chairs: there was no curtain. The separation of the stage from the auditorium was indicated by two towering great pine trees, one at each side; on the right there was a rough shrubbery and behind it a comfortable easychair, invisible to the audience, for the prompter. On the left the place was open and there was a view down into the valley. Tall trees formed the background of the stage, only in the centre were they close together, and on the left some narrow paths crept out of the shadow. Farther back among the trees, in a little artificial clearing, was a table and some chairs where the actors were to wait for their cues. The lighting was provided by some tall old church lanterns with gigantic tapers, erected at the side of the stage and the auditorium in what would have been the wings. Behind the shrubbery to the right was a sort of open-air property room; there I saw among various small objects needed in the play the bier on which Herr von Umprecht was to die at the conclusion of the piece.... As I walked across the meadow it was glowing in the mild evening sunshine.

I had naturally thought over Herr von Umprecht’s story. At first I thought it was not impossible that Herr von Umprecht was one of those fantastic liars who go to all sorts of trouble to prepare a mystification from a long while ahead so as to make themselves interesting. I thought it conceivable that the notary’s signature was a forgery, and that Herr von Umprecht had enlisted accomplices to carry the matter through with conviction. I found my mind dwelling on the hitherto unknown man with raised hands, with whom Umprecht might well have entered into some understanding. But the part that this man had played in my first sketch of the piece, which no one could have known — and especially the favourable personal impression that Herr von Umprecht had made on me — dismissed my doubts. And improbable and even monstrous as his whole story seemed, I actually longed to be able to believe it; perhaps it was no mad vanity to feel myself the instrument of an overmastering will.

In the meantime I became aware of some stir and movement near by: servants were coming out of the castle, tapers were being lit, people from the neighbourhood — most of them in peasant dress — were slowly climbing up the hill and disposing themselves modestly at the ends of the benches. Soon our hostess appeared with several ladies and gentlemen, who sat down here and there. I joined them and talked to some of them I had met last year. The members of the orchestra had appeared and were taking their places: they were a strange assortment: two violins, a cello, a viola, a double bass, a flute, and an oboe.

They at once began, obviously before the proper time, to play a Weber overture. Right in front near the orchestra stood an old peasant, with a bald head and a sort of dark scarf round his neck. Perhaps, I thought, he was the figure ordained by fate to put on a pair of spectacles later on, go mad, and rush on to the stage. The daylight was now completely gone; the tall lanterns flickered a little, as a light wind had got up. There was much activity behind the shrubbery, and the cast were making their way along the hidden paths towards the stage. Then, for the first time, I thought of the others who were taking part in it, and it occurred to me that I had seen none of them except Herr von Umprecht, his children, and the forester's daughter. Then I heard the loud voice of the stage director and the laugh of the young Countess Saima. The benches were full, the Baron sat in one of the front rows and was talking to the Countess Saima. The orchestra struck up, the forester's daughter came forward and spoke the prologue. The theme of the piece was the fate of a man who, seized by a sudden longing for adventures and far-off lands, leaves his home without saying good-bye, and in the course of a day meets with so much grief and disaster that he proposes to go home before his wife and children have missed him; but a last adventure on his way back ends in his murder, and before he dies he has only time to greet his abandoned dear ones, to whom his flight and death are riddles without an answer.

The play had begun: both men and women spoke their parts attractively: the simple presentation of the simple episodes gave me pleasure, and, to begin with, I thought no more of Herr von Umprecht's story. At the end of the first act the orchestra again began to play, but there was such a noise of talking on the benches that no one listened. I myself was not sitting, I was standing, hidden from the company, rather near to the stage on the left side, where the road could be seen dipping down into the valley. The second act began; the wind had become rather stronger, and the flickering lights contributed not a little to the effect of the piece. The performers again disappeared among the trees and the orchestra began once more. At that moment I happened to glance at the flute-player who wore spectacles and was clean-shaven; but he had long white hair and there was no sign of a shawl. The music stopped and the performers again appeared on the stage. Then I noticed that the flute-player, who had laid his instrument on the stand in front of him, put his hand into his pocket and pulled out a large woollen shawl and wound it round his neck. I was extremely taken aback. The next moment Herr von Umprecht appeared. I saw his eyes suddenly fix upon the flute-player, I saw him mark the green shawl and falter for an instant: but he had soon pulled himself together and went on with his part unperturbed. I asked a roughly dressed young countryman near me if he knew the flute-player, and was told that he was a schoolmaster from Kaltem. The play progressed, and began to near its end. The two children wandered, as the play directs, across the stage; there was a noise of tumult in the forest that came gradually nearer, and shouts and cries were heard: not inappropriately, the wind grew stronger, and the branches began to sway: and at last Herr von Umprecht, the dying knight-errant, was carried on to the stage. The two children rushed up, and the torch-bearers stood motionless at the side. The wife came in later than the rest, and with a face distorted by anguish, sank down by the side of the murdered man: he wants to open his lips once more, tries to raise himself up, but — as it was written in the play — he fails. At that moment came a tremendous gust of wind that threatened to extinguish the torches: I see someone jumping to his feet in the orchestra — it is flute-player — to my amazement he is bald, his wig has been blown off, and with his green shawl streaming from his neck, he rushes at the stage. Unconsciously I glanced at Umprecht: his wide eyes were fixed on the man with something like ecstasy: he tried to speak... it was clear he could not, and he sank down once more. Many of the audience still thought that all this was part of the play: I myself was not certain what to make of Umprecht's second collapse: meanwhile the man had passed the bier, still in pursuit of his wig, and disappeared into the forest. Umprecht did not move; a fresh gust of wind put out one of the two torches: a few people right in front became uneasy — I heard the Baron saying "Hush!" All was silent again — even the wind had dropped... but Umprecht still lay full length; he did not stir nor move his lips. The Countess Saima shrieked — and the audience thought that this was part of the play. But I, elbowing my way through the people, rushed on to the stage, while I could hear a growing disturbance behind me. Everyone got up, and some followed me; the bier was surrounded.... "What is the matter? what has happened?"... I snatched a torch from the hand of one of the torch-bearers and lit up the face of the prostrate man.... I shook him and tore open his shirt. Meantime, the doctor had appeared beside me; he sounded Herr Umprecht's heart, felt his pulse, told everyone to stand aside, whispered a few words to the Baron.... The wife of the man on the bier forced her way through the throng, shrieked, flung herself over her husband; the children stood by as though turned to stone, and could not understand.... No one would believe what had happened, and yet they were all telling each other — and a minute later it was known among all the company that Herr von Umprecht had died suddenly on the bier on which he had been carried on to the stage....

I hurried down into the valley the same evening, completely overcome with horror. I was in such a shaken condition that I could not bring myself to go inside the castle again. I spoke to the Baron the following day in Botzen; there I told him Umprecht's story, as Umprecht himself had told it to me. The Baron would not believe it; I felt in my pocket-book and showed him the mysterious paper: he looked at me with astonishment, even with concern, and gave me back the sheet — it was white, not a sign of any writing or drawing....

I made attempts to find Marco Polo; but all I could discover about him was that he had appeared for the last time three years ago in a low-class Hamburg music-hall.

But among so many mysteries, the greatest mystery of all is the fact that the schoolmaster, who ran after his wig with outstretched hands and disappeared into the forest, was never seen again; not so much as his corpse was ever found.

Editor's Note: —

I was not personally acquainted with the editor of the foregoing narrative. He was in his time a rather well-known author, but had almost entirely dropped out when he died ten years ago at the age of scarcely sixty. As he left no special directions, all his papers came into the hands of his old friend in Meran, mentioned in the narrative. From this friend, a doctor, with whom during a stay in Meran last winter I used at times to discuss such dark matters as ghosts, telepathy, and second-sight, I received the manuscript that is here reproduced. I should gladly regard the whole story as a work of the imagination, had not the doctor, as appears in the narrative, been present at the performance described at the end, with its strange dénouement, and also been personally acquainted with the schoolmaster who disappeared so mysteriously. As regards the magician, Marco Polo, I remember very well when I was quite a young man seeing his name on a theatre notice while I was on a holiday at the Wörthersee: it remained in my memory because just at that time I was about to read that famous traveller's description of his journeys.

BLIND GERONIMO AND HIS BROTHER

BLIND GERONIMO GOT UP FROM THE BENCH AND reached for his guitar which was lying ready on the table near his wine-glass. He had heard the distant rumbling of the first carriage. He felt his familiar way to the open door, and then went down the narrow wooden stairway that led into the covered courtyard. His brother followed him, and they then placed themselves close to the stairs, with their backs to the wall, so as to be sheltered against the damp cold wind that swept over the muddy ground through the open gates.

All the carriages that went by the Stelvio Pass had to drive under the gloomy archway of the old inn. It was the last stopping-place, before the top, for travellers going from Italy to Tyrol. It did not invite a long stay for the road here was fairly level, without views, and ran between barren heights. The blind Italian, and his brother Carlo, almost made the place their home during the summer months.

The mail-coach drove in and other carriages soon followed it. Most of the travellers stayed in their seats, well wrapped up in shawls and cloaks, others got out and marched impatiently up and down between the gates. The weather grew continually worse, and a chilly rain began to patter down. After a succession of lovely days, it seemed as though autumn had broken suddenly and all too soon.

The blind man sang, and accompanied himself on his guitar: he sang in an uneven voice, which sometimes rose into something like a shriek, as indeed it always did when he had been drinking. Sometimes he turned his face upwards with an expression of fruitless entreaty. But the lineaments of his face, with its short, stubby beard and its bluish lips, remained completely immobile. The other brother stood beside him, always motionless. When someone dropped a coin in the hat he nodded his thanks, and looked into the giver's face with a quick, almost puzzled look. But then, as though in fear, he looked away again, and stared like his brother into the void. It seemed as though his eyes were ashamed of the light that was granted to them, not one ray of which could he give to his blind brother.

"Get me some wine," said Geronimo, and Carlo went, obedient as ever. While he was walking up the stairs, Geronimo began to sing again. He had long ceased to listen to his own voice, so he was able to notice what went on around him. At that moment he caught two whispering voices, those of a young man and a young woman. He wondered how often these two had travelled back and forward over this road; for in his blindness and his half-fuddled state, it often seemed to him as though the same people came over the Pass day after day, first from north to south and then from south to north. So he had known this young couple for a long time.

Carlo came down and handed Geronimo a glass of wine. The blind man raised his glass to the young couple and said: "Here's your good health!"

"Thanks," said the young man; but the girl drew him away, for the blind man made her feel uncomfortable.

Then a carriage drove in with a rather noisy company: father, mother, three children, and a nurse.

"Germans," said Geronimo softly to Carlo.

The father gave each child a coin, which they were to throw into the beggar's hat. The eldest boy peered into the blind man's face with fearful curiosity. Carlo watched the boy. Whenever he saw a child like this he could not help remembering that Geronimo had been just that age at the time of the accident which had cost him his sight. Even now, after nearly twenty years, he could recollect that day with perfect clarity. His ears still rang with that shrill childish shriek with which little Geronimo had fallen on the grass, he could still see the flickering circles of sunlight on the white garden wall, and hear once more the Sunday bells which rang out at that moment.

As he had often done before, he had been shooting with his air-gun at the ash tree by the wall, and when he heard the shriek he at once thought he must have wounded his little brother who had just run past. He dropped his gun, jumped through the window into the garden, and dashed towards his little brother, who lay on the grass, wailing, with his hands clasped to his face. Blood was flowing down his right cheek and his neck. At the same moment their father came home from the fields through the little garden gate, and they both knelt helplessly by the wailing child. Neighbours hurried up; the old Vanetti woman was the first to succeed in getting the boy's hand away from his face. Then the blacksmith appeared, to whom Carlo was apprenticed; he had some medical knowledge and he saw at once that the right eye was lost. The doctor, who came from Poschiavo in the evening, could I do no more. He even pointed out the danger to the other eye: and he was right. A year later the world, for Geronimo, was swallowed up in darkness. At first they tried to convince him that he could be cured later on, and he seemed to believe it. Carlo, who knew the truth, wandered day and night up and down the roads, among the vineyards and the forests, and was on the verge of killing himself. But the priest in whom he confided pointed out that it was his duty to live and to devote his life to his brother. Carlo understood. He was seized with a great pity. Only when he was with the blind boy, when he could stroke his hair and kiss his forehead, tell him stories, and take him for walks in the fields behind the house, and among the vine-trellises, did his pain find any relief.

To begin with he had neglected his hours of work at the blacksmith's, because he would not be separated from his brother, and afterwards he could not bring himself to start again, though his father warned him and he worried over it. One day it occurred to Carlo that Geronimo had entirely given up talking of his accident. He soon knew why: the blind boy had realised that he would never again see the sky, the hills, the streets, the people and the light. Carlo was then more miserable than ever, though he tried hard to comfort himself by the thought that the accident was entirely unintentional on his part. And often and often, when he looked at his brother in the early morning, lying beside him, he was so terrified of seeing him awake that he ran out into the garden so as not to be there when the dead eyes seemed each day to seek once more the light which had gone from them for ever. It was at this time that Carlo had the notion that Geronimo, who had a pleasant voice, should take up music. The schoolmaster of Tola, who often came over on Sunday, taught him to play the guitar. The blind boy had certainly no idea that this newly learnt art was to serve him one day as a means of livelihood.

With that summer's day misfortune seemed to have settled for ever on the house of old Lagardi. The harvest failed one year after another, and the old man was cheated by relatives out of a small sum of money that he had saved: and when, on a sultry day of August, he was seized by an apoplectic fit in the fields and fell down dead, he left nothing but debts. The little property was sold: the two brothers were homeless and destitute and left the village.

Carlo was twenty and Geronimo fifteen. Then began the wandering beggars' existence which they had led until that day. At first Carlo had thought of finding some kind of work that would support his brother and himself; but he did not succeed. Besides, Geronimo was never at peace; he must always be on the move.

For twenty years now they had wandered about the roads and passes of North Italy and South Tyrol, always where the stream of travellers was thickest.

And if, after so many years, Carlo no longer felt the burning torment with which every ray of sunlight, the view of every pleasant landscape used to fill his heart, there was still a gnawing pity within him, insistent and unsuspected, like the rhythm of his heart and breath. And he was glad when Geronimo got drunk.

The carriage with the German family had driven away. Carlo sat down, as he liked to do, on the lowest step of the stairway, but Geronimo remained standing, dropped his arms limply to his side, and turned his face upwards.

Maria, the maid, came out of the inn-parlour.

"Had a good day?" she called down to them.

Carlo did not turn. The blind man bent over his glass, raised it from the ground and drank to Maria. She often sat beside him of an evening in the inn-parlour and he knew that she was pretty.

Carlo leaned forward and looked out towards the road. The wind blew, and the rain hissed down, and the rumble of an approaching carriage was lost in the noise and tumult. Carlo stood up and took his place again by his brother's side.

Geronimo began to sing, just as the carriage drove in: it contained only one passenger. The driver quickly unharnessed the horses and then hurried towards the inn-parlour. The traveller remained for a while sitting in his corner, quite enveloped in a grey mackintosh: he did not seem to be listening to the singing. After a while he jumped out of the carriage and hurriedly paced up and down, without going very far away from the carriage. He kept on rubbing his hands together to warm himself. Then he seemed to notice the beggars for the first time. He stopped in front of them, and stared at them for a while in a searching sort of way. Carlo inclined his head slightly, as if in salutation. The traveller was a very young man, with a pleasant, clean-shaven face, and restless eyes. After he had stood some time in front of the two beggars, he again hurried to the gate, through which he was to drive forth once more, and shook his head with annoyance at the cheerless prospect of rain and water.

"Well?" said Geronimo.

"Nothing yet," answered Carlo. "He'll probably give us something when he starts out again."

The traveller came back and leaned against the pole of his carriage. The blind man began to sing, and the young man suddenly seemed to be listening with great interest. The ostler appeared and began to put the horses in again. And it was not until then, as though he had just thought of it, the young man felt in his pocket and gave Carlo a franc.

"Thank you kindly, sir," said Carlo.

The traveller took his seat in the carriage and wrapped himself in his cloak once more. Carlo picked up his glass and went up the wooden stairway. Geronimo began another song. The traveller leaned out of the carriage and shook his head with an expression of mingled contempt and sadness. Suddenly a fancy seemed to take him, and he smiled. Then he said to the blind man, who was only a pace or two away from him:

"What is your name?"

"Geronimo."

"Well, Geronimo, don't let yourself be cheated." At that moment the coachman appeared on the top step of the stairway.

"How do you mean, sir?"

"I gave your companion a twenty-franc piece."

"Oh, thank you, sir, thank you."

"Well, but you be careful."

"He's my brother, sir: he wouldn't cheat me."

The young man hesitated for a moment, but while he was still reflecting the coachman had got on to his box and whipped up the horses. The young man leaned back, with a jerk of his head that seemed to say "Fate, take your course," and the carriage drove off.

The blind man waved his hands after him with animated gestures of gratitude. Then he heard Carlo coming out of the inn-parlour. Carlo called down: “Come on, Geronimo, it’s warm up here. Maria has made a fire.”

Geronimo nodded, took his guitar under his arm, and felt his way up the steps by the banister. While he was on his way he called out: “Let me feel it, it’s a long time since I’ve touched a gold piece.”

“What’s the matter?” said Carlo. “What are you talking about?”

Geronimo had reached the top and felt with both hands for his brother’s head, a gesture that with him always meant joy or affection. “Carlo, my dear brother, there are still some good people in the world.”

“Of course,” said Carlo. “Two lire and thirty centimes so far, and a little Austrian money — about half a lira.”

“And twenty francs, twenty francs,” cried Geronimo. “I know all about it!” He stumbled into the room and sat down heavily on a bench.

“What do you know?” asked Carlo.

“Oh, stop that, do! Give it to me to hold. It is so long since I had a gold piece in my hand.”

“What do you mean? How should I get hold of a gold piece? Here are two or three lire.”

The blind man brought his fist down on the table. “Stop that fooling, I tell you! Are you trying to hide something from me?”

Carlo looked at his brother with a troubled and astonished expression. He sat down beside him, moved up close and took his arm as if to try and soothe him. “I’m not hiding anything from you. How can you think such a thing? How should anyone give me a gold piece?”

“But he told me so.”

“Who did?”

“The young man who was walking up and down.”

“What? I don’t understand.”

“He asked me what my name was, and then he said: ‘Don’t you let yourself be cheated.’”

“You must have dreamt it, Geronimo — it’s nonsense!”

“Nonsense, is it? I heard it, and I can hear quite well: ‘Don’t you let yourself be cheated. I gave him a gold piece.’ No, he said: ‘I gave him a twenty-franc piece.’”

The landlord came in. “Well,” said he, “and what’s the matter with you two? Have you gone out of business? A coach with four horses has just come in.”

“Come along,” cried Carlo.

Geronimo did not move. “Why should I come? What’s the use? You stand there and—”

Carlo took his hand. “Be quiet now and come along!”

Geronimo said no more and obeyed his brother. But on the steps he said: “I haven’t done with you.”

Carlo did not understand what had happened. Had Geronimo suddenly gone mad? He certainly flew into a rage very easily, but he had never talked like this.

Two Englishmen were sitting in the carriage that had just arrived; Carlo raised his hat to them, and the blind man sang. One of the Englishmen had got out and flung a few coins into Carlo’s hat. Carlo said “Thank you,” and then, as if to himself, “Twenty centesimi.” Geronimo’s face remained unmoved: he began a new song. The carriage with the two Englishmen drove off.

The brothers went silently up the steps. Geronimo sat down on the bench, Carlo remained standing by the stove.

“Why don’t you speak?” asked Geronimo.

“Well,” said Carlo, “it happened just as I said.” His voice trembled a little.

“What was it you said?” asked Geronimo.

“Perhaps he was mad.”

“Mad? I dare say! When someone says ‘I gave your brother twenty francs,’ he’s mad, is he? And why did he say ‘Don’t you let yourself be cheated,’ eh?”

“Perhaps he wasn’t mad; but there are people who like to play tricks on poor people.”

“Tricks!” screamed Geronimo. “Of course you had to say that — I was waiting for that!” He emptied the glass of wine that stood in front of him.

“But, Geronimo!” cried Carlo, and in his confusion he could hardly speak. “Why should I... how can you believe...?”

“Why is your voice trembling... eh?... Tell me that.”

“Geronimo, I swear, I...”

“Eh?... and I don’t believe you. And now you’re laughing... I know you’re laughing.”

Here the ostler shouted from below: “Hullo, you up there, some people have come.”

The brothers stood up quite mechanically and walked down the stairs. Two carriages had arrived at the same time, one with three men, and the other with an old married couple. Geronimo sang; Carlo stood beside him, utterly bewildered. What should he do now? His brother did not believe him? How could that be possible? And he threw a nervous side-long glance at Geronimo who was singing his songs in a cracked voice. It seemed as though strange thoughts were sweeping across his brother’s forehead, thoughts that he had never observed there before.

The carriages had already gone, but Geronimo went on singing. Carlo did not dare to interrupt him. He did not know what he could say, and he feared that his voice might tremble again. Then he heard a burst of laughter from above, and Maria called out: “What are you still singing for? You won’t get anything from me!”

Geronimo stopped in the middle of a phrase: it sounded as though his voice and the strings had cracked at the same moment. Then he went up the steps again and Carlo followed him. He sat down beside him in the parlour. What should he do? He could do nothing except try and explain it over again.

“Geronimo,” he said, “I swear to you... think, Geronimo, how can you believe that I...”

Geronimo was silent: his dead eyes seemed to stare out through the window into the grey mist. Carlo went on: “Well, perhaps he wasn’t mad, he may have been mistaken... yes, he will have been mistaken....” But he knew quite well that he did not believe what he was saying.

Geronimo moved away impatiently. But Carlo went on, with sudden animation: “Why should I — you know I don’t eat and drink any more than you do, and when I buy a new coat you know all about it.... Why should I need so much money?... What should I do with it?”

And Geronimo answered, spitting out the words:

“Don’t tell lies. I know you’re telling lies!”

“I’m not telling lies, Geronimo,” said Carlo, alarmed.

“Eh? You’ve given it to her already, have you? Or will she get it later on?”

“Maria?”

“Who else? You liar! you thief!”

And as though he no longer wanted to sit beside his brother at the table, he pushed him away with his elbow.

Carlo stood up. At first he stared at his brother, then he left the room and went down the steps into the yard. With staring eyes he looked out at the road, which disappeared into a brownish fog. The rain had stopped. Carlo put his hands in his pockets and went out. He felt as though his brother had driven him away.

What had happened?... He still could not realise it. What sort of man could that person have been? He had given one franc and said it was twenty. He must have had some reason?... And Carlo tried to think if he had somewhere made an enemy who had sent the stranger to take, vengeance.... But as far back as he could remember, he had never offended any man or had had a serious quarrel with anyone. For twenty years he had done nothing but stand in inn-yards or by the roadside with his hat in his hand.

... Perhaps someone had a grudge against him over a woman.... But it was long since he had had anything to do with a woman.... The waitress at La Rosa had been the last one, in the previous spring... but surely no one could have taken offence at that... it was not conceivable!... There must be people in the world that he did not know. This stranger must have had some motive for telling Geronimo that he had given his brother twenty francs.... Surely.... But what was he to do now?.... It was suddenly clear that Geronimo distrusted him... and that he could not bear! He must do something to stop it.... And he hurried back.

When he went into the parlour again Geronimo lay outstretched on the bench and did not seem to notice Carlo's entrance. Maria brought them food and drink. They did not utter a word during the meal. When Maria was taking the plates away, Geronimo suddenly burst into a laugh and said:

"What are you going to buy with it?"

"With what?"

"A new petticoat, or some earrings?"

"What's he talking about?" she said, turning to Carlo.

In the meantime there was a loud rumble of heavily-laden vehicles below in the yard, a din of voices reached them, and Maria hurried down. After a few minutes three drivers came in and sat down at a table: the landlord went up and greeted them. They were cursing the bad weather.

"There will be snow to-night," said one.

The second told how he had been snowed up in the Pass in the middle of August ten years before and almost frozen to death. Maria sat down with them. Then the ostler came in and asked after his parents who lived down in Bormio.

At that moment a carriage with travellers arrived. Geronimo and Carlo went down, Geronimo sang, Carlo held out his hat, and the travellers gave them alms. Geronimo seemed perfectly quiet now. Several times he asked "How much?" and nodded slightly at Carlo's answers. In the meantime Carlo himself tried to collect his thoughts. But his only feeling was a dull conviction that something dreadful had happened, and that he was quite helpless.

When the brothers went up the stairs again, they heard the confused talk and laughter of the drivers up above. The youngest of them shouted out to Geronimo "Sing us something, we'll pay you for it — won't we?" and turned towards the others.

Maria, who had just come in with a bottle of red wine, said: "Let him alone to-day, he's in a bad temper."

Instead of answering, Geronimo stood in the centre of the room and began to sing. When he had finished, the drivers clapped their hands.

"Come here, Carlo," cried one of them, "we want to throw our money into your hat like the people down below." And he took a small coin, and raised his hand as though to drop it in the hat which Carlo held out to him. Then the blind man reached up for the driver's arm and said: "Give it to me, give it to me; it might drop..."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, it might drop between Maria's legs!"

They all laughed, including the landlord and Maria; only Carlo stood there motionless. Never had Geronimo made such jokes!...

"Sit down with us," cried the drivers. "You're a good fellow, you are," and they pushed closer together so as to make room for Geronimo. Their talk became louder and more confused. Geronimo talked too, louder and more gaily than usual, and never stopped drinking. When Maria came down again he tried to pull her to him; one of the drivers laughed and said: "Perhaps you think she's beautiful — why, she's ugly and old."

But the blind man pulled Maria down on to his knee. "You're all fools," he said. "Do you think I need my eyes to see? I know where Carlo is now — eh? — he's standing over by the stove, with his hands in his trouser pockets, and laughing."

They all looked at Carlo, who was leaning against the stove with his mouth open and did actually screw his face into a grin, as if he did not dare to give his brother the lie.

The ostler came in, and said that if the drivers wanted to get to Bormio before it was dark, they would have to hurry. They got up and went out with a clatter. The two brothers were again alone in the inn-parlour. It was the time when as often as not they were in the habit of sleeping. It was the early afternoon and silence used to fall upon the inn at that hour. Geronimo, with his head on the table, seemed to sleep. Carlo began by pacing up and down, then he sat on the bench. He was very tired. He felt as though he were involved in a wearisome dream. He had to think of all manner of things: of yesterday, and the day before, and all the days that had been, and especially of the warm summer days and the white country roads where his brother and he used to wander; and everything seemed so far away and strange, as though it could never be so again.

Late in the afternoon the mail coach from Tyrol arrived, and afterwards at short intervals carriages, also taking the same way to the south. Four times more the brothers had to go down into the courtyard. When they went up the last time dusk had fallen and the little oil lamp that hung down from the ceiling was spluttering. Workmen came in who were employed in a stone quarry near by, and had put up their wooden hutments a hundred yards or so below the inn. Geronimo joined them. Carlo remained alone at the table. He felt as though he had been alone for a very long time.

He heard Geronimo on the other side of the room talking loudly about his young days — indeed, he was nearly shouting — how he still remembered all sorts of things he had seen with his eyes — persons and objects, his father working in the fields, the little garden with the ash tree against the wall, the low house that was theirs, the shoemaker's two little daughters, the vineyard behind the church, even his own boyish face as it had looked at him out of a mirror. How often Carlo had heard it all; to-day he could not bear it. The words had a different ring; and every one that Geronimo uttered seemed to have a new meaning, and to be aimed at him.

He crept out and again went on to the road which now lay in complete darkness. The rain had stopped. The air was very cold, and Carlo was suddenly tempted to go farther and even farther into the darkness, and at last to lie down somewhere in a ditch, sleep, and never wake again.

All at once he heard the rumble of a carriage, and saw the gleam of two lanterns coming nearer and nearer. In the carriage that passed him sat two men. One of them, who had a small clean-shaven face, started with fright when Carlo's form rose up out of the darkness in the light of the lanterns. Carlo stood still and raised his hat. The carriage and the lights disappeared. Carlo again stood in the profound blackness. Suddenly he felt terrified. For the first time fn his life the darkness frightened him. He felt as though he could not bear it for another minute. In some strange way the fear that he felt for himself was confused in his dulled intelligence with an agonizing pity for his blind brother, and he felt impelled to go home.

When he went into the inn-parlour he saw the two travellers who had passed him on the road, sitting at a it table over a bottle of red wine and talking very earnestly together. They hardly looked up when he came in.

At the other table sat Geronimo still among the labourers.

"Where have you been?" said the landlord to him at the door. "Why do you leave your brother alone?"

"What's the matter?" asked Carlo in alarm.

"Geronimo is treating everybody. Of course it's all one to me, but you should remember that bad times will be round again soon."

Carlo went quickly over to his brother and took him by the arm. "Come along," he said.

"What do you want?" shouted Geronimo.

"Come to bed," said Carlo.

"Go away and let me alone! I earn the money — I can do what I like with my own money — eh? You can't pocket all of it. You think he gives it all to me! Oh, no! I'm a blind man! But there are people — good people — who say to me, 'I've given your brother twenty francs.'"

The labourers burst out laughing.

"That will do," said Carlo. "Come along!" and he took his brother off, almost dragged him up the stairway to the bare garret where they lay. And the whole way Geronimo screamed: "Yes, now it's all come out, now I know all about it. You just wait. Where is she? Where is Maria? Or are you putting it in the Savings Bank for her — eh? I sing for you, I play the guitar, you live on me — and you are a thief!" and he collapsed on to the straw mattress.

A dim light glimmered from the corridor; on the other side of it, the door of the only guest room in the inn stood open, and Maria was putting the beds in order for the night. Carlo stood by his brother and watched him as he lay, with bloated face and bluish lips, his damp hair sticking to his forehead, looking years older than he really was. And slowly he began to understand. His blind brother's mistrust was not a thing of to-day, it must have long been slumbering within him, and he had wanted only the occasion, or perhaps the courage, to express it openly. And everything that Carlo had done for him was in vain: vain was his remorse, vain the sacrifice of his whole life. What should he do now? Should he go on, day after day, for who knows how long, leading him through his endless night, watching over him, begging for him, with no other reward than mistrust and abuse? If his brother looked on him as a thief, any stranger would do as well or better than himself. It would probably be wisest to leave him alone, and part from him forever. Then Geronimo would learn how unjust he had been, then he would find out for the first time what it means to be betrayed and robbed, abandoned and wretched. And what was he to do? He was not yet old; and if he were alone he could make a start at several things. As an ostler he could always earn his keep anywhere.

But while these thoughts passed through his head, his eyes remained fixed upon his brother, and he suddenly saw him sitting by himself on a stone at the side of a sunlit road, staring with wide-open eyes up to the heaven that could not blind him and groping in the darkness that always hemmed him in. And he felt that as the blind man had no one in the world but himself so he had no one but his brother. He understood that his love for his brother was the whole meaning of his life, and for the first time it flashed upon his mind that only his faith that the blind man returned his love and had forgiven him had made it possible for him to bear his misery so patiently. He could not at a stroke renounce this hope. He felt that he needed his brother just as deeply as his brother needed him. He could not and he would not leave him. He must either endure his mistrust or find some means to convince the blind man of the groundlessness of his suspicions.

... If only he could somehow lay his hands on a gold piece. If he could say to the blind man early next morning: "I only put it away so that you wouldn't drink it all with the labourers — or, so that you wouldn't be robbed of it..." or something of that sort.

Footsteps approached up the wooden stairs; the travellers were going to their beds. Suddenly an idea flashed through his head: he would knock at the door opposite, tell the strangers the exact truth of what had happened to-day and ask for the twenty francs. And yet he realised at once that it would be futile: they would not believe a word of his story, and he remembered how the pale one had started with terror when he, Carlo, had suddenly appeared out of the darkness in front of the carriage.

He stretched himself out on the straw mattress. It was quite dark in the room. He could hear the labourers talking loudly and then going down the wooden stairs with heavy steps. Soon after that both the gates were shut. Once more the ostler went up the stairs and down again, and then all was still. Carlo could hear nothing but Geronimo's snoring. Soon his thoughts began to move in the labyrinths of dreams. When he awoke it was still pitch dark. He looked towards the place where the window was; and when he strained his eyes he was aware of a dark grey square in the centre of the impenetrable blackness. Geronimo was still sleeping the heavy sleep of a drunken man, and Carlo thought of the day that was to be the morrow and he shuddered. He thought of the night after that day, of the day after that night, of the future that lay before him, and he was filled with horror of the loneliness that he must face. Why had he not been braver that evening? Why had he not gone to the strangers and asked them for twenty francs? Perhaps they would have taken pity on him. And yet, it was perhaps just as well he had not asked them. But why?... He sat up suddenly and felt his heart beating. He now knew why. If they had refused him, he must have been under suspicion, but now... he stared at the grey patch that began to shine dimly.... This that had come into his head against his will was impossible, quite impossible.... The door opposite was fastened, and besides they might wake up.... Yes, there it was — that grey luminous patch in the centre of the darkness was the new day.

Carlo got up, as if something were driving him thither, and laid his forehead against the cold window-pane. Why had he got up?... To think it over?... To make the attempt?... What!... It was impossible and besides it was a crime. A crime?... What do twenty francs mean to such people who travel a thousand miles for their pleasure? They would not so much as miss it. He went to the door and opened it gently. The other door was opposite — two paces away — shut. Some clothes were hanging from a nail in the door post. Carlo passed his hand over them....

Yes, if people left their purses in their pockets, life would be very simple, soon no one would have to go begging.... But the pockets were empty. What could he do now? He had better go back to his room, to the straw mattress. Perhaps there was some better way of getting hold of twenty francs — less dangerous and more honest. If he merely kept back every time a few centimes from what was given them, until he had saved up twenty francs, and then change it all for a gold piece.... But how long would that take?... Months, perhaps a year. Ah, if he only had the courage. He was still standing in the passage. He looked across at the door.... What was that vertical streak from the top to the floor level? Was it possible? The door was only pushed to, it was not locked?... Why was he surprised?... For months past it had been impossible to lock the door. How was that? He remembered; it had only been occupied three times last summer, twice by journeymen and once by a tourist who had hurt his foot. The door did not shut; all he needed now was courage — yes, and luck. The worst that could happen to him was that they might both wake up, and even then he could always find an excuse. He peered through the crack into the room. It was still so dark that he could only recognise the outlines of the two figures on the beds. He listened: they were breathing quietly and evenly. Carlo opened the door gently, and entered the room on his bare feet without a sound. Both the beds lay lengthwise against the wall opposite the window. In the centre of the room was a table. Carlo crept up to it. He ran his hand across the top and felt a bunch of keys, a penknife, a small book — no more. Why, of course!... How could he imagine they would put their money on the table? Well, he had better go away at once now.... And yet, one bold stroke perhaps, and all would be well. He approached the bed nearest to the door. Something was lying on the chair — he felt for it — it was a revolver.

... Carlo started.... Perhaps he had better keep it. Why had the man put his revolver ready? If he awoke and noticed him... No, he would simply say: “Three o’clock, sir; time to get up!” and he left the revolver where it lay.

He crept further into the room. On the other chair, among some underclothes... God! there it was... a purse... he held it in his hand.... At that instant he heard a faint creak. With a quick movement he lay down full length at the foot of the bed.... Another creak — a sound of deep breathing, a clearing of the throat — then all was silent, profoundly silent. Carlo stayed where he was on the floor, with the purse in his hand, and waited. Not a sound or a movement. Already the pale light of dawn began to fill the room. Carlo did not dare to stand up: he crawled along the floor towards the door, which was wide enough open to let him through; he crawled right out into the passage, and not until then did he get up slowly, drawing a deep breath.

He opened the purse: it had three compartments, in the left and right of which were only small silver coins. Carlo then opened the middle one, which was shut by a catch of its own, and felt three twenty-franc pieces. For an instant he thought of taking two of them, but he quickly put the temptation from him, took out one gold piece only and shut the purse. Then he knelt down, looked through the crack into the room, in which all was absolutely still, and gave the purse a push so that it slid under the second bed. When the stranger awoke he must of course think that it had fallen down from the chair. Carlo got up slowly. The floor creaked slightly, and at that moment he heard a voice from within: “What is it? What’s the matter?” Carlo hastily made two steps backward, holding his breath, and slipped into his own room. He was safe now, and he listened.... The bed in the room opposite creaked again, and then all was still. Between his fingers he held the piece of gold. He had done it! He had the twenty francs and now he could say to his brother “You see now I’m not a thief,” and to-day they could start on their wanderings again — southwards to Bormio, then on through the Valtelline... To Tirano... to Edole... to Breno, to Lake Iseo, as they had done last year.... There would be nothing suspicious about it, for the day before yesterday he had said to the landlord, “We’re going down south in a few days.”

It was growing lighter, and the whole room glimmered in the grey dawn. Oh, if only Geronimo would wake up soon! It was so pleasant walking in the early morning. They would start before sunrise. Good morning to the landlord, the ostler, and Maria, and then away.... And not until they were two hours distant, and near the valley, would he tell Geronimo.

Geronimo stretched himself and turned over. Carlo called to him, “Geronimo!”

“Well, what is it?” and he sat up, propping himself on his elbows.

“Geronimo, we must get up.”

“Why?” and he turned His dead eyes towards his brother. Carlo knew that he was calling to mind what had happened yesterday, but he also knew that his brother would not say another word about it until he was drunk again.

“It’s cold, Geronimo; we must go. It won’t get any better here, and I think we should go. We could be in Boladore by midday.”

Geronimo heaved himself up. The noises of the awakening house were already audible. Down in the yard the landlord was talking to the ostler. Carlo stood up and went downstairs. He was always awake early and often went out into the road before the dawn had broken. He went up to the landlord and said: “We’re going off.”

“So soon?” said the landlord.

“Yes, it’s bitter cold standing here in the yard, and the wind goes through you.”

“Well, remember me to Baldetti when you get to Bormio, and tell him not to forget to send me the oil.”

“All right. And... how much for our beds last night?”

“That’s all right, Carlo,” said the landlord. “I’ll present your brother with the twenty centimes. I listened to him too. Good-bye.”

“Thanks,” said Carlo. “But we aren’t in such a hurry as all that. We’ll see you when you come back from the sheds. Bormio won’t move, I don’t suppose.” He laughed and went up the wooden stairs.

Geronimo stood in the middle of the room and said: “Well, I’m ready to go.”

“Right,” said Carlo.

He took their few belongings from an old cupboard that stood in a corner of the room and packed them in a bundle. Then he said: “A fine day, but very cold.”

“I know it,” said Geronimo, and they left the room together.

“Go quietly,” said Carlo, “the two people who came last night are sleeping there.” They walked carefully down the stairs. “The landlord asked me to say good-bye to you,” said Carlo. “He gave us the twenty centimes for last night. He’s gone out down to the sheds and won’t be back for two hours. But we shall see him again next year.”

Geronimo did not answer. They went out on to the main road which lay before them in the pale light of dawn. Carlo took his brother’s left arm, and both walked in silence down towards the valley. After a short stretch they reached the place where the road becomes a series of long-drawn-out curves. Mists rose up to meet them, and above them the heights seemed to be engulfed in cloud. And Carlo thought: “Now I will tell him.”

But Carlo did not say a word; he took the piece of gold out of his pocket and handed it to his brother. The latter took it between the fingers of his right hand, passed it over his cheek and his forehead, and at last nodded. “I knew it,” said he.

“Yes,” said Carlo, and looked at his brother with something like surprise.

“Even if the stranger hadn’t said anything about it, I should still have known it.”

“Yes,” said Carlo helplessly. “But you understand why, among all that crowd up there — I was afraid that you would get rid of it all at once. And, Geronimo, I thought it was time you bought a new coat for yourself, and a shirt and some shoes, I think. So that was why I...”

The blind man shook his head vigorously, “Why should I?” and he passed a hand over his coat. “Good enough, warm enough; now we shall soon be in the south.”

Carlo could not understand why Geronimo did not seem to be glad, and did not say he was sorry. And he went on: “Didn’t I do right, Geronimo? Now we have got it, haven’t we? If I’d told you up there, who knows.... I was quite right not to tell you, surely I was.”

Then Geronimo screamed out: “Stop telling lies, Carlo, I’ve had enough of it.”

Carlo stood still and let go of his brother’s arm. “I’m not telling lies.”

“I know very well you are! You’re always doing it.... You’ve told me hundreds of lies.... You wanted to keep this for yourself as well, but you were afraid, that’s what it was!”

Carlo bowed his head and said nothing. He took the blind man’s arm again and went on. It hurt him that Geronimo should speak so but he was quite astonished that he did not feel more upset.

The mists parted. After a long silence Geronimo said: “It is getting warm.” He spoke indifferently, in a matter-of-fact sort of way, as he had done a hundred times before, and at that moment Carlo felt that nothing had altered for Geronimo. For him he had always been a thief.

“Are you hungry yet?” he asked.

Geronimo nodded, and immediately took a piece of bread and cheese out of his coat pocket and began to eat. And they went on.

The mail from Bormio passed them. “Going down already?” the driver shouted to them. Then came other carriages, all going upwards.

“I can feel the air from the valley,” said Geronimo, and at that moment, after a sharp turn, the Valtelline lay at their feet.

Truly nothing had changed, thought Carlo.... Now I have actually stolen for him, and all to no purpose.

The mist below them was growing thinner, the sun’s rays tore holes in it. And Carlo thought: “Perhaps it was stupid to leave the inn so soon.... The purse is under the bed, which is in any case suspicious. But what did it all matter? Nothing worse could happen to him. His brother, the light of whose eyes he had destroyed, thought he had robbed him, thought he had done so for years, and would always think so — what worse could happen to him?

There below him lay the great white hotel, bathed in the radiance of the morning, and deeper down, where the valley began to widen out, the straggling village lay outstretched. The two went on in silence, and Carlo’s hand still lay on the blind man’s arm. They went past the grounds of the hotel, and on the terrace Carlo saw the guests sitting in light summer clothes over their breakfast.

“Where do you want to stop?” asked Carlo.

“At the ‘Eagle,’ of course, where we always do.”

When they got to the little inn at the end of the village they went inside. They sat down in the barroom and called for some wine.

“Why are you so early this year?” asked the landlord.

Carlo was rather alarmed by this question.

“Is it so early? It’s the 10th or 11th of September, isn’t it?”

“It was much later than this when you came down last year.”

“It’s so cold up above,” said Carlo. “We were frozen last night. By the way, I was to tell you not to forget to send up the oil.”

The air in the bar-room was heavy and thick. A strange restlessness fell upon Carlo: he wanted to be out in the open air again, on the main road that led to Tirano, to Edole, to Lake Iseo — far away into the distance. Suddenly he stood up.

“Are we going already?” asked Geronimo.

“We want to be in Boladore by midday — the carriages stop for a midday rest at the ‘Goat,’ it is a good place.”

And they went. The barber, Benozzi, stood smoking in front of his shop. “Good morning,” he shouted to them. “Well, what’s it like up there? I expect it snowed last night, didn’t it?”

“Yes, it did,” said Carlo and hurried on.

The village lay behind them. The white ribbon of the road wound among meadows and vineyards and along the rushing river. The sky was blue and still. “Why did I do it?” thought Carlo, and he glanced sidelong at the blind man. “His face looks just the same. He has always believed it — I have always been alone — and he has always hated me,” and it seemed to him as though he were walking and walking onward under a heavy load that he could not shake off; as though he could see the darkness through which Geronimo was walking at his side, while all the roads lay shining in the sunlight.

And they went on and on, hour after hour. From time to time Geronimo sat down upon a milestone, or they both leaned against the parapet of a bridge, to get some rest. They came to another village. Before the inn carriages had stopped; travellers had got out and were walking up and down, but the two beggars did not stay. Out once more on to the open road. The sun rose higher and higher: it must be near noon. It was a day like a thousand others.

"The tower of Boladore," said Geronimo. Carlo looked up. He was surprised how accurately Geronimo could calculate distances: the tower of Boladore had in fact appeared on the horizon. Far away in the distance someone was coming towards them. It looked to Carlo as though he had been sitting by the roadside and had suddenly got up. The form came nearer. Then Carlo saw that it was a gendarme, one of those they so often met on the road. None the less Carlo was slightly alarmed. But as the man approached he recognised him and was reassured. It was Pietro Tenelli. Only last May the two beggars had sat with him in Ragazzi's inn in Morignone and heard him tell a dreadful story of how he had been nearly stabbed to death by a brigand.

"Someone has stopped," said Geronimo.

"Tenelli, the gendarme," said Carlo.

By now they had come up to him.

"Good morning, Herr Tenelli," said Carlo, and stopped.

"It so happens," said the gendarme, "that I've got to take both of you to the station at Boladore."

"Eh!" cried the blind man.

Carlo paled. "How is it possible?" he thought. "It can't be on that account. They can't know about that here yet."

"It seems to be on your way," said the gendarme, laughing, "so we may as well go together."

"Why don't you say something, Carlo?" asked Geronimo.

"Yes, yes, of course.... But, please, sir, how is it possible?... What have we... or rather what have I... truly I don't know...."

"Well, there it is. Perhaps you're innocent. How can I tell? In any case we've had a telegram at the station that we're to stop you because you're suspected, strongly suspected, of stealing some money up above there. Of course it's quite possible you didn't. So, come on!"

"Why don't you say something, Carlo?" asked Geronimo.

"Yes, yes... of course...."

"Oh, come along. There's no sense in standing here on the road. It's getting too hot. We shall be there in an hour. On with you!"

Carlo touched Geronimo's arm in his usual way, and they walked slowly on, the gendarme behind them.

"Carlo, why don't you speak?" asked Geronimo again.

"But what do you want me to say, Geronimo; what can I say? It will all come right. I myself don't know..." And suddenly it flashed across his mind: "Shall I tell him before we are brought into court?... No, it's no good. The gendarme would hear us.... Well, what does it matter? I shall tell the truth in court. 'Your Honor,' I shall say, 'this isn't an ordinary theft. This was how it happened....' And then he struggled to find the words to make his affair clear and intelligible to the court. "A gentleman down over the Pass yesterday... he may have been mad... or perhaps he was just mistaken... and this man..."

What nonsense! Who would believe it?... They would not even let him get so far. No one could, that foolish story... not even Geronimo. And he glanced sidelong at him. From old habit, the blind man's head moved up and down, as if keeping time to his walk, but his face was set, and his empty eyes stared into vacancy. And Carlo suddenly knew what kind of thoughts were moving behind that forehead...."'So that's how it is,' Geronimo must be thinking.... 'Carlo steals not only from me but from other people too.... Well, he can do it all right: he has eyes that can see and he uses them.' Yes, that's what Geronimo is thinking, sure enough. They won't find any money on me, but that won't help me — neither with the judge nor with Geronimo. They'll lock me up, and him too.... Yes, him as well as me, as he's got the money."

And he could think no more, he felt so confused. It seemed as though he no longer understood a single thing about the whole affair and knew one thing alone: that he would gladly go to prison for a year or ten years, if only Geronimo might know that he, Carlo, had become a thief for his sake alone.

And suddenly Geronimo stood still, and Carlo had to stop also.

"Now what's the matter?" said the gendarme irritably. "Get on, do!" But he saw with surprise that the blind man had let fall his guitar, raised his arms, and was groping with both hands for his brother's cheeks. Then he brought his lips close to Carlo's mouth, who did not at first realise what was happening, and kissed him.

"Are you crazy?" asked the gendarme. "Come along, both of you. I don't want to stand here and get roasted."

Geronimo picked up the guitar, without uttering a word. Carlo took a deep breath and again laid his hand on the blind man's arm. Was it possible? Was his brother no longer angry with him? Did he at last understand? And he looked at his brother with a doubtful sidelong glance.

"Come on!" shouted the gendarme, "I'm sick of this," and he gave Carlo a jab in the ribs.

And Carlo, still guiding his brother with a firm grip on his arm, went on once more: and he walked at a much faster pace. For he saw Geronimo smile a gentle radiant smile that he had never seen on his brother's face since the days of his boyhood. And Carlo smiled too. He felt as though nothing evil could happen to him any more — neither in the police court, nor anywhere in the world. He had found his brother again — or, rather, he had found him for the first time.

ANDREAS THAMEYER'S LAST LETTER

I CANNOT POSSIBLY GO ON LIVING; FOR SO LONG AS I am alive people will despise me and no one will realise the truth. But the truth is that my wife was faithful — I swear it by all that I hold sacred, and I seal it with my death.

I have read a number of books dealing with these difficult and mysterious matters, and if there are persons who find such things essentially incredible, on the other hand there are scholars of importance who are entirely convinced, and I propose here and now to bring forward some instances that to every unprejudiced person must seem irresistible.

Malebranche relates that a certain woman, upon the occasion of the canonisation ceremonies of the blessed Pius, looked at his portrait so intently that the boy which she soon after brought into the world was exactly like the saint; his face showed all the tired lines of old age, his arms were crossed over his chest, his eyes turned up to heaven, and, over and above all this, the saint's voluminous cowl appeared in the form of a birthmark on his shoulder. But if, in spite of the authority of the witness, a disciple of the famous philosopher, Descartes, anyone should consider this story insufficiently confirmed, perhaps he will be satisfied with Martin Luther's evidence. Luther, in fact — as may be read in his table-talk — knew a citizen of Wittenberg with a head like a skull, and it was proved that the mother of this unfortunate man had been greatly shocked by the sight of a corpse during her pregnancy. But the story that seems to me the most significant and offers no reasonable ground for doubt is recorded by Heliodorous in the Libri Aethiopicorum. According to this esteemed author, the Queen Persina, after a childless marriage of ten years, bore her husband, Hydaspes, king of the Aethiopians, a white daughter, which, from fear of her husband's probable wrath, she caused to be exposed immediately after its birth: but with the child was a girdle on which was set out the true cause of this mysterious occurrence. In the garden of the royal palace, where the queen received the embraces of her dusky consort, there were magnificent marble statues of Greek gods and goddesses, which had been the objects of Persina's enraptured gaze. But the power of the spirit can go still further, and these views are not merely confined to the superstitious and the ignorant, as is proved by the following circumstance which took place in France in the year 1637. A woman gave birth to a boy after four years' absence from her husband, and she swore that at the appropriate interval before its birth she had dreamt with great vividness that her husband had embraced her with unusual ardour. The doctors and midwives of Montpellier declared on oath that the occurrence was possible, and the Courts of Havre conferred on the boy all the rights of legitimate birth. I find a further instance in Hamberg's Mysterious Natural Events, page 74 — to the effect that a woman, who in the seventh month of her pregnancy had gone with her husband and her mother to see a lion-tamer, gave birth to a child with a lion's head. Moreover, I have read a story — which may be found in Limböck's On the Effect of Shock on Pregnant Women — about a child being born with a large scar on its cheek because the mother had seen the house opposite burn down a few weeks before the event. And other highly remarkable matters are to be found in the same book. As I write this, it lies before me on the table, and I have just been looking through it; these are confirmed and scientifically established occurrences, and what has occurred to me, or rather to my dear wife — who has been faithful to me as sure as I am sitting here now — is equally well established.

Will you forgive me, my dear, if I decide that I must die? You see I cannot help it. It is only from love of you that I am going to die, because I cannot bear these people to despise and mock both you and me. Then they will indeed stop laughing, then they will understand it all, as I understand it. And you, who are to find me for her and find this letter for her, must know that while I write this she is sleeping in the room near by, quietly sleeping, the sleep that only a good conscience can bring: and her child — our child, now a fortnight old, is lying in the cradle near the bed and is also sleeping. And before I leave the house I shall go in and kiss my wife and my child on the forehead without awakening them. I am writing this all down so carefully that no one may think I am mad.... No, I have considered the matter well, and I am perfectly composed. As soon as I have finished this letter I shall go out in the darkness of the night through the empty streets, farther and farther, to where I so often used to go with my wife in the first years of our marriage — to Dörnbach — and farther still, into the forest. Yes, I have considered it all, and I am in complete possession of my senses.

This is the story. My name is Andreas Thameyer, I am an official in the Austrian Savings Bank, aged 33, living at Hernals, No. 64 Hauptstrasse, married four years ago. I knew my wife for seven years before we were married, and she refused two proposals because she loved me and wished to wait for me: a Kommissär with a salary of 1,800 gulden, and a very handsome young medical student from Trieste who was lodging with her parents — mark this well! She refused them for my sake, although I was neither handsome nor rich, and although our marriage had to be put off from year to year. And now people are saying that this woman has betrayed me — she who waited patiently for me for seven years! Really, they are too stupid and despicable — they cannot see into our inner selves, as I wish I could make mine clear; malicious, coarse brutes! However, now they will all hold their tongues.... Yes, now they will all be saying, "We were in the wrong, we now realise that your wife was true to you, and you had no need to kill yourself." But I say to you, I had! For so long as I was alive you would still have despised us, all of you. Only one person was decent and kind, and that was old Doctor Brauner.... Yes, he told me at once. Before he took me in he said to me: "My dear Thameyer, don't be frightened, and don't excite yourself or your wife. Such things have often happened. I will bring you Limböck's book to-morrow, and others on the effects of shock during pregnancy." These books lie before me now, and I must ask my relatives to be so good as to see that the excellent Doctor Brauner gets his books back with my sincerest thanks. I have no further instructions to leave behind me. My will was made long ago, I have no reason for altering it, as my wife was true to me and the child that she bore me is my child. The fact that its skin is so strange a colour I shall now explain in the simplest manner. Only malevolence and ignorance can reject this explanation, and I venture to maintain that if we lived among people who were not malicious and stupid I should not need to die, for everyone would accept it. But they will not, and they smile and laugh.

Herr Gustav Rengelhofer, my wife's uncle, to whom I have always shown the greatest respect, winked in a manner very offensive to me when we first saw my child; and my own mother — well, she pressed my hand in a very peculiar way, as though I stood in need of sympathy; and my colleagues at the office whispered together when I came in yesterday; and the concierge, to whose children I gave my old worn-out watch at Christmas — a watch-case of that kind has still some use as a toy — the concierge stifled a laugh as I passed him yesterday. Our cook put on a drunken-looking grin, and the grocer at the corner has already stared after me three or four times — just now he stopped in his doorway and said to an old lady: "That's him." And to show how quickly these ridiculous rumours have spread, people whom I do not know have heard of it, I do not know how. When I was driving home yesterday in an omnibus I heard three old women inside talking about me; I heard my Christian name quite clearly. I was standing outside by the conductor.

For this reason I ask in a voice that all may hear (I use the expression advisedly although this is a written statement) — I ask, What am I to do? What else can I do? I cannot say to everybody: "Read Hamberg's Wonders of Nature, and Limböck's remarkable work On the Effect of Shock on Pregnant Women." I cannot go on my knees to them and say: “Don’t be so cruel: you must understand.... My wife has always been faithful to me!”

She had a shock when she went to the Zoological Gardens with her sister last August, when those unpleasant black natives had a camp there. I can give my oath she had a shock, for what happened was this. On that day, and for a few days previously, I had been in the country with my parents — my father, in fact, was ill, very ill... so much so that he actually died a few weeks afterwards. However, that is incidental. So Anna was by herself. And when I got back I found her in bed — my absence had been too much for her, perhaps. Anyway, there she was. And I had only been away for three days. My wife loved me as much as that. So I had to sit down on her bed and get her to tell me how she had spent those three days. And without my having questioned her she told me everything and I set it down here with the exactness called for by the circumstances. On Monday she had spent the whole morning at home, but in the afternoon she went with Fritzi — as we call her unmarried sister, her real name is Friederike — she went into town with Fritzi to make some purchases. Fritzi is engaged to an excellent young man who has a position in Germany, in a large mercantile house in Bremen, and Fritzi is soon to join him to be married.... However, this too is by the way, I quite realise that. On Tuesday my wife spent the entire day at home as it was raining. It rained that day in the country, at my parents’ house, as I can well remember. Then came Wednesday. That day Fritzi and my wife went in the evening to the Zoological Gardens where there was a nigger camp. I might mention here that I myself saw these people later on, in September — I went there one Sunday evening with Rudolf Bittner and his wife: Anna absolutely refused to go, she could not forget her terrible experience on that fatal Wednesday. She told me she had never felt such terror as that evening when she was alone near the nigger camp.... Alone, because Fritzi had suddenly got lost.... I cannot conceal this fact. I will, indeed, say nothing against Fritzi as this is my last letter; but it seems not out of place to give Fritzi a warning not to be untrue to her fiancé for he, as an honourable man himself, would be very unhappy about it. Unfortunately, however, it remains a fact that on that evening Herr... though why should I mention his name here?... To cut the matter short, that evening Fritzi lost herself in the company of this gentleman whom I know very well, and whose reputation is none of the best, although he is married; and my poor wife was suddenly alone. It was a misty evening, such as we often have in late summer: for my part I never go out into the Prater in the evening without an overcoat.... I remember there are often grey vapours overhanging the meadows, in which the lights are reflected.... Well, it was just such an evening that Wednesday; Fritzi had disappeared, and my Anna was alone — quite suddenly alone.... It is quite understandable that she was overcome with awful terror at the sight of these gigantic creatures with their glittering eyes and great black beards.... For three whole hours she waited for Fritzi, and kept on hoping that she would come back; but at last the gates were on the point of being shut and she had to go. Thus it happened. Anna told me all this in the early morning, as I sat on her bed, as I have mentioned before.... She had flung her arms round my neck and was trembling; her eyes were all clouded, so that I was quite frightened, and on that day I knew as little as she did, what I came to know later. For had I known that she already carried our child under her heart, I would never, never have allowed her to walk with Fritzi in the Prater on a misty evening, and expose herself to all sorts of risks. Anything may be a risk for a woman in her condition.... Of course, if Fritzi had not lost herself, my wife would never have got into such a state of terror: that was the worst part of it — how she was left, alone and trembling for Fritzi.... Well, it’s all over now, and I would not throw a stone at anyone. But I have written all this down, for I wish the whole affair to be made absolutely clear. If I had not, who knows whether those contemptible people might not have gone on forever saying, “He killed himself because his wife betrayed him.”... No, my friends, once more I say it, my wife is faithful to me and the child she bore is mine. And I love them both until my last moment. It is only you who are driving me to my death — all those of you who are too contemptible or too malignant to believe or to understand. And the more I appealed to you and tried to make you see the scientific explanation of what has happened — I know you — the more you would jeer and laugh, if not to my face, then behind my back — or you would even say: “Thameyer is mad.”

Well, my worthy friends, I have deprived you of that pleasure: I am dying for my conviction, for the truth, and above all for the honour of my wife; for when I am dead you will not despise my wife, nor laugh at me: you will realise that such things do happen, just as they are recorded by Hamberg, Heliodorous, Malebranche, Weisenburg, Preuss, Limböck, and the rest. And you, my dearest mother, you should not have pressed by hand as if I needed sympathy! Now you will ask my wife’s forgiveness — I know you will.

Now, I think, I have no more to say. It is striking one. Good-night, my dear ones. Now I am going once more into the next room to kiss my wife and child for the last time — and then I shall go. Farewell.

EDEGONDA'S DIARY

YESTERDAY NIGHT, AS I WAS SITTING FOR A WHILE on a bench in the park on my way home, I suddenly saw a man of whose presence I had been quite unaware leaning back in the opposite corner. As there is no lack of empty benches at this late hour, the appearance of this nocturnal neighbour struck me as rather suspicious, and I was just about to make a move when the stranger, who was wearing a long grey overcoat and yellow gloves, raised his hat, addressed me by name, and wished me good evening. And I recognised him with a feeling of agreeable surprise. It was Dr. Gottfried Wehwald, a well-mannered young gentleman, with, indeed, a certain distinction of demeanour, which seemed to be, to him at least, a source of perpetual silent satisfaction. About four years before he had been transferred from the offices of the Vienna municipality to a small country town in lower Austria, but emerged from time to time among his friends at the café, where he was always greeted with that restrained warmth that seemed appropriate to his elegant reserve. So I thought it better, although I had not seen him since Christmas, to display no sort of surprise at the time and place of our meeting; I returned his greeting politely but with an air of indifference, and prepared to start a conversation as between men of the world who must not show the slightest surprise at a casual meeting in Australia, when, with an impatient wave of the hand, he remarked shortly:

"I beg your pardon, my dear fellow, but my time is limited, and I have come here specially to tell you a rather singular story, provided, of course, that you are willing to hear it."

I was rather taken aback by this address; however, I said I was quite ready to listen, but I could not help expressing my surprise that Dr. Wehwald had not come to see me at the café; how he had succeeded in finding me at night here in the park; and why I should be selected for the honour of listening to his story.

"The answer to the first two questions," he replied, with unusual sharpness, "will appear in the course of my narration. My choice fell on you, my dear fellow" (as he continued to address me), "because I knew you were something of an author, and I thought I might rely on my strange but rather unconventional communication being tolerably reproduced and published."

I made some deprecatory remark, whereupon Dr. Wehwald, with a singular twitch of the nostrils, began without further preamble:

"The heroine of my story is called Redegonda. She was the wife of a cavalry captain, Baron T. of the X Dragoons, then quartered in our little town of Z." (He actually used these letters, although not only the name of the small town, but for reasons that will soon appear, both the captain's name and the number of the dragoon regiment could be no secret to me.) "Redegonda," proceeded Dr. Wehwald, "was a woman of extraordinary beauty, and I fell in love with her, as the phrase goes, at first sight. Unfortunately, I had no opportunity of making her personal acquaintance, as the officers scarcely mixed at all with the civil population and extended this exclusiveness, in a manner that was almost offensive, to those who, like myself, were members of the administrative services. So I only saw Redegonda from afar, alone or by her husband's side, and often in the company of other officers and officers' wives, walking through the streets.

Many a time I caught sight of her at a window of her house on the Central Square, or saw her in the evening driving in a jolting carriage to the little theatre, when I had the satisfaction of looking up from the pit to her box, which was much frequented by young officers in the intervals. Sometimes it seemed as though she condescended to notice me. But her glance flashed on me for so brief an instant and then passed that I could draw no conclusions from it. I had already given up the hope of ever being able to lay my homage at her feet when one marvellous autumn morning she came upon me quite unexpectedly in the small park-like wood that stretches from the eastern gate of the town far into the country. With an imperceptible smile she passed me by — perhaps, in fact, she did not notice me — and had soon disappeared behind the yellowing foliage. I had let her pass without even considering whether I could have greeted her or addressed so much as a word to her; and now that she had disappeared from my ken I did not think of regretting that I had not tried, since I could hardly have expected any success. But then something singular happened. I felt myself suddenly impelled to imagine what would have been the result if I had found the courage to go up and speak to her. And, in my fancy, I saw Redegonda, so far from repulsing me, not trying to conceal her satisfaction at my boldness, and in the course of a lively conversation freely lamenting the emptiness of her existence and the inferiority of her society, and expressing her pleasure at having found in me an understanding and sympathetic soul. And so encouraging was the look she gave me at parting that on the evening of the same day — all this, including the parting glance existing only in my imagination — when I saw her again in her box, I felt just as though a precious secret made an invisible bond between us. You will not be surprised, my dear fellow, that I, who had received so extraordinary a proof of the power of my imagination, was careful we should soon meet again in the same way, and that upon each occasion the intercourse should grow more friendly, more confidential, and more ardent, until one lovely day, under the now leafless branches, the adored one sank into my longing arms. Then I gave rein to my delicious frenzy and it was not long before Redegonda visited me in my small lodging at the far end of the town, and I knew such intoxicating bliss the like of which paltry reality had never brought to me. We did not lack dangers, either, to season our adventure. It happened once in the course of the winter that the captain galloped past us as we were driving, covered with furs, along a country road into the night, and already there arose in my mind a foreboding of what was soon to come upon us with the full weight of destiny. In early spring it was reported in the town that the dragoon regiment, to which Redegonda's husband belonged, was to be transferred to Galicia. My — nay, our — despair was boundless. Nothing that could enter lovers' minds in such extremity, nothing was left unsaid: we would fly together, die together, or sadly acquiesce to the inevitable. However, the last evening came without our having made a definite resolution. I was expecting Redegonda in my flowerdecked room. So as to be prepared for all emergencies my trunk was packed, my revolver loaded, and my farewell letters written. That, my dear fellow, is actual fact. For so entirely had I been mastered by my madness that I not merely thought that, on this, the last evening before the regiment went off, my mistress would be able to come, but I actually expected her. I could not, as of old, summon up her shadow picture, dream the heavenly creature into my arms: no, I felt as though something unaccountable, perhaps frightful, was holding her at home. A hundred times I went to the door, listened down the stairs, looked out of the window, strained my eyes to see Redegonda approaching along the street. Yes, in my impatience, I was on the point of rushing forth to find Redegonda, clasp her to me, and, with the right of the lover and his beloved, claim her from her husband — until at last, stricken as though by fever, I sank down upon my divan. Then suddenly — it was near midnight — the bell rang outside. For the ring at the bell, you must understand, was no longer imagination. It rang a second and third time, and its tinkle, shrill and not to be denied, awoke me to the full consciousness of reality. But at the same moment, as I recognised that until this evening my adventure had been but a strange succession of dreams, I felt a rash hope awake within me — a hope that Redegonda, gripped in her very soul by the power of my longing, had been drawn and driven to my house, and now stood outside upon my threshold, and that in another minute I should hold her very self in my arms. In this delicious expectation I went to the door and opened it. But it was not Redegonda that stood before me, it was Redegonda's husband: he himself, as real and as living as you who sit at the other end of this bench, and he stared into my face.

“There was, of course, nothing for me to do but to let him come into my room, where I invited him to sit down. But he remained standing, and, with an expression of indescribable contempt on his lips, he said:

“‘You are expecting Redegonda. Unfortunately she is prevented from coming. She is, in fact, dead.’ “‘Dead!’ I repeated, and the world stood still. Unmoved, the captain continued: ‘An hour ago I found her sitting at her writing-table, with this small book in front of her, which, to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding, I have brought with me. She probably died of fright when I came so unexpectedly into the room. These lines here are the last she wrote. Look!’ “He handed me a small open book, bound in violet leather, and I read the following words:

“‘Now I am leaving my home forever; my lover waits for me.’

“I merely nodded slowly, as if in confirmation.

“‘You will have guessed,’ continued the captain, ‘that what you have in your hand is Redegonda’s diary. Perhaps you will have the goodness to look through it, so as to make any attempt at denial useless.’ I looked it through — no, I read it. I read it for nearly an hour, while the captain sat motionless on the divan; I read the whole history of our love — that sweet and marvellous tale in all its details: the autumn morning when I first spoke to Redegonda in the wood; our first kiss; our walks; our trips into the country; our hours of bliss in my flower-decked room; our plans for death and flight; our happiness and our despair. All was there, set down in those pages, all that had never happened to me in reality, and yet exactly as it had happened in my imagination. And I did not find that at all so inexplicable as you, my dear fellow, seem clearly to find it at this moment. For it came over me that Redegonda had loved me as I had loved her, and that she had thus acquired the mysterious power of realising in her own imagination the adventures that took place in mine. And since she, being a woman, was nearer than I to the springs of life, where desire and fulfillment are one, she was probably profoundly convinced that she had really felt and done all that was set down in her little violet book. But there was yet another thing that I thought possible: that the whole diary was nothing more nor less than a deliberate revenge upon me, a revenge for my irresolution in not letting my, and her, dreams become a reality; yes, that her sudden death was the work of her own will, and that it had been her intention in this way to get the treacherous diary into her deceived husband’s hands. But I had no time to dwell upon these problems, for the captain there could be only one — the natural — explanation, and I placed myself at his disposal in the words appropriate to such occasions....”

“Without attempting...”

“To deny anything?” interrupted Dr. Wehwald sharply. “Oh, even if such an attempt had had the slightest prospect of success, it would have seemed to me deplorable. For I felt myself entirely responsible for all the consequences of an adventure that I had wanted to experience, though I had been too cowardly to try. ‘I am anxious,’ said the captain, ‘to dispose of our business before Redegonda’s death is known. It is now one in the morning: our witnesses can meet at three, and by five o’clock the affair should be over.’ I again nodded as a sign of understanding. The captain departed with a cold salutation. I put my papers in order, went out of the house, fetched two acquaintances of mine from the office out of their beds — one was a count — told them no more than was necessary to get them to despatch the affair as quickly as possible, and then walked up and down the Central Square, opposite the darkened windows behind which I knew Redegonda’s body was lying, and I had the clear conviction that the fulfillment of my destiny was upon me. At five in the morning, in the little wood, quite near the place where I could have spoken to Redegonda the first time, the captain and I faced each other, pistol in hand.”

“And you killed him?”

“No. My bullet grazed his temple. But he shot me through the heart. I fell dead on the spot, as the phrase goes."

"What!" I gasped, turning a perplexed glance on my singular neighbour. But there was no one. Dr. Wehwald was no longer sitting in the corner of the bench. Indeed, I have reasons for thinking that he had never sat there. On the other hand I at once remembered that in the café yesterday evening there had been much talk of a duel in which our friend, Dr. Wehwald, had been shot by a cavalry captain of the name of Teuerheim. The circumstance that Frau Redegonda, on the very same day, had vanished into space with a young lieutenant of the regiment, roused the company, out of their serious mood, to a sort of melancholic amusement, and they were all inclined to suspect that Dr. Wehwald, whom we had all known as the paragon of correctness, discretion, and refinement, had — quite in his own style — half willingly and half against his will, paid for another's happiness with his own death.

As regards the appearance of Dr. Wehwald on the park bench, it would certainly have considerably gained in impressiveness and singularity if it had been forthcoming before the chivalrous end of the original. And I will not deny that it did occur to me to heighten the effect of my narrative by this quite trifling alteration. But after brief reflection I shrank before the possibility of the charge that the description of such a mystery provided fresh evidence for spiritualism and other dangerous matters, and I foresaw enquiries as to whether the story was true or fictitious and whether I believed such happenings were possible or not — and I should have had before me the painful alternative of figuring, in accordance with my answer, as an occultist or a fraud. Finally, therefore, I thought it better to set down the history of my nocturnal encounter exactly as it happened, fully realising the danger that many people will, even so, doubt its truth — in that widespread mistrust which authors, though with less reason than most other people, always seem to provoke.

DEAD GABRIEL

SHE DANCED PAST HIM ON THE ARM OF A MAN whom he did not know, nodded her head very slightly, and smiled. Ferdinand bowed more deeply than usual. So she is here, he thought to himself in surprise, and suddenly felt a new sense of freedom. If Irene, only a month after Gabriel's death, can bring herself to wear a ball dress and glide round a brightly lit room with an agreeable stranger, he felt he might cease reproaching himself for appearing at such a place of public gaiety. For the first time this evening, after a month's quiet seclusion, he had been seized by the desire to go out into the world once more. To his parents' pleasant surprise, who had scarcely been able to understand their son's deep depression over the death of a merely casual acquaintance, he had appeared at dinner in his evening clothes, announced his intention of going to the Law Students' Ball, and soon departed with the comfortable sensation of having given the kind old people a small pleasure without much trouble to himself.

In the cab that drove him to the Sophiensäle he still felt a slight sinking at the heart. He thought of the night when he had looked down from Wilhelmine's window and seen a dark form pacing up and down by the park railings, of the morning when, while still lying in bed, he had found the news of Gabriel's suicide in the paper, of the moment when Wilhelmine had shown him the pathetic letter in which Gabriel, without a word of reproach, had taken eternal leave of her. Even while he was going up the broad staircase, and in the ballroom itself, amid the din of the orchestra, he did not feel more cheerful: only Irene's glance had put him into a brighter mood.

He had known Irene now for several years without having taken any special interest in her, and to him, as to all frequenters of the house, her inclination for Gabriel had remained no secret. One evening when Ferdinand, shortly before Christmas, had been at her parents' house, she had sung a few songs in her pleasant husky voice. Gabriel had accompanied her upon the piano, and Ferdinand particularly remembered asking himself why that worthy young man did not marry that charming, simple creature, instead of hanging on to the magnificent Wilhelmine, who would be sure to betray him very soon. That he himself was designed by fate to fulfil this presentiment, Ferdinand, of course, had then not the least suspicion. So far as his share of the guilt of Gabriel's death was concerned, Anastasius Trehenhof, who understood all things earthly and divine, had at once convinced him that his part in the whole situation had not been that of an individual but of a social force, and that the matter was possibly one for mild regret but in no way an occasion for serious remorse. Still, it had been a painful moment for Ferdinand when he stood with Wilhelmine at Gabriel's grave, on which still lay the withered garlands, and his companion suddenly turned to him, as he stood there with the tears streaming down his cheeks, and said, in the tone he had heard so often on the stage, "Yes, you miserable creature, you may well weep now." An hour later, of course, she swore that better men than Gabriel had been willing to die for her sake, and in these last few days it often seemed to Ferdinand as though she had simply forgotten the whole tragic business. Trehenhof was also able to explain this singular circumstance by maintaining that women had more of the elemental in them than men, and from the beginning were created to bear with composure what cannot be changed.

For the second time Irene danced past Ferdinand and again she smiled. But her smile seemed different this time; it was more friendly and more inviting, and her gaze remained fixed on Ferdinand as she glided off again and disappeared with her partner into the crowd. When the waltz had come to an end Ferdinand walked round the room, wondering what had decoyed him to such a place where the dignified melancholy of his existence, to which the passionate hours spent in Wilhelmine's arms now lent but the impress of a mournful charm, was bound to be disturbed by all the clamorous banalities of a public ball. And he was suddenly seized by a longing, not merely to leave the place, but very soon — possibly to-morrow — to leave Vienna and start on a journey to the south, to Sicily or Egypt. He even reflected whether he should say good-bye to Wilhelmine — when Irene suddenly stood before him. She inclined her head slightly and returned his greeting; he offered her his arm, led her through the throng in the ballroom, up the halfdozen steps to the broad dais, dotted with supper tables, that surrounded the dancing-floor. At that moment the music started again, and as the first chords rang out Irene said softly: "He is dead, and we two are here." Ferdinand felt a little alarmed, unconsciously hastened his step, and at last remarked: "To-day is the first time I have come into such a large company."

"It is the third time for me," Irene replied in a clear voice. "I have been once to a theatre and once to an evening party."

"Was it amusing?" asked Ferdinand.

"I don't know. Someone played the piano, someone else sang some comic songs, and then we danced."

"Yes, it is always the same," remarked Ferdinand.

They were standing by a door. "I am engaged for the quadrille," said Irene, "but I shall not dance. Let us escape to the gallery."

Ferdinand led Irene up the narrow, chilly, spiral staircase. He noticed a few scattered flecks of powder on Irene's shoulders. She wore her dark hair in a heavy knot low down on her neck. Her arm lay lightly upon his. The door to the gallery stood open, and a waiter, who was sitting in the first box, hastily got up.

"I should like a glass of champagne," said Irene.

"Oh!" thought Ferdinand, "perhaps she is going to be more interesting than I imagined. Or is it affectation?"

He ordered the wine and then moved a chair back for her so that she could not be seen from below.

"You were a friend of his?" asked Irene, and looked him straight in the eyes.

"A friend? I can hardly say that. In any case in the last few years our relations were very slight." And he thought to himself: "How strangely she looks at me. I wonder if she guesses that..." But he went on: "Five or six years ago I went to a few lectures with him at the University. As a matter of fact, we were both studying law in a casual sort of way. Then, three years ago, in the autumn, we went on a bicycling tour from Innsbruck, where we had met quite by chance, over the Brenner. We parted again in Verona: I returned to Vienna and he went on to Rome."

Irene nodded several times, as if she had just been listening to somebody that she knew quite well.

"In Rome," Ferdinand continued, "he in fact wrote his first play, or rather his first that was produced."

"Yes," said Irene.

"He did not have much luck," remarked Ferdinand.

The champagne stood on the table, and Ferdinand poured it out. They clinked glasses, and while they were drinking, they looked earnestly into each other's eyes as if the first glass was a toast to the memory of the departed. Then Irene put her glass down and said quietly, "He killed himself over the Bischof woman."

"So people say," Ferdinand replied simply, and with a sense of satisfaction that his expression did not betray him.

The opening bar of the quadrille crashed out so furiously that the champagne glasses trembled.

"Do you know the Bischof personally?" asked Irene.

"Yes," replied Ferdinand. Then she does not suspect, he thought. Of course not. If she did, she would not be drinking champagne with me up here. Or perhaps she might all the more...?

"I saw the Bischof the other day as Medea," said Irene. "I only went to the theatre on her account. Since the first performance of Gabriel's play last winter I had never seen her on the stage. Did the affair begin then?"

Ferdinand shrugged his shoulders; he had no idea. "She is a great artist," he observed.

"That is quite possible," Irene replied; "but I don't think that gives her the right to..."

"What right?" asked Ferdinand, as he filled the glasses once more.

"The right to drive a man to his death," said Irene, finishing her sentence and staring into vacancy.

"Yes," said Ferdinand thoughtfully, "where the right begins on the one side and the responsibility on the other it is difficult to decide. And if one does not know the more intimate circumstances of the case, how can one... In any case, Fräulein Bischof is one of those beings who — how shall I say? — seems to belong to a more primitive world than ours, and is not to be judged by our measure."

Irene had laid her small old-fashioned ivory fan upon the table; she picked it up and drew it across her cheeks and forehead, as if to cool herself. Then she drank a glass of wine at a gulp, and said: "That she wasn't faithful to him — well, that I can understand. But why wasn't she straightforward with him? Why didn't she say to him: 'It is all over: I love another, let us part'? It would have hurt him very much, but it would not have driven him to his death."

"Who knows?" said Ferdinand slowly.

"Of course it would not," repeated Irene sharply. "It was disgust that drove him to that — simply disgust. He must have thought to himself: 'the very same words she used to me, the very same endearments...'" A shiver went through her body, her gaze wandered across the balustrade down into the hall, and she was silent.

Ferdinand looked at her and could not understand how any man on earth could kill himself for Wilhelmine's sake when this girl was in love with him. At this moment he doubted more deeply than ever whether Gabriel had ever had any talent. It was true that he had only the vaguest recollection of the piece in which Wilhelmine had played the leading part the year before, and after the failure of which, as a sort of compensation, she had become Gabriel's mistress. Then, with averted eyes, Irene said softly: "Did you see nothing of him, then, these last few years?"

"Very little," answered Ferdinand. "It was not until last autumn that we met again a few times. I ran into him once in the Ring. He was with the Bischof, and we all had supper together in the Volksgarten. It was a very pleasant evening. One could still sit in the open air although it was already the end of October. Then we met a few times after that evening, once or twice actually in Fräulein Bischof's flat. Yes, it might have seemed to some extent, as though we had found each other again after a long interval. But nothing came of it." Ferdinand glanced at Irene and smiled.

"Now I will tell you something," said Irene. "I had intended to call on Fräulein Bischof."

"What!" cried Ferdinand, and looked at Irene's forehead, which was very white and higher than girl's foreheads usually are.

The quadrille was at an end, and the music stopped. A confused hum of voices surged up from below. A few indifferent words rang out more clearly as though they had been strong enough to force their way through the din.

"I had really quite made up my mind," said Irene, as she snapped her ivory fan to and fro, "but it was very childish of me, I know — my courage always failed me at the last moment."

"Why did you want to call on her?" asked Ferdinand.

"Why? Surely that is very simple. I wanted to see her face to face, to hear her voice, I wanted to know how she speaks and moves in daily life, and ask her questions about all manner of ordinary things. Can't you understand that?" she added with sudden vehemence, laughed shortly, drank a mouthful of wine, and went on. "It is interesting to know what these women are really like, these secret creatures, that are to be judged by a different standard, in your opinion, these women for whom good men kill themselves, and who then appear on the stage three days later, tall and magnificent, as if nothing in the world were changed."

Two men sauntered past, stopped, turned, and stared at Irene.

Ferdinand was annoyed, and decided, if this insolence lasted a second longer, to get up and call the two men to account. And he saw himself already exchanging cards, receiving seconds, driving through the Prater in the grey dawn, wounded in the chest, sinking down on to the damp earth, and last of all Wilhelmine standing with some actor at his graveside. But before the second's grace had elapsed they had ceased to stare and walked on. And Ferdinand again heard Irene's voice.

"I should have the courage now," she said, with a strange half-despairing smile.

"Courage for what?" asked Ferdinand.

"Courage to go and see Fräulein Bischof."

"Go and see Fräulein Bischof... now?"

"Yes, now, at once. What do you think of it?" and she swayed her shoulders in time with the music. "Or shall we dance a waltz?"

"After all, it isn't far off," said Ferdinand.

"Isn't it marvellous?" said Irene, with a merry look. "What has changed since we have been sitting in this box and drinking champagne? Nothing. Not the least thing. And suddenly one realises that death is not so dreadful as one had usually imagined. Look: I feel quite prepared to throw myself down from here — or from the top of a tower. I should not mind in the least — really! And how well we have got to know each other! But you must thank Gabriel for that."

"I never imagined..." began Ferdinand, with a polite smile, and he noticed that his heart was throbbing slightly.

The merry look had gone from Irene's eyes: they were large, dark, and serious. "And do you know what was in my mind?" she said, without listening to him. "I wanted to introduce myself as a budding actress or simply as an enthusiastic admirer. 'For a long time I've been longing to... I've been so terribly anxious to...' that's how I should have begun. These women are all very vain, aren't they?"

"That is part of their profession," replied Ferdinand.

"Ah, I should have flattered her so that she would have been simply enchanted, and would certainly have asked me to come again.... And I would have come many times, we should have become very intimate — friends, in fact; until one day — yes — I should have screamed into her face some time or other: 'Do you know what you did? Do you know what you are? A murderess. That's what you are, Fräulein Bischof.'"

Ferdinand looked at her with astonishment, and again wondered what sort of a fool this Gabriel must have been.

A buzz and a clatter rose up from the room, and it all seemed to come from further away than before. Two couples walked by, sat down not far away at a table by the wall, talking and laughing loudly. Then the orchestra crashed out into another dance.

"Supposing I went to see her now?" asked Irene.

"Now?"

"Do you think she would receive me?"

"It would be an odd time to go," said Ferdinand, with a smile.

“Oh, well, it can’t be nearly midnight yet, and she was acting to-day.”

“How do you know?”

“There’s nothing surprising about that, it was in the paper, wasn’t it? She will just have come home. It would be the simplest thing in the world. We will send in our names, and tell any story you like, or just simply the truth. Yes: I was coming straight back from a ball — my longing to get to know her got the better of me — I wanted just to kiss her hand once... and so on. The carriage will wait for us below, and we shall he back before the interval. No one will have noticed.”

“If you really mean to go, Fräulein,” said Ferdinand, “then you must let me go with you.”

Irene looked at him. There was a tense decided look on her face. “Then you don’t think that I really...”

“But have you the courage to jump off a tower, Fräulein?”

Irene stared into his eyes and suddenly got up.

“Come along, then,” she said, and a dark shadow passed over her forehead.

Ferdinand called the waiter, paid, gave Irene his arm, and led her down the two flights of stairs into the ante-room. Then he helped her into a light grey cloak: she turned up the fur collar and tied a lace scarf round her head. Without a word to each other, they went out through the door into the gateway. A carriage came up and they sped noiselessly to their destination over the snow-covered street.

From time to time Ferdinand threw a sidelong glance at Irene. She sat motionless, and from her veiled face her eyes stared out into the darkness. When, after a few minutes, the carriage stopped in front of the house in the Park-Ring Irene waited until Ferdinand had rung the bell and the door had opened. Ferdinand felt as though he had awakened from a dream, as the familiar parlour-maid stood before him and looked with astonishment at him and his companion.

“Please ask the Fräulein,” said Ferdinand, “whether she will be so good as to receive us.”

The girl smiled, said nothing, and showed the pair into the drawing-room. Under the light from the candelabra, Ferdinand saw the semblances of himself and Irene hovering like two strange beings in the Venetian mirror that hung out from the wall over the black, gleaming grand piano. A sudden thought came into his head. How if Irene had got him to introduce her so that she might murder Wilhelmine? The idea vanished as soon as it had come and yet the girl who stood at his side, and slowly unwound the scarf from her head, seemed to him entirely changed — almost like some strange creature whose voice he had never heard before.

A door opened, and Wilhelmine entered wearing a soft velvet indoor dress cut away from the neck. She gave a hand to Ferdinand, and looked at him and his companion with an air of welcome rather than of surprise. Ferdinand tried to give some facetious explanation of this nocturnal visit. He told Wilhelmine that during the dance his companion had talked of nothing but her admiration for Fräulein Bischof, and how he, in a sort of carnival mood, had offered at this unearthly hour to go with her to her idol’s house — at the risk of both being bundled downstairs again.

“What nonsense,” replied Wilhelmine; “on the contrary I am delighted,” and she gave a hand to Irene. “I must only ask you to be kind enough to keep me company at supper — I have just come back from the theatre.”

They all went into the next room where under a greenish crystal shade with little frosted lights a table stood, half of which was laid for supper. While Ferdinand took off his fur coat and threw it on to the divan, Wilhelmine herself took Irene’s cloak from her shoulders and hung it over the back of a chair. Then she took some glasses from a sideboard, filled them with white wine, and set them before Ferdinand and Irene, after which she herself sat down, calmly helped herself to some cold meat, cut it up, said “Excuse me,” and began to eat. From time to time she threw a friendly, faintly smiling glance at Irene and Ferdinand.

"She naturally takes it as a matter of course," thought Ferdinand, a little disappointed; "and if I had brought the Empress of China and announced my appointment as Mandarin, she would not have thought it strange. It is really rather a pity. 'For women who are never surprised never entirely belong to any man.'" It was a remark of Trehenhof's which suddenly came into his mind.

"Did you have a good time at the ball?" asked Wilhelmine. Ferdinand answered that the room was too full, the people mostly detestable, and the music poor; and so he went on. Wilhelmine glanced at him good-humouredly, and turning to Irene asked whether her companion were a good dancer. Irene nodded and smiled. Her "Yes" was almost inaudible.

"Did you play Feodora to-day, Fräulein?" asked Ferdinand, so as not to let the conversation drop. "Was there a large audience?"

"Packed," Wilhelmine replied.

Irene then said: "I am sorry to say I have never seen you as Feodora, Fräulein Bischof. But I saw you as Medea not so long ago. It was splendid."

"Thank you very much," answered Wilhelmine.

After a few more words of admiration, Irene asked Wilhelmine which were her favourite parts and seemed to listen to her answers with interest. Then they came upon the eternal question — whether the greater actor is the one who loses himself in the part he is presenting or the one who stands above it. Ferdinand mentioned that a young comedian he knew had told him that he had played a certain highly amusing part more effectively than ever on the very day of his father's funeral.

"Nice sort of friends you must have," Wilhelmine observed, putting a section of orange into her mouth.

"What on earth is all this?" thought Ferdinand. "Has Fräulein Irene forgotten that she wanted to call Wilhelmine a murderess to her face?... And is Wilhelmine still aware that I am her lover, though I have called upon her in the middle of the night with a strange woman?..."

"You are so keenly interested in the theatre, Fräulein," remarked Wilhelmine, "I wonder if you have ever thought of taking up acting as a career."

Irene shook her head. "Alas, I have no talent!"

"Well, you may be thankful," said Wilhelmine, "stage life is a sink."

And as she began to talk of all the humiliations that an actress has to endure, Ferdinand noticed that Irene was staring, as though bewitched, at a halfopen door, through the crack of which a bluish glow was visible. And he noticed how Irene's face, which had hitherto been motionless, began to stir slightly under its pallor, and how the silent lips began to quiver strangely. And he thought he could see in her wide-open eyes an evil longing to force her way into that bluish room and bury her face in the pillow on which Gabriel's head had once rested. It then occurred to him that although Irene's absence might until now have been unnoticed, if she stayed away any longer it might be awkward for her and for himself; and he pushed back his chair.

Irene turned towards him as though awakening from a dream. Wilhelmine's last words still echoed in their ears, though they had not heard them.

"It is quite time for us to go," said Irene, and got up.

"I am very sorry that you can't stay longer," answered Wilhelmine.

Irene gazed at her with a calm and searching look.

"Well, my child?" asked Wilhelmine.

"It is strange, Fräulein," said Irene, "how you remind me of a picture we have at home of a Croat or Slovak peasant woman praying before a holy image at the side of a snowy country road."

Wilhelmine nodded thoughtfully, as if she clearly remembered the winter day on which she had knelt in the snow in Croatia before that holy image. Then she insisted on putting Irene's cloak round her shoulders and accompanied her guests into the hall. "Well, go back and have some more jolly dances," she said; "that is, if you really are going back to the ball."

Irene became deathly pale — but smiled.

"You need to be careful of him," added Wilhelmine, and threw a glance at Ferdinand — the first that held anything like a recollection of the night that had gone before.

Ferdinand did not answer: he only felt how Irene covered Wilhelmine and himself with one and the same dark look.

The maid appeared, Wilhelmine once more held out her hands to her guests, said she hoped the girl would come and see her again soon, and smiled at Ferdinand as though she had won a game against him — a game that they had both agreed to play.

Accompanied by the maid carrying a taper, Ferdinand and Irene went down the stairs in silence. The outer door was soon shut behind them. The driver stood by the carriage, Irene got in, and Ferdinand sat down beside her. The horses trotted through the noiseless snow. Suddenly a ray of light from a street lamp fell on Irene's face. Ferdinand saw that she was staring at him with parted lips.

"So it was you," she said softly, and her voice seemed to quiver with amazement, horror, and hate. And again they were in darkness.

"If she had a dagger with her," thought Ferdinand, "I wonder would she stab with it?... And yet, however you look at the thing, I really shouldn't deserve it. Surely I was a social force, not a..." And he fell to meditating whether he should not try to explain the affair to her. Not in the least to justify himself, but because this intelligent creature well deserved to be initiated into the deeper significances of the whole story.

Suddenly he felt arms about him, and Irene's lips on his — savage, hot, and sweet. It was a kiss such as he believed he had never felt before, so fragrant and mysterious, and he wished it might not end. Mouth clung to mouth till the carriage stopped.

Ferdinand got out and gave his hand to Irene.

"You are not to follow me," she said harshly, and disappeared into the hall. Ferdinand stayed outside. It did not for a moment occur to him to disobey her command. He realised quite clearly, and with sudden sorrow, that it was over, and that this kiss could have no sequel.

Three days later he related his adventure to Anastasius Trehenhof, to whom one could tell everything, for discretion in his company would have been as childish as in the presence of the good God.

"It is a pity," said Anastasius, after brief reflection, "that she did not become your mistress. Your child would have interested me. We have enough children of Love, far too many children of Indifference, but of children of Hatred far too few. And yet it is not impossible that from them may come our salvation."

"So you think..." began Ferdinand.

"Come now, don't you flatter yourself," answered Anastasius sharply.

Ferdinand hung his head and was silent.

Besides, he had his sleeping-car ticket to Trieste in his pocket, and from there he went on to Alexandria, Cairo, Assouan.... Three days ago he too had realised that people may die of hopeless love — other people, of course — other people.

THE MURDERER

A CERTAIN YOUNG MAN, A BARRISTER WHO DID NOT practise, without parents, comfortably off, and a popular and pleasant member of society, had for more than a year lived with a girl of humble origin, who, like him, had no relations, and did not need to consider public opinion. At the very beginning of the acquaintance, less from kindness or passion than from the desire to enjoy his happiness as far as possible undisturbed, Alfred had made his mistress give up her position as correspondence-clerk in an important Viennese shop. For a long time, flattered by her grateful tenderness, he had felt happier in the quiet enjoyment of their common freedom than in any previous liaison, but at last he grew gradually aware of that well-known feeling of restless anticipation that with him had always meant the end of such a relationship — an end that, in this case, however, could not at present be foreseen. He already imagined himself as the companion in misfortune of an old friend of his who had been entangled, years before, in a connection of the kind, and now was forced to live a retired and restricted life as a harassed father of a family: and many hours that, without such forebodings, in the company of a sweet, gentle creature like Elise, would have been hours of pure delight, he now began to find wearisome and painful. He was the sort of man who was quite clever enough, and, he flattered himself, considerate enough, not to let Elise notice these feelings of his, but still they had the effect of making him once more frequent that comfortable middle-class society which he had almost deserted in the course of the last year. And when a very popular young lady, whom he met at a dance, the daughter of a wealthy manufacturer, treated him with marked friendliness, and he suddenly saw before him the promising possibility of an engagement suited to his position and his means, he began to look on the other connection, which he had begun as a cheerful inconsequent adventure, as a burdensome fetter which a young man with his advantages should be able to shake off without hesitation. But the smiling serenity with which Elise always welcomed him, her never-varying devotion during the hours, now fewer and fewer, that they spent together, the unclouded confidence with which she let him go from her arms into a world unknown — all this not merely silenced the words of parting on his lips every time he thought he had firmly decided to speak, but filled him with a sort of tormented sympathy, whose hardly realised expression could but seem, to an utterly trusting creature like Elise, a new and sincerer mark of his affection for her. And so it came about that Elise never believed herself more passionately adored by him than when he was fresh from some meeting with Adèle, when, trembling still at the recollection of her sweet, questioning glance, her thrilling touch, and, later, by the fragrance of their first secret lovers' kiss, he came back to a home consecrated to him alone and to his faithless love; and every morning Alfred left his mistress, not with the words of parting that he had composed outside the door, but with fresh protestations of eternal fidelity. And so the days went on, and so did Alfred's two romances. At last the problem for decision really was which evening he had better choose for the inevitable explanation with Elise — the one before or the one after his betrothal with Adèle: and on the first of these two evenings (had he not still a respite?) Alfred came in to his mistress, thanks to the habit of his double life, with an air of almost unruffled composure.

He found her paler than he had ever seen her before, leaning back in the corner of the divan: nor did she get up as usual when he came in, to offer her forehead and mouth for a kiss of welcome. She looked at him with a tired forced smile, so that, not without a feeling of relief, a suspicion came into Alfred's mind that the news of his forthcoming betrothal had, in spite of all attempts at secrecy, in the mysterious way of rumours, found its way to her. But in answer to his hurried questions Elise merely said that, though she had not mentioned it before, she suffered from time to time with heart-attacks, from which she usually recovered quickly, but this time the after-effects seemed likely to last longer than ever before. Alfred, in the consciousness of his guilty purpose, was very much upset by this disclosure; he was all kindness and sympathy, and before midnight, without an idea how the thing had got so far, he and Elise had planned a trip together, which was to be a lasting cure for these unpleasant seizures.

Never had she been so tender to him, and never had he felt such tenderness for her as when he said good-bye that night; indeed, on his way home he seriously considered writing a letter of farewell to Adele, in which he proposed to excuse his escape from betrothal and the bonds of marriage on the grounds that his vacillating character made him quite unfitted for a life of permanent and peaceful happiness. The artful turns of phrase haunted him even in his sleep but with the light of morning, as it shone through the slits of the jalousies and flickered on his coverlet, he felt that his anxiety had been both foolish and superfluous. Indeed, he scarcely thought it strange that his suffering lady of the night before seemed like a dream, vanished and forgotten, while Adèle stood before his mind, glowing with the fragrance of his infinite desire.

At midday he made his proposal to Adèle's father, who was friendly but not entirely favourable. With a good-humoured and playful reference to the many temptations of a young man like himself, the father, on the contrary, insisted that Alfred should first travel for a year so that he might test the strength and endurance of his feelings at a distance, and he actually forbade the two young people to correspond, so that he might be certain there had been no opportunity for self-deception in this way. If Alfred were of the same mind when he came home, and if he then found that Adèle felt the same as she was sure she did today, then, so far as he was concerned, there would be not the slightest objection to the young couple's immediate marriage. Alfred made a show of reluctance in agreeing to these terms, but, in fact, he took them with an inward sigh of relief as giving him a future respite before the dreadful day; after a moment's thought he explained that in these circumstances he would like to leave at once, and so bring the period of separation all the sooner to an end. Adèle seemed at first hurt by this submissive attitude, but at the end of the short private talk allowed by her father she was full of admiration for her lover's good sense, and sent him, protesting his fidelity and with actual tears in his eyes, into the dangers of a distant separation.

Scarcely had he got into the street when Alfred began to think over in his mind all the possibilities that might, in the course of the year he had before him, lead to a solution of his relations with Elise. And his impulse to dispose of the most serious difficulties of life, without really facing them, was so overmastering that it not merely overcame his vanity, but even drew to the surface of his mind certain darker imaginings which in the ordinary way would have been quite abhorrent to his easy-going nature. Under the pressure of unusually close companionship, such as was inevitable on a journey, Elise's feelings might well, he thought, grow cooler, and she might gradually come to dislike him; and his mistress's heart trouble might also set him free in a manner that would, of course, be more unwelcome. However, he soon thrust both hopes and fears so violently from him that, finally, his only feeling was one of childish, delighted expectation of an agreeable trip abroad in the company of a pleasant and devoted creature; and on the evening of that very day he was talking away in the highest spirits to his guileless companion about the delightful prospects of the journey they were to make.

As the spring was drawing near Alfred and Elise first visited the mild shores of Lake Geneva. Later on they went up to various cooler mountain resorts; they spent the late summer by the seaside in England; in the autumn they visited the Dutch and German cities, and last of all, when the dark days began to come upon them, they fled to the genial southern sun. Until then, Elise, who had never before left the neighbourhood of Vienna, had moved through that year of wonders like a beautiful dreamer led by a beloved guide. Even Alfred, though he never forgot the future and the crisis he had but postponed, seemed under the same spell as Elise, and gave himself up, unreflecting, to the delights of the moment. And though, at the beginning of their journey, he had carefully tried to keep away from people he knew, and had, so far as possible, avoided showing himself with Elise on populous promenades, or in the dining-rooms of great hotels, later on he challenged fate almost of set purpose, and had he received a telegram from his betrothed accusing him of disloyalty, he would have been perfectly willing to give up a future that still attracted him if he might but rid himself of all doubt, disquiet, and responsibility. But no telegram, nor any news at all, found its way to him from home, for, contrary to Alfred's conceited expectations, Adèle held as strictly as he to the undertaking on which her father had insisted.

However, the hour arrived in which — at least for Alfred — this wonder-year came to a sudden end, and seemed to stand for an instant suspended in time, bereft of its magic, more desolate than any he had known. This happened one day in late autumn in the Botanic Garden in Palermo, when Elise, who until then had been so fresh and lively and blooming, suddenly clutched with both hands at her heart, looked nervously at her lover, and then smiled as if she knew it was a duty not to cause him any inconvenience. But this, instead of touching him, filled him with bitterness, which he did in fact at first try to disguise under an air of concern. He reproached her, though he did not believe what he said, with having constantly concealed such attacks from him; told her he was very hurt that she obviously regarded him as heartless; asked her to promise she would go with him to a doctor at once, and was very glad when she refused, as she said she had no confidence in the local quacks. But when, as though in an access of gratitude and love, there in the open air, on that bench with people passing to and fro, she suddenly seized his hand and put it to her lips, he felt something like a wave of hatred surge through his veins, that actually surprised himself; but he soon found an excuse for it in the many hours of boredom and emptiness which (did he not know it?) had been all too frequent on that journey. So a burning desire for Adèle suddenly flamed up within him, and in defiance of his promise, he sent a telegram to her that very day in which he begged her to send him a word to Genoa, and which he signed "Yours forever."

A few days later he found her reply in Genoa, which read: "Yours for just as long." And, carrying this crumpled sheet against his heart — for in spite of its sceptical mocking tone, it was the epitome of all his hopes — he set out with Elise on his journey to Ceylon, which they had left until the end as they thought it would probably be the most delightful part of their trip. It would have taken a far subtler woman than Elise to guess that, on this journey, it was only Alfred's bold imagination that made her feel such rapture as she had never known in his love, and to realise that it was not she who lay in his arms in those dark and silent nights at sea, but a lady far away, whom his desire was able to conjure into a living presence. But after they had reached that burning island, in the dull monotony of the last part of their stay there, when he found that the image he had all too impetuously evoked now refused to serve him, he began to leave Elise alone, and was malicious enough to use a slight return of the heart trouble, which attacked her soon after she got ashore, as an excuse for his aloofness. She took this, like everything he did, as a sign of the love that had now become all the meaning and happiness of her existence. And when, under the glare of that blue and golden sky, she clung to his side as they drove through the rustling shade of the forests, she did not know that her companion was merely longing for that solitary hour when, undisturbed by Elise, his flying pen would scribble imploring passionate words to another of whose existence Elise did not yet know, and never was to know. In such hours of solitude he was filled with so vast a longing for the absent one that he could forget the features, nay, the very voice, of the woman at his side, this woman that was his, with whom he had wandered over the world for nearly a whole year. And when, the night before they were to start the voyage home, on leaving the writing-room, he found Elise stretched out on her bed, unconscious from another serious attack, he recognised with a feeling of mild, almost agreeable, horror, that what he had thought was a sensation of slight anxiety was, in fact, the inextinguishable, darkly glimmering hope of his very soul. However, it was in very real and painful agitation that he at once sent for the doctor, who soon appeared and relieved the patient with an injection of morphia. But he gave the supposed husband, who explained that he had serious reasons for not postponing a voyage on which much depended, a note recommending Elise to the special care of the ship's doctor.

In the very first few days the sea-air seemed to have a healing influence on Elise. Her pallor disappeared, her whole being unfolded, her manner was less constrained than Alfred had ever known it. And, while she had hitherto been indifferent, almost hostile, to any, even the most innocent, overtures from strangers, on this occasion she showed no signs of avoiding the casual conversation inevitable on board ship, and accepted with pleasure the respectful homage of a few male fellow passengers. A certain German baron, in particular, who was trying to cure long-standing lung trouble by a sea voyage, spent as much time as he could in Elise's company without becoming a nuisance, and Alfred would have liked to persuade himself that Elise's encouraging demeanour to this, the most agreeable of her admirers, was the welcome sign of a new and growing inclination. But when, with an appearance of anger, he tried to call Elise to account for her rather marked friendliness, she smilingly explained to him that all this forthcoming manner of hers was simply intended to arouse his jealousy, and she was delighted with the success of her little stratagem. This time Alfred could no longer conceal his impatience and disappointment. He replied to her confession, by which she had thought to soothe and please him, with a harshness she could not understand. She stood before him for a moment or two in dumb perplexity, and then suddenly fell unconscious on the deck, where they had been talking, and had to be carried below to her cabin. The ship's doctor, who knew what the trouble was from his colleague's letter, did not think a careful examination necessary, and temporarily relieved that tormented heart by the same means as before. But he was not able to prevent the occurrence of future attacks, without any apparent cause, on the next day and the day after, and although morphia never failed in its effect, he did not conceal his fear that the illness might have a fatal end, and warned Alfred, in appropriate but quite definite terms, to use every possible consideration towards his beautiful wife.

Alfred, in the throes of his dumb resentment against Elise, would have been very ready to take this advice in regard to one particular especially, as to which the doctor had been very emphatic, if Elise had not been overcome by her desire, one dark night of loneliness, and had succeeded in tempting him, in spite of his resistance, back into her arms, as though to make her peace by her endearments. And yet as she lay there in his embrace, exhausted and with half-closed eyes, and he watched the bluish glitter of the waves shimmering through the little port-hole window on to her moist forehead, he felt his lips curl into a smile; it came from the deepest recesses of his soul, and he knew it for a smile of contempt, nay — even of triumph. And while he became shudderingly conscious of this dark hope of his, he had to admit to himself that its fulfillment meant salvation to him and deliverance from all his troubles, especially as Elise, if she knew the end to be inevitable and were given a choice, would certainly wish for no other than to pass away beneath his kisses. And as she now, though fully conscious of the risk, seemed prepared, in ever more passionate self-abandonment, to die for love and in the act of loving, he too felt himself strong enough to accept a sacrifice by which, dreadful as it might seem, the complications of destiny might so work out as to make three human beings happy in the end.

But while, night after night, he watched with expectant dread the dull glitter in her eyes, her ecstatic gasps for breath, and then a minute later her awakening gaze lit up once more, the warm breath rose to her lips eager to meet his, he felt as though he had been cheated; his murderous malignity spent itself in sending a wave of fresh and lovely life pulsing through Elise's veins. And she was so sure of his love that in the daytime, when he left her alone or to the company of others, to go and cool his fevered forehead in the sea-breeze on the upper deck, she stayed behind without misgiving, and when he came back to her with his wild and wandering smile, she answered it with shining eyes, as though it had been a greeting of affection.

At Naples, where the ship was to call and stay a day, and then go on to Hamburg without any further stop, Alfred hoped to find a letter from Adèle — he had written from Ceylon imploring her to send one there. The stormy weather made it unnecessary for him to find a pretext for leaving Elise and going ashore with some casual acquaintances on one of the boats that lay near by. He drove to the post office, went up to the counter, gave in his name, but had to go away with empty hands. When he tried to console himself with the fact that Adèle's letter had not been sent in time, or had been lost, the feeling of desolation that came over him made him realise that a life without Adèle was for him unthinkable. He was now at the end of his powers of deception, and he first thought of telling Elise the brutal truth the moment he got back to the ship. But then he reflected that the consequences of such a confession could not be foreseen — Elise might drop dead on the spot, or it might drive her to madness or suicide, and the circumstances of such a mishap could not be concealed, and this might damage his relations with Adèle. He ran the same risk if he postponed his confession to the last moment — until they landed in Hamburg, or even until their arrival in Vienna. Full of these despairing thoughts and even now hardly conscious of their implication, Alfred wandered up and down the seashore in the burning noontide sunshine, when he suddenly felt giddy and almost on the point of fainting. He sank nervously on to a bench and waited until the spasm passed and the cloud faded from before his eyes. Then he drew a deep breath as though awakening from sleep. He became suddenly aware that in that instant when his perceptions had threatened to give way a decision had come to fullness in his mind, terrible and clear, that had long been maturing in his deeper consciousness. This awful, burning purpose, whose fulfillment he had tried for many days to bring forth from its cowardly concealment, he must now accomplish, without more delay, by his own will and by his own hands. And as though it had been the fruit of long reflection, a finished plan came forth into his mind.

He got up, and first went to an hotel where he ate his lunch with an excellent appetite. Then he called on three doctors one after the other, pretended to be subject to attacks of agonising pain, and that his stock of morphia to which he had been accustomed for years had run out. He took the prescriptions for which he asked, had them made up by different chemists and when he went on board again at sunset, he was in possession of a dose that he was sure was more than sufficient for his purpose. At dinner on the ship he gave an enthusiastic description of how he had spent the day in an excursion to Pompeii, and with a positive lust for lying, as though to damn himself more deeply, he dwelt on the description of a quarter of an hour that he had spent in the garden of Appius Claudius in contemplation of a statuette which, of course, in reality he had never seen, but happened to have seen mentioned in a guide-book. Elise sat at his side, with the baron opposite her; their eyes met and Alfred could not rid himself of the idea that these were two ghosts glaring at each other from empty eye-sockets.

Later, as they had so often done before, he walked up and down with Elise on the upper deck in the moonlight, while far away the lights glittered on the coast. He felt himself weaken for a moment, but he roused his determination once again by imagining that it was Adèle's arm that pressed against his own; and by the glow of passion that shot through his veins he realised that the most terrible crime was not too high a price to pay for the happiness that awaited him. At the same time he felt a sort of secret envy of the young creature at his side who was so soon to find release, without pain and without foreknowledge, from the perplexities of living.

When they were in their cabin and he took Elise in his arms for the last time he saw her with an utter and almost unbearably intensified clarity of vision, and yet there was a despairing passion in his embrace; but he felt as though he were accomplishing a destiny in which his will no longer took a part. It needed but one movement of his fingers to upset the glass where it stood, glimmering with bluish iridescence on the little table, and the poison drops could have trickled in harmless moisture on to the indifferent floor. But Alfred lay motionless and waited. He waited until at last, as his heart stood still, Elise, with a movement that he knew so well, reached out her hand with half-closed eyes, as she always did, for a glass to quench her thirst before she slept. He did not stir; he watched her with staring eyes as she raised herself slightly, put the glass to her lips, and swallowed the contents at a gulp. Then she lay down again with a gentle sigh, and laying her head on his breast, as her custom was, prepared to sleep. Alfred heard a long dull hammering in his temples; he heard Elise's quiet breathing; he heard the waves beating as if in lamentation against the bows of the ship, as it glided forward; and time seemed to stand still.

Suddenly he felt a violent shudder pass through Elise's body. Her two hands clutched at his neck, her fingers seemed to be trying to pierce his skin, and then, with a long groan, she opened her eyes. Alfred freed himself from her embrace, sprang out of bed, watched her try to raise herself, fling her arms into the air, stare into the half-light with wild fluttering eyes, and then suddenly collapse full length and lie completely motionless except for short, sharp gasps for breath. Alfred at once realised that she was quite unconscious, and coldly wondered how long it would be before the end. It also occurred to him that at this moment she might still be saved, and with an obscure feeling that he would in this way tempt fate once again — either he would destroy the fruits of what he had accomplished or by a bold stroke find atonement; so he ran to fetch the doctor. If the latter realised what had happened, then the game would be definitely lost; otherwise he was freed forever from guilt and from remorse.

When Alfred came into the cabin, Elise lay back, pale, with glazed and half-closed eyes, her fingers clenched in the coverlet, and beads of sweat glittering on her forehead and her cheeks. The doctor bent down, laid his ear to her breast, listened for a time, nodded gravely, drew back Elise's eyelids, held his own hand to her lips, and listened again; then he turned to Alfred and told him that the death struggle was over. With a wild look that was not dissembled, Alfred hid his head in his hands, sank down by the bedside, and remained for awhile with his forehead pressed against Elise's knee. Then he turned and stared helplessly at the doctor, who held out his hand to him in sympathy. Alfred did not take it, shook his head, and, his mind completely clear and composed, he added as though in self-reproach now that it was too late: "If only we had followed your advice." Then he buried his face gloomily in his hands. "That is what I thought," he heard the doctor say in a tone of gentle reproof, and in an overmastering sensation of triumph he knew his eyes were blazing behind their twitching lids.

The next day, in accordance with the instructions, Elise's body was consigned to the sea, and Alfred, as the widower, felt himself surrounded by universal though silent sympathy. No one liked to disturb him when he walked up and down the deck for hours and stared into a distance that for him — though no one knew it — was hidden by a haze of joy to come. Only the baron occasionally joined Alfred for a few minutes as he paced to and fro, and even so he carefully refrained from uttering a word about the tragedy. Alfred knew very well that the only reason that led the baron to accompany him was his desire to feel the atmosphere of the dear dead woman about him once again. For Alfred these few minutes were the only times in which the past seemed at all to move him. Otherwise he had completely raised himself above his act and what it might mean to other men.

In the living present stood before him the image of the woman he yearned for, whom his guilt had won — and when he looked down into the water from the bow of the ship, it seemed as though he saw it rippling peacefully over buried worlds to which, in those slumberous depths, it mattered little whether they had foundered yesterday or a thousand years ago.

Only when the German coast came into sight did his pulse begin to beat faster. His purpose was to stay in Hamburg no longer than was necessary to pick up the letter that must be waiting for him, and then to take the next train home. The tedious business of disembarkation set him quivering with impatience; and he sighed with relief when his luggage was at last put on the carriage and he drove through the streets of the city to the post office under a sky dotted with the small pink clouds of a late spring afternoon. He gave his card to the clerk, watched him with greedy eyes as he turned over the letters, held out his hand in readiness, and received the answer that there was nothing for him — no letter, no card, no telegram. He put on an incredulous smile, and asked the official in an almost humble tone, of which he was instantly ashamed, to look again. Then Alfred tried to make out the addresses over the edges of the envelopes, and several times he thought he recognised his name in Adèle's handwriting, more than once he hopefully held out his hand — only to be told again that he was mistaken. At last the official put the packet back into the pigeon-hole, shook his head, and turned away. Alfred wished him good-day with exaggerated courtesy, and the next minute found himself standing bewildered at the door. Only one thing was clear, and that was that he must stay where he was for the present — he could not possibly go on to Vienna without news of some kind from Adèle.

He drove to an hotel, took a room, and scribbled the following words on one of the forms that lay ready on the table: —

"No word from you. Can't understand it. Quite distracted. Back day after to-morrow. When can I see you? Reply at once."

He added his address, and had it sent off reply paid.

When he came down into the entrance-hall, which was already lighted up for the evening, he was aware of someone looking at him — someone who, without getting up, greeted him gravely from where he was sitting with a newspaper on his knee; it was the baron, to whom he had only had time to say a hurried good-bye before he left the boat. Alfred said he was delighted at this unexpected meeting, and really believed he was, and he told the baron that he intended to stay until the next day. The baron, who, in spite of his pallor and persistent cough, said he felt very well, proposed during dinner that they should visit a music-hall together, and when Alfred hesitated he added softly and with lowered eyelids that grief had never yet brought anyone to life again. Alfred laughed, and then was startled by his laughter, thought the baron had noticed his embarrassment, and at once decided that the wisest thing he could do would be to agree. Soon after he found himself sitting with the baron in a box, drinking champagne, and watching, through the smoke and haze, the tricks and antics of acrobats and clowns, accompanied by the vulgar din of a blaring orchestra, listening to halfnaked women singing risqué songs, and with a kind of demented defiance pointing out to his silent companion the graceful legs and bosoms displayed upon the stage. Then he flirted with a flower-seller, threw a yellow rose at the feet of a dancer who shook her black hair at him invitingly, and laughed aloud when he saw the baron's thin lips curl as if in contempt and disgust. Later on it seemed as though hundreds of people from the hall below were looking up at him with malignant curiosity, and as if all the murmurs and whisperings were meant for him alone. He felt a shiver of fear go down his back, and then it occurred to him that he swallowed several glasses of champagne rather too quickly and he recovered his composure. He was delighted to notice that while he had been leaning over the edge of the box two painted ladies had drawn the baron into a conversation; he breathed deeply as though he had escaped a danger, got up, and nodded to his companion as though to encourage him and wish him luck in his adventure; soon he was walking alone, along streets that he had never seen and never was to see again, whistling some tune or other, and with the feeling that he was wandering through a dream city in the cool night air, back to his hotel.

When he awoke next morning after a deep and heavy sleep, he had at first to remember that he was not on the moving ship, and that the white glimmer yonder was not Elise's morning wrap but a curtain over the window. By a tremendous effort of will, he thrust aside the tide of memory that threatened him and rang the bell. A telegram was brought to him with his breakfast. He left it on the tray so long as the waiter was in the room; and he had the feeling that such self-control deserved some reward. The door had scarcely shut when he opened the telegram with trembling fingers. At first the letters swam before his eyes, then suddenly they stood before him, stiff and huge: —

"To-morrow morning 11 o'clock. Adèle."

He ran about the room, laughing to himself, and refused to be dashed by the curt, cold tone of the summons. That was her way. And even if he did not find everything at home just as he had been hoping — even if there were some unpleasant disclosures waiting for him — what did that matter? He would again stand before her, in the light of her eyes, in the fragrance of her breath; and his dreadful deed would not have been in vain.

He would not stay in the hotel: he spent the short time before the departure of his train in wandering about the city, with wide-open eyes that saw nothing — neither men nor things. At noon he left Hamburg, and stared hour after hour through the windows at the flying landscape: all the thoughts, and hopes, and fears that rose in his mind, he strained his now docile will to force into subjection: and if, so as not to look strange to his fellow passengers, he took up a book or a newspaper, he did not read it, he counted up from one to a hundred — five hundred — a thousand. When night fell, his devouring desire broke down all his efforts to keep calm. He called himself a fool for having misinterpreted the absence of news, and the tone of his last telegram, and realised that his only reproach against Adèle was that she had held to the agreement more honourably than he. But even if it had somehow come to her ears that he had been travelling with a woman, he felt himself strong enough in his love to win his injured lady back to him in spite of all her jealousy and fury. And so completely had he become the master of his waking dreams that in that interminable journey through the night he could hear her voice, see the outlines of her form and features, and even feel her kiss more burning sweet than any that her lips had ever given him.

At last he was at home. His house welcomed him with its friendly comfort. The carefully prepared breakfast looked excellently appetising, and for the first time for many days, so it seemed to him, he thought with perfect calm of one who, freed forever from all earthly care, now slumbered in the silent sea. At one moment he felt as though that succession of hours from the time he landed in Naples until Elise's death might be a figment of his shattered nerves, and that the dreadful ending had been, as the doctors had foreseen, or rather predicted, the result of the normal development of her illness. Yes, the man who, in that sunny foreign city, had hurried so malignantly from doctor to doctor, and from chemist to chemist, and with such dreadful forethought had prepared the deadly poison, the man who had held his beloved in his arms for a last hour of sacrilegious pleasure before he sent her into the beyond, seemed to him a being quite other than himself who sat here drinking tea in this familiar room, and amid these unchanged, homely, comfortable surroundings: he seemed a being greater than himself, to whom he must look up in shuddering admiration. Yet later on, when he was getting out of his bath, and he saw his slim naked body in the mirror and became suddenly conscious that it was he who had done this unbelievable thing, he noticed a hard glitter come into his eyes, and he felt worthier than ever to clasp his expectant lady to his heart, and (with a curl of contempt upon his lips) more certain than ever of her love.

At the appointed hour he entered the yellow drawing-room, which he had left a year ago almost to the very day, and in the next moment Adèle stood before him, as unconcerned as though she had said good-bye to him the day before: she gave him her hand, and he kissed it and held it long. "Why don't I take her in my arms?" he thought. Then he heard her speak in that husky voice of hers, which had come to him in his dreams that very night; and he was conscious that he himself had not said a word except to whisper her name when she came in. He must not mind, she began, that she had not answered his beautiful letters; but there were certain matters that could be better dealt with face to face than in writing. Her silence must in any case have prepared him for the fact that many things had changed, and the cool tone of her telegram was, as she wished to acknowledge at once, quite intentional. For about six months she had, in fact, been engaged to another. And she mentioned a name that Alfred knew. It was the name of one of his many good friends of old days, of whom he had thought as little in that past year as of most men whom he had met in his previous life. He listened calmly to Adèle, stared spellbound at her smooth forehead, then through her into nothingness, and there was a murmur in his ears as of distant waves surging over sunken worlds. Suddenly he saw something like a gleam of fear in Adèle's eyes; and he realized that he was standing before her, deadly pale, and with a frightful expression in his face, and he found himself saying, "It isn't true, Adèle; you don't mean it; you can't do it."

She was clearly relieved that he had at last found his voice. She smiled her charming smile again, and explained that he must understand she did mean it; that she could do it — she could do, in fact, as she pleased. She had not been engaged to him, they had been completely free when they parted, and without any obligation, she as well as he. And as she loved another now, and not him, the affair was at an end. He must realize that, and resign himself, otherwise she should regret not having followed her father's advice of that morning and simply not been at home to Alfred. And she sat down opposite him, her slender hands clasped on her knees and with a distant look in her shining eyes.

Alfred felt that he needed all his self-command not to do something ridiculous or dreadful. He did not know what he really wanted to do: seize her by the neck and strangle her or fling himself on the floor and cry like a child. But what was the use of thinking about it? He had no choice, he stood there stricken, and had barely the presence of mind to seize Adèle's hands as she was hastening away and hoarsely implore her to stay. Only a quarter of an hour! She must hear him! He had the right to ask that after all that had once passed between them. He had so much to tell her, more than she could imagine, and it was her duty to hear him. For if she knew everything, then she would also know that he was hers and hers only, and she was his alone. She would know that she could not belong to another, that he had won her in guilt and torment; that his lawful claims upon her must utterly sweep aside all others, that she was fettered to him irrevocably, forever and forever, and he to her. And, on his knees before her, clutching her hands in his, his eyes fixed on hers, he poured out his story, and told her all that had happened in the past year; how he had loved another before her; how he had gone abroad with her as she was ill and had no one on earth but himself; how the torment of his desire had nearly worn him out, but the other had clung to him helplessly and he could not go; and how, at the end of his endurance, for love of her — of her whose hands he held in his, for a love the like of which had not been seen on earth, he had killed that other, who could not and would not have lived without him — poisoned her, half in pity and half in hatred; how the poor creature now slept under the sea-waves far away, martyr to a happiness that was to be beyond all others, like the price at which it had been won.

Adèle had let him keep her hands and her gaze was still plunged in his. She listened to what he told her, but he did not really know how she took it — whether as a fairy tale about strange far-off beings or as an item of news about people that were no concern of hers. Perhaps she did not believe what he was telling her. But, in any case, she did not care whether what he said were true or false. He felt his impotence more and more. He watched the words fall from her like a chill unheeded shower; and at the last, when he would have learned his fate from her lips, she merely shook her head. He looked at her fearfully, knowing yet unbelieving, and with a wild questioning look in his twitching eyes.

"No," she said, in a hard voice, "it is over."

And that "No" meant, he knew, that all was forever at an end. Adèle's face was quite inflexible. There was no trace in it of past affection, no sign of horror — only a devastating expression of indifference and boredom.

Alfred bowed his head with a vacant smile as though he understood, let go her hands, which she dropped coldly at her side, turned and went. The door behind him was still open, and he felt a chill breath on his neck. As he went down the stairs he knew that there was nothing left for him to do but to make an end. And it was so decided; he set all his doubts aside, and sauntered quietly homeward through that lovely spring day as though he were going to the sleep he needed after some wild carouse.

But someone was waiting for him in his room. It was the baron. Without taking Alfred's proffered hand he explained that he only wanted a few words with him, and, as Alfred nodded politely, he continued:

"I think it my duty to inform you that I consider you a scoundrel."

"Good!" thought Alfred, "that will be an excellent way out." And he answered calmly: "I am at your disposal. Early to-morrow morning, if that suits you..."

The baron shook his head curtly. It became apparent that he had made his preparations as soon as they had landed. Two young gentlemen from the German Embassy were merely awaiting his further instructions and he said that he expected that his adversary, who was at home here, would find no difficulty in arranging for the affair to be settled before that same evening. Alfred believed he could promise to do so. For one instant he thought of confessing the whole truth to the baron; but from the terrible look of hatred that glittered from those cold eyes, he was afraid that the baron, who perhaps suspected the truth, might hand him over to justice: so he decided to say nothing.

Alfred found the two men he wanted without difficulty. One of them was Adèle's fiancé, the other a young officer with whom he had spent many a gay time in earlier days. At sunset, in a meadow by the Danube, a favourite spot for such encounters, he stood facing the baron. A sense of peace possessed him that, after the turmoil of the last few days, was almost happiness. As he looked down the barrel of the levelled pistol, and heard a distant voice rap out, one by one, those last three seconds, that fell like three chill drops from the silent evening sky, he thought of one unutterably dear to him, over whose mouldering body surged the sea. And when he lay upon the ground, and something dark bent over him, enfolded him, and would not let him go, he felt at last content that his atonement was accepted, and that he was disappearing for her sake, and to her, into that nothingness he had so long desired.

THE DEATH OF A BACHELOR

SOMEONE HAD KNOCKED AT THE DOOR, QUITE gently, but the doctor awoke at once, turned on the light, and sat up in bed. He glanced at his wife who was sleeping quietly, picked up his dressing-gown, and went into the hall. He did not at once recognise the old woman who stood there, with the grey shawl over her head.

"The master is suddenly taken very bad," she said; "would the doctor be kind enough to come at once?" Now he recognised the voice: it was the housekeeper of that old friend of his who had never married. The doctor's first thought was, "My friend is fifty-five years old, his heart has been out of order for years — it might well be something serious," and he said, "I'll come at once — will you wait for me?"

"Excuse me, doctor, but I have to hurry round to two other gentlemen," and she mentioned the names of the merchant and the author.

"But what is your business with them?"

"My master wants to see them again."

"See them again?"

"Yes, sir."

"He is sending for his friends," thought the doctor, "because he feels very near to death,"... and he asked, "Is anyone with your master?"

"Of course," the old woman answered. "Johann is with him all the time." And she departed.

The doctor went back into his bedroom, and while he was dressing quickly and as noiselessly as possible, a feeling of bitterness came over him. It was not so much grief at the possibility of losing a good old friend, but the painful consciousness that they were all so far on in years, though not so long ago they had been young.

The doctor drove in an open carriage through the soft, heavy air of that spring night, to the neighbouring suburb where his friend lived. He looked up at the bedroom window which stood wide open, and whence the pale lamplight glimmered into the night.

The doctor went up the stairs, the servant opened the door, greeted him gravely, and dropped his left arm in a gesture of grief.

"What?" asked the doctor, catching his breath. "Am I too late?"

"Yes, sir," answered the servant, "my master died a quarter of an hour ago."

The doctor heaved a deep sigh and went into the room. There lay his dead friend, with thin, bluish, half-open lips, his arms outstretched over the white coverlet; his meagre beard was in disorder, and a few grey wisps of hair had strayed over his pale damp forehead. The silk-shaded electric lamp that stood on the night table cast a reddish shadow over the pillows. The doctor looked at the dead man. "When was he last in our house?" he thought to himself. "I remember it was snowing that evening. It must have been last winter." They had not seen much of each other latterly.

From without came the sound of horses' hoofs pawing the road. The doctor turned away from the dead man and looked across at the slender branches of the trees swaying in the night air.

The servant came in and the doctor then enquired how it had all happened.

The servant told a familiar story of a sudden attack of vomiting and breathlessness. Then his master had leapt out of bed, paced up and down the room, rushed to his writing-table, tottered back to bed again, where he lay racked with thirst and groaning and after one last effort to raise himself he had sunk back upon the pillows. The doctor nodded and laid his hand on the dead man's forehead.

A carriage drew up. The doctor went over to the window. He saw the merchant get out and glance enquiringly up at the house. Unconsciously the doctor let his hand fall just as the servant had done who opened the door to him. The merchant threw back his head as if refusing to believe it, and the doctor shrugged his shoulders, left the window, and sat down, in sudden weariness, on a chair at the feet of the dead man. The merchant came in wearing a yellow overcoat unbuttoned, put his hat on a small table near the door, and shook the doctor by the hand. "How dreadful!" he said; "how did it happen?" And he stared dubiously at the dead man.

The doctor told him what he knew, and added: "Even if I had been able to come at once, I could have done nothing."

"Fancy," said the merchant, "it is exactly a week to-day since I last spoke to him at the theatre. I wanted to have supper with him afterwards, but he had one of his secret appointments."

"What, still?" said the doctor, with a gloomy smile.

Outside another carriage stopped. The merchant went to the window. When he saw the author getting out, he drew back, not wanting to announce the sad news by his expression. The doctor had taken a cigarette out of his case and was twisting it about in an embarrassed sort of way. "It's a habit I've had since my hospital days," he remarked apologetically. "When I left a sick-room at night, the first thing I always did was to light a cigarette, whether I had been to give an injection of morphia or to certify a death."

"Do you know," said the merchant, "how long it is since I saw a corpse? Fourteen years — not since my father lay in his coffin."

"But — your wife?"

"I saw my wife in her last moments, but — not afterwards."

The author appeared, shook hands with the other two, and glanced doubtfully at the bed. Then he walked resolutely up to it and looked earnestly at the dead man, yet not without a contemptuous twitch of the lips. "So it was he," he said to himself. For he had played with the question which of his more intimate friends was to be the first to take the last journey.

The housekeeper came in. With tears in her eyes she sank down by the bed, sobbed, and wrung her hands. The author laid his hand gently and soothingly on her shoulder.

The merchant and the doctor stood at the window; and the dank air of the spring night played upon their foreheads.

"It is really very odd," began the merchant, "that he has sent for all of us. Did he want to see us all gathered round his death-bed? Had he something important to say to us?"

"As far as I'm concerned," said the doctor, with a sad smile, "it would not be odd, as I am a doctor. And you," he said, turning to the merchant, "you were at times his business adviser. So perhaps it was a matter of some last instructions that he wanted to give you personally."

"That is possible," said the merchant.

The housekeeper had left the room, and the friends could hear her talking to the other servant in the hall. The author was still standing by the bed carrying on a silent dialogue with the dead man.

"I think," whispered the merchant to the doctor, "that latterly he saw more of our friend. Perhaps he can throw some light on the question."

The author stood motionless, gazing steadily into the closed eyes of the dead man. His hands, which held his broad-brimmed grey hat, were crossed behind his back. The two others began to grow impatient, and the merchant went up to him and cleared his throat.

“Three days ago,” observed the author, “I went for a two-hours’ walk with him among the hills and vineyards. Would you like to know what he talked about? A trip to Sweden, that he had planned for the summer, a new Rembrandt portfolio just published by Watson’s in London, and last of all about Santos Dumont. He went into all sorts of mathematical and scientific details about a dirigible airship, which, to be frank with you, I did not entirely grasp. He certainly was not thinking about death. It must indeed be true that at a certain age people again stop thinking about it.”

The doctor had gone into the adjoining room. Here he might certainly venture to light his cigarette. The sight of white ashes in the bronze tray on the writing-table struck him as strange and almost uncanny. He wondered why he was still there at all, as he sat down on the chair by the writing-table. He had the right to go as soon as he liked, since he had obviously been sent for as a doctor. For their friendship had nearly come to an end. “At my time of life,” he went on, pursuing his reflection, “it is quite impossible for a man like me to keep friends with someone who has no profession and never has had one. What would he have taken up if he had not been rich? He would probably have turned to literature: he was very clever.” And he remembered many malicious but pointed remarks the dead man had made, more especially about the works of their common friend, the author.

The author and the merchant came in. The author assumed an expression of disapproval when he saw the doctor sitting at the deserted writing-table with a cigarette in his hand, which was, however, still unlit, and he closed the door behind him. Here, however, they were to some extent in another world.

“Have you any sort of idea?...” asked the merchant.

“About what?” asked the author absent-mindedly.

“What made him send for us, and just us?”

The author thought it unnecessary to look for any special reason. “Our friend,” he explained, “felt death was upon him, and if he had lived a rather solitary life, at least latterly, at such an hour people who are by nature socially inclined probably feel the need of seeing their friends about them.”

“He had a mistress, though,” remarked the merchant.

“Oh, a mistress,” repeated the author, and contemptuously raised his eyebrows.

At this moment the doctor noticed that the middle drawer of the writing-table was half open.

“I wonder if his will is here?” he said.

“That’s no concern of ours,” observed the merchant, “at least at this moment. And in any case there is a married sister living in London.”

The servant came in. He respectfully asked what arrangements he should make about having the body laid out, the funeral, and the mourning cards. He knew that a will was in the possession of his master’s lawyer, but he was doubtful whether it contained instructions in these matters. The author found the room stuffy and close; he drew aside the heavy red curtains over one of the windows and threw open both casements, and a great waft of the dark blue spring night poured into the room. The doctor asked the servant whether he had any idea why the dead man had sent for him, because, if he remembered rightly, it was years since he had been summoned to that house in his capacity as doctor. The servant, who obviously expected the question, pulled a swollen-looking wallet from his jacket-pocket, took out a sheet of paper, and explained that seven years ago his master had written down the names of the friends whom he wanted sent for when he was dying. So that, even if the dead man had been unconscious at the time, he would have ventured to send for the gentlemen on his own responsibility.

The doctor took the sheet of paper from the servant’s hand and found five names written on it: in addition to those present was the name of a friend who had died two years ago, and another that he did not know. The servant explained that the latter was a manufacturer whose house the dead man used to visit nine or ten years ago, and whose address had been lost and forgotten. The three looked at each other with uneasy curiosity. “What does that mean?” asked the merchant. “Did he intend to make a speech in his last hours?”

“A funeral oration on himself, no doubt,” added the author.

The doctor had turned his eyes on the open drawer of the writing-table, and suddenly these words, in large Roman letters, stared at him from the cover of an envelope: “To my friends.”

“Hullo!” he cried, took the envelope, held it up, and showed it to the others. “This is for us.” He turned to the servant and, with a movement of the head, indicated that he was not wanted. The servant went.

“For us?” said the author, with wide-open eyes.

“There can be no doubt,” said the doctor, “that we are justified in opening this.”

“It’s our duty,” said the merchant, and buttoned up his overcoat.

The doctor had taken a paper-knife from a glass tray, opened the envelope, laid the letter down, and put on his eyeglasses. The author took advantage of the brief interval to pick up the letter and unfold it. “As it is for all of us,” he remarked casually, and bent over the writing-table so that the light from the shaded lamp should fall on the paper. Near him stood the merchant. The author remained seated.

“You might read it aloud,” said the merchant, and the author began.

“‘To my friends,’” — he stopped with a smile— “yes, it’s written here also,” and he went on reading in a tone of admirable detachment. “‘About a quarter of an hour ago I breathed my last. You are assembled at my death-bed, and you are preparing to read this letter together — if it still exists in the hour of my death, I ought to add. For it might so happen that I should come to a better frame of mind...’”

“What?” asked the doctor.

“‘A better frame of mind,’” repeated the author, and continued: “‘and decide to destroy this letter, for it can do not the slightest good to me, and, at the very least, may cause you some unpleasant hours, even if it does not absolutely poison the life of one or other of you.’”

“Poison our lives?” repeated the doctor, in a wondering tone, as he polished his eyeglasses.

“Quicker,” said the merchant in a husky voice.

The author continued. “‘And I ask myself what kind of evil humour it is that sends me to the writing-table to-day and induces me to write down words whose effect I shall never be able to read upon your faces. And even if I could the pleasure I should get would be too trifling to serve as an excuse for the incredible act I am now about to commit with feelings of the heartiest satisfaction.’”

“Ha!” cried the doctor in a voice he did not recognise as his own. The author threw a glance of irritation at him, and read on, quicker and with less expression than before. “‘Yes, it is an evil humour, and nothing else, for I have really nothing whatever against any of you. I like you all very well in my own way, just as you like me in your way. I never despised you, and if I often laughed at you, I never mocked you. No, not once — and least of all in those hours of which you are so soon to call to mind such vivid and such painful images. Why, then, this evil humour? Perhaps it arose from a deep and not essentially ignoble desire not to leave the world with so many lies upon my soul. I might imagine so, if I had even once had the slightest notion of what men call remorse.’”

“Oh, get on to the end of it,” said the doctor in a new and abrupt tone.

The merchant, without more ado, took the letter from the author, who felt a sort of paralysis creeping over his fingers, glanced down it quickly and read the words: “‘It was fate, my dear friends, and I could not alter it. I have had the wives of all of you: yes, every one.’”

The merchant stopped suddenly and turned back to the first sheet.

“The letter was written nine years ago,” said the merchant.

“Go on,” said the author sharply.

And the merchant proceeded. “‘Of course the circumstances were different in each case. With one of them I lived almost as though we had been married, for many months. The second was more or less what the world is accustomed to call a mad adventure. With the third, the affair went so far that I wanted us to kill ourselves together. The fourth I threw downstairs because she betrayed me with another. And the last was my mistress on one occasion only. Do you all breathe again — my good friends? You should not. It was perhaps the loveliest hour of my life... and hers. Well, my friends, I have nothing more to tell you. Now I am going to fold up this letter, put it away in my writing-desk — and there may it lie until my humour changes and I destroy it, or until it is given into your hands in that hour when I lie upon my death-bed. Farewell.’”

The doctor took the letter from the merchant’s hands and read it with apparent care from the beginning to the end. Then he looked up at the merchant who stood by with folded arms and gazed down at him with something like derision.

“Although your wife died last year,” said the doctor calmly, “it is none the less true.”

The author paced up and down the room, jerked his head convulsively from side to side a few times, and suddenly hissed out through his clenched teeth, “the swine,” and then stared in front of him as though looking for something that had dissolved into air. He was trying to recall the image of the youthful creature that he had once held in his arms as wife. Other women’s faces appeared, often recalled but long since, he had thought, forgotten, but he could not bring before his mind the one he wanted. For his wife’s body was withered and held no attraction for him, and it was so long since she had been his beloved. But she had become something other than that to him, something more and something nobler: a friend and a comrade; full of pride at his successes, full of sympathy with his disappointments, full of insight into his deepest nature. It seemed to him not impossible that the dead man had, in his wickedness, secretly envied him his comrade and tried to take her away. For all those others — what had they really meant to him? He called to mind certain adventures, some of old days and some more recent; there had been enough and to spare of them in his varied literary life, and his wife had smiled or wept over them as they went their course. Where was all this now? As faded as that far-off hour when his wife had flung herself into the arms of a man of no account, without reflection, perhaps without thought: almost as extinct as the recollection of that same hour in the dead skull that lay within on that pitifully crumpled pillow. But perhaps this last will and testament was a bundle of lies — the last revenge of a poor commonplace fellow who knew himself condemned to eternal oblivion, upon a distinguished man over whose works death has been given no power. This was not at all improbable. But even if it were true — it was a petty revenge and unsuccessful in either case.

The doctor stared at the sheet of paper that lay before him, and thought of his gentle, ever kindly wife, now growing old, who lay asleep at home. He thought also of his three children: of his eldest who was now doing his one year’s military service, of his tall daughter, who was engaged to a lawyer, and of the youngest, who was so graceful and charming that a famous artist, who had lately met her at a ball, had asked if he might paint her. He thought of his comfortable home, and all this that surged up at him from the dead man’s letter seemed to him not so much untrue as, in some mysterious way, almost sublimely insignificant. He scarcely felt that at this moment he had experienced anything new. A strange epoch in his existence came into his mind, fourteen or fifteen years before, when he had met with certain troubles over his profession, and, worn out and nearly crazy, had planned to leave the city, his wife and family. At the same time he had entered upon a kind of wild, reckless existence, in which a strange hysterical woman had played a part, who had subsequently committed suicide over another lover. How his life had gradually returned to its original course he could not now remember in the least. But it must have been in those bad times, which had passed away as they had come, like an illness, that his wife had betrayed him. Yes, it must so have happened, and it was clear to him that he had really always known it. Was she not once on the point of confessing it? Had she not given him hints? Thirteen or fourteen years ago.... When could it have been...? Wasn't it one summer on a holiday trip — late in the evening on the terrace of some hotel? In vain he tried to recall those vanished words.

The merchant stood at the window and stared into the soft pale night. He was determined he would remember his dead wife. But however much he searched his inmost consciousness, at first he could only see himself in the light of a grey morning, standing in black clothes outside a curtained doorway, receiving and returning sympathetic handshakes, with a stale reek of carbolic and flowers in his nostrils. Slowly he succeeded in recalling to his mind the image of his dead wife. And yet at first it was but the image of an image for he could only see the large portrait in a gilt frame that hung over the piano in the drawingroom at home and displayed a haughty-looking lady of thirty in a ball dress. Then at last she herself appeared as a young girl, who, nearly twenty years before, pale and trembling, had accepted his proposal of marriage. Then there arose before him the appearance of a woman in all her splendour, enthroned beside him in a theatre-box, gazing at the stage, but inwardly far away. Then he remembered a passionate creature who welcomed him with unexpected warmth on his return from a long journey. Swiftly again his thoughts turned to a nervous tearful being, with greenish heavy eyes, who had poisoned his days with all manner of evil humours. Next he saw an alarmed, affectionate mother, in a light morning frock, watching by the bedside of a sick child who, none the less, died. Last of all, he saw a pale, outstretched creature in a room reeking of ether, her mouth so pitifully drawn down at the corners, and cold beads of sweat on her forehead, who had shaken his very soul with pity. He knew that all these pictures, and a hundred others, that flashed past his mind's eye with incredible speed, were of one and the same being who had been lowered into the grave two years ago, over whom he had wept, and after whose death he had felt freed from bondage. It seemed to him he must choose one out of all these pictures to reach some definite reaction; for at present he was tossed by shame and anger, groping in the void. He stood there irresolute, and gazed across at the houses in their gardens, shimmering faintly red and yellow in the moonlight and looking like pale painted walls with only air behind them.

"Good-night," said the doctor and got up.

The merchant turned towards him and said: "There's nothing more for me to do here either."

The author had picked up the letter, stuffed it unobtrusively into his coat pocket, and opened the door into the adjoining room. Slowly he walked up to the death-bed, and the others watched him looking down silently at the corpse, his hands behind his back. Then they turned away.

In the hall the merchant said to the servant: "As regards the funeral, it is possible that the will in possession of the lawyers may contain some further instructions."

"And don't forget," pursued the doctor, "to telegraph to your master's sister in London."

"To be sure, sir," replied the servant, as he opened the front door.

The author overtook them on the doorstep. "I can take you both with me," said the doctor, whose carriage was waiting.

"Thank you, no," said the merchant. "I shall walk."

He shook hands with both of them and walked down the road towards the city, glad to feel the soft night air upon his face.

The author got into the carriage with the doctor. The birds were beginning to sing in the garden. The carriage drove past the merchant, and the three men raised their hats, ironically polite, each' with an identical expression on his face. "Shall we soon see another play of yours?" the doctor asked the author in his usual voice.

The latter launched into an account of the extraordinary difficulties involved in the production of his latest drama which, he had to confess, contained the most sweeping attacks on everything generally held to be sacred. The doctor nodded and did not listen. Nor did the author, for the familiar sentences fell from his lips as though he had learned them by heart.

Both men got out at the doctor's house, and the carriage drove away.

The doctor rang. They both stood and said nothing. As the footsteps of the porter approached, the author said, "Good-night, my dear doctor"; and he added slowly, with a twitch of his nostrils, "I shan't mention this to my wife, you know."

The doctor threw a sidelong glance at him and smiled his charming smile.

The door opened, they shook each other by the hand, the doctor disappeared into the passage, and the door slammed. The author went.

He felt in his breast pocket. Yes, the letter was there. His wife would find it sealed and secure among his papers. And with that strange power of imagination that was peculiarly his own, he could already hear her whispering over his grave, "Oh, how splendid of you... how noble!"

Miscellaneous Stories

Translated by Elsie M. Lang, 1926

CONTENTS

FLOWERS
A FAREWELL
THE WIFE OF THE WISE MAN
HIS HOUR OF FAME

FLOWERS

THE WHOLE AFTERNOON I have been walking about the streets, through the quietly falling soft white snow, — and now I am at home, the lamp burning, cigar alight, and books close at hand: everything ready to make me completely comfortable... but it is all of no use, I can only think of her.

Has she not been dead to me a long time?... Yes, dead, or rather, as I thought with the childlike pathos of the deceived, "worse than dead"?... And now, since that moment, I know she is not "worse than dead," no, simply dead, like all the others who lie out there deep in the earth, always, always; when the spring is here, and when the hot summer comes, and when, like to-day, the snow is falling... without any hope of return — since that moment I have known that not only to me but to everyone else she is dead. Pain? — No. It is only the shudder that always seizes us when those who once belonged to us are laid in the grave, and we see them still, quite distinctly, we see the light in their eyes, and hear the sound of their voices.

It is certainly very sad, as I realised when she deceived me... but what has become of it all?... The fury and the violent hatred, and the loathing for existence, and — ah, yes, certainly — the wounded pride; but gradually I have begun to feel pain. There is one consolation: that she herself suffered. — I have all of them still, at any moment I can read them again, the dozen letters which, sobbing, lamenting, implore forgiveness. — And I see her still, in her dark English clothes and little straw hat, as she stopped at the corner of the street in the evening dusk, and looked back at me standing at the house door.... I still think of that last parting, how she stared at me with the great wondering eyes in the round childish face, that is now so white and changed.... I did not give her my hand when she went; — when for the last time she went. — And from the window I saw her reach the corner of the street and then disappear — forever. Now she can never return....

It was quite by chance I heard of it. Weeks, months might have passed. One morning I met her uncle whom I had not seen for quite a year, and who very seldom stays in Vienna. I had only spoken to him twice before. The first time was three years ago at a social evening, to which she and her mother also came. — And then in the following summer: I was at the "Csarda" in the Prater with a few friends, and at a table near us the uncle sat with two or three other men; he was in a good humour, almost jovial, and drank my health. And before he left the gardens he came and leant over me, and told me as a great secret that his niece had a fancy for me. — And how odd and amusing it seemed to me, half bemused as I was, that the old man should tell me this, to the sound of cymbals and violins, me, who knew her so well, and on whose lips the fragrance of her last kisses still lingered.... And now, this morning. I had almost passed him by. I enquired after his niece, more out of politeness than interest.... I knew nothing of her; it was long since I had received any letter; though she sent me flowers regularly. In remembrance of our happy days; once every month they came; without a word, silent humble flowers.... And when I questioned the old man he was quite astonished. "You did not know the poor child died a week ago?" It was a violent shock. — He told me more. That she had long been ill, but had taken to her bed scarcely a week.... What ailed her? "Melancholia... poorness of blood... the doctor was uncertain."

For a long time I remained standing where he left me, unable to move, as if a great trouble had overtaken me. — And now it seems to me I must realise that something in my life is at an end. — Why? — Why? But it does not touch me. I have no feeling for her, I scarcely think of her. And to write all this down has done me good; I have become quieter... I begin to appreciate the comforts of my home. — To think about her any more is to torment myself unnecessarily.... No one has less reason to mourn than I.

I have been for a walk. A warm winter day. The sky is so pale, so cold, so high.... And I feel quite peaceful. The meeting with the old man yesterday seems as remote as if it had taken place many weeks ago. — And when I think of her I picture her to myself in a peculiarly clear vivid way; and have only that one feeling, anger which had accompanied all my thoughts of her up to that moment. The actual fact, that she is no longer in this world, but is lying in her coffin and they have buried her, I have not fully grasped.... I have no feeling of sorrow. The world seems to me quite tranquil. All of a sudden I have become conscious that actually there is neither joy nor pain; no, only the grimaces of pleasure and sorrow; we laugh and weep, but our souls are untouched. I can sit down now and read deep serious books and take in their wisdom; I can stand before old pictures which before meant nothing and now yield up to me all their obscure beauty. And when I think of those dear to me who are dead, my heart does not contract as once it did. — Death has become rather friendly; he comes among us and does us no harm.

Snow, deep white snow in all the streets. Little Gretel has come to see me and insists that we must go for a sleigh-ride, and so here we are out in the country, flying along the smooth shining road, with jingling bells, the pale grey sky above us. Swiftly, swiftly we pass along between the white shining hills, and Gretel leans against my shoulder and gazes with delighted eyes at the long highway stretching before us. We come to an inn that we knew well back in the summer. Then it was the centre of a green world, and now it is so changed, so solitary, so isolated that we feel as if we were seeing it for the first time. The hot stove in the inn kitchen glows warmly, and we have to move the table right back, for little Gretel's left cheek and ear have become scarlet. I am obliged to kiss the pale cheek. Then we go back in the twilight. How closely Gretel huddles against me, holding both my hands in hers — And she says "To-day at last you are mine again." All unwitting she has found the very words to make me quite happy. Perhaps, too, the keen snowy air of the country has unfettered my senses, for I feel gayer and lighter than I have for a long time. —

One afternoon I was lying half asleep on the divan when the strange thought crept into my mind that I was cold and hard. Like one who, without tears, yes, without any capacity for feeling, stands beside a grave in which a beloved being has been buried. Like one who has become so hard that he does not want to expiate the waste of a young life. Yes, unexpiated, that is it....

It is all over and done with. Life, pleasure and the little bit of love have chased away all thoughts of that foolish affair. I go again among people. I find them ready for me, they are harmless, they chatter about anything that is amusing. And Gretel is a dear tender creature, and looks lovely when she stands beside me at the window in the afternoon with the sunbeams gilding her fair hair.

Something strange happened to-day.... It is the day on which every month she sent me flowers.... And the flowers have come again just as... as if nothing had changed. They came early in the morning by post, in a long white narrow cardboard box. It was quite early; sleep still pressed upon my eyes and brow, and as I lay thus before attempting to open the box there came to me full recollection.... It almost terrified me.... And there they lay, neatly tied together with a gold thread, carnations and violets.... They lay there as in a coffin. And as I took the flowers in my hand a shudder went through my heart. — I know how it is they came to-day. When her illness was beginning, when perhaps she already felt the approach of death, she gave her usual order at the flower shop. I should not miss her tenderness. — Certainly that is the explanation of their coming, it is perfectly natural, rather pathetic... and yet as I hold the flowers in my hand and they seem to tremble and bow their heads, against my will and my reason I feel something ghostly about them, as if they came from her, as if they were a greeting from her... as if she wanted, even in death, to tell me of her love, of her truth — too late. Oh, we do not understand death, we never understand it; and no one is really dead until all those who have known him are dead too.... I have held the flowers in my hand to-day as at other times, tenderly, as if I might hurt them if I clasped them too tightly... as if their gentle souls might begin to whimper softly. And they now stand before me on the writing-table in a slim pale-green glass, and it seems to me as if the blossoms bowed their hands in mournful thanks. All the sorrow of an unsatisfied yearning breathes fragrance from them to me, and I believe they have something they could tell me if only we understood the language of living things that do not talk.

I will not let myself be deceived. They are flowers, nothing more. They are not a greeting from the Beyond.... Nor a call, no, not a call from the grave. — They are flowers, and in some flower-shop a girl quite mechanically tied them together, placed them on a little piece of wadding in a, white cardboard box and took them to the post. And now they are here, why should I think about them any more?

I am often out of doors, I take long lonely walks. When I am with other people I feel no real connection with them; all the threads of intercourse have dropped. I am conscious of this even when the dear fair-haired maiden sits in my room and chatters to me about anything... it means nothing to me. The moment after she has gone she is as remote from me as if she were far away, as if the flood of humanity had carried her right away and she had vanished without leaving a trace. If she never came back I should scarcely be surprised.

The flowers stand in the slim green shining glass; their stalks showing through the water, and the room is full of their fragrance... they still scent the room... although they have already been here a week and are slowly beginning to fade.... And I understand all the incredible things at which I have often laughed, I understand our affinity with other living things. I know we may look for an answer when we speak to the clouds and running brooks; and I stare incessantly at these flowers and wait for them to speak to me...oh, no, I know that in truth they are always speaking... even now... that incessantly they speak and complain, and I am beginning to understand them.

How glad I am the dreary winter is coming to an end. There is already a hint of spring in the air. Time passes so strangely. I continue to live as before, and yet it often seems to me as if the outline of my existence were less clearly drawn. Yesterday has already vanished, and anything that happened a few days ago takes on the vagueness of a dream. Each time Gretel leaves me, and especially when I do not see her for several days, my affair with her seems like a story that long long ago was ended. She always comes from so far, so far.... It is true that when she begins to chatter everything soon seems the same as before and I have a vivid impression of her presence and identity; indeed the colours are almost too glaring, the sound too loud; but vivid and glowing as she seems, the dear child has scarcely left me when she is transported to an immeasurable distance. At times there remains with me an afterglow of bright and happy moments, but it soon becomes blurred and is extinguished as suddenly as a fire in a damp grotto. — And I am left alone with my flowers. They are already faded, quite faded. They no longer have fragrance. Gretel hitherto had not noticed them; but to-day her glance lingered on them, and I thought she wanted to question me. Then suddenly a secret shyness seemed to seize her; she did not say anything more but bid me good-bye and went.

Slowly the leaves have dropped. I have not touched them for they would have fallen to dust between my fingers. That they should fade causes me unspeakable grief. Why I do not have the strength of mind to make an end of the timid ghosts I do not know. They make me ill, these dead flowers. Sometimes I cannot endure them, I rush out away from them, and in the middle of the street they lay hold of me again, and I have to go back, have to look at them, and I find them in the same green glass in which I left them, limp and dreary. Yesterday evening I wept over them as a man weeps over a grave, and did not give a thought to how they really came. — Perhaps I am mistaken, but it seems to me as if Gretel, too, feels the presence of something strange in my room. She laughs no longer when she is with me. She does not speak so loud, nor in the gay vivacious voice to which I am accustomed. In truth I no longer receive her as I did. A continual fear torments me — that she may question me, and I know every question would be intolerable.

She often brings her work, and while I am bending over my books she sits silently at the table, crocheting or embroidering, patiently waiting till I put the books aside and get up, and, coming over to her, take her work out of her hand. Then I remove the green shade from the lamp that stands beside her, and the mild kindly light is diffused throughout the room. I do not like it when there is darkness in the corners.

It is the Spring! — My window stands wide open. Late in the evening Gretel and I look out into the dark street. The air comes to us soft and warm. As I look towards the corner of the street where the lamp burns low I suddenly see a shadow there. I see it and do not see it.... I know that I do not see it.... I shut my eyes but through my shut lids I can see, and there the poor thing stands, by the feeble light of the lamp I see her face with unearthly clearness, as if it were lighted up by a golden sun, and in the white changed face I see the great wondering eyes. Then I go slowly away from the window and sit down at the writing-table, in the light of the candle flickering in the breeze that blows in. And I remain sitting motionless for I know that she is standing at the corner of the street, waiting; and if I dared to touch the dead flowers I might take them out of the glass and give them to her.... That is what I keep on thinking, quite steadily, and at the same time know that it is nonsense. Gretel, too, now leaves the window, stands a moment behind my chair and touches my hair with her lips. Then she goes away and leaves me alone....

I stare at the flowers. They are no longer alive, they are little more than bare stalks, dry and wretched.... They make me sick and furious. — There must be something; else Gretel would have questioned me; she feels it — she runs away sometimes as if there were ghosts in my room.

Ghosts! — They are, they are! — Dead things playing at life. The earth of which these faded flowers smell is simply a memory of the time when they bloomed and breathed fragrance. And the dead return so long as we do not forget them. What matter if they no longer speak; — I can still hear them! They are no longer there but I can see them still! — And the Spring out there, and the sun that shines brightly on my carpet, and the fresh scent of the lilac in the Park close by, and the people who walk there and have no thought of me; are they really the living? I can draw the curtains and there is no more sun. I can put away all thought of the people and they are dead to me. I can shut the window, and the scent of the lilac no longer troubles me, there is no more Spring. I am stronger than the sun and the people and the Spring. But stronger than I are the memories which come when they will and which cannot be shut out. These dry stalks in the glass are stronger than all the fragrance of the lilac and the Spring.

I am sitting before these dry stalks when Gretel enters; she has never before come so early and seldom arrives before dusk. I am surprised, half confused. She remains standing at the door for a few seconds, and I look at her mutely. She smiles and comes nearer. She has a bunch of fresh flowers in her hand. Without saying a word she comes up to my writing-table and lays her flowers in front of me. And the next moment she has clutched the faded flowers in the green glass. I feel as if she clutched my heart; — but I can say nothing... And as I start up, she pulls me back and smiles at me. And holding high the hand with the dead flowers in it she slips behind the writing-table to the window, and throws them out into the street. I feel as if I must jump after them, but she stands in the way, leaning against the parapet, her face turned towards me. And over her fair head the sun streams, warm, living.... And the sweet scent of the lilac comes from outside. And I look at the empty green glass that stands on the writing-table; I do not know what has happened to me; but I feel free — far more free than ever before. Gretel comes nearer, picks up her little bouquet, and holds it before my face; cool white blossoms... such a fresh wholesome fragrance; — so white, so cool; I want to bury my face in them. — Smiling, white, caressing flowers — and I feel that the spectre has fled. — Gretel stands behind me, and lets her hands stray through my hair. “You dear goose,” she says. — Does she know what she has done?... I take her hands and kiss them. — And in the evening we go out into the fresh air and the Spring. We come back together. I light the candle; we have walked a long way, and Gretel is so tired that she falls asleep in the arm-chair near the open window. She is very lovely as she lies there smiling in her sleep.

Before me stands the lilac blossom in the slim green glass. — Outside in the street — no, no, they are no longer lying there. The wind has already blown them away with the dust.

A FAREWELL

HE HAD ALREADY waited an hour. His heart beat thickly, and now and again he felt half suffocated and drew in great breaths, but without relief. He had gone through it all before; it was always the same; he had to wait, one hour — two — three, and often in vain. And he could not be angry with her, for while her husband was at home she could not venture out, and directly he had gone she would come rushing up, quite desperately, press a swift kiss on his lips, and be off again, flying down the stairs, leaving him again alone. When she was out of sight, he would lie on the divan, quite exhausted by the strain of the terrible hours of waiting, which made him unable to work, and was gradually ruining him. It had been going on now for a quarter of a year, ever since the end of the Spring. Every afternoon from three o'clock he would be in his room with the blinds down, and unable to settle to anything; he had not the patience to read a book, scarcely even a newspaper, nor to write a letter, and did nothing but smoke cigarettes, one after the other until a bluish-grey mist filled the room. The door of the outer room was always left open, and he would be alone in the flat, as his servant was not allowed to be there when she was expected, and when the bell rang suddenly it always startled him. But when she came, when at last it was really she, how splendid that was! He would feel as if a ban had been removed, and he was a free man again; he would sometimes weep for pure joy that at last she was there with him, and he had not to wait for her any longer. Then he would pull her quickly into his room, shut the door, and they would be blissfully happy.

It was agreed that every day he should stay in till seven o'clock; after that she could not come — he had told her quite definitely that he should always go out at seven, because the waiting made him nervous. And yet he always remained in his rooms till later, and would not go down to the street till eight. — Then he would think with a shudder of the passing hours, and sorrowfully recall past summers, when his time was his own, and on fine afternoons he had gone into the country, and in August to the sea, and been healthy and happy; he sighed after freedom, travel, remote places, solitude, but he could not get away from her; for he adored her.

To-day seemed to him as if it would never end. Yesterday she had not come, nor had he received any message from her. — It was already seven, but he could not rest. He did not know what to do. The terrible thing was that he had no means of communicating with her. All he could do was to go to the street in which she lived and walk a few times up and down in front of her windows; he dared not go to her, nor send a messenger, nor make any enquiries. For no one must suspect they even knew each other. They lived in a state of restless, anxious, glowing emotion, and in constant fear of being found out. It seemed to him very beautiful that their love should be so carefully hidden, and yet such days as to-day were full of torment.

It was eight o'clock — she had not come. For the last hour he had stood without moving at the door, looking out through the little spy-window at the stairs. The gas lamps on the staircase were now lighted. He went back into his room, and, dead-tired, threw himself on the divan. It was quite dark in the room and he fell asleep. Half-an-hour later he awoke, and made up his mind to go out. He had a headache, and his legs too ached as if he had been running for hours.

He took his way to her house. It was somehow a sort of consolation to him when he saw the blinds were down in all the windows. Through those in the dining-room and bedroom a ray of light shone. He walked up and down for half-an-hour on the opposite side of the way, with his eyes fixed on the windows. There were not many people in the street. But when some maids and the housekeeper appeared at the door he went away to avoid being seen. That night he slept profoundly.

The next morning he lay in bed late; he had put a note in the outer room that he was not to be disturbed. At ten o'clock he rang. The servant brought his breakfast; on the tray were letters, but there was not one from her. He said to himself at once that now it was certain she would be with him in the afternoon, and he passed the time till three o'clock tolerably quietly.

On the stroke of three, and not a moment earlier, he came back after lunch to his rooms. He sat down on a chair in the outer room so that he might look out at anyone he heard coming up. He was always glad when he heard footsteps; every time he hoped afresh. But always in vain. Four — five — six — seven — she did not come. He walked up and down his room, groaning softly, then as if he were giddy, threw himself on his bed. He felt absolutely desperate; he could bear it no longer — the best thing to do, was to go away, away — this happiness had been too dearly bought!... Or he must make a stand — only wait one hour — or two — but even then it could not go on, or he would lose everything, the power to work, health, and even in the end, love. He realised that he was not always thinking about her now; his thoughts whirled as in a confused dream. He sprang off the bed. He opened the window and looked out into the twilit street.

... Ah... there... there at the corner... in every woman who passed he seemed to recognise her. He went away again from the window; she would not come now, it was long past her time.

And then it suddenly seemed to him incredibly foolish only to wait those few hours. Perhaps she might now have an opportunity... perhaps she could have come this morning, and already it was on his lips what he would say to her, and be whispered it to himself: "I have been at home the whole day waiting for you; from early morning until night." But even as he said it he laughed at himself, whispering: "I must be mad, mad, mad!" He hurried off again to her house. — Everything was the same as it had been yesterday. Light glimmered through the drawn blinds. Again for half-an-hour he walked up and down on the opposite side of the way — and again went away when the housekeeper and the maids came out of the door. He thought they caught sight of him, and was convinced they were talking about him and saying: "That is the same man who was walking up and down here yesterday." He roamed about the streets nearby, but when ten o'clock sounded from the Tower and the door was shut he returned and stared up at the windows. Only from the end ones, where the bedroom was, a ray of light shone. He looked at it as an exile might. — He stood there helpless, unable to do anything or to enquire. He shuddered at the thought of the hours that lay before him. A night, a morning, a day till three o'clock. — Yes, till three — and then... supposing she did not come then?... An empty carriage passed, he signed to the driver, and was driven slowly up and down the dimly lighted streets.... He thought of the last time they met.... No, no, she had never ceased to love him — no, certainly not! — Had her people begun to suspect?... No, that was not possible... not the slightest hint of it had escaped — and she was so discreet. — There could be only one reason: she was ill and unable to leave her bed. And so she had not even been able to send him word.... And in the morning she would be better and her first thought would be to send him a few lines to comfort him.... Yes, but supposing it was two days or more before she could leave her bed... if she were really very ill.... God in heaven... if she were seriously ill... no, no, no... why should she be seriously ill!...

Suddenly a thought came into his head which brought with it consolation. If she were really ill, might he not send up in the morning and enquire after her? The messenger himself need not know from whom the enquiry came — he might have misunderstood the name.... Yes, yes, that would be all right! — He was quite glad such an opportunity had occurred.

Thus the night passed, and the next day although he received no news, he did not fret, and even spent the afternoon as he had been wont to do before he met her; — for he knew that in the evening of this very day the uncertainty would be at an end. His longing for her was more tender and kindly than it had been of late.

At eight o'clock in the evening he left his rooms. At the corner of a distant street he engaged a messenger who did not know him, and took him along to her house. Before they arrived he stopped and gave the man careful directions.

He looked at his watch by the light of the street lamp and began to walk up and down. But immediately stopped to wonder what would happen if her husband had a suspicion and questioned the messenger.... He started to run after him but soon moderated his pace and followed slowly behind. He saw him disappear into the house. Albert was standing at a distance and had to strain his eyes not to lose sight of the door.... Three minutes afterwards he saw the man come out again.... He waited a few seconds to see if anyone followed his ambassador but there was no one and he went to meet him. "What happened?" he asked. "The gentleman presents his compliments," answered the man, "and the gracious lady is no better, but they hope she will be up in a few days."

"Whom did you speak to?"

"To the maid; she went into the room but came out again almost at once. I believe the doctor is there...."

"What did she say?"

He made the messenger repeat it a few times, and at last realised that he knew scarcely more than before. She must be seriously ill; evidently there were many enquiries and therefore his messenger would pass unnoticed.... And he would be able to send him again. — He arranged with the man for the next morning at the same hour.

In a few days they hoped she would be up — that was all he knew.... And whether she thought of him, whether she realised what he was suffering — he did not know.

Did she perhaps guess that it was from him this last enquiry had come?... The gentleman presented his compliments; not she, he; of her perhaps, they would not think of saying it.... Yes, but what ailed her? The names of a hundred illnesses flashed through his mind. — Hoped she would be up in a few days, — then it could not be serious.... But don't they always say that, when his own father lay on his deathbed that is what they always said to people.... He perceived that he had begun to run and had come out into a busy street where the many passers-by got in his way. He knew that the time until the evening of the next day would seem to him an eternity.

The hours, however, passed, and he was surprised to find he did not always believe in the serious illness of the loved one. And sometimes he would feel ashamed of taking it so quietly.... But in the afternoon — how long it was since that had happened — he read a book for hours, just as if there were nothing to fear, nor to hope for.

In the evening the messenger was already standing at the corner when Albert came up. This time he told the man that after making the same enquiry as yesterday he was to go on talking to the maid and if possible find out what really was the matter with the gracious lady. It was a long time before he appeared and Albert had begun to grow uneasy. Almost a quarter of an hour had gone by before he saw the man coming out of the house; Albert met him almost opposite.

"The gracious lady is very ill."

"What?" cried Albert.

"The gracious lady is very ill," repeated the man.

"Whom did you ask? What did they say?"

"The maid told me, that it is very serious.... Three doctors have already been there to-day, and the gentleman is quite in despair."

“Go on... go on.... What is the matter with her? Did you not ask? I told you—”

“Certainly. It is typhoid, and the gracious lady has been unconscious for two days.”

Albert stood stock still and looked at the man as if he did not see him.... Then he asked:

“But don’t you know anything more?”

The man began his story all over again, and Albert listened to every word as if it were something fresh. Then he paid him, and went back to stand again in front of the house of his love. Yes, surely he could stand there now undisturbed; — who up there would trouble about him? And he stared up at the bedroom and tried to see through the windows and curtains. The sickroom — yes! — it was quite clear to him now that behind those quiet windows someone was lying seriously ill, — how was it he had not guessed it the first evening? To-day he knew it. A carriage drove up; Albert hastened across and saw a man who must be the doctor alight and disappear through the door. Albert remained standing near, awaiting the return of the doctor, in the vague hope of being able to learn something from his face.... He stood some minutes without moving, and then the earth beneath him seemed to heave up and down, and he perceived that his eyes were shut, and when he opened them he felt he had been dreaming there for hours and now awoke refreshed. That she was seriously ill he could believe, but not dangerously, no.... So young, so beautiful and so beloved.... And suddenly the word “Typhoid” flashed through his mind. He did not know exactly what it was. He remembered seeing it given sometimes as a cause of death in a list of people who had died. He imagined her name being included in such a list, with her age, and “Dead on the 20th of August from Typhoid.”... But that was impossible, absolutely impossible... yet now that he had thought of it, was it really so impossible;... it would be too strange if in a few days he actually read it in print.... He believed by imagining it he had outwitted Fate. — The doctor came out of the house. Albert had almost forgotten him — and he caught his breath. The doctor’s face was calm and grave. He called out an address to the coachman, jumped in and the carriage bore him away. “Why did I not ask him,” thought Albert... then he was glad that he had not. He might have heard something very bad. Now he could continue to hope.... He went slowly away from the house, and resolved not to return sooner than an hour.... And suddenly he pictured her coming to him for the first time after her recovery. He saw it all so clearly that he was quite surprised. He even knew that a fine grey rain was falling. And she was wearing a cloak which in the outer room would fall from her shoulders, and she would rush into his arms and weep, and weep. “There now, you have me again,”... she would whisper at last... “here I am.” Suddenly Albert shivered.... He knew that it would never, never be.... Fate had outwitted him!... Never again would she come to him — five days ago she had been with him for the last time, and he had allowed her to go forever, and he had not known it....

And again he ran along the streets, thoughts humming in his head, he longed to forget. Here he was again in front of her house....The door was still open, and the light was burning above in the dining-room and bedroom. Albert hurried away. He knew if he were to remain there another minute he would rush in to her — to her bedside — to his beloved. — And in his usual way be began to picture what would happen: he saw the husband, who had guessed the truth, hasten up to the sick girl, lying there motionless, and shake her and shout in her ear: “Your lover is here, your lover is here.” — But she was already dead....

In bad dreams he passed the night, in gloomy fatigue the early hours of the day. By eleven o’clock he had sent a messenger to enquire. It would cause no comment, for who would notice now what people came to enquire. All the information he received was: “No change.”... The whole afternoon he remained at home, lying on his divan, unable to understand himself. He felt perfectly indifferent, and only thought: “It is quite delightful to be so tired.”... He fell fast asleep. But when it was dark he suddenly sprang up in an astonished way, as if now for the first time, out of all the confusion, understanding had come to him. And an immense longing for certainty took possession of him — to-day he would speak to the doctor himself. — He hastened to her house. The housekeeper was standing outside. He went up to her, and, wondering at his own calmness, asked her quite quietly: “How is the lady...?” The housekeeper answered: “Oh, she is very ill; she will never get up again....”

“Ah,” replied Albert, very politely, and added: “But that is sad.”

“Indeed,” agreed the other, “it is very sad — such a young and beautiful lady.” And with that she disappeared through the doorway.

Albert looked after her.... “She certainly did not notice me,” he reflected, and at the same moment the idea struck him, that he might venture into the house, for he was an adept at dissimulation.... The doctor’s carriage now drove up. Albert saluted him as he alighted and received in return a polite bow. He was pleased at this for it established a sort of acquaintance, and he might even question him when he came out....

He stood there without moving, glad to think the physician was with her. He remained thus for a long time.... In any case there must still be some possibility of saving her, otherwise he would not stay so long up there. Or perhaps she already lay at Death’s door.... Or.... Oh, away, away, away! — He wished he could scare all these thoughts away, they were useless — anything was possible. — Suddenly it seemed to him he heard the doctor speak; he even understood the words: “It is the crisis.” And involuntarily he looked up at the window, it was shut. He pondered whether under certain circumstances — e.g. when the senses were excited and therefore quickened, words might not be heard through a closed window. Yes, of course, he had heard them, not in imagination, but actually spoken.... But at this moment the physician came out of the door. Albert made a step towards him. The physician probably took him for a relative of the family, for in answer to the unspoken question in his eyes, he shook his head. But Albert would not understand. He began to speak. “May I ask, Herr Professor, how...” The physician stood with one foot on the carriage step and shook his head again.... “Very ill indeed,” he said, and looked at the young man.... “You are her brother, are you not?”... “Certainly,” said Albert.... The physician looked at him with pity. Then he took his seat in the carriage, nodded to the young man, and drove off.

Albert looked after the carriage wistfully, as if his last hope vanished with it. Then he went away. He talked softly to himself, in broken almost meaningless ejaculations, through his teeth. “Well, what are we doing to-day?... Into the country... is it too late,.. is it too late? It is too late, it is too late.... Yes, I am sad. I am sad. Am I grieved to death? No, I go walking about, I feel nothing at all, nothing at all. I can now go to the theatre, yes, or drive into the country.... Oh, no, I only imagine it... it is all madness, because I have been hit so hard. Yes... hit so hard, shattered. This is a great moment, I must hold fast on to it. Something definite to understand, and to feel... nothing... nothing.” — He shivered a little. “Home, home. I must have had some forewarning... but when, when?... Perhaps once in a dream?... Yes, I am going home now, the same as every evening, as if nothing had happened, as if nothing in the least important had happened. — But what am I persuading myself? I shall not stop at home, I shall run out in the middle of the night, to the house of my love, to the house of my dying love.”... And his teeth chattered.

Suddenly he found himself in his room, and could not remember how he got there. He turned on the light, and sat down on the divan. “I know how it is,” he said to himself: “Pain knocks, and I won’t let it in. But I know it stands outside, I can see it through the spy window. — Ah, how stupid, how stupid. So my love will die....Yes, she will, she will! Or do I perhaps still hope and that is why I am so quiet? No, I know it for certain. Ah, and the doctor took me for her brother! If I had answered him: ‘No, I am her lover’; or, ‘I am her Seladon. I am her shattered Seladon....’

“God in Heaven!” he cried suddenly aloud, and springing up, walked up and down the room.... “I have let it in! Pain is here!... Anna, Anna, my sweet, my own, my beloved Anna!... And I cannot be with you! Am I not, I, the only one to whom you really belong.... Perhaps she is not unconscious! How do we know! And she longs for me, — and I cannot go to her — dare not go. Or perhaps at the last moment when all earthly ties are loosed, she will say, she will whisper: 'Call him to me — I will see him once more.'... And what would he do?"...

Then he began to picture the whole scene. He saw himself going up the stairs, the husband receives him, leads him to the bedside of the dying girl, she smiles at him with yearning eyes, — he bends over her, she embraces him, and as he raises her, she breathes her last.... And now the husband comes forward, and says to him: "Now go, sir, we shall have something to say to one another very soon."... But life is not like that, no.... That would be the most beautiful, the most perfectly beautiful; to see her once more, to feel that she loved him! — He must see her once more, there must be some way.... Yes, by the Will of Heaven she shall not die until he has seen her once more. It would be too terrible. He had not thought it out properly. Yes, but what was to be done? — It was nearly midnight. "With what excuse could I go there now," he asked himself. "But do I need an excuse... now, that Death.... But even if she... dies — have I the right to betray her secret, to sully her memory for her husband and family?... But... I might be able to feign madness. Ah — I am an adept at playing a part.... Oh, God — what a scene for a play!... But if one played the part so well that one was shut up for the rest of one's life in a lunatic asylum.... Or if she were conscious and herself declared me to be a madman whom she had never known, never seen before!... Oh, my head, my head!" — He threw himself on his bed. Presently he awoke to a consciousness of the night and the stillness which surrounded him. "Now," he said to himself, "I will think it out quietly. I will see her once more.... Yes, in any case... that is settled."

And his thoughts whirled rapidly: he saw himself going up the steps to her flat in a hundred disguises: as the doctor's assistant, a chemist's assistant, a servant, a man from the undertaker's, a beggar, finally he saw himself as a helper to watch by the dead girl, whom he must pretend not to know, to wrap her in her white shroud, and to lay her in her coffin....

He awoke very early. The window had been left open, and although he lay dressed on his bed he felt chilled, a light rain was falling and the wind scattered a few drops in the room.

"The Autumn is here," thought Albert.... Then he sat up and looked at the clock. "I have been fast asleep for five hours. — In that time much... may have happened." — He shivered all over. "Strange, I suddenly know quite well what to do. I will go to the door of the house, knock, and... even... ask...."

He poured himself out a glass of cognac, and drank it off rapidly. Then he went to the window. Ugh! How bleak the street looked. It was still very early.... Men were running, even at seven o'clock they had to be at work. "Yes, to-day I too am a man who at seven o'clock has something to do. 'Very ill indeed,' the doctor said yesterday.

.. But yet no one has died.... And yesterday I felt continually as if she were already.... No, no...." He put on his overcoat, took an umbrella, and went into the outer room. His servant looked up surprised. "I shall soon be back," he said, and went.

He went along very slowly; it was really most painful to him to go there at all. What should he say?

He drew near; he was now in the street, and saw the house in the distance. It seemed different to him. Of course he had never seen it at this hour before. How strange the grey light was which the morning's rain shed over the street. Yes, on such days people died. — If Anna on the day when she was with him for the last time had simply bid him farewell, he might by now perhaps have already forgotten her. Yes, in all probability — for it was extraordinary how long ago it seemed to him that he had seen her for the last time. Could a rainy morning create such a false idea of time.... Ah, God.... Albert was very tired, very overstrained.... He almost went past the house.

The door was open; a boy came out with milk cans in his hand. Albert went very quietly a few steps through the doorway — suddenly, as he began to mount the stairs a full realisation of all that had happened, and was now happening, and what he wanted to do, flashed upon him. It was just as if he had been half asleep all the time and had now suddenly awakened. He pressed both hands over his heart before he went on. So this was the staircase... he had not seen it before. It was in half darkness; little gas jets were burning on the wall.... Here on the first floor was her home. What was that?... The door stood wide open. — He could see into the outer room — there was no one there. He opened a little door, it led into the kitchen. There was no one there either. He remained standing a little while irresolute. Then the door that led into the living room opened and a servant came softly out without noticing him. Albert went towards her.

"How is the gracious lady?" he asked.

The girl looked at him absently.

"She died half-an-hour ago," she said, and turned away and went into the kitchen.

Albert felt as if the world around him had suddenly become deathly still; as if in that moment everything had ceased, hearts to beat, men to walk, carriages to drive along, clocks to tick. Something within the whole living moving world had stopped, and it had ceased to live and move. "So this is Death," he thought.... "Yesterday I did not understand it...."

"Excuse me," said a voice near him; it came from a man dressed in black, who had come up the stairs and wanted to pass into the outer room, but Albert who stood in the door was in his way. Albert moved a step further in and allowed the man to pass. He paid no further attention to Albert, but went quickly through the door, leaving it half open. Albert could now see into the next room. It was almost dark there for the curtains had been drawn; he saw some people sitting at a table; they rose and greeted the newcomer. He heard them whisper.... Then they all disappeared into an inner room. Albert remained standing at the door and thought: "She is lying in there.... It is not a week since I held her in my arms... and yet I dare not go in." — He heard voices on the stairs. Two women came up and passed him. One, the younger, had her eyes filled with tears. She resembled his love and was certainly the sister of whom she had sometimes spoken to him. An older woman came to meet them, embraced them both, and sobbed softly. "half-an-hour ago," she said, "quite suddenly." Tears prevented her from saying anything more. All three went through the darkened room into the inner one. None of them noticed him.

"I certainly cannot stand here," thought Albert. "I will go away and come back again in an hour." He went down, and the next minute was in the street. The business of the day had now begun, many people hastened past him, and carriages drove by.

"In an hour more people will be up there, and I can mingle with them quite easily. What a consolation certainty is.... I feel better than yesterday; although she is dead.... Half-an-hour ago.... In a thousand years she will not be farther from life than she is now.... And yet the knowledge that an hour ago she still breathed gives me a feeling that somewhere she still must know something of existence; something of which we have no idea as long as we still breathe... perhaps the incomprehensible moment in which we pass from life to death is our poor eternity. Yes, now the waiting in the afternoon is at an end.... I shall stand no more at the spy window — no more, no more."... The hours spent with her now assumed an unspeakable beauty in his mind. A few days ago he had been so happy — yes, happy. It had been a deep oppressive happiness. Ah, when her feet hastened up the last stairs — when she rushed into his arms... and when in the darkened room that was scented with flowers and cigarettes, she lay mute and motionless on the white bed.... Away, away....

"I must go away, it is the only thing I can do. I cannot go on living in my room in the ordinary way. I should weep all day long, I should always, always be weeping....”

He came to a restaurant. It occurred to him that since yesterday’s luncheon he had had nothing to eat. He went in and had breakfast. — When he came out it was past nine o’clock. “Now I can go there again — I must see her once more. What will happen?... Shall I be able to see her?... I must see her.... Yes, I must see my beloved dead Anna for the last time. — But will they let me go into her room?... Of course more people will be there, and all the doors will stand open....”

He hastened to the house. The housekeeper stood by the door, she greeted him as he went past; on the stairs he passed two men who were also going up. In the outer room some people were standing. The door was wide open; Albert went in. The curtain before one of the windows was drawn back, and some light came into the room. There were about a dozen people present, standing or sitting and talking in hushed voices. The elderly woman whom he had seen before, was sitting quite overcome in the corner of a dark red sofa. As Albert came in she looked at him; he stood before her and held out his hand. — She nodded her head and began again to weep. Albert looked about him; the second door, which led into the inner room was shut. He went over to a man who was standing at the window and absently looking out through the gap in the curtains.... “Where does she lie?” he asked. The man pointed towards the right-hand side. Albert softly opened the door. He was dazzled by the full light which streamed out upon him. He found himself in a small light room with hangings of white and gold and bright blue furniture. No one was there. The door into the next room was ajar. He went in. It was the chamber of death.

The window shutters were closed; a lamp burned. The dead girl lay stretched upon the bed. The covering was drawn up to her mouth; on a small table at her head a candle was burning, the light of which fell full upon her ashen face. He would scarcely have recognized her if he had not known that it was she. But gradually the realisation came to him — that it was Anna, his Anna, who lay there, and for the first time since the beginning of these frightful days he felt tears come into his eyes. A hot burning pain went through his heart, he could have cried aloud before he sank down to kiss her hands.... He now saw for the first time that he was not alone with her. Someone was kneeling at the foot of the bed, his head buried in the cover and holding the hand of the dead girl fast in both of his. When Albert drew near the mourner raised his head. “What shall I say to him?” — But already he felt his right hand seized and pressed by the man who knelt there, and heard his tear-choked voice whisper: “Thank you, thank you.” — And then the mourner turned away and let his head sink down again, sobbing softly into the white cover. Albert stayed for some time looking at the face of the dead girl with a kind of detached interest. Tears were now far from him. His pain had suddenly dried up and become unreal. He knew that this meeting would soon seem to him at once dreadful and comic. It would have seemed to him perfectly ridiculous if he and this other had mingled their tears together.

He turned to go. At the door he stopped to look back. The flickering light cast by the candle made him think there was a smile on Anna’s lips. He nodded to her as if he were bidding her farewell and she could see him. He now wanted to go, but it seemed to him as if with that smile she held him fast; it was a strange contemptuous smile, that seemed to speak to him and he could understand. And the smile said: “I have loved you and now you stand there like a stranger and deny me. Tell him that I was yours, that yours is the right to kneel down and kiss my hands. — Tell him. Why do you not tell him?”

But he dared not, he held his hands before his eyes so that he might no longer, see the smile.... He turned away from the foot of the bed, left the room and shut the door behind him. He went shivering through the bright little boudoir, pushed past the people in the darkened room beyond, the people who whispered together, and among whom he dared not stay; then he hastened through the outer room and down the stairs, and when he came out of the door, he slunk along by the wall of the house, and his steps grew quicker and quicker until he was out of sight of it. Deeply ashamed, he hastened through the streets; for it seemed to him as if he might not mourn as others did: his dead love had chased him away, because he had denied her.

THE WIFE OF THE WISE MAN

I WILL STAY here a long while. Over this place, which lies between sea and forest, there hovers a gentle melancholy which soothes me. All is still and motionless. Only the white clouds move slowly along; the wind blows high over waves and tree-tops, and the sea and forest never murmur. Here is deep solitude, one is conscious of it even in a crowd at the hotel, or on the promenade. The band plays the saddest of Swedish and Danish songs, and even their gayest airs sound tired and faint. When the musicians have ended they come silently down the steps of the stand and disappear slowly and sadly with their instruments down the avenue.

I am writing this on my knee, as I am rowed in a boat along the shore.

The shore is green and gentle, covered with the beautiful gardens of country houses, with seats here and there looking out over the water; behind the houses is a narrow white street, and beyond the street the forest, which spreads over the land, gently ascending in the distance, and where it ends there is sunlight. The evening glow turns the long narrow island lying opposite into gold. The boatman says we could reach it in a couple of hours. Some day I must go. But there is something in this place that holds me strangely fast; I never stray beyond its narrow limits. I am happiest on the shore or on my terrace.

I lie under the beech-trees. The heavy afternoon weighs upon the leaves. I hear the footsteps of people passing along the path to the woods; but I cannot see them, for I do not move, and my eyes are gazing up into the blue vault above. I can hear the clear laughter of children, but the great stillness around swiftly absorbs every sound, and although it may have echoed a moment ago it already seems long past. When I shut my eyes and open them again I feel as if I had awakened after a long night. Thus I, too, become absorbed, a part of Nature, in the great stillness around.

The beautiful stillness is at an end. Not in the little boat nor under the beeches can I recapture it. The change came all at once. The melodies of the band now sound warm and festive; the people who pass by talk gaily; the children laugh and cry. Even the gentle sea that seems so peaceful, at night beats against the shore. Life for me has again become full of sound. I had never before come away from home with a lighter heart; I left nothing incomplete behind me. I had obtained my Doctor's degree; an artistic illusion which had misled me in my youth I had finally buried, and Fraulein Jenny had become the bride of a watchmaker. So I had the rare luck to set out upon my travels without leaving a beloved being behind, and without an illusion to distract me. I felt free and happy with the closing of one of the pages of my life. And now my troubles have begun all over again — for Frau Friederike is here.

It is late evening, I am on my terrace; I have placed a light on my table and now write. It is the time, above all others, when one sees clearly. I will write down our conversation, the first I have had with her for seven years, the first since that hour....

It was on the shore, about luncheon time. I was sitting on a bench. Now and again someone would go past. A woman with a little boy was standing on the landing-stage, too far off for me to see their faces clearly. Besides they did not seem to me in any way remarkable. I only knew that she had stood there for a long while when at last she left the landing-stage and gradually drew nearer to me. She led the boy by the hand. I could see now that she was young and slim. I seemed to know her face. She was still ten steps away from me; when I got up quickly and went to meet her. She had smiled, and I knew who she was.

"Yes, it is I," she said and held out her hand.

"I recognised you at once," I said.

“I hope it was not too difficult,” she answered. “You yourself have really not changed at all.”

“Seven years,”... I said.

She nodded. “Seven years.”...

We were both silent. She was very lovely. A smile played on her lips, she turned towards the little boy whom she still held by the hand, and said: “Give the gentleman your hand.” The little boy held out his hand but did not look at me.

“This is my son,” she said.

He was a beautiful dark boy with bright eyes.

“It’s very delightful to meet you again,” she began, “I had not thought....”

“It is very strange,” I said.

“Why?” she asked, smiling at me and for the first time looking straight into my eyes. “It is summer... everyone goes away, do they not?”

An enquiry after her husband rose to my lips but I did not venture to utter it.

“How long will you stay here?” I asked.

“A fortnight. Then I shall go back with my husband to Copenhagen.”

I cast a quick glance at her which she answered calmly: “Do you perhaps wonder at that?”

I felt uncertain, almost uneasy. How incomprehensible it suddenly appeared to me that anyone could so entirely forget. For I now realised for the first time that I had thought of her so little during the seven years that it was as if she had never existed.

“But you must have a great deal to tell me,” she began again, “a very great deal. Of course you have been doctor for a long time?”

“Not very long — a month.”

“But you still have your child’s face,” she said. “Your moustache looks as if it were stuck on.” The bell for supper sounded, too loudly, from the hotel.

“Adieu,” she said at once, as if she had been waiting for it.

“Can we not go together?” I asked.

“I have my meals with the boy in my room. I do not care to be among so many people.”

“When shall we meet again?”

She looked in the direction of the little promenade along the shore with a smile. “People must meet each other there,” she said, and as she perceived I was agreeably affected, added: “especially if one has the inclination. Good-bye.”

She held out her hand to me and went away without a glance behind. The little boy turned once and looked back at me.

I walked up and down the promenade the whole afternoon and evening, and she did not come. Had she finally decided to go away at once? I really could not be surprised.

A day has gone by and I have not seen her. It rained all the morning, and there was scarcely anyone on the promenade except myself. I went past the house in which she was staying two or three times, but I did not know which her windows were.

In the afternoon it left off raining, and I took a long walk by the sea to the next village. The weather was dull and oppressive.

On the way I could think of nothing but that time. I remembered everything quite distinctly. The cheerful house in which I lived and the little garden with the green-painted seats and tables. And the little town with its quiet white streets. And the distant hills veiled in mist. And over all the pale blue sky, which seemed so much a part of the place, that in the whole world only there it was so pale a blue. And I recalled all the people I had known there; my school-fellows, and my tutor, who was Friederike's husband. I saw him otherwise than he appeared to me at that last moment — I saw him with the mild somewhat tired expression which his face wore when he called out friendly greetings to us boys after school in the street; and when he sat at table between Friederike and me, mostly silent. I saw him as from my window I had often looked out and seen him: correcting our work at the green-painted table in the garden. And I remembered how Friederike used to come into the garden to bring him his afternoon coffee, and would look up at my window smiling, with a glance which I did not understand till that last hour — I know now that I have often thought of it. But not as something actual, rather as a picture that hangs quietly and peacefully on the wall of a room.

We sat side by side on the shore to-day, and talked to each other like strangers. The boy played at our feet with sand and stones. We did not talk as if anything were weighing upon us, but like people who mean nothing to one another, and have only been brought together for a short time by the chances of seaside life; we chatted about the weather, the country and other people, also about music and a few new books. When I was sitting near her I felt it not disagreeable but when she got up and went away it seemed intolerable. I could have called after her, "Leave me something," but she might not have understood. And if I thought about it, what else could I expect? That she should be so friendly to me at our first meeting was evidently only the result of surprise; perhaps also the pleasant feeling of finding an old acquaintance in a strange place. But now she had time to remember everything like myself; and what she had hoped was forever forgotten, had again come to life. I could not in the least judge what she must have suffered because of me, and what perhaps even now she was enduring. That she was living with him I could plainly see, and that she had reconciled herself to him again, the four-year-old boy was a living proof — but people can be reconciled without forgiving, and forgive without forgetting. — I shall go away, it would be better for both of us.

That whole year rises up before me with a strange melancholy beauty, and I live through it all again. Every little incident comes back to me. I remember the Autumn morning on which I came to the little town, accompanied by my father, to take the last year of my school course. I clearly see the school buildings in the middle of the park with its tall trees; I remember my quiet work in the beautiful spacious room, and the friendly talk about my future that I had at table with the Professor, and to which Friederike smilingly listened, and the walks with the students along the country roads to the nearest town; and all the little insignificant things suddenly assumed as much importance to me as if they typified my youth. Probably it would all have remained in the shadows of oblivion if it had not been that from that last hour a mysterious glamour was reflected upon it. And the most remarkable thing is that since Friederike has been here those days seem to me much nearer than the May of this year, when I loved the Fraulein who married the watchmaker in June.

When early this morning I went to my window and looked out upon the great terrace, I saw Friederike sitting with her boy at one of the tables; they were the first to breakfast. Her table was directly under my window, and I called out "Goodmorning" to her. She looked up. "Awake already?" she said. "Won't you come down?"

The next minute I was sitting at their table. It was a wonderful morning, cool and sunny. We chatted again about the same sort of things as last time, and yet it was quite different. Behind our words remembrance now glowed. We went into the forest. And she began to talk about herself and her house.

"At our house everything is still exactly as it was, only the garden is more beautiful; my husband spends a great deal of time in it now that we have the boy. Next year we shall have a greenhouse."

She went on chatting. "We have had a theatre now for two years and have plays all the winter up to Palm Sunday. I go two or three times a week, generally with my mother, who takes great delight in it."

“I go to the theatre too,” cried the little boy.

“Yes, you too. On Sunday afternoons,” she explained, turning towards me, “they often play pieces for children, and I go with the boy. I find it very amusing.”

I had to tell her many things about myself. She did not ask about my profession or any serious matters, but preferred to know how I spent my leisure, and was interested in hearing about the social amusements of the great town. The conversation flowed pleasantly on without a break; not a single word touched upon our mutual recollection, and yet it must certainly have been as present to her as it was to me. We walked about for hours, and I felt almost happy. Several times the little one walked between us, and our hands met over his hair. But we both went on talking in unembarrassed fashion, as if we had not noticed.

When I was again alone, my pleasant feelings vanished. I felt I knew nothing of Friederike. I could not understand how it was uncertainty never tormented me during our conversations, and it occurred to me as strange that Friederike herself had not felt impelled to mention it. For even if I assume that hour has not been spoken of between her and her husband for years — yet she herself cannot have forgotten it. Something serious must have followed upon my mute farewell — how can she possibly refrain from speaking of it? Does she expect me to begin? What prevents me? The same shyness perhaps, which keeps her from questioning me. Are we both afraid to bring it up? — That is quite possible. And yet it must come out some time; until it does there will be something between us that separates us. And that something should separate us hurts me more than anything else.

In the afternoon I sauntered through the forest, the same way I had gone in the morning with her. I felt within me a yearning as after an infinite love. Late in the evening, when I had looked for her everywhere in vain, I went past her house. She stood at one of the windows. I called up to her, as earlier in the day she had called up to me: “Are you not coming down?”

She said coldly, as it seemed to me: “I am tired. Good-night” — and shut the window. In my memories of her Friederike seems to me two different people. Generally I see her sitting in the garden in a white morning frock, a pale gentle woman who is like a mother to me and strokes my cheek. If this were the only one I had to meet again here, my peace certainly would not have been disturbed, and I should lie under the shade of the trees as in the first days of my stay here.

But she had once appeared to me an entirely different person: it was in the last hour that I had spent in the little town.

It was the day on which I had received my matriculation certificate. I had lunched with the Professor and his wife as usual, and as I had no wish to be accompanied to the railway station I had taken leave of them when we rose from the table. I felt quite untroubled. But when I sat on the bed in my bare room, with my boxes packed beside me, and through the wide open window looked out upon the green leaves of the little garden, and the white clouds which hung motionless over the hills, the mournfulness of the parting came gently and almost pleasingly over me. Suddenly the door opened. Friederike entered. I got up quickly. She came nearer and leant against the table, supporting herself against the corner of it with both hands behind her, and looked earnestly at me. Then she said softly: “So, to-day?” I only nodded, and for the first time felt deeply how sad it really was that I had to go away from here. She looked for a while at the ground and was silent. Then she raised her head and came nearer to me. She laid both hands lightly on my hair, as she had often done before, but I knew at once that it meant something quite different this time. Then she let her hands move slowly down my cheeks, and her glance rested on me with infinite kindliness. She shook her head with a troubled expression, as if there were something she could not do. “Must you go away to-day?” she asked softly. “Yes,” I said. “Forever?” she cried. “No,” I answered. “Oh, yes,” she said, with a painful twitching of the lips, “it is forever. Even if you should visit us again... in two or three years — to-day you go away from us forever.” — She spoke with a tenderness that no longer had anything motherly in it. It went through me. And suddenly she kissed me. At first I only thought: she has never done that before. But when her lips still clung to mine, I understood what that kiss meant. I was confused and happy; I could have wept. She threw her arms round my neck; I sank, as if she pressed me, down upon the divan. Friederike lay upon my knees, and drew my mouth down to hers. Then she took both my hands and buried her face in them. I whispered her name, and was surprised to find how beautiful it was. The scent of her hair rose up to me; I inhaled it with ecstasy.... At this moment the door opened softly — it had only been pulled together — I turned stiff with terror — Friederike’s husband stood there. I would have cried out but no sound come. I stared in his face — I could not see if anything in his expression changed — for at the same moment he vanished, shutting the door. I wanted to raise myself, to free my hands in which Friederike’s face was still hidden, to speak, painfully to utter her name — but she herself sprang up instantly — dead white — whispered imperiously to me: “Be silent,” stood for a second motionless, her face turned towards the door as if she were listening. Then she half opened it and looked through. I stood breathless. She opened it wide, took me by the hand, and whispering: “Go, go quickly,” pushed me out. I slunk across the little landing to the stairs, and then turned round and saw her standing at the door with unspeakable anguish imprinted on her face. With a violent motion of the hand she signed to me: “Go, go.” — and I rushed away.

And what happened next I think of as a mad dream. I hastened to the railway station, tormented by deadly anxiety. I travelled through the night, tossing about sleepless in a coupé. I arrived home, expecting that my parents had already been informed of all that had happened, and was quite astonished when they received me with joy and kindliness. All day long I spent in imminent expectation of something terrible happening, and every ring of the bell, every post made me tremble. At last a card arrived which quieted me; it was from a school friend, who lived in the little town and who sent me harmless news and cheerful greetings. So nothing terrible had happened; at least it had not come to an open scandal. I dared hope that it had been played out quietly between husband and wife, that he had forgiven her and she had repented.

In spite of this, that first adventure remained in my memory at first as something regrettable, almost tragic, and I seemed to myself as one who, although guiltless, had destroyed the peace of a household. Gradually this feeling disappeared, but later on when I had learned to understand that hour better and more clearly from fresh experiences, sometimes a strange tenderness towards Friederike came over me, with an ache in it, as of a wonderful promise that had not been fulfilled. But this tenderness, too, had passed, and so it had come about that I had almost entirely forgotten her. But now all that I had felt at the time had come to life again, stronger than ever, for I loved Friederike.

What had recently been enigmatic, now appeared to me quite clear. Late in the evening we were sitting on the shore, by ourselves; the little boy had gone to bed. In the afternoon I had begged her to come, quite casually, speaking of the beauty of the sea by night, and how wonderful it was when everything around was still, to sit on the shore and look out into the great obscurity. She had said nothing but I knew she would come. And now we were sitting on the shore almost silent, holding each other’s hands, and I felt that Friederike would belong to me whenever I wished. Why speak of the past, I thought — and I knew she was thinking of our first meeting again after our separation. Were we still the same as we were then? We were so easy, so unconstrained; memories fluttered high above us like distant summer birds. Perhaps she had had other experiences during those seven years, even as I — what did it matter to me? We were people in the present day who were struggling towards each other. Yesterday she was unfortunate, perhaps, or frivolous; to-day she sat silently beside me near the sea, and held my hand, and longed to be in my arms.

We went slowly together the few steps to her house. The long black shadows of the trees lay across the road.

“We will go for a sail early to-morrow morning,” I said.

“Yes,” she answered.

“I will wait on the landing-stage at seven o’clock...”

“Where shall we go?” she asked.

“To the island over there... where the lighthouse stands; do you see it?”

“Oh, yes, that red light. Is it far?”

“An hour — we can be back very soon.”

“Good-night,” she said, and entered the vestibule.

I went away. “In a few days you will perhaps again have forgotten me,” I thought, “but tomorrow shall be a beautiful day.”

I was earlier on the landing-stage than she. The little boat waited; old Jansen had hoisted the sail, and was sitting at the helm, smoking his pipe. I sprang in, and the waves rocked me up and down. I sipped the minutes of waiting like a morning draught. The road, along which I looked was still empty of people. After a quarter of an hour Friederike appeared. I saw her in the distance, and it seemed to me as if she walked more rapidly than usual; when she reached the landing-stage I stood up; she could now see me for the first time and greeted me with a smile. At last she was at the end of the landing-stage; I held out my hand and helped her into the boat. Jansen loosed the rope, and the boat glided away. We sat close together; she held my arm. She was dressed all in white and looked like a girl of eighteen.

“What is there to see on the island?” she asked.

I could not help laughing.

She blushed and said: “The lighthouse, at least?”

“And the church, perhaps,” I added.

“Ask the man...” she looked at Jansen.

I asked him: “How old is the church on the island?”

But he did not understand a word of German; after this attempt we felt more alone with one another than before.

“Is that also an island over there?” she said, looking across.

“No,” I answered, “that is the mainland, Sweden.”

“It is even more beautiful,” she said.

“Yes,” I answered— “but one must be able to remain there... a long time... always.”

If she had said to me now: “Come, we will go together to another land, and never come back again” — I would have gone. As we glided along in the boat, with the fresh breeze blowing, and the clear sky above us, it seemed to me like a triumphal progress, and we ourselves a kingly pair, all the earlier circumstances of our life wiped out.

Soon we could discern the little houses on the island; the white church on the hill gradually stood out, and at last the whole island lay spread out before us, in clear outlines. Our boat sailed along the shore. We passed some little fishing boats; on one of them the oars had been taken in, and it floated lazily on the water. Friederike directed her eyes mostly towards the island; but she saw nothing. In less than an hour we arrived at the port; it was enclosed by a wooden jetty which made it seem like a swimming bath.

Some children stood on the jetty. We went up the steps and slowly along the shore, the children following, but they were soon left behind. The whole village was before us; it consisted at most of twenty houses lying here and there. Our feet sank in the fine brown sand, which had been brought up by the sea. On a sunny open space, reaching out to the water, nets were spread to dry. A few women sat at the house doors mending nets. When we had walked a hundred steps we were quite alone. We had turned into a narrow track which led from the houses to the end of the island where the lighthouse stands. To our left, across a strip of thinly cultivated land that became narrower and narrower, lay the sea; on our right rose the hill, and on the top of it we could see the path leading to the church, which was now behind us. Over it all lay bright sunshine and stillness. — Friederike and I had said nothing. I felt no wish to talk; to me it was infinitely pleasant to saunter with her in this peaceful place.

But she began to talk.

"Eight days ago," she said....

"Yes —?"

"I did not know... never imagined, towards whom I was travelling."

I answered nothing.

"Ah, how beautiful it is," she cried and seized my hand.

I felt myself drawn to her; I wanted to clasp her in my arms and kiss her eyes.

"Yes?" I asked softly.

She was silent and rather serious.

We had come to the houses that had been built round the lighthouse; here the path ended; we should have to return. A narrow field path led steeply up the hill. I stopped.

"Come," she said.

As we now went, we could see the church, and drew nearer to it. It was very warm. I put my arm round Friederike's neck; she was obliged to remain quite close to me if she did not wish to follow behind. I stroked her hot cheeks with my hand.

"Why was it we heard nothing from you all that time?" she asked suddenly. "I, at least," she added, looking at me.

"Why," I repeated surprised.

"Yes."

"How could I?"

"Oh, that's it," she said. "You were hurt, then?"

I was too astonished to make any answer.

"Well, what did you really think?"

"What I—"

"Yes — or did you forget all about it?"

"Of course I remembered. Why do you speak of it now?"

"I have long wanted to ask you," she said.

"Go on," I answered, deeply moved.

"You looked upon it as a mere caprice — oh, yes," she added quickly, as she saw I was about to contradict her— "but I tell you it was not. I suffered in those years more than anyone knows."

"For what?"

"Now... when you were with us.... Why do you ask? — At the beginning I myself.... But why do I tell you this?"

I seized her arm violently. "Tell me... I beg you... I love you."

"And I you," she cried out suddenly; took my two hands and kissed them— "always — always."

“I beg you tell me more,” I said, “everything, everything....”

She spoke as we went slowly along the field path in the sun.

“At the beginning I said to myself: ‘He is a child.’... I was willing to be a mother to you. But the time when you had to leave came nearer and nearer....”

She interrupted herself, then went on’:

“And at last it came — I did not mean — I do not know what drove me on. And when I was with you before I had not wished to kiss you — but....”

“Go on, go on,” I said.

“And then I suddenly said to you that you must go — and you had meant to go, it was quite a comedy, wasn’t it?”

“I don’t understand you.”

“That is what I thought all the time. I wanted to write and tell you.... But where?... So... the reason I sent you away, was... I got frightened.”

“I knew that.”

“If you knew — why did I never hear from you again?” she cried excitedly.

“Why did you get frightened,” I asked, beginning to understand.

“Because I believed someone was near.”

“You believed? How was that?”

“I thought I heard steps on the landing. That was it. Steps. I thought — it was he.... Then terror seized me — it would have been too terrible if he — oh, I won’t think of it. — But no one was there — no one. He did not come home till late in the evening, when you had long, long been gone.” While she was telling me this I felt as if something froze within me. And when she had finished I looked at her as if I would ask her: “Who are you?” I turned involuntarily to the port, where I saw the sail of our boat gleaming, and I thought: “How long, how infinitely long ago it was since we came to this island.” For I landed here with a woman I loved, and now a stranger walks beside me. I could not utter a word. She scarcely perceived it; she was hanging on my arm, and mistook it for the silence of love. I thought of him. So he had never said anything to her. She did not know, she had never known, that he saw her lying at my feet. He had shut the door and sneaked away, and later... hours later, returned, and said nothing to her. And he had lived all these years at her side without betraying himself by one word. He had forgiven her and she did not know it. We had arrived at the church, it was scarcely ten steps away. A steep path would take us in a few minutes to the village. I turned into it. She followed me.

“Give me your hand,” she said, “I am coming too.” I held it out without turning round. “What is the matter with you?” she asked. I could not answer, and only pressed her hand hard, which seemed to calm her. Then I said, merely for the sake of saying something: “It is a pity, we might have seen the church.” — She laughed: “We passed it by without noticing it.”

“Would you like to go back?” I asked.

“Oh, no, I shall be glad to be sitting in the boat again. I should like one day to go sailing alone with you, without the man.”

“I do not know how to sail a boat.”

“Oh,” she said, and was silent, as if something had happened to her of which she did not wish to speak. — I asked no questions. We were soon on the jetty. The boat lay ready. The children who had greeted us on our arrival were there again. They looked at us with round blue eyes. We sailed away. The sea had become perfectly calm; if we shut our eyes we could scarcely perceive that we were moving along.

“You shall lie at my feet,” said Friederike, and I stretched myself along the bottom of the boat, and put my head on Friederike’s lap. I was glad I did not have to look her in the face. She talked, and it seemed to me as if the sound came from the far distance. I heard what she said but at the same time went on with my own thoughts.

I felt as if something were forcing me away from her.

“We will go out on the sea this evening together,” she said. A shadow seemed to me to rise between us.

“This evening, on the sea, in a rowing boat. You can row?”

“Yes,” I said. I was forced away from her by the deep forgiveness that silently enfolded her, and of which she did not know.

She continued talking. “We will let ourselves float out to sea, alone. — Why don’t you say anything?” she asked.

“I am happy,” I said.

I was forced away from her by the silent Fate, that had protected her all these years, though she knew nothing of it.

We glided along.

For a moment the thought flashed through my mind: “Tell her. Tear away this shadow, then she will be like other women again for you, and you will desire her.” But I could not say it. — We arrived.

I sprang out of the boat, and helped her to land.

“The boy must have wanted me. I will go quickly... by myself.”

There were a number of people on the shore; I saw several of them looking at us. “And this evening,” she said; “at nine o’clock I shall.... But what’s the matter with you?”

“I am very happy,” I said.

“This evening,” she said, “at nine o’clock I shall be here on the shore, with you. — Au revoir.” And she hastened away.

“Au revoir,” I, too, said, and stood there. — But I shall never see her again.

As I write these lines, I am already far away — further with every second; I write them in the coupé of a railway train which left for Copenhagen an hour ago. It is just nine o’clock. She is standing on the shore and waiting for me. When I shut my eyes, I see her figure before me. But it is not a woman who wanders to and fro there on the shore in the twilight — a shadow glides up and down.

HIS HOUR OF FAME

I

AUGUST WITTE HAD already been sitting for half-an-hour in the café with a pile of newspapers before him at which he had not looked, when at last Emerich Berger appeared very hurriedly.

"Well," August called across to him, "so you have come at last. It is certainly high time. You leave everything for one to do alone."

"Pardon," said Emerich, as he sat down, "I had another call I was obliged to make, and I found it very difficult to get away — it is to be hoped I have not overlooked anything? Is everything already arranged?"

"Certainly," answered August, slightly raising his eyebrows— "luckily I am here."

"So there is really nothing more to be done, before the thing commences."

"Nothing more now. I have only to arrange a meeting with Dobrdal to give him the last instructions."

"Then you have engaged Dobrdal?"

"Why not? He looks very decent. And then everyone knows that he does not belong to us." Emerich nodded affirmatively, and then asked: "What about the laurel crown?"

"It is already procured, and at the theatre."

"Well then everything is in perfect order. — And besides ourselves no one knows anything about it, is that not so?"

"No one. Fred indeed we shall have to tell, because he will be with us in the box."

Emerich shook his head.

"Don't you think we shall rather — surprise Fred?"

"Yes, why not?"

"You know, I only mean that Fred is sometimes... odd. It might be a disadvantage."

"I can't help that. We shall have to allow ourselves yet another joke. And the responsibility is all on our shoulders, eh?"

"Of course. On yours."

"Very well, on mine. Such an original idea would never have occurred to any of you."

"That is so," laughed Emerich, "but somehow the Blandini is at the back of it, I would wager... and it is true, I believe—"

At this moment he received such a severe look from August that, instead of saying anything further, he nodded his head in an embarrassed way, put a piece of sugar in his coffee, and began to smoke quietly.

"Well, how are you?" said Fred, who now entered, and held out his hand to both young men. "Thank you very much for the ticket for the box," turning to August, "only, may I be allowed to ask, why are we going to this silly operetta again?"

"You shall hear immediately," answered August; "here is Herr Dobrdal."

"Who?" asked Fred.

"You, marker," called out August. "Do you see the gentleman standing by the billiard table, speaking to Franz? Bring him over here to us."

"Dobrdal?" Fred turned inquiringly to Emerich. "What has he to do with it? Who is Dobrdal?"

Emerich looked at the man who, directed by the waiter to their table, came over and bowed to them.

He was a little man in a brown ulster and a fur cap. He dangled a monocle to and fro on a ribbon.

August nodded at him condescendingly. “Goodevening, Herr Dobrdal, won’t you have something?”

“Oh, it doesn’t matter.”

“Well, take a seat.”

“I will take the liberty.”

“I asked you to come to the café, so that for the last time we.... But won’t you give your order? Here is the waiter.”

“Bring me a melange,” said Herr Dobrdal, and, taking off his fur cap, laid it on the table.

Emerich carefully picked it up and laid it on a chair.

“Thank you very much,” said Herr Dobrdal. “Now,” August began again, “how many people have you got?”

“Forty, and well distributed.”

“In the stalls as well?”

“Of course, with the gallery alone we could do nothing. The stalls are the most important.”

“And are you going to see these people again, before the thing starts?”

“Of course, I have got all the tickets still in my pocket.”

“That’s good. Now listen, Herr Dobrdal. We will go over it once more: In the first act — nothing. Yes, I should even like the applause at the close of the act to be no more than usual.”

“Herr von Witte, that won’t do. The manager insists on three calls to the front.”

“I don’t like that.”

“But don’t you think, Herr von Witte, the stalls might applaud after the first act.”

“Very good. Now comes the second act — and we must talk that over. First of all there is the chorus.”

“I know that, Herr von Witte.”

“Please listen. After the chorus, the Blandini remains, as you know, alone on the stage, and is frightfully sad; she throws herself on the divan. At this moment Herr Roland enters.”

“And now we let loose,” added Dobrdal.

“Roland?” cried Fred.

“But that is where the humour comes in,” said Emerich lightly.

“At the moment,” went on August, “Herr Roland enters — thunderous applause.”

“Good,” said Dobrdal.

“With the applause,” said August, “they must shout ‘Bravo’; while it is continuing, the wreath will be handed up out of the orchestra. Now Roland has to say: ‘Beautiful lady... or beautiful woman... my master sends you these jewels.’ Then the Blandini sings her Aria while Roland stands at the door. When the Blandini has finished she walks up to Roland and gives him back the jewels.”

“How fine the Blandini is,” remarked Emerich.

August regarded him gloomily. Emerich reddened; August continued: “Roland takes the jewels and says: ‘What shall I say to my master’ — or something to that effect. The Blandini answers ‘Nothing.’ — Now Roland bows and goes off. — And now: colossal applause.”

“Shouting,” added Dobrdal.

“Right: uproarious shouting, calls: ‘Come out.’ And you must simply not let your people leave off until Roland has come out and bowed. — You quite understand, Herr Dobrdal?”

“Herr von Witte, you can rely on me.”

“So now,” concluded August, “we are all ready.”

Dobrdal acquiesced, hastily drank off the rest of his melange, bowed and went.

"Now may I at last know," said Fred, "what all this means?"

"I will tell you," answered August.

"I am very curious," said Fred.

Emerich listened attentively.

"First," continued August, "I do not exactly see why everything should have a meaning."

Emerich appeared disappointed, Fred laughed. "And second," added August quickly in an irritated voice, "if you two had sufficient ability to think out the matter, you would not have asked. I won't say that in the beginning I thought of anything beyond putting a good joke on the stage: but what we are doing is more than that, it is something good, I might call it ingenious: we give pleasure to a poor devil of whom as a rule no one thinks. The great actors get sufficient appreciation, I find, but the lesser folk are equally essential to the plays."

"That is true," put in Emerich.

"Therefore my jest has a deeper significance, and when the people in the theatre this evening enter into it, as they undoubtedly will, by their applause, perhaps without suspecting it, they will give an ovation, in the person of Herr Roland, to all the lesser folk whom usually they forget."

"Certainly without suspecting it," said Fred, "for you had no idea five minutes ago what a really noble man you are."

"Emerich was quite right," remarked August quickly.

Emerich assumed an important air, but asked himself in what he had been so right.

"It is no good telling you anything," went on August, which startled Emerich, who looked at Fred sympathetically.

"You have spoiled all the humour of it," August said.

"I really don't understand you," laughed Fred. "You are as upset as if you had got a smack. Noble things are always done unconsciously, otherwise they would not be noble at all. When a joke occurs to an ordinary fellow, in accordance with his nature it will be a vulgar one, but when a joke occurs to you, in accordance with your nature it will be a good deed."

August looked at him angrily. "Perhaps you will deprive us of the pleasure of your company at the performance?"

"Certainly not," answered Fred lightly, "besides you have invited me to supper afterwards with you and Emerich and the Blandini."

"I had forgotten."

"But I have not."

"It is time to go," August said.

They paid, left the café and went to the theatre. On the way Emerich contemplated first one, and then the other, and reflected that here were two men who, on a rather important matter, had different points of view. So he took heart, and, as they alighted and went up the stairs to the box, said: "Children, behave!..."

August made no answer. But Fred pressed Emerich's hand and said: "I will try."

The door of the box was open, and as the three friends entered the first chords of the Overture gaily resounded.

II

The first act was over.

Friedrich Roland sat in his dressing-room, alone. He wore a fantastic costume — black and red velvet jacket, and dark-blue knee breeches and a splendid wig of chestnut brown hair on which a cap was perched. He had laid his sword across his knee, and was staring into the mirror, out of which his face, painted youthfully red and with a false moustache, looked back at him. He had sat like this almost without moving since the beginning of the piece. Now and again through the closed door he heard the footsteps and voices of the chorus girls, who hurried past between the stage and the dressingrooms, and then all would be quiet again. Roland was glad he was alone. He almost loved the new operetta because neither of the two colleagues with whom he shared the dressing-room had a part in it. They were not the kind of men with whom he had anything in common; they were contented people, who always carried out their insignificant roles like honest working-men, and asked nothing more of him than the modest efficiency they themselves possessed. Roland was quite aware that as one of them he had his place, but at the same time he felt that in reality he did not belong to them at all. He might have been able to become something quite different, if only he had had luck. He thought of this now as he sat painted before the mirror; as he had thought of it hour after hour. Yet now, after a ten years' engagement at this theatre he could not step upon the stage without a miserable feeling of resentment and mortification, which he had never been able to conceal. His companions, with the quick instinct of lesser men, had discovered his most sensitive points, and all his little mannerisms: the gentle tired way in which he spoke, the slow and seeming proud way in which he used to walk gravely along, yes, even a certain habit of turning his head sideways, and at the same time half closing his eyes, were pointed out as the absurd signs of his dissatisfaction. Whether he had once had talent no one knew, there had never been any mention of it; for years the parts he had been allotted were pages, servants, slaves, conspirators; those that are grouped together on the programme without any names; at most he was second servant, or third conspirator. There were no grounds for assuming that he had more cause to complain than any of the others who were selected for the same rôles as himself; they looked back on the same sort of career as Roland's, and had for years played heroes, lovers or villains at small theatres. There were probably several among them who also recalled that time with painful feelings; and perhaps their dissatisfaction had also been remarked by others', but all the jokes, all the malice fell to his share, because they saw that he suffered most under them. At the beginning he had tried to defend himself, to answer back joking with joking, but could not get the knack of it; he wanted to join in with the others, but had not the right temperament. So he began slowly to let himself go down, and became reserved; often all day long no one would hear a word from his mouth. And this too fitted into the idea they had formed of him once for all; it was the absurd pride of the "misunderstood genius." His reputation outgrew by degrees the narrow sphere in which he worked; everyone in the little town who was interested in the stage folk, knew his name, around which many jokes had accumulated; the reporter in his smartest notices, the public in jesting conversations used the name Roland to denote a type of actor who was insignificant but conceited. So in its way his name had become popular, and in a different sense from that of Roland's earlier hopes, his yearning after fame appeared to obtain fulfilment. Now it had gone so far that he envied the unrecognised. All who might still hope that their fate would take a happy turn and that they might somehow emerge out of their obscurity into the light of fame. To him this was forever barred. Two years before he had ventured for the last time to beg the manager for a better part; it had been smilingly refused, and Roland understood what that meant. Then once more he thought, for the last time, of leaving the town and travelling again in the provinces, where he had spent the first ten years of his stage career; but the agent declared it was too late, and the experience he had himself gathered in his time in hero parts in little Bohemian and Moravian towns, was also not sufficiently encouraging for him to exert the needful energy to seek for an engagement himself. It was best to resign himself and like other quiet workers, perform the daily work by which he might live. He had become very lonely; he had no part with either the principals or the small actors. In earlier days he had gone regularly after the theatre to a tavern where a harmless company of people from the audience and small shopkeepers assembled, who were proud to mix with the actors, but even here they had not failed to make a joke when Roland appeared; and sometimes a kindly word with which he might be greeted, he would take, with increasing suspicion, as intended to be malicious, and before long he left off going. He only went now when he had first drunk a few glasses of wine somewhere else by himself; that made it easier for him to believe in the friendliness of other people, and even to endure malicious remarks with equanimity. Yes, at such moments he was animated by the singular hope that some extraordinary crisis would some day thrust him to the front; he believed it quite possible that he might become famous, and dared to despise the scorn often openly expressed before him. It was not often however that wine created this feeling in him, as a rule he drank it like one too deeply hurt to feel any satisfaction. In earlier days little adventures with women had brought a last glimmer of youth into his life; but for the last few years that also had died out, and he no longer responded to the tender and speaking glances which even now sometimes rested upon him. During the last few weeks it had happened several times that he found violets on the little table in his dressing-room; he had no idea from whom they had come; surely it must be one of the jokes that had often been played on him; a joke like the affectionate letters making an appointment, at which no one appeared, or else the prompter or one of the chorus girls, hugely diverted by his abashed face.

The violets were here again to-day; he had not touched them, and even if they were meant seriously, what difference could it make? He was so absolutely crushed that he was unable to feel any pleasure. He thought of nothing but his loneliness and the way people laughed at him. Sometimes the thought flashed through his mind, how will it end? And there would come to him strange notions from which he had to turn away. But one of them held him fast for a long time: he wanted to publish an appeal to the public in the newspapers, making it known how people tormented him; it should begin with the words “Noble people.” He had once begun to write it, here in his dressing-room, for his table at home always shook — but he did not finish it. It seemed to him like a begging letter. And they might laugh. Something else had occurred to him lately. He wanted to talk seriously, just once, with the Blandini, the prima donna of the theatre, who had sometimes said a few kind words to him at rehearsal; he wanted to tell her that he was not really comic, as people always imagined, but... he did not dare. And then one night he came home rather drunk from the tavern, and a quite mad idea came into his head; he would take the first opportunity to fall on his knee in the middle of the play, and begin at once imploringly: “Oh, noble people,..” and pour out all his grief and misery; he knew he would be able to put such wonderful pathos into his voice that no one would be able to withstand him; they would recognise then that he was a great actor, and many would weep and he himself perhaps with them. — This idea came to him again and again, not as a serious possibility, but like the memory of a vivid and beautiful dream.

The bell rang to summon him to the stage. He got up, went along the passage and slowly descended the ten wooden stairs. Now he was behind the scenes. Some chorus girls wished him good-evening. Roland went a few steps further, and placed himself close behind the door, through which he was to enter upon the stage. He heard the Blandini singing. He awaited his cue... there... now he was on; the stage manager, who stood near him, gave a sign; an assistant on either side opened the door, and Roland went on to the stage. But he was rather too soon. The stage manager had given the signal too hastily. Louder applause broke out, evidently for the Blandini. “Her popularity is always increasing,” he thought, “even on an occasion like this.”... The clapping went on and on. — And Roland involuntarily looked at the Blandini, who at first had turned towards the audience, but now had drawn nearer to him. He heard her whisper: “Do you understand?”... and the applause grew louder and louder. Roland looked up at the gallery.... Suddenly he believed he heard his name clearly shouted.... It was certainly a delusion. The Blandini said: “Do you hear?” Roland answered “Yes.”

“Your name,” said the Blandini. The applause became deafening and the shout “Roland” louder. “What is it?” thought Roland. “Have I gone mad? Am I dreaming?”

“Say it,” whispered the Blandini. “What?” asked Roland bewildered. “Your words... about the jewels.” — And Roland began to speak: “Beautiful lady, these jewels...” But he could get no further. The applause continued, some hisses now mingled with it. It rose almost to a tumult. “A wreath,” said the Blandini, and Roland, believing it was intended for her, hastened to the front of the stage, bowed and was handed a gigantic laurel wreath, which he at once offered to the singer. But she whispered: “For you.” — He could not understand; his eyes fell on the card attached to it and he saw his own name. For a second a wave of ecstasy surged over him; he thought “I am a great actor. Everyone recognises it, although I play an insignificant part”; he mechanically took the card in his left hand — and read: “To the gifted actor, Roland, from his grateful contemporaries.”... And suddenly he heard the theatre resound with laughter; he let the card fall from his hand — he looked at the audience, saw a thousand lifted clapping hands, and the faces of the people lighted up with amusement. He could not understand. They laughed louder and louder. Suddenly realisation came to him. He felt he must sink down and hide his face: they were laughing at him... mocking him. The whole of the public had gathered together to rejoice in his downfall — his, Herr Friedrich Roland. It cut him to the heart: was it thus he reached the summit of fame... He felt it so acutely that he neither saw nor heard anything more, and stared at the noisy multitude as at silence and emptiness, and all in a moment, as if he had compelled them — they were actually still. And he knew that he had not yet spoken his lines; perhaps the Blandini had whispered to him that he must speak. And he said, without a quiver in his voice, looking quietly in the singer’s face: “Beautiful lady, my master sends you these jewels.” — The Blandini took the jewels and gave him a long look; it forced the thought from him: she did not do that at the rehearsals, and he asked himself “Why?”... Then he heard her say to him: “Don’t trouble about it.” Now he perceived that the orchestra had begun again and were playing the opening bars of the Aria; the Blandini took up her position and sang. The Aria seemed very long. Roland meanwhile stood at the door and listened to the well-known voice; the Blandini went on singing; it seemed as if she sang for hours. Roland was conscious of nothing else, only that the stage seemed to heave up and down, and a humming as of a thousand little meaningless voices sounded in his ears; but the Blandini’s Aria rang out clearly, as if it would pierce the walls and pass out into the free air; it seemed to Roland as if everyone, all over the world could hear the song if only they would listen. It was good of her to sing so long because he began to be afraid before she had finished; he remembered how the clapping and laughter had resounded before she began; it would surely burst out again... and he felt he must be strong, to be able to bear it once more — it had been so horrible. — The Aria was over. The Blandini held out the jewels. And Roland asked: “What shall I say to my master?” — And the Blandini answered: “Nothing.” — She said it with a tremble in her voice which had never been there before. And she looked at him with imploring eyes, as if she wanted to keep him there on the stage, and yet he had to go. He bowed and the door opened; he made a step towards it — and then it broke out again: “Bravo! Roland! Roland! Bravo!” He found himself behind the scenes, with the scene-shifter and a few of the chorus who had drifted out. The youthful comedian was also there. “A masterly performance,” he said to Roland. The manager came out. “What does it mean? Are the people mad? Do you know, Roland, what it means?” — Roland shook his head. “Now, what are we to do?” cried the manager. “They are clapping out there again. There is nothing else for it, you must go out and bow,” said the manager. “Yes,” said Roland. He now noticed that he was still holding the wreath in his hand, and was going to let it fall. “Hold on to it,” said the manager, “that’s all right. Ready!” he called. The door flew open, and Roland stepped out on to the stage. The shouts of “Bravo!” grew louder; laughter clearly mingled with them. The comedian said to the manager: “My opinion is, it’s a wager.”

“Probably,” answered the manager; “everyone gets his hour of fame.”

Roland again stepped back, the door was closed. He let the wreath fall, and went slowly away towards his dressing-room. A few chorus girls laughingly tried to shake hands with him, but he passed them by unseeingly, his arms hanging limply down. Then he felt himself pulled back. “You must go out once more, the people won’t be quiet.” Roland turned round, went again on the stage and bowed low. He appeared to find so much humour in the fact that people had at last noticed him, that the laughter of the audience rang out more gaily and cheerfully; many at this moment quite liked him. That dream suddenly flashed again through his mind, and he asked himself if now were not the right moment to fall on his knees and cry out: “Noble people, mercy! Mercy!...” But he knew that under it all there was no mercy. And in the midst of all the shouting and laughing around him, such a terrible feeling of forlornness came over him that his heart stood still. As he went back he cast a side glance at the Blandini; she had tears in her eyes and gazed past him. Now at last the noise was over; the manager clapped Roland on the shoulder, and said laughing: “Your hour of fame.” There were a number of people standing behind the scenes, actors, chorus girls, scene-shifters, delighting in the joke and ready to continue it in the dressing-rooms; but Roland went by with bowed head, seeing and hearing nothing. He went slowly up the ten stairs, crept across the passage, opened the door of his dressing-room and went in, shutting the door behind him. The key creaked in the lock, and below the fun went on.

III

For an hour the three young men had sat in the private room and waited. The Blandini did not arrive.

“She won’t come,” said Fred.

“That’s impossible,” answered August. “We arranged it together yesterday, and besides I wrote to her this afternoon.”

“Do you know what I think?” remarked Emerich.

“What?” asked August.

“We must send to Roland....”

“Don’t begin that again, the joke is over, the people have been amused, it was something new — and now... an end.”

“All right,” said Emerich. “But I meant, we must send something to Roland in the morning.”

“Money?” asked Fred.

“Of course, money is really owing to him, don’t you think, Gustl?”

“We can send him some,” answered August, curtly.

Fred looked in front of him. All were silent. Suddenly August got up. “I am going along.”

“To the theatre?” asked Emerich.

“No. To her house. She can’t be at the theatre now, it is closed.”

“So you think it possible she has forgotten your invitation?”

“Why will you persist,” said August angrily as he pulled on his overcoat.

“Are you sure to come back?” asked Emerich.

"Yes, of course; with her. Au revoir."

He went quickly out. He had to pass the door of another little room; out of it came the sound of a waltz, thumped out by a rather unmusical man upon a hard piano. August went out into the open air. The street was not dark. The snow which lay on the ground shed a faint luminance. It was snowing in great slow flakes. August Witte decided to go on foot, he felt he was excited and hoped the calm, white night would soothe him. He felt inclined to blame Fred for his bad temper, he had spoiled the whole evening from the beginning by his sarcastic, almost contemptuous air. It was true he could not reproach Fred because the Blandini had not come, although he would gladly have done so — therefore there must be another reason. Probably she was angry with him; well. — Had he not done what she wanted? He would never have thought of that trick for this evening, nor carried it out, if it had not been for the Blandini who for some time past had insisted on talking about the wretched creature: he had the most interesting head that she had ever seen, and surely had much more talent than all the others. At first she had only said it as a joke; but as August imprudently began to contradict, she wilfully persisted in her opinion, declaring at length that August was jealous. — That made him quite furious. — Jealous of Herr Roland! — Ah, he was quite well aware of whom he had reason to be jealous. From the beginning the comedian had been his rival; therefore there was no question of anyone else... over this Herr Roland he positively was not going to get angry again. He had continually resolved not to talk about him any more with the Blandini — and he would be with her scarcely five minutes before the wrangle began again. — He felt it was unwise; that he was driving the Blandini straight into something he had feared for a long time. — Now, as he hurried through the street he knew what it was he feared. He knew it was no love of a joke that had been the reason of the trick this evening, nor to give special pleasure to Herr Roland, although he had been firmly convinced Herr Roland would be overjoyed; no — he had cherished the quiet hope that it would make the wretched actor forever ridiculous and impossible to the Blandini, and she would laugh at August's droll idea, and be his best friend again as she had been before; he thought that after this joke the Blandini would finally dismiss Herr Roland to his proper place. He had stationed himself at the beginning of the play so that in front of his friends she might fall on his neck and say, as in earlier happier times: "You are my sweet and clever Afferl." But in the theatre he soon perceived that the matter had fallen out differently from what he anticipated. During the storm of applause after the entrance of Roland, the Blandini had cast an angry glance at the box in which he was sitting with his two friends, and as Roland went off for the last time she looked so forlornly at the door that August had felt a mightily increasing anger in his heart. And now the nearer he drew to the house in which the Blandini lived the less he could conceal from himself that what in truth he trembled at was lest he should find them together. He hastened his steps-ground the corner — and found himself at the door of the house. It stood in a wide street behind the Ring; no one was in sight. He listened and heard the muffled sound of a carriage coming along the snow-covered road. He took his hand off the bell he had been about to ring, and waited.

The carriage came round the corner and stopped before the door of the house. He knew it well, he had hired it for the Blandini himself. In a moment he was beside it. He felt his agitation suddenly subside. For he was perfectly certain that the next moment she would step out of the carriage with Roland — and everything then would be absolutely at an end. — The door was opened, a woman stepped out of the carriage and shut the door behind her. It was the Blandini. August hastened up and quickly peered through the window into the carriage. It was empty. He breathed again. Then he cried: "Albine." She turned quickly round and directly she recognised him, made a step towards him: "Do you dare to come here?"

"Ah, that's good," cried August, suddenly becoming conscious of his rights again. "Do I dare? Where have you been? What have you been doing? I waited two hours for you. What do you call that?"

“My dear, you may wait,” said the Blandini, “we two have finished with one another.”

“Why?”

“Do you ask that? First, do not shout, there is no need for the coachman to know, — and second—”

At this moment the door of the house opened; the Blandini hurried into the vestibule, shutting the door behind her. August trembled with rage. But he did not wish to lower himself before the coachman and porter, and remained standing there quite quietly. He reflected. What should he do? Wait? — Hasten after her? — He ran the risk of being refused admittance. Walk up and down there till the morning? Make a scandal for her in the street in the early hours? He was so angry that he could hear his own hard breathing that was almost a groan. Two minutes later the house door opened and Albine appeared again. She hastened to the carriage, calling out something to the coachman. August hurried after her and pulled her by the arm. “Where are you going?”

“What’s that to you?” She freed herself from him and jumped into the carriage; he after her.

“I suppose I may drive in my own carriage,” he said between his teeth.

“Pardon.”

The carriage drove on.

“May I ask for an explanation?” said August. She did not answer.

“Where have you been?”

She was silent.

“Were you with him?”

“No!” she said, “but I am looking for him.”

“What?”

“Yes.”

“Are you his love?”

“No; but you may rely upon it I shall be to-day.”

August reached out his hand for the speaking-tube to the coachman.

She pulled his arm violently away.

August looked out of the window; they were crossing the Ring.

Albine looked at him sideways.

“Does it interest you where we go?”

August trembled, and did not answer.

She went on talking with cruel satisfaction.” I waited for him after the theatre, but he had already gone.... I went to his house but he wasn’t at home. Then I went to the tavern where he sometimes goes, but he was not there. And do you know why I went home just now? Because I left word specially, both at his house and the tavern, that when he arrived they were to send him on to me immediately. And now we are going again to the theatre, for I shall have no peace until I find him, — do you understand?”

August said nothing, but he would willingly have strangled her.

The carriage drove across the bridge, and a few minutes later stopped in a narrow street at the little back door of the theatre which led to the stage. The Blandini sprang out of the carriage; August after her. The door had long ago been locked. A night-watchman passing by looked curiously at the young woman who was ringing the bell here at midnight. After a few minutes the little door was opened and the porter appeared with a lantern in his hand....

“Jesus, Fraulein Blandini, what’s the matter? What has happened? Have you forgotten something?”

“Just light me along.”

August stood behind her.

"It is nothing to do with the gentleman," said the Blandini, "close the door."

She pushed August back, shut the door herself, and the porter locked it. While she hurried with the porter through the narrow passage that led down to the stage she asked him: "Did you see Roland go away?"

The porter reflected. "Yes, Fraulein. Surely no one is left in the dressing-rooms? I locked up two hours ago."

"Did you see him go away?" she repeated almost imploringly.

They were standing now on the great dark stage. From the lantern which the porter held in his hand a cone of light fell on the white prompter's box. The coulisses on either side appeared immeasurably heightened in the darkness. The iron curtain hung there like a giant wall.

"Yes... did I see..." said the porter, "I don't really remember. I am very sorry, Fraulein, so many people go by, a man does not look at each one, does he?"

The Blandini stood still a moment considering, then she ran quickly across the stage, through the coulisses, to the little staircase. She put her foot on the first stair.

"But Fraulein," cried the porter who was hurrying after her with the lantern, "that leads to the gentlemen's dressing-rooms."

She did not answer, but went so quickly up the stairs that she was soon in darkness, and was obliged to wait for the man stumbling after her with the lantern. She drew a deep breath. When the porter was again beside her and a pale glimmer of light lit up the passage, she asked: "Where is Roland's dressing-room?"

"Well, Fraulein, I don't myself know. I never come up here. But the names are written above."

She took the lantern out of his hand, and began, at random, to try and open the first door.

"Fraulein, that's not it; that's locked. The gentlemen mostly lock it themselves when they go out. And it's not Herr Roland's."

Fraulein Blandini ran along further; she held the lantern high to read the names above one door after the other. At last she arrived at the right one. Here a white sheet of paper was pasted up; three names were on it: Engelbert Brunn, Oswald Friedemann, Friedrich Roland. She groped for the handle, but this door too was locked.

The porter shook his head. "You know, Fraulein, if you have left something in there, it will be quite safe, and still there in the morning."

"You... you..." the Blandini turned to him, "Roland has always finished after the second act, he must have gone out earlier than the others, and you must have seen him?"

"Yes, Fraulein, it is possible that I did see him, as a man sees without noticing, but I know I don't remember it."

The Blandini remained standing a few moments in perplexity. Suddenly an idea occurred to her. She searched her pocket, and breathed again, relieved. "Perhaps it will fit," she whispered and produced the key of her dressing-room. She gave the porter the lantern to hold, and hastily put the key in the lock. It fitted. She turned it once, twice, seized the handle and opened the door. Opposite to her, just by the window, an immensely long figure seemed to be leaning. "Is it one of the costumes?" was her first thought. Then she wrenched the lantern out of the porter's hand, held it high, and screamed. "For God's sake," cried the porter, and rushed to the window. It was almost as if Herr Roland stood there alive, his arms hung limply down, his head had fallen low upon his breast. He was still in the costume he had worn that evening; even the false moustache was still on his lip; only the wig had fallen off, and his thin straight grey hair was sticking up.

"He's hung himself," the porter pushed forward... "hung himself." He placed the lantern on the little table by the rouge pot and the wig. Then he took hold of the dead man by the hands, and felt along his arms up to his head... “with a pocket handkerchief,” he said. “Now, what shall we do, Fraulein?”

The Blandini stood without moving, and stared at the dead body.

“Don’t you think, Fraulein,” said the man, “I had better fetch up the gentleman from below, and I will go at the same time to the police and notify the affair,”

The Blandini pulled herself together a little, then she answered softly: “Yes, go to the police, I will stay here... but tell the gentleman below that he is to go away, that he is to go away at once, I will never see him again, tell him that, and if I find him still there, tell him, that I’ll spit in his face,”

She shrieked the last words so loudly that they accompanied the porter and echoed in his ears as he ran in the darkness across the empty stage.

The Plays

Café Griensteidl, Vienna. c. 1890 — from 1890, Schnitzler, along with his friends Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Richard Beer-Hofmann, was one of the leading figures of Young Vienna, a modern literary movement, whose preferred meeting place was Café Griensteidl.

Schnitzler Villa, Sternwartestraße, Vienna — Schnitzler purchased the villa in 1910 for a total of 95,000 crowns. It would remain his home for the rest of his life.

The house today

Anatol (1893)

A SEQUENCE OF DIALOGUES

Translated by Harley Granville-Barker, 1913

First published in 1893, this seven-act play featured an introduction by Loris, a pseudonym of the young Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Schnitzler's close friend. The plot takes place in late nineteenth century Vienna, depicting the many shallow and immature relationships of the bourgeois playboy Anatol. The first act, Die Frage an das Schicksal (The Question to Fate), earned Schnitzler the title of Psychologischer Tiefenforscher (psychological depth researcher) from Sigmund Freud. Although these one-act plays were much less probing than his later dramatic works, they underline Schnitzler's unique gift of characterisation and power to evoke moods, often in a detached and melancholic vein.

The opening act introduces Anatol and his friend Max, who discuss the problem that a man never can know for sure whether or not a woman is faithful to him. Anatol argues that, irrespective of love, women by their very nature can never be true. He also suspects his current lover Cora of infidelity. The constant uncertainty, against which he believes there is no recourse, almost drives him crazy. Max suggests that he should try hypnosis and his companion takes up this suggestion enthusiastically, as it offers him the opportunity to finally dispel his doubts. As soon as he makes the decision to try hypnosis, he has the opportunity to try it out, for Cora arrives home at that moment. He asks her if she is willing to be hypnotised by him and she is happy to comply.

He successfully hypnotizes Cora and asks her if she loves him; she replies, "Yes!" Encouraged by this, he now wants to address the question of fidelity, but it is apparent that he still fears the truth and would rather be tortured by doubt than face an unpleasant truth that would wound his pride. Nevertheless, Max words the question, "Are you faithful to me?" Anatol objects to the intelligibility of the question, finally even doubting the possibility of the existence of an answer, just to avoid having to ask. When Max finally points out to the unnerved Anatol that all his objections are nonsensical and contrived, he eventually decides that he wants to ask his lover, but not in the presence of Max, whom he sends out of the door. When alone with Cora, he is overwhelmed by his feelings and wakes her up, without having asked his question. Thus Anatol gambles away his opportunity to have "the question to fate" answered, and Cora playfully makes it clear that she will never let Anatol hypnotise her again.

Overall, the change in the nature of Anatol's relationships with women from act to act in this play is striking. In the first act, he effectively has the opportunity to get an answer to a "question to fate", to discover the truth. His lover is hypnotised, and in a sense Anatol is actually the "god" he feels he is. The power of knowledge is given to him. The responsibility for not using the power lies solely with him; he does not dare to ask the question, out of pride and because "imagination is a thousand times more important than the truth". This quasi-almighty position Anatol assumes changes more and more in later acts – in the "Episodes" act he isn't remembered, while in the "Farewell Supper" act Annie resists Anatol's attempt to enforce his position as the person with the sole right to determine the future of their relationship. In the "Wedding Morning" act, the initial position of the protagonist turns completely into its opposite: Anatol is completely at the mercy of his lover, who could ruin the planned wedding and thus completely sabotage Anatol's life plans — however cursory — and Anatol cannot say or do anything to resolve the crisis. Significantly, it is not Anatol that resolves the crisis — Max has to help and bring the situation under control for Anatol.

Arthur Schnitzler.

Anatol.

Berlin, 1893.
Verlag des Bibliographischen Bureaus.
Alexanderstraße 2.

The first edition's title page

CONTENTS

I. ASK NO QUESTIONS AND YOU'LL HEAR NO STORIES
II. A CHRISTMAS PRESENT
III. AN EPISODE
IV. KEEPSAKES
V. A FAREWELL SUPPER
VI. DYING PANGS
VII. THE WEDDING MORNING

Emilie in front of the fireplace — pencil drawing by Moritz Coschell, 1899

I. ASK NO QUESTIONS AND YOU'LL HEAR NO STORIES

ANATOL, AN IDLE young bachelor, lives in a charming flat in Vienna. That he has taste, besides means to indulge it, may be seen by his rooms, the furniture he buys, the pictures he hangs on the walls. And if such things indicate character, one would judge, first by the material comfort of the place and then by the impatience for new ideas which his sense of what is beautiful to live with seems to show, that though a hedonist, he is sceptical of even that easy faith. Towards dusk one afternoon he comes home bringing with him his friend MAX. They reach the sitting-room, talking...

MAX. Well, Anatol, I envy you.

ANATOL. My dear Max!

MAX. Perfectly astonishing. I've always said it was all tricks. But he went off to sleep under my very eyes... and then he danced when you told him he was a ballet dancer and cried when you said his sweetheart was dead... and he sentenced that criminal very soundly when you'd made him a judge.

ANATOL. Didn't he?

MAX. It's wizardry!

ANATOL. We can all be wizards to some extent

MAX. Perfectly uncanny.

ANATOL. Not more so than much else in life... not more uncanny than lots we've been finding out the last hundred years. If you'd suddenly proved to one of our ancestors that the world went round, he'd have turned giddy.

MAX. But this seems super-natural.

ANATOL. So must anything strange. What would a man think if he'd never seen a sunrise before, or watched the spring arrive... the trees and the flowers... and then felt himself falling in love.

MAX. Mesmerism...

ANATOL. Hypnotism.

MAX. Yes... I'll take care no one ever does it to me.

ANATOL. Where's the harm? I tell you to go to sleep. You settle down comfortably... off you go...

MAX. Then you tell me I'm a chimney-sweep, and up the chimney I go and get all over soot.

ANATOL. But, you know, it has great scientific possibilities. We're hardly on the threshold of them yet... worse luck.

MAX. Why worse luck?

ANATOL. I could make what I liked of the world for that fellow an hour ago. Can I shift it a jot from what it damnably is for myself?

MAX. Can't you?

ANATOL. Haven't I tried? I've stared and stared at this ring of mine, saying Sleep... and then wake with this little wretch that's driving you mad, gone clean from your mind.

MAX. Still the same little wretch?

ANATOL. Of course. I'm damned wretched.

MAX. And still suspecting her?

ANATOL. Not a bit of it. I know perfectly well that she's untrue to me. She puts her arms round my neck and kisses me, and we're happy. But all the time... as sure as she's standing there... I know that she's...

MAX. Oh, nonsense.

ANATOL. Is it!

MAX. Then how do you know?

ANATOL. When I feel a thing as I feel this... it must be true.

MAX. That's unarguable, anyhow.

ANATOL. Besides, girls of this sort always are unfaithful. It comes naturally to them... it's a sort of instinct. Just as I have two or three books that I read at a time, they must keep two or three men hanging around.

MAX. But doesn't she love you?

ANATOL. What difference does that make?

MAX. Who's the other man?

ANATOL. How do I know? Some one has seen her in the shop. Some one has made eyes at her in the train going home.

MAX. Rubbish!

ANATOL. Why? All she wants is to have a good time without thinking about it. I ask her if she loves me. She says Yes... and it's perfectly true: Then... Am I the only man she loves? She says Yes again... and that's true, too, for the time being. For the time being she's forgotten the other fellow. Besides... what else can a woman say? She can't tell you.... No, my darling, the very moment your back is turned...! Still... I wish I knew for certain.

MAX. My dear Anatol, if she really loves you...

ANATOL. Oh, innocent! I ask you what has that to do with it?

MAX. A great deal, I should hope.

ANATOL. Then why am I not true to her? I really love her, don't I?

MAX. You're a man.

ANATOL. Thank you... it only needed that! Of course... we are men and women are different. Some! If their mammas lock them up or if they're little fishes. Otherwise, my dear Max, women and men are very much alike... especially women. And if I swear to one of them that she's the only woman I love, is that lying to her... just because the night before I've been saying the same thing to another?

MAX. Well... speak for yourself.

ANATOL. Cold-blooded, correct gentleman! I'm afraid dear Hilda's rather less like you than she is like me. Perhaps she isn't... but perhaps she is. I'd give a lot to know. I might go on my knees and swear I'd forgiven her already... but she'd lie to me just the same. Haven't I been begged with tears a dozen times... for God's sake to tell them if I'm true. They won't say an angry word if I'm not... only tell them. Then I've lied... calmly and cheerfully. And quite right too. Why should I make poor women wretched? They've believed in me and been happy.

MAX. Very well, then...

ANATOL. But I don't believe in her and I'm not happy. Oh... if some one could invent a way to make these dear damnable little creatures speak the truth!

MAX. What about your hypnotism?

ANATOL. My...?

MAX. Put her to sleep and draw it like a tooth.

ANATOL. I could.

MAX. What an opportunity.

ANATOL. Isn't it?

MAX. Does she love you... or who else is it? Where's she just been... where's she going? What's his name...?

ANATOL. Oh, if I knew that!

MAX. But you've only to ask her...

ANATOL. And she must answer.

MAX. You lucky fellow!

ANATOL. Yes... I am. It'll be my own fault if I worry any more, won't it? She's under my thumb now, isn't she?

MAX. I say... I'm curious to know.

ANATOL. Why... d'you think she's not straight?

MAX. Oh... may nobody think it but you?

ANATOL. No, nobody may. When you've just found your wife in another man's arms and an old friend meets you and says Poor fellow, I'm afraid Madame isn't all that she should be... d'you clasp his hand gratefully and tell him he's quite right? No... you knock him down.

MAX. Yes... the principal task of friendship is to foster one's friends' illusions.

ANATOL hears something.

ANATOL. Tsch!

MAX. What?

ANATOL. How well I know the sound of her!

MAX. I don't...

ANATOL. In the hall. Here she is. Well... Hilda?

He opens the door to find her coming in. A personable young woman.

HILDA. Dearest! Oh... somebody with you.

ANATOL. Only Max.

HILDA. How are you? All in the dark!

ANATOL. I like the gloaming.

HILDA. Romantic darling.

ANATOL. Dearest.

HILDA. But don't let's have any more of it. You don't mind, do you?

She turns up the lights and then takes of her hat and things, and makes herself quite at home.

ANATOL [under his breath]. Isn't she...? [praise fails him].

MAX [with a shade of irony]. She is!

HILDA. Had a nice long talk?

ANATOL. Half-an-hour.

HILDA. What about?

ANATOL. All sorts of things.

MAX. Hypnotism.

HILDA. You're all going mad about that.

ANATOL. Yes...

HILDA. Anatol, why don't you hypnotise me some time?

ANATOL is staggered at the sudden opportunity.

ANATOL. D'you mean it?

HILDA. Rather! Awfully jolly if you'd do it, darling.

ANATOL. Much obliged.

HILDA. Not any strange person messing about of course.

ANATOL. Very well... I'll hypnotise you.

HILDA. When?

ANATOL. Now.

HILDA. Will you? Oh, how nice! What do I do?

ANATOL. Sit in that chair and go to sleep.

HILDA. That all?

He settles her on a chair, and, taking another, settles himself opposite. MAX is discreet in the background.

ANATOL. You must look at me... straight at me. And then I stroke your forehead... and then over your eyes... like this.

HILDA. What else?

ANATOL. Let yourself go.
She sits limply with her eyes shut.

HILDA. When you stroke me like that... it makes me feel funny all over.

ANATOL. Don't talk... go to sleep. You are rather sleepy.

HILDA. No, I'm not.

ANATOL. Just a little.

HILDA [in tune with him]. Yes... just a little.

ANATOL. Oh... it's so hard to keep awake. Don't try. Why... you can't lift up your hand.

HILDA [tonelessly]. No... I can't.

ANATOL makes wider passes, and his voice is wonderfully soothing.

ANATOL. You are so sleepy... so sleepy... so very sleepy. Well, then... sleep, dear child, sleep... sleep. You can't open your eyes now.
It seems as if she made the most helpless effort.

ANATOL. You can't... because you're asleep. Keep sleeping...

MAX [really excited]. Is she...?

ANATOL. S-sh! [Then as before.] Sleeping... sleeping... fast asleep.

He stands silently for a minute looking down at HILDA As she sleeps. Then he turns to MAX and says in his ordinary tones...

ANATOL. All right now.

MAX. Is she really asleep?

ANATOL. Look at her. Let her be for a minute.

For a minute they both watch her. Then ANATOL speaks again.

ANATOL. Hilda, answer me when I ask you. What's your name?
Her mouth opens and the word is slowly formed.

HILDA. Hilda.

ANATOL. Hilda... we're walking along a road... out in the country.

HILDA. Yes... isn't it pretty? That's a tall tree. There's a bird singing...

ANATOL. Hilda... you're going to tell me the truth. Do you understand?

HILDA [slowly again]. I am going to tell you the truth.

ANATOL. Answer me all I ask you quite truthfully... but when you wake up you will have forgotten. Do you understand?

HILDA. Yes.

ANATOL. Then sleep... soundly.

Then he turns to MAX and they look at each other triumphantly, but hesitant.

ANATOL. How shall we begin?

MAX [after a moment]. How old is she?

ANATOL. She's nineteen. Hilda... how old are you?

HILDA. Twenty-five.

MAX. Oh! [and he dissolves into silent guffaws].

ANATOL. Tsch! That's odd. But... [he brightens] but there you are.

MAX. She never thought she'd be such a success.

ANATOL. Well... one more martyr to science. Let's try again. Hilda, do you love me? Hilda dear... do you love me?

HILDA. Yes.

ANATOL. There... that's the truth.

MAX. And now for the all-important question... is she true to you?

ANATOL strikes the correct attitude for this.

ANATOL. Yes. Hilda, are you...? [but he frowns.] No... that won't do.

MAX. Why not?

ANATOL. I can't put it that way.

MAX. It's a simple question.

ANATOL. Not at all. Are you true to me! It may mean anything.

MAX. How?

ANATOL. She might look back over her whole life. You don't suppose she never fell in love till she met me, do you?

MAX. Well... I should like to hear about it.

ANATOL. Would you, indeed! Prying into schoolgirl secrets! How was the poor child to know that one day she'd meet me?

MAX. Of course she didn't.

ANATOL. Very well, then.

MAX. So why shouldn't she tell us?

ANATOL. I don't like putting it that way, and I shan't.

MAX. What about... Hilda, since you've known me have you been true to me?

ANATOL. Ah, that's different. [He faces the sleeper again.] Hilda... since you've known me have you been... [but again he frowns and stops]. And it's rather worse.

MAX. Worse?

ANATOL. Think how all love affairs begin. We met quite casually. How could we tell we should one day be all in all to each other?

MAX. Of course you couldn't.

ANATOL. Very well, then. Suppose when she first knew me she had some idle fancy still to shake free of... am I to blame her for that?

MAX. You make better excuses than ever she could.

ANATOL. Is it fair to take such an advantage of the girl?

MAX [with a twisty smile]. You're a good fellow, Anatol. Try this. Hilda... since you've loved me, have you been true to me?

ANATOL. Yes... that's better.

MAX. Right.

Once more ANATOL fixes his love with a gesture. But he suddenly drops it.

ANATOL. No, it won't do... it won't do.

MAX. Well, really!

ANATOL. Think a minute. She's sitting in a train. A man opposite... good-looking fellow... slides his foot against hers. She looks up.

MAX. Well?

ANATOL. Think of the extraordinary subtlety of mind that has been engendered in her by this hypnotic trance. In her present unconscious state the remembrance of looking up not displeased might well be recalled as an act of infidelity.

MAX. Oh, come!

ANATOL. That's perfectly sound. And the more so because she already knows my views on such a point...

which are a little exaggerated. I've often warned her not to go looking at men.

MAX. What has she said to that?

ANATOL. Oh... asked me to imagine her doing such a thing!

MAX. Which you were imagining quite well ten minutes ago.

ANATOL. Suppose she was kissed under the mistletoe last Christmas...

MAX. No... really!

ANATOL. She may have been.

MAX. All this means is, that you won't ask her the question.

ANATOL. Not at all. I will ask her the question. But...

MAX. Anatol, it won't do. Ask a woman if she's true to you and she doesn't think of men treading on her foot or kissing her under the mistletoe. Besides, if the answer's not clear, we can make her go into details.

ANATOL. I see. You've made up your mind I shall ask her, have you?

MAX. Dash it, no! It's you want to find things out... not I.

ANATOL. Yes. There's another thing to think of.

MAX. What now?

ANATOL. What about her sub-responsible self?

MAX. What the devil's that?

ANATOL. Under the stimulus of certain extraordinary circumstances, I quite believe that one is not a fully independent agent.

MAX. Would you put that into English?

ANATOL. Well... imagine some room... softly curtained... dimly lit... glowing with warmth and colour.

MAX. Right... I've imagined it.

ANATOL. There she sits... she and some other man.

MAX. But what's she doing there at all?

ANATOL. That's not the point for the moment. She is there, we'll suppose. Supper... a glass of wine... cigarettes... silence. And then a whispered word or two...! Oh, my dear Max, colder women than she haven't stood prim against such temptation.

MAX. I should say that if you're in love with some one, you've no business to find yourself in a room like that with somebody else.

ANATOL. But I know how things will happen.

MAX. Anatol, it won't do. Here's your riddle with its answer ready. It's to be solved with a word. One question to find out if she's yours alone. One more to find out who shares her with you... and how big is the share. You won't ask them. You suffer agonies. What wouldn't you give to know... just to be sure. Well, here's the book open... and you won't even turn the page. Why? Because you might find written there that a woman you're in love with is no better than you swear all women are. You don't want the truth... you want to keep your illusions. Wake her up... and to-morrow be content with the glorious thought that you could have found out... only you wouldn't.

ANATOL. I... I...

MAX. You've been talking nonsense. It hasn't taken me in if it has you.

ANATOL. I will ask her.

MAX. Will you?

ANATOL. Yes... but not in front of you.

MAX. Why not?

ANATOL. If I'm to know the worst, I'll hear it. privately. Being hurt is only half as bad as being pitied for it. I don't want your kind face to be telling me just how hard the knock is. You'll know just the same, because if she's... if she has been... then we've seen the last of her. But you won't be there at the awful moment. D'you mind?

MAX. Shall I wait in your bedroom?

ANATOL. Yes. It won't take a moment.

So MAX retires, and ANATOL faces the sleeping girl, who is half smiling in her sleep. He braces himself for the effort, then speaks sternly, judicially.

ANATOL. Hilda... do you...?
He fails, then makes a further effort.

ANATOL. Hilda... are you...?

He fails again and turns distractedly away. Then for the third time...

ANATOL. Hilda... have you...?
He begins to sweat with the emotion of it.

ANATOL. Oh, Lord! Hilda... Hilda...

And then, with one qualm as to whether MAX can overhear, he throws conscience to the winds, and himself on his knees beside the pretty girl.

ANATOL. Oh... wake up, my darling, and give me a kiss.

With a couple of waves he can release her, and up she sits quite brightly.

HILDA. Have I been like that long? Where's Max?

ANATOL. Max!
Out of the bedroom comes MAX, mischievously watchful.

MAX. Here.

ANATOL. Yes... a sound sleep. You've been saying things.

HILDA. Anything I shouldn't?

MAX. He's been asking you questions.

HILDA. What sort?

ANATOL. All sorts.

HILDA. And I answered them?

ANATOL [with a look at MAX]. Every one.

HILDA. Oh, tell me...!

ANATOL. Aha!... we'll try again to-morrow.

HILDA. No, we won't. You asking me what you like... and now I can't remember any of it. I may have said the most awful things.

ANATOL. You said you loved me.

HILDA. Did I?

MAX. Who'd have thought it!

HILDA. I can say that better when I'm awake.

ANATOL. Sweetheart!

MAX. Good afternoon!

ANATOL. Going?

MAX. I must.

ANATOL. You can find your way out?

HILDA. Ta-ta.

MAX beckons to ANATOL, who follows him to the door.

MAX. Perhaps you've made a scientific discovery besides. That women tell lies just as well when they're asleep. But so long as you're happy... what's the odds?

He departs, leaving the couple locked in a fond embrace.

II. A CHRISTMAS PRESENT

It is Christmas Eve, about five o'clock. In a byestreet, that links up two others busy with shops, a builder's scaffold has formed a little arcade. Beneath this, and just beside a big arc lamp that sheds its whiteness down, ANATOL, hurrying along with umbrella up, meets GABRIELLE.

ANATOL [stopping]. Oh! How do you do?

GABRIELLE. Why, it's you!

ANATOL. What are you doing? All those parcels... and no umbrella!

GABRIELLE. I'm trying to find a cab.

ANATOL. But it's raining.

GABRIELLE. That's the reason. I've been buying presents.

ANATOL. Let me carry some of them... please.

GABRIELLE. It doesn't matter.

ANATOL. I insist. [He captures one.] But hadn't you better wait here in shelter? We shall find a cab just as quickly.

GABRIELLE. You really mustn't trouble.

ANATOL. Let me be a little attentive for once in a way.

GABRIELLE. I'll wait here a minute to see if one passes. Or I'll be grateful for the umbrella. [He tries for another parcel.] No, I can manage that, thanks. It's not at all heavy. [But she surrenders it.] Oh, very well then!

ANATOL. Won't you believe that I like being polite?

GABRIELLE. As one only notices it when it's raining, and I haven't an umbrella...

ANATOL. And it's Christmas Eve, and dark too...! Warm weather for Christmas, isn't it?

GABRIELLE. Very. [They take their stand looking out for a cab to pass.] Marvellous to see you at all.

ANATOL. I've not been to call once this year... is that what you mean?

GABRIELLE [with much indifference]. Oh, haven't you?

ANATOL. The fact is I've not been anywhere much. How is your husband... and how are the dear children?

GABRIELLE. Why ask that? You don't in the least want to know.

ANATOL. You read me like a book.

GABRIELLE. It's such very large print.

ANATOL. I wish you knew more of it... by heart.

GABRIELLE [with a toss of her head]. Don't say things like that.

ANATOL. They just spring from me.

GABRIELLE. Give me my parcels. I'll walk on.

ANATOL. Oh, don't be angry... I'll be as prim and proper as you please.

GABRIELLE. There's a cab. No, it's full. Oh, dear, shall I have to wait long? [He is standing mum.] Do say something.

ANATOL. I'm longing to... but the censorship is so strict.

GABRIELLE. You can tell me your news, can't you? It's ages since we met. What are you doing now?

ANATOL. As usual... nothing.

GABRIELLE. Nothing?

ANATOL. Rather less than nothing.

GABRIELLE. Isn't that a pity?

ANATOL. Why say that... when you don't in the least care?

GABRIELLE. You shouldn't take that for granted.

ANATOL. If I'm wasting my life, whose fault is it? Whose, would you mind telling me?

GABRIELLE. I'd better go on. Give me my parcels.

ANATOL [mischievously]. I didn't imply it was any one's fault in particular. I just wanted your valuable opinion.

GABRIELLE [with a touch of feeling]. You idler!

ANATOL. Don't despise idlers. They're the last word in civilisation. But I'm not idling to-night. I'm as busy as you are.

GABRIELLE. What with?

ANATOL. I'm out to buy Christmas presents, too.

GABRIELLE. Are you?

ANATOL. If I could find anything worth buying. I've been looking at the shops for weeks. They haven't a notion amongst 'em.

GABRIELLE. That's what the good customer has to supply. But, bless me! an idle person like you ought to be thinking out his presents all the summer.

ANATOL. How could I? How can I tell in the summer who I may be making up to at Christmas? And the shops will be shut in an hour or two, and I'm still empty-handed!

GABRIELLE. Could I help?

ANATOL. Oh, you are a darling! What's my best shop?

GABRIELLE. Well, you must know that. We'll take the cab there when we find it.

ANATOL. Thank you for passing the Darling... it's my favourite word.

GABRIELLE. I ignored it.

ANATOL. Very well... I'm prim and proper again.

GABRIELLE. Where shall we go when the cab comes? What sort of a present? Who's it for?

ANATOL. Now... how shall I tell you?

GABRIELLE. It's for a woman, of course.

ANATOL. Didn't I say you could read me like a book?

GABRIELLE. What sort of a woman?

ANATOL. There, again! How do you women sort yourselves out?

GABRIELLE. Is it a woman I know?

ANATOL. Not at all.

GABRIELLE. Not... a woman I should call on?

ANATOL. Never.

GABRIELLE. No... I thought as much.

ANATOL. Don't sneer.

GABRIELLE. You have extraordinary tastes. What's she like... pretty-pretty?

ANATOL. Pretty.

GABRIELLE. A man is a marvellous creature. Good breeding, good manners, are nothing to you!

ANATOL. Oh, a great deal... when they'll condescend to us. But if they won't...

GABRIELLE. Don't be silly again. No, you prefer a cheap and easy conquest!

ANATOL. I go where I'm appreciated.

GABRIELLE. Can she read you like a book?

ANATOL. God forbid! But she admires the binding, and takes the rest on trust. While you despise the contents... as if you really knew them!

GABRIELLE. I really don't know what you mean. I can tell you of an excellent shop; I passed it just now. Cases of scent in the window. One with three sorts... Patchouli, Jockey Club, Cherry Blossom. I'm sure that's the very thing.

ANATOL. You're unkind.

GABRIELLE. Well, there was another shop next door... With brooches and suchlike. One with six Parisian diamonds in it... six. Oh, so sparkling! Or a bracelet with charms hung round; or a long bead necklace... quite savage! That's the sort of thing these ladies like, isn't it?

ANATOL. I'm afraid you know nothing about them.

GABRIELLE. Or I can tell you of a hat shop with a style of its own. Their bows are too large, and they put in a feather too many. These persons like to be conspicuous, don't they?

ANATOL. Not at all.

GABRIELLE. It's hard to be helpful. Make a suggestion yourself.

ANATOL. You're waiting to laugh at it.

GABRIELLE. I promise I won't. Let me know what she likes. Is she demure in sealskins?

ANATOL. I said you'd laugh.

GABRIELLE. I'm not laughing. Tell me about her.

ANATOL. I don't think I can.

GABRIELLE. Of course you can. How long have you known her?

ANATOL. Oh...

GABRIELLE. Well?

ANATOL. Ever so long.

GABRIELLE. Don't be so difficult. Tell me all about it.

ANATOL. There's nothing to tell.

GABRIELLE. What nonsense! Where did you meet her and what's she like? What's her name and her age? Is she tall or short and dark or fair?

ANATOL. It'll only bore you.

GABRIELLE. No it won't. I've always wanted to know about that sort of person... what they're really like.

ANATOL. You'll never know.

GABRIELLE. Why not?

ANATOL. As long as you fully believe that women you can't call on don't really exist at all.

GABRIELLE. But I want to learn better. And if no one dares tell me the truth...

ANATOL [with a sudden break of tone]. Haven't you very virtuous ladies a feeling that this other sort of woman... somehow gets the better of you after all

GABRIELLE. That's a delicate insult.

ANATOL. You wouldn't change places, of course, but... how dare she be so improperly happy?

GABRIELLE. Is it the only way then?

ANATOL. That's feminine fellow-feeling, I'm told... and therefore all that's charming and charitable.

GABRIELLE. You've learnt to be very sarcastic since we last met.

ANATOL [seriously, almost passionately]. Shall I tell you bow? Once I used to believe that a good woman so-called was an honest woman. I've taken a few knock-down blows with my teeth shut...

GABRIELLE. Please don't be heroic... that's far worse!

ANATOL. Straight blows. I can take a No when it's honestly meant and said without flinching. But when the eyes say Perhaps and the smile says Wait a little, and what the No means is Yes Yes Yes... if only I dared! Then...

GABRIELLE [biting her lips]. I think I won't wait for this cab to come by...

ANATOL. Then you've your choice between feeling a fool and becoming a cynic.

GABRIELLE.... Unless you mean to go on telling me about... about your new friend.

ANATOL [back to his bantering humour]. You simply must know, must you?

GABRIELLE. Certainly I must. How did you first meet?

ANATOL. How does one meet people? In the streets, at the seaside, in an omnibus, sharing au umbrella!

GABRIELLE. Never mind how one meets people. How did you meet her... the Her we're finding a Christmas present for? I'm sure she's like nobody else.

ANATOL. She's just as like every other girl of her sort as you are like every other woman of yours.

GABRIELLE [for the first time really annoyed]. Am I indeed!

ANATOL. Oh, don't be offended. Or as I'm like every other man of mine. Are there a dozen different patterns of any of us altogether?

GABRIELLE. What's yours?

ANATOL. I, madam, am a Toy Philosopher.

GABRIELLE. And mine?

ANATOL. You are a Married Lady.

GABRIELLE. And what's she?

ANATOL. She? She is just a Dear Little Girl.

GABRIELLE. Then let's hear all about your Dear Little Girl.

ANATOL. It's not that she's so pretty, or so smart... and certainly not that she's so clever.

GABRIELLE. Never mind what she's not.

ANATOL. She's as sweet as a wild flower, and as elusive as a fairy tale... and she knows what love means.

GABRIELLE. No doubt. These Dear Little Girl have every chance to learn.

ANATOL. Quite so, but you'll never learn what she's really like. For when you were a dear little girl... of another sort... you knew nothing at all. And now you're a married lady you think you're so worldly wise.

GABRIELLE. Not at all. I'm quite open-mouthed for your fairy tale. What sort of a castle does the princess live in?

ANATOL. Can you imagine a fairy princess in anything but the smartest of drawing-rooms?

GABRIELLE [a little tartly]. Thank you, I can.

ANATOL. Because this one lives in a little room... with a cheap and nasty wall-paper. With a few Christmas numbers hanging about and a white shaded lamp on her table. You can see the sun set from the window over the roofs and through the chimneys. And in the spring you can almost smell the flowers in a garden across the way.

GABRIELLE. It must be a sign of great happiness... looking forward to the spring.

ANATOL. Yes, even I feel happy now and then... sitting with her at that window.

GABRIELLE gives a little shiver; it's the cold, no doubt. Then...

GABRIELLE. It is getting late. Shall we walk on? You must buy her something. Something to hang on the nasty wall-paper and hide it a little.

ANATOL. She thinks it so pretty.

GABRIELLE. Why don't you refurnish the room to your taste?

ANATOL. Why should I?

GABRIELLE. With a Persian carpet, and...

ANATOL. No, no, no... She knows what she likes.

There falls a little silence. But no cab passes.

GABRIELLE. Is she waiting for you now?

ANATOL. Sure to be.

GABRIELLE. What will she say when you come?

ANATOL. Oh... the right thing.

GABRIELLE. She knows your step on the stairs, doesn't she?

ANATOL. I expect so.

GABRIELLE. And goes to the door?

ANATOL. Yes.

GABRIELLE. And puts her arms round your neck, and says... What does she say?

ANATOL. The right thing.

GABRIELLE. What's that?

ANATOL. It's just... the right thing to say.

GABRIELLE. What was it yesterday?

ANATOL. It sounds nothing repeated. I suppose it's the way that she says it.

GABRIELLE. I'll imagine that. Tell me the words.

ANATOL. It is good to have you back again.

GABRIELLE. It is good... what?

ANATOL. To have you back again.

GABRIELLE. That's very beautiful.

ANATOL. You see... she means it.

GABRIELLE. And she lives there alone? You can always be with her?

ANATOL. She's quite alone. She has no father or mother.

GABRIELLE. And you... are all the world to her?

ANATOL [the cynic in him shrugs his shoulders]. I hope so. For the moment.
There is another silence.

GABRIELLE. I'm afraid I'm getting cold standing still... and all the cabs seem to be full.

ANATOL. I'm so sorry. I shouldn't have kept you. Let me see you home.

GABRIELLE. Yes... they'll all be fidgeting. But what about your present?

ANATOL. Never mind, I shall find something.

GABRIELLE. Will you? But I wanted to help you buy it.

ANATOL. No, no, you mustn't trouble.

GABRIELLE. I wish I could be there when you give it her. I wish I could see that little room and that... lucky little girl. There's a cab empty. Call it, please.

ANATOL waves to the cab.

ANATOL. Taxi!

GABRIELLE. Thank you. [As the cab turns and she moves towards it...] May I send her something?

ANATOL. You?

GABRIELLE. Take her these flowers. Will you give her a message as well?

ANATOL. It's really most awfully good of you.

GABRIELLE. But you will take them her, and promise to give her the message?

ANATOL. Certainly.

GABRIELLE. Promise.

ANATOL [by this he has opened the cab door]. I promise. Why shouldn't I?

GABRIELLE. This is it.

ANATOL. Yes?

GABRIELLE. These flowers, dear little girl, are from... some one who might have been as happy as you... if she hadn’t been quite such a coward! [She gets in without his help]. Tell him where to drive.
He does so, and then goes his way too.

III. AN EPISODE

MAX'S ROOMS ARE comfortable, if commonplace. The writing table he is sitting at is clumsy, but it's within reach of a cheerful fire. By the lamp on it he is reading a letter.

MAX. We're back again for three months... you'll have seen it in the papers. Old friends first... I'm coming along... Your affectionate Bibi. Nice little Bianca! I shall certainly stay in.
There's a knock at the door.

MAX. Already! No, this can't be... Come in.

In walks ANATOL, carrying an enormous parcel. He looks most gloomy.

ANATOL. How are you?

MAX. What on earth have you got there,

ANATOL. This is my past.

MAX. Your what?

ANATOL deposits the parcel on the table.

ANATOL. I have brought you my dead and buried past. I want you to take care of it for me.

MAX. Why?

ANATOL [with great solemnity]. May I sit down?

MAX [as solemn as he]. You may.

ANATOL takes off his hat and coat and settles himself in the most comfortable chair.

ANATOL. May I smoke?

MAX. Try one of these.

ANATOL lights a cigar and unbends a trifle.

ANATOL. I rather like these.

MAX [pointing to the parcel]. Well?

ANATOL. I really cannot live with my past any longer. I'm going for a holiday.

MAX. Ah!

ANATOL. I wish to begin a new life... even if I don't go on with it. And this is naturally very much in the way.

MAX. In love again?

ANATOL. Out of love this time. So you might look after this rubbish for me.

MAX. Better burn it if it's rubbish.

ANATOL. I can't do that.

MAX. Why not?

ANATOL. This is how I'm true to them... to all the women I've ever loved... I never forget a single one. I have only to turn over these letters, and dead flowers, and locks of hair... You'll have to let me come here and turn them over occasionally... and back they come to me... I'm in love with them all again.

MAX. This is to be a sort of Usual place at half-past three and don't be late... is it?

ANATOL. I've often wished there really were some Abracadabra which would call them back out of the utter nothingness.

MAX. But a variegated sort of nothingness.

ANATOL. If I knew of a word...

MAX. Let's think of one. What about... My Only Love.

ANATOL. Yes... My Only Love! And then they'd all come. One from a little suburban villa... one from her crowded drawing-room... one from her dressing-room at the theatre...

MAX. Several from their dressing-rooms at the theatre.

ANATOL. Several. One from a shop...

MAX. One from the arms of your successor!

ANATOL. One from the grave. One from here... one from there. Here they all are!

MAX. Would you mind not speaking the word? I somehow don't think they'd be pleasant company. I dare say they're not in love with you still... but I'm pretty sure they're still jealous of each other.

ANATOL. Wise man! Let the phantoms rest.

MAX. And where am I to put this mausoleum?

ANATOL. I'd better undo it.

He undoes it. The parcel is made up of a dozen or so other little parcels, neatly tied up and ticketed. MAX gazes with delight.

MAX. Hullo!

ANATOL. Yes... I'm a methodical man.

MAX. Is it done alphabetically?

ANATOL. No, there's a label for each... like the motto in a cracker. A verse or a phrase will recall the whole affair to me. No names! Susan and Jane suggest nothing.

MAX. May I look?

ANATOL. I wonder if I can still fix them all. I can't have looked at some of them for years.

ANATOL leans back in his chair, smoking. MAX settles himself enjoyably to the Past. He takes up the first packet and reads the motto.

MAX.
"I loved her. When she left me I thought

I should have killed her;
My kisses on your neck remain, and nothing else, Matilda."
But that's a name... what a name! Matilda!

ANATOL. It wasn't her real name, but I'd written "killed her," and there aren't many rhymes to that. I always did kiss her on the neck, though.

MAX. Who was she?

ANATOL. It doesn't matter. I held her in my arms once. That's all there is to her.

MAX [as he puts the packet aside]. Stand down, Matilda. She does up small, anyhow.

ANATOL. One lock of hair.

MAX. No letters?

ANATOL. Letters from Matilda! That would have inked her fingers. Don't you sometimes wish women weren't taught to write? Exit Matilda.

MAX reads another label.

MAX. "Women are alike in one thing... they turn impudent if you catch them out in a lie."

ANATOL. They do.

MAX. Who was it? She's very heavy.

ANATOL. Lies eight pages long. Oh... put it away.

MAX. Was she so very impudent?

ANATOL. When I found her out. Throw her away.

MAX. Impudent little liar!

ANATOL. No... you mustn't insult her. I have held her in my arms. She is sacred.

MAX. How stupid of me! Who's next? [A third packet.]
"When sad, my child, and sick of earth.
My thoughts to your Young Man fly far,
And then I laugh for all I'm worth;
Oh, dear, how funny some things are!"

ANATOL. So they were!

MAX. What's inside?

ANATOL. A photograph. She and the Young Man.

MAX. Did you know him too?

ANATOL. That's what was so funny. He really was quite an exceptional fool.

MAX. Hush! She has held him in her arms... he is sacred.

ANATOL. You shut up.

MAX. Stand down, my child, with your exceptionally foolish and mirth-provoking young man. [With a fourth package.] What's this?

ANATOL. What?

MAX. "A box on the ears."

ANATOL. Oh...! Oh, yes... yes... yes!

MAX. Was that how it ended?

ANATOL. No, how it began.

MAX. Ah! [A fifth label.] "How hard it is to grow a flower, but it's so easy to pick it." What does that mean?

ANATOL. Some other fellow grew the flower... I came along and picked it.

MAX. Oh! [A sixth label.] "She always carried her curling tongs."

ANATOL. Do you know she always did. Then it didn't matter what happened. I tell you... she was damn pretty. There's a bit of her veil left, isn't there?

MAX. It feels like that. [A seventh label.] “How did I lose you?” How did you lose her?

ANATOL. That’s the point... I never knew. One fine day she just wasn’t. Don’t you know how you leave your umbrella somewhere... don’t think of it till days later... no idea where you put it down.

MAX. Fare thee well, my lost umbrella! [An eighth label.] What’s this one? “Sweet and dear you were to me...”

ANATOL [catching him up]. “Girl with roughened finger tips. Past all...”

MAX. Oh... that was Hilda.

ANATOL. You remember Hilda?

MAX. What became of her?

ANATOL. She married a milkman.

MAX. Did she now?

ANATOL. That’s what happens. I love a girl... I’m all the world to her... and then she marries a milkman. A dear child. I hope it’s been good for trade.

MAX [as he puts HILDA aside]. Milko! [Then the ninth package.] And what’s “Episode”? Nothing inside but a little dust.

ANATOL leans across and takes the little envelope from him.

ANATOL. Dust! It was once a rosebud.

MAX. What does “Episode” mean?

ANATOL. That’s what it was... an episode... a couple of hours’ romance. Pathetic, isn’t it? Nothing left of its sweetness but dust!

MAX. Most pathetic. But one might call them all a little episodic.

ANATOL. Not with such dreadful truth. Of course, they all were... and I knew they were at the time. I had a fine idea of myself in those days. I used to catch myself thinking... Poor child, poor child!

MAX. Poor...?

ANATOL. When I was very young indeed I saw myself as one of the world’s great heroes of romance. These women, I thought... I pluck them, crush the sweetness from them... it’s the law of nature... then I throw them aside as I pass on. I know row that I’m more of a fool than a hero... and I’m getting most unpleasantly used to knowing it.

MAX. What was “Episode”?

ANATOL. I caught her... then I threw her aside... crushed her under my heel.

MAX. Did you really?

ANATOL. But I tell you... they were the few most wonderful moments I ever passed. Not that you'd ever understand.

MAX. Why not?

ANATOL. Because it sounds nothing at all... unless you can feel it as I felt it.

MAX. I'll try.

ANATOL. I sat at the piano in that room of mine one evening. We'd been in love with each other just two hours. D'you remember a lamp I had and the curious glowing light it gave. Think of that lamp... it's most important.

MAX. I've thought of it.

ANATOL. I sat at the piano. She sat at my feet... I remember I couldn't reach the pedals. Her head in my lap... her hair loose... and the glowing light making such shadows in it! I let one hand wander on the keys... the other was pressed against her lips.

MAX. What else?

ANATOL. Isn't that like you? Nothing else! We'd loved each other for only an hour or two. It was our first solitude... it was to be our last. She said it would be. But I knew that she loved me madly... the very air was shimmering with it. Would you have noticed that? Do you wonder I felt a demi-god and only thought... Oh, you poor, poor child! What was it to me? An episode. I should hardly cease to feel her kisses on my hand before she'd begin to slip into the shadows of memory. But she'd never forget... never be able to forget. Some women can... but not she. She lay thereat my feet pouring out her soul in love. I knew that I was the whole world to her... and always would be... one is so certain of these things sometimes. While to me... she and her love were just an episode.

MAX. Who was the lady?

ANATOL. You knew her... we met her at supper once.

MAX. Did we? Sounds too romantic a person for any supper I ever went to.

ANATOL. Not a bit. You'll laugh when I tell you. She belonged to a...

MAX. Theatre?

ANATOL. No... a circus.

MAX. Not Bianca?

ANATOL. Yes... Bianca. I never told you I met her again after that night.

MAX. D'you mean to say that Bibi was in love with you?

ANATOL. She was. I met her in the street... it seems they went off to Russia the next morning.

MAX. And a good job for your romance they did.

ANATOL. Of course! Because it's somebody you knew the whole thing becomes commonplace. Oh, Max... why don't you learn how to be in love?

MAX. Teach me.

ANATOL. Learn to tune yourself up to the supreme moments.

MAX. With a little piano-playing and a glowing light upon her shimmering hair?

ANATOL. Well... that's how I get wonders out of life. You saw no more in that girl than you could in that lamp of mine. A bit of glass, wasn't it... with a light behind? What a way to walk through the world... eyes open and imagination shut! Do you wonder you find nothing in it? You swallow life whole, Max... I taste it.

MAX. You've only to fall in love to make the universe all you want it to be!

ANATOL. That's how it's done.

MAX. How many glowing lamps would it take to work Bianca up to that pitch?

ANATOL. I know what she felt when I kissed her.

MAX. I know better.

ANATOL. Do you?

MAX. Because I've never kissed her... and never needed to imagine her anything but the pretty, harmless, worthless little baggage she is.

ANATOL. Oh!

MAX. Whatever else you want to find in her you must put there first.

ANATOL. It wasn't so then... it wasn't. Oh... I know all about the girl. She'd kissed men before, and she has kissed them since.

MAX. With just the same kisses that she kissed you.

ANATOL. No. I wish I hadn't told you.

MAX. Never mind. You felt all you felt and all she ought to have felt as well.

ANATOL. Have you ever seen much of her?

MAX. Quite a lot.

ANATOL. Have you?

MAX. Don’t distress yourself. She’s a witty little devil, and we always liked a chat.

ANATOL. A friendly chat?

MAX. Not a bit more.

ANATOL. Then I swear to you, Max... that girl loved me to distraction.

MAX. Quite so. Let’s get on with the others [he takes a tenth packet]. “Could I but tell the meaning of your smile, you green-eyed”...

ANATOL. I say... d’you know that circus is back again?

MAX. Yes... she’s still with it.

ANATOL. Sure?

MAX. Quite. I shall see her this evening... she’s coming to call.

ANATOL. Well! Why on earth didn’t you tell me that before?

MAX. What’s it to do with you? Your past is dead... look at it.

ANATOL. But...

MAX. Besides... yesterday’s romance warmed up. Don’t risk that.

ANATOL. I wonder if I could feel the same for her again.

MAX. There are other dangers. You take great care of this Episode of yours. Don’t let it catch cold.

ANATOL. But I mustn’t miss a chance of seeing her.

MAX. She’s wiser than you! Has she ever sent you even a postcard? But perhaps she forgot all about you.

ANATOL. Max... why not believe me when I tell you...?

MAX. Well?

ANATOL. That hour we spent together was one of those things that never fade.
There’s a knock at the door of the flat.

MAX. Here she is!

ANATOL. What!

MAX. You go into my bedroom and then slip out.

ANATOL. Certainly not.

MAX. You'd much better.

ANATOL. I shall not.

MAX. Stand there then, where she won't see you at once.

ANATOL. But why...?

Still, he stands in the shadow, and MAX goes to the door to welcome BIANCA. She is as he described her.

BIANCA. Max! How are you? I'm back.

MAX. How are you, Bibi? Nice of you to come.

BIANCA. First visit.

MAX. Honoured.

BIANCA. How's everybody? Suppers at Sacher's again now?

MAX. But you must turn up. Sometimes you didn't.

BIANCA. I did.

MAX. Not when you'd something better to do.

BIANCA. But you weren't jealous. I wish they'd all take lessons from you. Why can't a man be fond of one without making himself a nuisance? Oh... who's that? Making one jump!

She has discovered ANATOL, who comes forward, silent, expectant. She stares at him.

MAX. An old friend, Bibi.

BIANCA. Oh...

MAX. Quite a surprise.

ANATOL comes nearer. BIANCA is desperately puzzled. She doesn't recall him in the least. She is most polite.

BIANCA. Of course... we've met...

ANATOL. Bianca.

BIANCA. Yes... to be sure.

ANATOL seizes her hand quite passionately.

ANATOL. Bianca.

BIANCA. But... I'm so stupid... where was it?

MAX. Try hard to remember.

BIANCA. Of course... in Petersburg.

ANATOL. No... it wasn't in Petersburg.

With that he drops her hand, takes his hat and coat and goes.

BIANCA. Oh...
The flat door slams.

MAX. He's gone.

BIANCA. But... I'm so sorry... what's wrong...?

MAX. Don't you really remember him?

BIANCA. Yes... quite well. But I can't place him for the life of me.

MAX. Anatol, Bibi... Anatol.

BIANCA [her brow wrinkling in puzzlement]. Anatol... Anatol?

MAX. Anatol... at the piano... and a lamp casting shadows on your shimmering hair. Here... not in Petersburg... three years ago.

A light breaks on BIANCA.

BIANCA. Well... of course... Anatol! How stupid of me. Oh, do call him back. Anatol!
She makes for the door.

MAX. No... he's gone.
She looks from the window.

BIANCA. There he goes.

MAX [behind her]. Yes... there he goes.

BIANCA [calling]. Anatol!

MAX. No use... he can't hear.

BIANCA. You will apologise to him, won't you? I've hurt his feelings. Such a nice fellow.

MAX. You're quite sure you remember him?

BIANCA. Why, yes! But, you know, there is some one in Petersburg as like him as two peas.

MAX. I'll tell him so.

BIANCA. Besides... when you haven't given a man a thought for three years... and there he suddenly is plumped in front of you! One can't remember everybody.

MAX [grimly smiling]. Let's shut the window... it's gone chilly.

BIANCA. I shall run against him somehow.

MAX. No doubt [he picks up and holds out to her the little envelope marked "Episode"]. D'you know what this is?

BIANCA. What?

MAX. The rosebud you were wearing that evening... the evening, Bibi...

BIANCA. Has he kept it?

MAX. As you see.

BIANCA. D'you mean he was in love with me?

MAX. Passionately... unfathomably... and for ever and a day. But so he was with all these others.

BIANCA surveys the table full.

BIANCA. All that lot!

MAX. We've been sorting you out.

BIANCA. Sorting us...?

MAX. Sorting you.

BIANCA. Oh, indeed! Where do I go?

MAX. Here.
He gravely drops "Episode" in the fire.

BIANCA. Well!

MAX. All the revenge I can give him you see. But don't be cross... I want to hear your news.

BIANCA. I don't think I feel like it now.

MAX. Bibi... don't quarrel with me. Let's hear about the fellow in Petersburg, who's as like him as two peas.

BIANCA. Don't be absurd.

MAX. Or anything else you like. I'll tell you how to begin.

He settles her in a big armchair, and settles himself in another beside her.

MAX. Once upon a time there was a big, big city...

BIANCA.... And into the city came a big, big circus...

MAX.... And in the circus there was a tiny, tiny girl...

BIANCA.... Who jumped through a big, big hoop.

MAX. Now we're getting on. And in a box every evening...

BIANCA. Yes... in a box every evening there sat a very good-looking man...

MAX. Quite so... and then?
They settle to their friendly chat.

IV. KEEPSAKES

EMILY'S SITTING-ROOM IS quite prettily furnished, and looks over some gardens, where the trees are just now breaking into leaf. It is late in the afternoon. Alone in the room and at the writing-desk sits ANATOL. He is feverishly searching the drawers. EMILY comes in and finds him.

EMILY. What are you doing at my desk... rummaging about? Anatol!
He hardly looks up even.

ANATOL. I have a perfect right to. And it's as well I did.

EMILY. What have you found... except your own letters?

ANATOL. My letters! What do you call these?

Two tiny objects which he had placed safely on the top of the desk. He shows them to her in his outstretched palm.

EMILY. What?

ANATOL. These two stones. This one's a ruby... and this other dark one. I've never seen them before. I didn't give them you.

EMILY turns away, and for a moment doesn't answer. When she does it is very quietly.

EMILY. No... I had quite forgotten them.

ANATOL [still brutally, sneeringly angry]. Had you! They were hidden away safe enough in the bottom of that drawer. Come on... you'd better confess. Don't lie. Oh, all you women do! Won't you? Don't pretend to be indignant. Yes, of course... sulk when you're found out. I want to know what else there is. Where have you hidden your other treasures?
He returns to his ransacking.

EMILY. I haven't any others.

ANATOL. Haven't you!

EMILY [quite passive]. You needn't look. I swear I haven't.

ANATOL. Well then... what about these?

EMILY. I suppose I was wrong. I shouldn't have...
He leaves the desk and faces her.

ANATOL. You suppose! Now Emily... to-morrow we were to be married. I thought we'd got rid of the past... utterly. Didn't I bring you everything I had that could remind me of mine... letters, keepsakes, everything...

and didn't we burn them? And your rings and bracelets and earrings! Haven't we got rid of them too... all of them? Given them away... thrown them into the river... out of the window... anywhere? And you swore to me that you had done with it all... wiped everything out! You said that now you knew you'd never really been in love with any one before. And I believed you! I suppose we always do believe women when the lies are pleasant ones... from their first lie to their last... because we want to.

EMILY. Shall I swear it again?

ANATOL. What's the good? I've done with you... done with you. Oh, you were very clever about it! To see you standing there in front of the fire watching those letters and things burn... poking them down so that nothing should escape... wouldn't one have thought you were only thankful to be rid of every speck of your past? You sobbed in my arms that day by the river when we threw that bracelet into the water! Tears of repentance? All a sham! Now I'll tell you... I didn't trust you in spite of them. I came here to find out for myself... and I have found out. [She is sitting silent, her head away.] Say something. Defend yourself.

EMILY. No... you've made up your mind to have done with me.

ANATOL. But I want to know about these two things. Why keep just these two?

EMILY. You don't love me any more.

ANATOL. Emily... I want to know the truth.

EMILY. What's the good if you don't love me any more?

ANATOL. Tell me the truth. Perhaps...

EMILY. Well?

ANATOL. Perhaps you can make things seem a bit better. I don't want to think badly of you, Emily.
She turns a little towards him.

EMILY. D'you forgive me?

ANATOL. Tell me the truth.

EMILY. If I do... will you forgive me?

He doesn't answer for a moment. Then his voice half hardens again.

ANATOL. This ruby! What about it... why have you kept it?

EMILY. Will you be patient?

ANATOL. Yes... yes. Go on.

After a moment she does; speaking quite tonelessly, her head bent.

EMILY. It came out of a locket. It fell out.

ANATOL. Who gave you the locket?

EMILY. Oh... that wasn't it. It was because of... the day I was wearing it.

ANATOL. But who gave it you?

EMILY. What does it matter? My mother, I think. Oh, Anatol... if I were the bad lot you think me, I could easily say I kept the stone because my mother gave it me. You'd believe that. I kept it because I didn't want ever to forget that day I nearly lost it.

ANATOL. Go on.

EMILY. I am so glad to be telling you. But listen now. You'd laugh at my being jealous of the first woman you were ever in love with, wouldn't you?

ANATOL. What's that to do with it?

EMILY. But I dare say you're still in love with the memory of her. It's the sort of old unhappiness one never wants quite to lose, isn't it? The day I dropped that ruby means a lot to me, because it was the day I had my first glimpse of... everything that you and I can mean to each other now, if we will. Oh... if I'd never had to learn how to love... d'you think I could love you as I do? Anatol... it we'd met then... before we knew what love meant... should we have given each other a thought? Don't shake your head. You once said that to me yourself.

ANATOL. I did.

EMILY. You told me not to be so sorry that things were... as they were... because if we hadn't both learnt by experience, we could never love each other as we do.

ANATOL [bitterly]. Yes... that's all the consolation one has in loving a woman who... [he swallows the insult] oh, never mind!

EMILY [with dignity]. I'm telling you the truth about this. I kept it to remind me of the day that...

ANATOL. Say the words!

EMILY. You like to humiliate me. It was the very first time that... I was just a silly girl. What was I... sixteen?

ANATOL. He was twenty... and tall and dark... I'm sure.

EMILY [quite simply]. D'you know I don't remember, dear. I remember the wood we were in, and the wind shaking the trees. It was in the spring. Yes... and the sun shone through the branches and made the primroses look so bright.

ANATOL paces the room with a sudden access of fury.

ANATOL. And you were stolen from me before I ever knew you! Don't you hate him... the very thought of him?

EMILY. Perhaps he gave me to you, Anatol. [That brings him to a stand.] No... whatever happens I don't hate the thought of him... I won't pretend I ever did. Don't you know I love you as I have never loved any one? And no one has ever loved you as I love you. But in spite of that... and even though when you kissed me first you made me forget every one else... all I'd ever gone through... Wiped it out utterly... you can't make me forget, and you can't make me regret the moments that made me a woman.

ANATOL. You love me, do you?

EMILY. I hardly remember what he looked like... or anything he said.

ANATOL. Only that he kissed you... held you close to him... turned your ignorance into knowledge and your innocence into guilt. And you're grateful for that... grateful! Good God... can't you see what this means to me... stirring up again all this horrible past when I'd almost forgotten that there ever was or could be any other man in the world for you but me.

She looks at him and then speaks with a certain cold sadness.

EMILY. Yes... you don't understand. I think you were right. We'd better part.

ANATOL [not quite prepared for this]. What else d'you expect of me?

EMILY [emotional for the first time]. I envy a woman who can lie. It's a costly business telling the truth. But there's one thing I'd like to know. Why you have always begged me to be quite straight with you. How many times have you said that there was nothing you couldn't forgive me except a lie. So I confessed everything to you... and never cared how bad I made myself out. I told you that the only good thing about me was my love for you. Any other woman would have made excuses... I didn't. I let you know that I was vain and wanton... that I'd wasted and sold myself... that I wasn't worth your loving. I told you that before I'd let you come near me. I hid away from you, didn't I? It was just because I loved you so. You found me and you cried for me. But I still said No. I didn't want to drag you down... although your love meant more to me than anything else had ever meant in the world. I've never loved any one but you. In spite of everything you took me. I was so glad and so afraid! But why have you given me back bit by bit all the beauty and self-respect that the others had robbed me of... why have you made me innocent again by being great enough to be able to forgive... if now...?

ANATOL [echoing her as she pauses]. Now?

EMILY. If now you're done with me only because I am just like all the others?

ANATOL. No, no, dear... you're not, you're not.

EMILY. What do you want me to do then? Shall I throw it away?
She fingers the little ruby disdainfully.

ANATOL [passionately self-reproachful]. What is there great about me? I'm worse than human. Yes... throw it away. You dropped it, did you, among the primroses... and it glittered in the sun...

They sit there silently; the poor little trinket on the table between them. Then he rouses.

ANATOL. It's dark... let's go out.

EMILY. It'll be so cold.

ANATOL. No... you can feel. the Spring's in the air.

EMILY. Very well, darling.

She moves, and as he moves too his eye lights on the other stone he had found.

ANATOL. But what about this one?

EMILY. That?

ANATOL. Yes, the black stone... what about that?
She takes it up with care.

EMILY. Don't you know what it is?

ANATOL. It looks like a...

EMILY. It's a black diamond!
Her eyes glitter as she holds it.

ANATOL. What?

EMILY. They're very scarce.

ANATOL [hardly articulate]. Why... have you kept it?

EMILY. It's worth a hundred pounds!

ANATOL. Ah!

He snatches the stone from her and throws it into the fire. She shrieks out savagely...

EMILY. What are you doing?

Then throws herself on her knees and snatching up the tongs does her best to rescue it. He watches her grimly for a little; the firelight makes ugly shadows on her face. Then he says quietly...

ANATOL. That was your price, was it?
And he leaves her.

V. A FAREWELL SUPPER

IN A PRIVATE room at Sacher's restaurant one evening, about supper-time, we find ANATOL and MAX. MAX is comfortable upon a sofa with a cigarette. ANATOL stands by the door discussing the menu with the waiter.

MAX. Haven't you done?

ANATOL. Just. Don't forget now.

This to the waiter, who disappears. ANATOL begins to pace the room, nervously.

MAX. Suppose she don't turn up after all.

ANATOL. It's only ten. She couldn't be here yet.

MAX. The ballet must be over long ago.

ANATOL. Give her time to take her paint off and dress. Shall I go over and wait for her?

MAX. Don't spoil the girl.

ANATOL [mirthlessly laughing]. Spoil her... spoil her!

MAX. I know... you behave like a brute to her. Well... that's one way of spoiling a woman.

ANATOL. No doubt. [Then, suddenly stopping before his friend.] But, my dear Max... when I tell you... oh, Lord!

MAX. Well?

ANATOL.... What a critical evening this is!

MAX. Critical! Have you asked her to marry you?

ANATOL. Worse than that.

MAX [sitting up very straight]. You've married her? Well!

ANATOL. What a Philistine you are. When will you learn that there are spiritual crises besides which such commonplace matters as...

MAX [subsiding again]. We know! If you've only got one of those on I wouldn't worry her with it.

ANATOL [grimly]. Wouldn't you? What makes this evening critical, my friend, is that it's to be the last.

MAX [sitting up again]. What?

ANATOL. Yes... our farewell supper.

MAX. What am I doing at it?

ANATOL. You are to be the undertaker... to our dead love.

MAX. Thank you! I shall have a pleasant evening.

ANATOL. All the week I've been putting it off.

MAX. You should be hungry enough for it by this time.

ANATOL. Oh, we've had supper every night. But I've never known how to begin... the right words to use. I tell you... it's nervous work.

MAX. If you expect me to prompt you...

ANATOL. I expect you to stand by me. Smooth things down... keep her quiet... explain.

MAX. Then suppose you explain first.

ANATOL considers for half a second. Then...

ANATOL. She bores me.

MAX. I see! And there's another she... who doesn't?

ANATOL. Yes.

MAX [with fullest comprehension]. Ah!

ANATOL [quite rapturously]. And what another!

MAX. Please describe her.

ANATOL. She makes me feel as I've never felt before. She... I can't describe her.

MAX. No... one never can till it's all over.

ANATOL. She's a little girl that... well, she's an andante of a girl.

MAX. Not out of the ballet again?

ANATOL. No, no! She's like a waltz... simple, alluring, dreamy. Yes, that's what she's like. Don't you know...? No, of course you don't! And how can I explain? When I'm with her I find I grow simple too. If I take her a bunch of violets... the tears come into her eyes.

MAX. Try her with some diamonds.

ANATOL. I knew you wouldn't understand in the least. I should no more think of bringing her to a place like this...! Those little eighteenpenny places suit her. You know... Soup or Fish: Entrée: Sweets or Cheese. We've been to one every night this week.

MAX. You said you'd had supper with Mimi.

ANATOL. So I have. Two suppers every night this week! One with the girl I want to win, and the other with the girl I want to lose. And I haven't done either yet.

MAX. Suppose you take Mimi to the Soup or Fish and bring the little Andante girl here. That might do it.

ANATOL. That shows you don't understand. Such a child! If you'd seen her face when I ordered a one and tenpenny bottle of wine.

MAX. Tears in her eyes?

ANATOL. She wouldn't let me.

MAX. What have you been drinking?

ANATOL. Shilling claret before ten. After ten, champagne. Such is life.

MAX. Your life!

ANATOL. But I've had enough of it. To a man with my nice sense of honour... my nice sense of honour, Max.

MAX. I heard.

ANATOL. If I go on like this much longer I shall lose my self-respect.

MAX. So shall I if I have much more to do with you.

ANATOL. How can I play-act at love if I don't feel it?

MAX. No doubt it's better acting when you do.

ANATOL. I remember telling Mimi in so many words... when we first met... when we swore that nothing should part us... My dear, I said, whichever first discovers that the thing is wearing thin must tell the other one straight out.

MAX. Besides swearing that nothing should part you. Good!

ANATOL. If I've said that once I've said it fifty times. We are perfectly free, and when the time comes we'll go each our own way without any fuss. Only remember, I said, what I can't stand is deceit.

MAX. Then I'm sure supper ought to go off very well.

ANATOL. Yes... but when it comes to the point... somehow I can't tell her. She'll cry. I know she'll cry, and I can't bear that. Suppose she cries and I fall in love with her again... then it won't be fair to the other one.

MAX. And the one thing you can't stand is deceit.

ANATOL. It'll be easier with you here. There's an honest, unromantic air about you that would dry any tears.

MAX. Happy to oblige. And how shall I start? Tell her she's better off without you. How can I?

ANATOL. Something of that sort. Tell her she won't be losing so much.

MAX. Yes...

ANATOL. There are hundreds of better-looking men... men better off.

MAX. Handsomer, richer... and cleverer.

ANATOL [half humorously]. I shouldn't exaggerate.

At this point the waiter shows in the Mimi in question. A lovely lady.

WAITER. This way, Madame.
She doesn't seem to be in the best of tempers.

MIMI. Oh... so here you are!

ANATOL [cheerfully]. Here we are. [He takes off her wrap with much tenderness]. Let me.

MIMI. You're a nice one, aren't you? I looked up and down...

ANATOL. A good thing you hadn't far to come.

MIMI. If you say you'll be there for me you ought. Hullo, Max. Come on... let's feed.
There's a knock at the door.

MIMI. Come in! What's he knocking for?

It is the WAITER again, expectant of his orders, which ANATOL gives him...

ANATOL. Bring supper.

MIMI sits at the table and, cat-like, fusses her appearance.

MIMI. You weren't in front.

ANATOL [with careful candour]. No... I had to...

MIMI. You didn't miss much. It was precious dull.

MAX. What was on before the ballet?

MIMI. I don't know. I go straight to the dressing-room and then I go on the stage. I don't bother about anything else. Anatol... I've a bit of news for you.

ANATOL [his brow wrinkling a little]. Have you, my dear? Important?

MIMI. Myes:.. may surprise you a bit... praps.
The supper arrives... oysters first.

ANATOL. Well... I've some for you, too.

MIMI. Wait a second. It's no concern of his.

This with a cock of the head towards the well-mannered, unconscious waiter.

ANATOL. You needn't wait... we'll ring.
The waiter departs. Supper has begun.

ANATOL. Well?

MIMI [between her oysters]. I think praps it will surprise you, Anatol... though I don't see why it should. Praps it won't... and it oughtn't to.

MAX. They've raised your salary!

ANATOL [watching her]. Tsch.

MIMI [ignoring this levity]. No... why should it? I say... are these Ostend or Whitstable?

ANATOL. Ostend... Ostend.

MIMI. I do like oysters. They're the only things you can go on eating and eating...

MAX [who is doing his full share]. And eating and eating and eating.

MIMI. That's what I always say.

ANATOL. Well... what's this news?

MIMI. D'you remember something you once said?

ANATOL. Which of the hundreds?

MIMI. Mimi... oh, I remember your saying it... The one thing I can't bear is deceit!

ANATOL, not to mention MAX, is really taken aback.

ANATOL. What!

MIMI. Always tell me the whole truth before it's too late.

ANATOL. Yes, I meant...

MIMI [roguish for a moment]. I say... suppose it was!

ANATOL. What d'you mean?

MIMI. Oh, it's all right... it isn't. Though it might be to-morrow.

ANATOL [hot and cold]. Will you please explain what you mean?

MAX [unheeded]. What's this?

MIMI [meeting a fierce eye]. You eat your oysters, Anatol, or I won't.

ANATOL. Damn the oysters!

MIMI. You go on with them.

ANATOL. You go on with what you were saying I don't like these jokes.

MIMI. Now didn't we agree that when it came to the point we weren't to make any fuss but...! Well... it has come.

ANATOL [bereft of breath]. D'you mean...?

MIMI. Yes, I do. This is the last time we have supper together.

ANATOL. Oh! Why... would you mind telling me?

MIMI. All is over between us.

ANATOL. Is it!

MAX [unable to be silent longer]. Admirable!

MIMI [a little haughty]. Nothing admirable about it. It's true.

ANATOL [with trembling calm]. My dear Mimi... please let me understand. Some one has asked you to marry him?

MIMI. Oh... I wouldn't throw you over for that.

ANATOL. Throw me over!

MIMI [with her last oyster]. It's no use, Anatol. I'm in love... head over ears.

MAX goes into such a fit of laughter that choking follows, and he has to be patted on the back. ANATOL does the friendly office, somewhat distractedly.

MIMI [very haughty indeed]. There's nothing to laugh at, Max.

MAX. Oh... oh... oh!

ANATOL. Never mind him. Now... will you please tell me...?

MIMI. I am telling you. I'm in love with somebody else and I'm telling you straight out like you told me.

ANATOL. Yes, but damn it... who?

MIMI. Now my dear... don't lose your temper.

ANATOL. I want to know.

MIMI. Ring the bell, Max, I'm so hungry.

MAX recovering, does so.

ANATOL. Hungry... at such a moment! Hungry!

MAX [passing back to his chair, says in ANATOL'S ear]. Ah... but it'll be the first supper she's had to-night.

The waiter arrives, ANATOL rends him savagely.

ANATOL. And what do you want?

WAITER [perfectly polite]. You rang, sir?

MAX. Bring the next thing.

While the plates are cleared ANATOL fumes, but MIMI makes casual conversation.

MIMI. Berthe Hoflich is going to Russia... it's settled.

MAX. Letting her go without any fuss?

MIMI. Oh... not more than a bit.

ANATOL. Where's the wine? Are you asleep tonight?

WAITER. Beg pardon, Sir... the wine [he points it out under ANATOL'S nose].

ANATOL. No, no... the champagne.

The waiter goes out for that and for the next course. As the door shuts on him...

ANATOL. Now then... will you please explain?

MIMI. Never take a man at his word! How many times have you told me... when we feel it's coming to an end, say so and end it calmly and quietly?

ANATOL [with less and less pretence of self-control]. For the last time...

MIMI. He calls this quietly!

ANATOL. My dear girl... doesn't it occur to you that I have some right to know who...?

MIMI hasn't let her appetite be disturbed; and at this moment she is relishing the wine, her eyes closed.

MIMI. Ah!

ANATOL. Oh, drink it up... drink it up!

MIMI. Where's the hurry?

ANATOL [really rather rudely]. You generally get it down quick enough.

MIMI [still sipping]. Ah... but it's good-bye to claret, too, Anatol. It may be for years, it may be for ever.

ANATOL [puzzled]. Oh... why?

MIMI [with fine resignation]. No more claret for me... no more oysters... no more champagne! [At this moment the waiter begins to hand the next course.] And no more filets aux truffes! All done with now.

MAX. Oh... what a sentimental tummy! Have some?

MIMI [with gusto]. I will.

MAX. You've no appetite, Anatol.

The waiter having served them disappears once more, and once more ANATOL plunges into trouble.

ANATOL. Well, now... who's the lucky fellow?

MIMI [serene and enjoying her filet aux truffes]. If I told you you wouldn't be any the wiser.

ANATOL. But what sort of a chap? How did you come across him? What does he look like?

MIMI [seraphic]. He's a perfect picture of a man.

ANATOL. Oh, that's enough, of course.

MIMI. It's got to be. [She re-starts her chant of self-sacrifice.] No more oysters...!

ANATOL. Yes... you said that.

MIMI. No more champagne!

ANATOL. Damn it... is that his only excuse for existence... not being able to stand you oysters and champagne?

MAX. He couldn't live by that.

MIMI. What's the odds as long as I love him! I'm going to try throwing myself away for once... I've never felt like this about any one before.

MAX [with a twinkle]. Anatol could have given you an eighteenpenny supper, you know.

ANATOL. Is he a clerk? Is he a chimney-sweep? Is he a candlestick-maker?

MIMI. Don't you insult him.

MAX. Tell us.

MIMI. He's an Artist.

ANATOL. Music-hall artist?

MIMI [with dignity]. He's a fellow-artist of mine.

ANATOL. Oh... an old friend? You've been seeing a lot of him? Now then... how long have you been deceiving me?

MIMI. Should I be telling you if I had? I'm taking you at your word and speaking out before it's too late.

ANATOL. How long have you been in love with him; You've been thinking things... haven't you?

MIMI. Well... I couldn't help that.

ANATOL [his temper rising fast]. Oh!

MAX. Anatol!

ANATOL. Do I know the fellow?

MIMI. I don't suppose you've ever noticed him. He's in the chorus. He'll come to the front.

ANATOL. When did this affair start?

MIMI. To-night.

ANATOL. That's not true.

MIMI. It is. To-night I knew it was my fate.

ANATOL. Your fate! Max... her fate!

MIMI. Yes... my fate. Why not?

ANATOL. Now... I want the whole story. I've a right to it. You still belong to me, remember. How long has this been going on... how did it begin? When had he the impudence...?

MAX. Yes... I think you ought to tell us that.

MIMI [impatient for the first time]. Oh... this is all the thanks I get for doing the straight thing. Suppose I'd gone like Florrie with von Glehn. He hasn't found out yet about her and Hubert.

ANATOL. He will.

MIMI. Well, he may. And then again he mayn't. But you wouldn't have. I know a thing or two more than you do.

For proper emphasis she pours out another glass of wine.

ANATOL. Haven't you had enough?

MIMI. What... when it's the last I shall get?

MAX [with a nod]. For a week or so.

MIMI [with a wink]. Don't you think it. I'm going to stick to Carl. I love him for himself alone. He won't badger and bully me, the dear!

ANATOL. You and he have been carrying on under my nose for... how long? To-night indeed!

MIMI. Don't believe it if you don't want to.

MAX. Mimi... tell the truth. You two won't part friends unless you do.

ANATOL [recovering some complacency]. And then I've a bit of news for you.

MIMI. Well... it began like this...

Once more the waiter, with the champagne this time. Mimi stops very discreetly.

ANATOL. Oh, never mind him.

So she gets ahead, but in whispers, till the intruder shall have departed, which he does very soon.

MIMI. A fortnight ago he gave me a rose. Oh, so shy he was! I laughed... I couldn't help it.

ANATOL. Why didn't you tell me?

MIMI. Start telling you those sort of things! I should never have done.

ANATOL. Well?

MIMI. And he hung round at rehearsals. It made me cross at first... and then it didn't.

ANATOL [viciously]. No, I'm sure it didn't.

MIMI. Then we began to have little chats. And then I began to take such a fancy to him.

ANATOL. What did you chat about?

MIMI tries the champagne now.

MIMI. Oh... things. He got expelled from school. Then he went into business, and that wasn't any good. Then he thought perhaps he could act.

ANATOL. And never a word to me!

MIMI. And then we found out we used to live close to each other as children. Just fancy!

ANATOL. Most touching!

MIMI [simply]. Wasn't it?

ANATOL. Well?

The champagne (one fears it is) has an instant effect. She becomes a little vague and distant.

MIMI. That's all. It's my fate. You can't struggle against your fate, can you? Can't... struggle... against...

She stops suddenly. ANATOL waits for a minute, then...

ANATOL. But I've not been told what happened to-night.

MIMI. What happened...
Her eyes close.

MAX [with fine effect]. Hush... she sleeps.

ANATOL. Well, wake her up. Take that wine away from her. I want to know what happened to-night. Mimi... Mimi!
She wakes up, refreshed apparently.

MIMI. To-night? He told me he loved me.

ANATOL. What did you say?

MIMI. I said I was awfully glad. And I mustn't play the silly fool with him, must I? So it's good-bye to you.

ANATOL. It's him you're considering, not me.

MIMI [with friendly candour]. I don't think I ever really liked you, Anatol.

ANATOL. Thank you. I'm happy to say that leaves me cold.

MIMI. Don't be nasty.

ANATOL. Would you be surprised to hear that I hope to get on very well without you for the future?

MIMI. Really?

ANATOL throws his belated bomb.

ANATOL. I am in love, too.

And it is received by Mimi with the indifference of scepticism.

MIMI. Think of that!

ANATOL. And have been for some time. Ask Max. I was telling him when you came in.
She smiles at this in the most irritating way.

MIMI. Yes... I'm sure you were.

ANATOL [piling it up]. She's younger and rather prettier than you.

MIMI. I'm sure she is.

ANATOL. And I'd throw six hundred and seventy of your sort into the sea for her. [But Mimi, not in the least impressed or distressed, laughs loud.] You needn't laugh. Ask Max.

MIMI. If I were you I should have invented all that a little earlier.

ANATOL [aghast]. But it's true. I haven't cared that much about you since...! You've been boring me till I could only stay in the room with you by sitting and thinking of her. I've had to shut my eyes tight and think it was her I was kissing.

MIMI [as comfortable as ever]. Ditto to that, my dear.

ANATOL takes a nasty turn.

ANATOL. Well... that's not all. Say ditto to this if you can.

She notices the change in his tone, puts down her wine-glass, and looks squarely at him.

MIMI. To what?

ANATOL. I could have told you all you've been telling me months ago. And weeks ago I could have told you a good deal more.

MIMI. D'you mean...?

ANATOL. Yes, I do. I have behaved very badly to you... dear Mimi.

MIMI gets up outraged.

MIMI. Oh... you cad!

ANATOL [grateful for the abuse]. And only just in time, too... it seems! You wanted to get there first, did you? Well... thank God, I have no illusions!

But MIMI has gone to collect her things: her hat, her cloak. And she puts them on too, not waiting a moment.

MIMI. Oh... it only shows!

ANATOL. Doesn't it! Shows what?

MIMI. What a brute a man can be!

ANATOL. A brute... am I?

MIMI. Yes, a brute... a tactless brute. [For a moment she gives him undivided attention.] After all I never told you that.
Abysses open!

ANATOL. What!

MAX. Oh, never mind!

ANATOL. Never told me what? That you and he...

MIMI [with most righteous indignation]. And I never would have told it you. Only a man could be so... unpleasant!

Heaven knows what might happen, ANATOL so twitches with rage and amazement. But the timely calm waiter saves the situation with yet another course.

WAITER. I beg pardon.

ANATOL. Oh, go to...! [He swallows the word, and recovers a little.]

MIMI. Ices!

And, pleased as a child, she goes back to her chair to begin on hers. ANATOL, in his turn, is deeply shocked.

ANATOL. Can you eat ices at a moment like this?

MAX [starting on his too]. Yes, of course she can. It's good-bye to them for ever.

MIMI [between the spoonfuls]. No more ices... no more claret... no more champagne... no more oysters! [Then, as she gets up to go.] And, thank goodness... no more Anatol. [But on her way to the door she notices on the sideboard the cigars. She helps herself to a handful. Then turns with the sweetest of smiles.] Not for me. They're for him!
She departs.

MAX. I said it'd go off all right.

ANATOL is speechless.

VI. DYING PANGS

ONE SPRING AFTERNOON it is growing dusk in ANATOL'S room, though through the open window the broad expanse of sky still shines clear and blue. ANATOL and MAX come in from a walk.

MAX. I didn't mean to come up with you.

ANATOL. But don't go.

MAX. I shall be in the way.

ANATOL. I'm not sure she'll come. Three times out of four she won't.

MAX. I couldn't stand that.

ANATOL. She has excellent excuses. I dare say they're sometimes true.

MAX. Three times out of four.

ANATOL. Hardly that! Max, never, never be the lover of a married woman. There's nothing deadlier.

MAX. Except being her husband.

ANATOL. I've been in this mess... how long? Two years? More. It was two years last Easter that...

MAX. What's gone wrong?

ANATOL, who has taken off neither coat nor hat, who still carries his stick in his hand, flings himself into a chair by the window.

ANATOL. I'm weary of it. I wish... oh, I don't know what I wish.

MAX. Go abroad for a bit.

ANATOL. What's the good?

MAX. Wouldn't that bring it to an end quicker?

ANATOL. It might.

MAX. I've seen you through this sort of thing before. And the last time, how long did it take you to make up your mind to have done with that silly girl who had never been worth worrying about at all?

ANATOL. D'you think things are dead between us now?

MAX. That wouldn't matter... death doesn't hurt. But dying pangs do.

ANATOL. Job's comforter! You're quite right though.

MAX. Talk it over if you like... that helps sometimes. Not to bother over the whys and wherefores, but just to diagnose the case.

ANATOL. You'd like a cheerful ten minutes, would you?

MAX. Well... if you knew what a face you've been carrying round and round the park with you this afternoon.

ANATOL. She said she'd be there.

MAX. You weren't sorry she wasn't. You couldn't have looked as glad to see her as you did a couple of years ago.

ANATOL [jumping up]. It's true. But why... why? Have I got to go through it again... this cooling... cooling... growing cold? It's a perfect nightmare.

MAX. Run away then... go abroad. Or else make up your mind to tell her the truth.

ANATOL. What is the truth?

MAX. That you're tired of her.

ANATOL. Tell a woman that sort of truth only because you're weary of telling lies! A pleasant job.

MAX. No doubt you'd both of you do anything rather than face the brutal facts. But why?

ANATOL. Because we still don't thoroughly believe in the brutal facts... that's why. Even in this dull, dying autumn of our passion, there come to us days of spring... brighter than any we've ever known. You never so much want to be happy with a woman as when you know that you're ceasing to care for her. And when the happy moments come, we don't look too closely at them either. We only feel so ashamed... we mutely apologise for having doubted ourselves and each other. Love's like a candle flame... it flickers highest when it's going out.

MAX. And the end's in sight often much sooner than we think. You can date the death of some love affairs from the very first kiss. But a man may be on his deathbed and swear he's never better.

ANATOL. Not I, worse luck. In love affairs, my friend, I have always been a valetudinarian. Very likely I knew that I wasn't so ill as I thought... I felt so much the worse for that. I've sometimes fancied I have a sort of evil eye... turned inwards... to wither my own happiness.

MAX. A most rare and distinguished deformity.

ANATOL. You're welcome to it for me. Lord... how I've envied lucky, careless devils, who can be supremely happy in the passing moment. I've never valued a thing when I had it.

MAX. Often they don't know they're happy.

ANATOL. But they needn't feel guilty afterwards.

MAX. Guilty?

ANATOL. She and I knew well enough, didn't we, that though we might swear to love each other till death and after, yet the end of it all was never so very far off? Then why didn't we make the most of our time? For we never did. We're guilty of lost opportunity.

MAX. Oh, my dear Anatol... these dragged-out affairs are very bad for you. You're too quick-witted for them.

ANATOL. Am I?

MAX. Haunted by the past and afraid of the future... why, your one chance of happiness is to keep the present, at least, clear and clean and forgetful. Be a little stupid about it if you must.

ANATOL. Yes... yes.

MAX. But you jumble past, present, and future together till I don't think you know which you're living in. All you think of to-day is your yesterday's remorse for the sins that you mean to commit to-morrow.

ANATOL. And that's not half the nonsense it sounds.

MAX. Thank you. But we must all talk our share of platitudes too... so here goes for mine. Anatol, pull yourself together... be a man.

ANATOL. Max... you can't keep a straight face as you say it. Besides, I don't think I want to pull myself together. What a lot one loses by being a Man! There are a dozen ways of being an interesting invalid, and a fellow can choose his own. But there's only one way of being in rude health... and that's such a dull one. No, thanks.

MAX. Vanity!

ANATOL. Now for a platitude about vanity.

MAX. No. My only concern is that you won't go abroad.

ANATOL. I may. But it must be at a moment's notice. I hate planning things. I particularly hate packing, and looking up trains, and ordering a cab, and...

MAX. I'll do all that for you.

Suddenly, as if in response to some instinct, ANATOL turns to the window and looks out.

MAX. What is it?

ANATOL. Nothing.

MAX. I beg your pardon. I forgot. I'm off.

ANATOL. Max... at this moment I feel more in love with her than ever.

MAX. You probably are more in love with her than ever... at this moment.

ANATOL. Then don't order the cab.

MAX. But the boat-train don't leave for an hour and a half. I could send your luggage on after.

ANATOL. Thank you so much.

MAX. Now I must make a good exit... with an epigram.

ANATOL. Please.

MAX. Woman is a riddle...

ANATOL. Oh, really!

MAX. Wait, that's only half of it. Woman is a riddle... says a man. What a riddle would Man be for women... if they'd only brains enough to want to guess it.

ANATOL. Bravo.

MAX bows to his applause and departs. ANATOL is more restless than ever. He paces the room. He goes to the window, where he can now hear some violinist practising in the room above. He lights a cigarette and sits down to wait as patiently as may be. But he hears a sound in the hall. He jumps up and goes to the door as it opens to admit ELSA. She comes in a little furtively. She is dressed as a smart rich woman should be, but she is rather heavily veiled.

ANATOL. At last!

ELSA. Yes... I'm late.

He quite tenderly puts up the veil to kiss her. After that she takes it off, her hat too.

ELSA. I couldn't come before.

ANATOL. You might have let me know. Waiting does get on one's nerves. But you can stop a bit.

ELSA. Not long, darling. You see, my husband...
He breaks away from her almost rudely.

ELSA. My dear... can I help that?

ANATOL. No, you can't. There it is... we may as well face it. Come to me.

He is by the window and tries to draw her to him, but she hangs back.

ELSA. No, no... some one might see me.

ANATOL. It's too dark... and the curtain hides us.
She slips into his arms.

ANATOL. I wish you hadn't to go so soon. I've not seen you for two days. Then you only stayed ten minutes.

ELSA. Do you love me so?

ANATOL. Do I not? What aren't you to me? If I could have you here always...

ELSA. I'm glad.

ANATOL. Sit by me. [He draws her close beside him.] Where's your hand? [He holds it and kisses it.] That's the old man upstairs playing. Plays well, doesn't he?

They sit together there in the twilight, listening.

ELSA. Dear one!

ANATOL. Think if we were in Italy now... in Venice!

ELSA. I've not been to Venice since I was there for my honeymoon.

ANATOL shrivels.

ANATOL. Need you have said that?

ELSA [with a gush of remorse]. Darling... but I've never loved any one but you. No... not... not my husband.

ANATOL [in some agony]. Please do try and forget that you're married... just for thirty seconds. Can't you obliterate everything for a moment but ourselves?

She apparently does, and there is silence. Then a clock strikes and ELSA looks round quickly.

ELSA. What's that?

ANATOL. Elsa... never mind. Forget everything but me.

ELSA [turning back to him all the more tenderly]. Haven't I forgotten everything but you... for you?

ANATOL. Oh... my dear... my dear!

He kisses her hand and there is silence again. Then the lady says, very tentatively, almost tremulously...

ELSA. Anatol...

ANATOL. Yes, darling.

She makes a half serious little face at him as a sign that she really must be off. He won't understand.

ANATOL. What is it?

ELSA. I simply must go.

ANATOL. Must?

ELSA. Must.
He gets up... goes right away from her.

ANATOL. Very well.

ELSA. Oh... you are difficult.

ANATOL. Difficult! I sometimes think you want to drive me mad.

ELSA. And this is the thanks I get!

ANATOL. Thanks! What do you expect thanks for? Don't I give you as much love as I get? Is it worth less to you than yours is to me? Why thanks?

ELSA. Don't you owe me just a little gratitude for the sacrifice I've made for you?

ANATOL. I don't want sacrifices. If it was a sacrifice... then you didn't love me.

ELSA. Not love you! I'm an unfaithful wife for your sake... and you say I don't love you.

ANATOL. I didn't say so, Elsa.

ELSA. Oh... when I've done... what I've done.

ANATOL. What you've done! I'll tell you all that you've done. Seven years back you were a pretty gawky girl, weren't you? Your people got you married... because that's the thing to do with pretty gawky girls. Then you went a honeymoon in Venice... you liked that well enough.

ELSA [indignantly]. I didn't.

ANATOL. Oh, yes, you did! You were in love... more or less.

ELSA. I wasn't.

ANATOL. He was, then. I'm sure he petted you nicely... anyhow, you were his little wife. Then back to Vienna... and after a bit to boredom. Because you'd grown a pretty woman by now... and, really, he's a precious fool. So you learned to flirt... harmlessly enough, no doubt! You tell me I'm the only man you've ever really loved. I can't prove it... but let's say that's so. It flatters me to believe it.

ELSA. You call me a flirt.

ANATOL. I do. Did you never indulge in that sensual hypocrisy?

ELSA. Oh... you're unjust!

ANATOL. Am I? Then real temptation came. You played with it... you were longing for a romance. For you grew prettier than ever... and your husband more of a fool. He was getting fat too... and ugly. So at last your conscience yielded. You coolly looked round for a lover, and chanced to hit upon me.

ELSA. Chanced to hit upon...

ANATOL. Yes... if it hadn't been me it would have been the next man. You thought you were unhappily married... or at least not happily married enough. You wanted to be... one calls it loved. Of course, it was just a flirtation between us at first... we skated quite skilfully over thin ice. Till one fine day... what was it...? one of your friends looking happier than usual... the sight of some merry little baggage in a box at the theatre. Well, and why shouldn't I?... said you. And you took the plunge. Leaving out fine phrases... that's the story of this little adventure.

She does not look at him, but in her voice is shame and reproach.

ELSA. Oh... Anatol, Anatol!

ANATOL. Well?

ELSA. You don't mean it.

ANATOL. I do.

ELSA. That's what you think of me.

ANATOL. I'm afraid so.

ELSA. Then I'd better go.

ANATOL. I'm not keeping you.

And she does go... quite as far as the door. But there she lingers.

ELSA. You Want me to.

ANATOL. My dear! Two minutes ago it was you that were in such a hurry.

ELSA looks up in some relief.

ELSA. Darling... you know I can't help that. My husb...
He suddenly flashes round on her.

ANATOL. Elsa.

ELSA. Yes.

ANATOL. You do love me? Say so.

ELSA [tears in her eyes]. Do I? Good heavens!... What better proofs can I give?

ANATOL. Shall I tell you?

ELSA. I love you with all my heart.

ANATOL. Then don't go. Don't go back home. Come away somewhere with me. Let me have you all to myself.

ELSA. Anatol!

ANATOL. Isn't that obviously the thing to do? How can you go back to him... loving me with all your heart? How could I ever have let you? We've been taking it all as a matter of course. But don't you see that it can't go on... it's impossible. Elsa, dear, come away with me... you must. We'll go wherever you like. To Sicily? Very well... further then. I'll go as far as you like, Elsa!

ELSA [blankly]. My dear Anatol!

ANATOL. No one to take you from me ever again Far away, dear... we two... belonging to each other.

ELSA. Go right away?

ANATOL. Yes... anywhere.

ELSA. But... my dear Anatol...

ANATOL. Well? ELSIE [with a sort of puzzled blandness]. Where's the need?

ANATOL. Where's the...!

ELSA. Why go away... when we can see each other here almost as often as we want?

ANATOL takes a long look at her and then smiles queerly.

ANATOL. Yes... almost. True... there is no need.

ELSA. You didn't mean it, did you?

ANATOL. Did I?

He turns away from her. She follows him prettily.

ELSA. Are you still angry?

The clock chimes again. He turns back with the utmost politeness.

ANATOL. I'm sure you must go.

ELSA [a little flustered]. Oh dear!... I didn't know it was so late. Till to-morrow. I can come at six.
He helps her with her things.

ANATOL. Please do.

ELSA. Not going to kiss me?

ANATOL. Of course!
He kisses her.

ELSA [encouragingly]. Things'll look brighter to-morrow.

ANATOL. Good-bye.

He takes her to the door, where she stops and looks up, all sweetness and charm.

ELSA. Kiss me again.

He looks at her hard for a minute, then very deliberately does so, and she slips away. He turns back and savagely exclaims...

ANATOL. She asked for that kiss. And it makes her another cheap woman at last... [Then to himself in the glass] And you're a fool... a fool!

VII. THE WEDDING MORNING

Note... In Vienna, of course, a man's clothes for a wedding are what we should call evening dress. It also appears that on such occasions, to every bridesmaid there is a groomsman, whose business at is to provide her with a bouquet.
It is a brilliant winter morning; the lately risen sun shines straight into ANATOL'S room. ANATOL stands on the hither side of his bedroom door, which is a little open. He is listening. After a moment he closes the door very softly and comes back into the room. He looks nervous and rather puzzled. He sits down on not the most comfortable chair with a fretful sigh. Then he gets up to ring the bell. Then he sits down again. His costume is the strangest mixture of early morning and overnight that ever was: a dressing jacket and dress trousers, slippers, and a scarf round the neck; but he looks bathed and shaved, and his hair is brushed.
FRANZ, his man, answers the bell, and, not seeing him, is going into the bed room. ANATOL jumps up and stops him, more by gestures than with his voice, which he hardly raises above a whisper.

ANATOL. Here, where are you going? I didn't see you.

FRANZ. Did you ring, sir?

ANATOL. Yes... bring some breakfast.

FRANZ. Very good, sir.
And he is going for it.

ANATOL. Quietly, you idiot. Don't make such a noise. [FRANZ is quiet, and apparently comprehending. When he is well out of the room, ANATOL makes for the bedroom door again, and again listens.] Still asleep!

FRANZ comes back with the light breakfast, which he puts on a table by the fire, saying, very comprehendingly indeed...
]FRANZ. Two cups, sir?

ANATOL [with a look at him]. Yes. [Then he can hear a bell ring, and he jumps.] There's some one at the door. At this time in the morning! [FRANZ goes out again as quietly. ANATOL looks around, out of the window, at the bedroom door, then doubtfully at the teacups, and says...] I don't feel in the least like getting married.

In bursts MAX, in the best of spirits; FRANZ behind, looking as if he ought to have stopped him.

MAX. My dear fellow!

ANATOL. Tsch!... don't talk so loud. Get another cup, Franz.

MAX [at the table]. Two cups here already.

ANATOL. Get another cup, Franz, and then get out.

FRANZ obeys with discretion. ANATOL is very fretful.

ANATOL. What are you doing here at eight o'clock in the morning?

MAX. Nearly ten!

ANATOL. Well... what are you doing here at ten o'clock in the morning?

MAX. It's my wretched memory.

ANATOL. Don't talk so loud!

MAX. I say... you're very jumpy. What's the matter?

ANATOL. Yes... I am very jumpy.

MAX. But not To-day.

ANATOL. Oh... what is it you want?

MAX. You know your cousin Alma's to be my bridesmaid at the wedding. About her bouquet....

ANATOL [with rather sulky indifference]. What about it?

MAX. I forgot to order it and I forgot to ask her what colour she's wearing. What do you think... white or red or blue or green?

ANATOL. Certainly not green!

MAX. Are you sure?

ANATOL. You know she never wears green.

MAX. How do I know?

ANATOL. Don't shout! It's nothing to be excited about.

MAX [a little exasperated]. Do you know what colour she will be wearing at your wedding this morning?

ANATOL. Yes... red or blue.

MAX. Which?

ANATOL. What does it matter?

MAX. Damn it... for the bouquet.

ANATOL. You order two... you can wear the other in your hair.

MAX. That's a silly joke.

ANATOL [his head on his hand]. I'll be making a sillier in an hour or two.

MAX. You're a cheerful bridegroom... I must say!

ANATOL. Well... I've been very much upset.

MAX. Anatol... you're hiding something.

ANATOL [with great candour]. Not at all.

From the bedroom rings a female voice, loud and clear.

THE VOICE. Anatol!

In the silence that follows MAX looks at ANATOL in something more than surprise.

ANATOL [casually]. Excuse me a minute.

He goes and gingerly opens the bedroom door. A pretty pair of arms appears and rests upon his shoulders. In answer to the embrace, for a moment his head disappears. He shuts the door then and returns to his scandalised friend.

MAX. Well really, Anatol!

ANATOL. Let me explain.

MAX. If this is how you begin your married life...!

ANATOL. Don't be an ass.

MAX. I'm not a moral man myself... but hang it all!

ANATOL. Will you let me explain?

MAX [looking at his watch]. Hurry up then... your wedding's at half-past twelve.

ANATOL. So it is!

He sits silent for a moment; then slowly begins...

ANATOL. Last night I was at my father-in-law's... my future father-in-law's.

MAX. I know that. I was there.

ANATOL. So you were... I forgot. You were all there. You were all very lively. There was lots of champagne. A lot of you drank my health... and Sophia's health.

MAX. I drank your health... and her health... and wished you both happiness.

ANATOL. So you did. Happiness! Thank you very much.

MAX. You thanked me last night.

ANATOL. They kept it up till past twelve.

MAX. I know. I kept it up.

ANATOL. They kept it up till really... I thought I was happy.

MAX. Well... that's enough about that.

ANATOL. That fellow Sophia was in love with as a girl...!

MAX. Young Ralmen?

ANATOL. Silly young ass... writes verses! Sort of fellow who seems to be everybody's first love and nobody's last.

MAX. Hadn't you better come to the point?

ANATOL. I didn't mind his being there... it rather amused me. We broke up about half-past twelve, didn't we? I gave Sophia a kiss... and she gave me a kiss. No... she gave me an icicle. My teeth just chattered with it as I went downstairs.

MAX. Well?

ANATOL. There were three or four of them still on the doorstep... and they wished me happiness all over again. And Uncle Edward was quite drunk and would insist on kissing me. And Professor Lippmann sang a comic song... in the street. Then Sophia's first love turned up his coat collar and went off... on the tiles. And then somebody... I forget who that was... said of course I'd spend the night under Sophia's window. Damn nonsense... it was snowing! And after a bit they'd all tailed off... and there I was alone.

MAX. [to express some sympathy]. T-t-t!

ANATOL. Alone, in the cold and the snow! Great big flakes... perfectly beastly.

MAX. So what did you do?

ANATOL. So... I thought I'd go to the ball at the Opera.

MAX. Oho!

ANATOL. And why not?

MAX. Now I'm afraid I understand.

ANATOL. Not at all! There I stood in the cold and the snow...!

MAX. Teeth still chattering.

ANATOL. It was beastly cold. And it suddenly came over me... made me perfectly wretched... that I wasn't going to be a free man any more. Never more a jolly bachelor! Never to go home again without some one asking where you've been. I'd had my last night out. I'd been in love for the last time.

MAX. Get on.

ANATOL. They were in full swing at the Opera. I watched for a bit. Oh... that swish of a silk petticoat! And don't a girl's eyes shine through a mask? It makes her neck look so white. Then I just plunged into it all. I wanted to breathe in the sound and the scent of it... to bathe in them.

MAX [consulting his watch again]. Time's getting on. What happened then?

ANATOL. Was I drunk with champagne at papa-in-law's?

MAX. Not a bit.

ANATOL. I got drunk with that dancing... mad drunk. It was my Opera ball... given on purpose to say good-bye to poor bachelor me! I say... you remember Katinka?

MAX. Green-eyed Katinka!

ANATOL. Tsch!

MAX points to where the voice came from.

MAX. Is that Katinka?

ANATOL. No, it just isn't Katinka. Green-eyes was there, though! And a pretty, dark girl called... no, never you mind about her. Do you remember the tiger-lily girl that Theodore...? Lisa! I didn't see Theodore... but we didn't look far for him. I could tell them all through their masks. I knew their voices... I knew their ankles. One girl I wasn't sure about. And whether I was running after her or she after me...? But something in the way she swung her shoulders...! And we met and we dodged, and at last she caught me by the arm... and then I knew her right enough.

MAX. An old friend?

ANATOL. Can't you guess? When did I get engaged? It's not more than two or three months ago. That meant the usual lie... Going away for a bit... back soon.

MAX points again.

MAX. Lona?

ANATOL. Tsch!

MAX. What... not even Lona?

ANATOL. Lona right enough... don't fetch her in yet. We went and sat under a palm. Back again... she said. Yes... I said. When?... she said. Not till last night. Why haven't you written... where on earth have you been? Off the map... I said.. but I'm back again, and I love you still. And don't I love you still?... she said. And the waiter brought the champagne. We were very happy.

MAX. Well... I'm blessed.

ANATOL. Then we got into a cab... just as we used to. She put her head on my shoulder. Never to part she said... and went to sleep. We didn't get back till seven. She's still asleep... was, when you came.

The story over, he sits contemplating the world generally with puzzled distress. MAX jumps up.

MAX. Anatol... come to your senses.

ANATOL. Never to part! And I've got to be married at half-past twelve!

MAX. Yes... to somebody else.

ANATOL. Isn't that just like life? It's always somebody else one gets married to.

MAX. You ought to change... you've not much time.

ANATOL. I suppose I'd better. [He studies the bedroom door doubtfully, and then turns to his friend.]

ANATOL. You know... looked at in a certain light this is pathetic.

MAX. It's perfectly disgraceful.

ANATOL. Yes... it is disgraceful. But it's very pathetic, too.

MAX. Never mind that... you hurry up.

At this moment the door opens and LONA first puts her head round it and then comes in. A hand some shrew. She is still in her fancy ball dress; the domino thrown over it making an excellent morning wrap.

LONA. Oh... it's only Max.

MAX. Only Max.

LONA. Why didn't you tell me?... I'd have come in before. How's Max... and what do you think of this ruffian?

MAX [feelingly]. I think that's just what he is.

LONA. I've been crying my eyes out for him for months. And all the time he's been... where have you been?

ANATOL [with picturesque vagueness]. Over there.

LONA. Didn't he write to you either? But now I've got him safe, he doesn't get away again. Never to part, darling! Give me a kiss.

ANATOL. No... really...

LONA. Max doesn't mind [taking his chin between finger and thumb, she secures her kiss]. What a face! Look pleasant. Let's all have breakfast and be happy.

She settles herself most domestically at the little table and begins to pour out tea. ANATOL looks on miserably.

ANATOL. Certainly.

MAX. Lona, I'm afraid I can't stop... thanks very much. [Then glancing at the wretched ANATOL.] And I really don't see...

LONA. What don't you see?

MAX. Anatol ought...

LONA. What ought Anatol?

MAX. Anatol, it's high time that you... that you...

LONA. High time for what?

MAX. He ought to dress.

LONA surveys him in his queer costume without any disapproval.

LONA. What's the hurry? We'll stop at home today.

ANATOL. My dear... I am afraid I can't.

LONA. You can if you try.

ANATOL. I'm asked out.

LONA. You send a message and say you can't go.

MAX. He must go.

ANATOL [with desperate inspiration]. I am asked to a wedding.

LONA. Oh... that don't matter.

ANATOL. But it does matter. I'm... what you might call the best man.

LONA. Is your bridesmaid in love with you

MAX [who has followed these efforts encouragingly]. We won't go into that.

LONA. Because I am... so he'd much better stop at home with me.

ANATOL. My dear child, I must go.

MAX. He really must.

ANATOL. For a couple of hours.

LONA. Sit down, both of you. How many lumps, Max?

MAX thinks it tactful to obey.

MAX. Three.

LONA [to ANATOL, with a fond smile]. How many lumps, darling?

ANATOL. I ought to be gone now.

LONA [with loving severity]. How many lumps?

ANATOL sits down helplessly.

ANATOL. You know I always take two.

LONA. Cream or lemon?

ANATOL. You know I take lemon.

LONA. Lemon and two lumps of sugar. Those are his principles.

MAX. I say... I must be off.

ANATOL. No... no... no.

LONA. Drink your tea first, Max.
The two drink their tea, unhappily. Then...

ANATOL. My dear child... I simply must go and change.

LONA. Good goodness!... what time is this silly wedding?

MAX. Half-past twelve.

LONA. Are you asked, too!

MAX. Yes.

LONA. Who’s the man?

ANATOL. No one you know.

LONA. But who? Not a secret, is it?

ANATOL. The whole thing’s a deadly secret.

LONA. With a best man and bridesmaids? Nonsense.

ANATOL [explicit]. You see... his people...

LONA. You're both dear boys... but you are telling lies.

MAX [with dignity]. I beg your pardon.

LONA. God knows what it's all about, but it doesn't matter. You go where you like, Max... Anatol stops with me.

ANATOL is getting desperate.

ANATOL. I tell you I can't. The man's my best friend. I must get him married.

LONA [prettily to MAX]. Shall I let him go?

MAX. Dear Lona... I think you'd better.
The tension is a trifle relieved, but...

LONA. Where's it to be?

ANATOL [very uneasily]. What do you want to know that for?

LONA. I'd like to go and look on.

ANATOL. You mustn't do that.

LONA. I must have a look at your bridesmaid, Anatol. Best men marry bridesmaids, don't they? I can't have you getting married... so make up your mind to that.

MAX. What would you do if he did?

LONA [with perfect simplicity]. Forbid the banns.

ANATOL. Would you now?

LONA. Or I might make a scene at the church.

MAX. That's commonplace... I shouldn't do that.

LONA. No... one ought to invent something new.

MAX. Such as...?

LONA. Turning up at the wedding... dressed like a bride too! That'd be striking.

MAX [drily]. Very! I must go.
His decisive getting up encourages ANATOL.

ANATOL. Look here, Lona... I simply must change. I shall be late!

In comes FRANZ with a bouquet swathed in its tissue paper.

FRANZ. The flowers, sir.

LONA. What flowers?

Wherever ANATOL may wish his man, he does not send him away, so FRANZ, though not without a sly look at LONA, repeats politely...

FRANZ. The flowers, sir.

ANATOL takes them silently, and FRANZ departs.

LONA. Still got Franz, have you? You said you were going to get rid of him.

MAX. And I almost think you'd better, Anatol.

LONA. Let's see.

MAX. It's the bouquet for his bridesmaid.

LONA detaches one wrap of the paper. Orange blossoms!

LONA. It's a bride's bouquet!

ANATOL [with great readiness]. Well, I say... if they haven't sent the wrong one! Franz... Franz!
He carries it off.

MAX. And the wretched bridegroom has got his!

ANATOL serenely returns.

ANATOL. I've sent Franz back with it.

MAX. And I really must go.

He kisses LONA'S hand and is off. ANATOL catches him half through the door.

ANATOL. What the devil shall I do?

MAX. Confess.

ANATOL. How can I?

MAX. I'll come back soon.

ANATOL. Do... for goodness' sake.

MAX. But what colour will your cousin be in?

ANATOL. Blue... or red.

MAX. Damn!

ANATOL most unwillingly shuts the door on him, for no sooner has he than LONA is round his neck.

LONA. Thank goodness he's gone... darling.

ANATOL. Darling!

LONA. Be nicer than that!

ANATOL. I said Darling.

LONA. Must you go to this silly wedding?

ANATOL. I'm afraid I must.

LONA. Shall I drive with you to the church?

ANATOL. Better not. I'll see you in the evening. You've to go to the theatre.

LONA. I'll send and say I'm ill.

ANATOL. I wouldn't. I'll come and fetch you. Now I must dress. Lord... look at the time! Franz! Franz! [FRANZ is there.] Have you put out my things?

FRANZ. Your wedding things, sir?

ANATOL [very steadily]. Yes... the things in which I always go to weddings.

FRANZ. I will see to it, sir.

ANATOL. After the theatre then... that's settled.

LONA. And I thought we'd have such a jolly day.

ANATOL. Don't be childish. Jolly days have to give way to more important matters.

LONA is round his neck again.

LONA. I love you dreadfully. I don't know what's more important than that.

ANATOL [as he removes her]. Then you'll have to learn.

FRANZ passes through from the bedroom saying...

FRANZ. Everything's ready, sir.

ANATOL. Thank you. You've a lot to learn yet.

Into the bedroom he goes, and his talk — or rather his shouting — from there is muffled by the changing of vest and shirt, and punctuated by the tying of ties and slipping in of studs and the brushing of hair. LONA, left alone, twists discontentedly about the room.

LONA. Are you really going to change?

ANATOL. I couldn't go to a wedding like this, could I?

LONA? Must you go?

ANATOL. Don't let's begin it all over again.

LONA. I shall see you this evening?

ANATOL. After the theatre.

LONA. Don't be late.

ANATOL [blandly]. Late! Why should I be late?

LONA. You kept me waiting an hour once.

ANATOL. Did I? I dare say I did.

LONA is still on the prowl.

LONA. Anatol... you've got a new picture.

ANATOL. Yes... do you like it?

LONA. What do I know about pictures?

ANATOL. It's quite a good one.

LONA. Did you bring it back with you?

ANATOL [puzzled]. Bring it back!

LONA. From where you went away to.

ANATOL. Of course... from where I went away to! No... it was a present.

Silence for a moment. A shade of half-angry cunning falls on LONA'S face.

LONA. Anatol.

ANATOL. What is it?

LONA. Where did you go?

ANATOL. I told you.

LONA. You didn’t.

ANATOL. I did... last night.

LONA. I’ve forgotten.

ANATOL. I went to Bohemia.

LONA. Why Bohemia?

ANATOL. Why not

LONA. Were you shooting?

ANATOL. Yes... rabbits.

LONA. For three months?

ANATOL. Everyday.

It sounds as if he were rearing slightly under this spur of cross-examination.

LONA. Why didn’t you come and say good-bye to me before you went?

ANATOL. I just thought I wouldn’t.

LONA. Tried to give me the slip, didn’t you?

ANATOL [ironically bland]. No... no... no... no... no...

LONA. You did try once.

ANATOL. I tried.

LONA [sharply]. What’s that?

ANATOL. I said I tried. I tried hard... but it didn’t come off.

LONA. I should think not... and it’s not likely to.

ANATOL. Ha ha!

LONA. What did you say?

ANATOL. I said Ha ha.

LONA. It isn’t funny. Glad enough to come back to me that time... weren’t you?

ANATOL. That time.

LONA. So you are this time. Just a little bit in love with me... aren’t you?

ANATOL. Worse luck.

LONA. What?

ANATOL. Worse luck.

LONA. Yes... shout it from the next room. You dare say that to my face?

ANATOL sticks round the door a head undergoing a hairbrush.

ANATOL. Worse luck!

LONA makes for it, but it disappears and the door closes. She calls through the crack.

LONA. What do you mean by that, Anatol?

It is getting to be rather angry chaff, this.

ANATOL. Things can't go on like this for ever.

LONA. What?

ANATOL. They can't go on for ever.

LONA. Can't they? Ha ha!

ANATOL. What?

LONA, with some violence, tugs the door open.

LONA. I said Ha ha.

ANATOL. Shut the door... shut the door.
He slams it to.

LONA. No, my darling... you don't get rid of me in a hurry.

ANATOL. Think not?

LONA. I'm sure not.

ANATOL. Quite sure?

LONA. Quite... quite... quite sure.

ANATOL. You can't hang round my neck for ever.

LONA. We'll see about that.

ANATOL. Don't you be silly.

LONA. Do you see me giving you up?

ANATOL. When you can't help it.

LONA. When will that be?

ANATOL. When I get married.

The lady, whose eyes are flashing now, begins to drum the door with her fingers.

LONA. And when will that be... my precious?

ANATOL [unkindly mimicking]. Soon... my precious.

LONA. How soon?
The drumming grows louder.

ANATOL. Don't bang on the door. This time next year I may be quite an old married man.

LONA. Fool!

ANATOL. Suppose I get married in a month or two?

LONA. Some one simply waiting to marry you?

ANATOL. There is... at this very moment.

LONA. In a month or two?

ANATOL. Or even less.

LONA laughs with great derision.

ANATOL. You needn't laugh. I'll be married in a week.

LONA still laughs.

ANATOL. You needn't laugh, Lona!

LONA tumbles herself on the sofa, she is laughing so much. And then ANATOL walks in, sprucely dressed: coated, hatted, and gloved for his wedding; very self-possessed, moreover, now.

ANATOL. I said you need not laugh.

LONA. When are you going to be married?

ANATOL. At half-past twelve.
She stops very short in her laughter.

LONA. What?

ANATOL. At half-past twelve, my dear.

LONA. Anatol, don't be silly.

ANATOL. I am perfectly serious. I am going to be married at half-past twelve to-day.

By this she is taking it in and her breath is leaving her.

LONA. Are you...?

ANATOL. Franz!

FRANZ is at the door.

FRANZ. Sir?

ANATOL. Bring those flowers.

LONA. Anatol...!

FRANZ brings in the orange blossoms which were not sent back. LONA understands now. She makes a grab at them. FRANZ is too quick for her and secures them to ANATOL, and then departs again, suppressing a grin.

LONA. It's true?

ANATOL [Coolly]. Quite.

But LONA is not to be conquered with coolness now. It seems that she is endowed with the very rare faculty of losing her temper. She suddenly makes for ANATOL and the bouquet with such complete abandonment of the conventions of civilisation that, with no manly dignity at all, he bolts from her.

ANATOL. What are you up to?

LONA. You beast... you beast.

It's the bouquet seems most to excite her and it's that she's after. ANATOL, other methods of defending it failing, jumps on a chair at last and holds it above his head, at which moment MAX arrives back dressed for the wedding too and with his bouquet: Pink roses.

ANATOL. Here... Max... help!

The ever-obliging MAX incautiously comes near. Pink roses are better than nothing to LONA, and with one snatch she has them from him and with half-a-dozen pulls she has them in pieces and under her stamping feet. MAX is in agony.

MAX. Lona... don't do it! It's my bouquet! [He surveys the wreckage.] Well... now what shall I do?

The lady having sated her natural lust for the destruction of something — anything; bursts into violent tears, and abandons herself to the sofa. ANATOL addresses the situation, still standing on the chair.

ANATOL. Oh... she has been riling me! Now start crying, of course. I told you not to laugh! Said I daren't run away from her... said I daren't get married. So now I shall... just to spite her.

In pursuance of which he gets off the chair. But LONA has another fit of fury...

LONA. Sneak! Liar!

So on he gets again. Again she tumbles down exhausted. Poor MAX meanwhile collects the remnants of the roses.

MAX. I say... look at my flowers.

LONA. I thought it was his. I don't care. You're as bad as he is!

ANATOL. Do be reasonable.

LONA [flinging her wrongs to heaven]. Reasonable! When you treat me like this! But you wait! I'll show you! You'll see!

She jumps up and makes for the door. By good luck MAX is in the way.

ANATOL. Where are you going?

LONA. You'll soon see. You let me go!

MAX [his back to the door and holding tight to the handle.] Lona... what are you up to?

LONA. You let me go! You let me go!

ANATOL. Be reasonable.

LONA. You won't... won't you!

She then proceeds to wreck the room. The teapot goes into the fire and the teacups out of the window. The table goes over and so do the chairs. A cigar box smashes the new picture and cushions fly around. MAX and ANATOL do nothing. What can they do? Her work accomplished, the lady has violent hysterics. When the tumult has a little subsided says ANATOL...

ANATOL. Oh... I say! Why get married when you can have all the comforts of home without it?
And they gaze at the patient awhile.

ANATOL. She's getting quieter.

MAX. But we must go. And look at my flowers!

FRANZ comes in to announce...

FRANZ. The carriage is at the door, sir.

And goes out again.

ANATOL. The carriage! What am I to do?

He sits beside the sobbing LONA and takes her hand. MAX sits on the other side, and takes her other hand.

MAX. Lona! [he adds over the top of her head to ANATOL]. Go along... I'll put it right somehow.

ANATOL. I really must. Poor girl... I can't...

He is obviously melting towards the sobbing LONA.

MAX. You go along.

ANATOL. Are you sure you can manage her?

MAX. Yes... I'll follow you. Watch me when I get there. I'll wink if it's all right.

ANATOL. I don't like it... poor child. She might...

MAX envisages new complications.

MAX. Will you go?

ANATOL. I'd better!

He gets to the door. His heart melts again towards the poor thing who has indeed in the last few minutes sacrificed much to her love for him. He comes back and kisses the top of her head. Then he goes to his wedding. MAX, left alone with her, perseveringly strokes the hand he holds. She sobs on.

MAX. Ahum!

LONA looks up.

LONA. Where's he gone?

MAX [securing the other hand]. Now... Lona!
Only just in time, for she jumps up.

LONA. Where's he gone?

MAX. You'd never catch him.

LONA. Yes, I will.

MAX. Lona... you don't want to make a scandal.

LONA. Yes, I do. Where is the wedding?

MAX. Never mind.

She tries to pull away.

LONA. I'm going there!

MAX. No, you're not. What good would it do?

LONA. To be treated like this!

MAX. Doesn't it always happen?

LONA. Be quiet with your beastly philosophy.

MAX. If you weren't in such a temper you'd see that you'd only get laughed at for your pains.

LONA [viciously]. On the wrong side of their mouths!

MAX. Think now... there are lots of good fish in the sea.

LONA. That shows how much you know about me.

MAX. Suppose he were dead or gone abroad? Suppose you'd really lost him... and no help for it.

LONA. What d'you mean by that?

MAX. It's not so much you that he's treating badly... Suppose he leaves her some day...! Wait and see.

She has calmed a little to the influence of his smooth voice. And now her face lights up with the wildest triumphant happiness.

LONA. Oh... if I thought he would!

MAX lets her go.

MAX. That's nice of you.

LONA. Let me just get a bit of my own back!

MAX. Hell knows no fury like a woman scorned.

LONA. No, it doesn't... does it?

MAX. That is heroic of you. And while you're waiting, can't you avenge your whole sex on every man you meet?

LONA. I will.

She is restored to sanity and self-respect. MAX looks at his watch rather anxiously.

MAX. Now I've just time to take you home in a cab. [He adds half to himself.] If I don't... catastrophe for sure! [He offers her his arm.] Say good-bye to this happy home.

LONA. Not good-bye.

MAX. Till you come back a goddess of vengeance... though you're really a rather silly woman. Not but what that answers the purpose as a rule.

LONA. For the present...

Most dramatically, with flashing eyes and curling lip she goes off with him, leaving the wrecked room.

CURTAIN

Light-'O-Love (1896)

Original German Title: 'Liebelei'

Translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, 1912

With the premiere of Liebelei on 9 October 1895 at Vienna's Burgtheater, orchestrated by director Max Burckhard and starring Adele Sandrock as Christine, Schnitzler became an overnight sensation. The play was performed on many stages in Europe and established his reputation as one of the most important German-language playwrights of his generation.

The first Act takes place in the apartment of a young man name Fritz, whose friend Theodor has invited two young women, Mizi and Christine, to dinner. Theodor hopes to distract Fritz from his troubling affair with a married woman by introducing the "sweet girl" Christine. The atmosphere is lively, but while Mizi doesn't take her relationship with Theodor very seriously, Christine sees Fritz as the love of her life. During dinner, the husband of his lover arrives at Fritz's apartment with the collected love letters and challenges him to a duel. After the enraged spouse leaves, Fritz, noticeably shaken, tells Theodor about the incident. Fritz tries to reassure him, saying that such duels almost always end well. Theodor and the two young women then leave Fritz's apartment.

As early as 1881, when he was only nineteen, Schnitzler noted in his diary the idea for a drama that would later become Liebelei. A first outline of the plot, which has survived to this day, was likely written ten years later. At that time, Schnitzler planned to present the material as a "folk play" under the title Das arme Mädel. In the autumn of 1893, he worked out the first act of the planned play: It is set in a suburban dance school; the meeting of Fritz and Christine (at this time still called Marie), which is no longer explicitly stated in the published play, is shown in this act. However, after criticism from his writer friends Richard Beer-Hofmann, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Felix Salten, and Gustav Schwarzkopf, he discarded this act and began working on the material three more times in the following months. In his fifth attempt, he finally drafted the three-act form of the final version at the beginning of September 1894 and began writing it on September 13, 1894; the title Liebelei also appears for the first time at this stage.

In Liebelei, Schnitzler's first major theatrical success, Schnitzler addresses the social issue of extramarital love. During the course of the play, a kind of class division emerges as Theodor describes two types of women. The "interesting women," according to Theodor, are married women from the upper class, bringing "danger," "tragedy," and "great scenes." In comparison, a poor girl from the suburbs, one can only hope to find "relaxation," "tenderness," and "gentle emotion." Furthermore, the play contains connections to bourgeois tragedy, as the second act revolves around preserving Christine's good reputation.

The duel between the gentleman and Fritz arises solely from social norms, not from love. The affair must remain undiscovered, otherwise it would be sanctioned by society. The reasons for the gentleman's indirect demand for this duel — he doesn't express it verbally — are different. His personal honour is wounded since his wife has been unfaithful to him, and Fritz, moreover, refuses to hand over her love letters. Therefore, he must demand retribution and salvage his social standing. The then-current code of honour mandated a duel in such cases and Fritz and the gentleman are both aware of this rule.

Another notable theme of this play is the exposure of class differences. The "Lady in Black" comes from Fritz's social class, while Christine belongs to the lower middle class. Women of this class would feel the need to find a well-to-do husband that could support them. When Fritz visits Christine at her home for the first time shortly before he goes to the duel, he crosses the line of class division. It seems as if he has deeper feelings for Christine, as he becomes aware of the superficiality of his own social class. He cannot, however, agree with Christine's ideal of love, namely a love for eternity. He lives solely for the moment, and only in the moment is a claim to eternity valid (albeit only as an illusion).

K. K. Hof=Burgtheater.

Mittwoch den 9. Oktober 1895.

206. Vorstellung im Jahres-Abonnement.

Zum ersten Mal:

Rechte der Seele

Schauspiel in einem Akt von Giuseppe Giacosa. Deutsch von Otto Eisenschitz.

Paul	—	Hr. Hartmann.
Anna, seine Frau	—	Fr. Hohenfels.
Marius, sein Bruder	—	Hr. Kraftel.
Johanna, Magd	—	Fr. Kratz.

Ort der Handlung: Eine Villa auf dem Lande. — Zeit: Die Gegenwart

Zum ersten Mal:

Liebelei

Schauspiel in drei Akten von Arthur Schnitzler.

Hans Weiring, Violinspieler an einem Vorstadttheater	—	Hr. Sonnenthal.
Christine, seine Tochter	—	Frl. Adele Sandrock.
Mizi Schlager, Modistin	—	Frl. Kallina.
Katharina Binder, Frau eines Strumpfwirkers	—	Frl. Walbeck.
Lina, ihre 9jährige Tochter	—	Camilla Gerzhofer.
Fritz Lobheimer, junge Leute	—	Hr. Kutschera.
Theodor Kaiser, junge Leute	—	Hr. Zeska.
Ein Herr —	—	Hr. Mitterwurzer.
Ein Diener —	—	Hr. Slanar.

Ort der Handlung: Wien. — Zeit: Die Gegenwart.

Zwischen dem ersten und zweiten Stück größere Pause.

Der freie Eintritt ist heute ohne Ausnahme aufgehoben.

Kassa-Eröffnung 6 Uhr. Anfang 7 Uhr. Ende vor halb 10 Uhr.

Unpäßlich: Fr. Mitterwurzer. Fr. Wolter. Hr. Gabillon. Hr. Robert. Hr. Stätter.

Donnerstag den 10. Rechte der Seele. Liebelei.
Freitag den 11. Don Carlos.
Samstag den 12. Rechte der Seele. Liebelei.

Sonntag den 13. Mittags halb 2 Uhr: König Richard II.
Abends: Die Karlsschüler.
Montag den 14. Schach dem König.
Dinstag den 15. Rechte der Seele. Liebelei.

Falls eine angekündigte Vorstellung abgeändert werden sollte, kann von den für dieselbe gelösten Karten auch zur Ersatzvorstellung Gebrauch gemacht, oder der dafür entrichtete Betrag, jedoch spätestens am Tage der Vorstellung bis halb 7 Uhr abends (resp. eine halbe Stunde vor dem für Beginn der Vorstellung angesetzten Zeitpunkt) bei sonstigem Verlust des Anspruches an der Kasse zurückverlangt werden.

Zu jeder im Repertoire angekündigten Vorstellung erfolgt Tags vorher bis 1 Uhr Nachmittags die Ausgabe der Stammsitze; um halb 2 Uhr Nachmittags (Tags vorher) beginnt der allgemeine Verkauf von Logen und Sitzen.

Zum Dienstgebrauche.

K. k. Hoftheater-Dr

Playbill for the premiere of "Liebelei" at the Burgtheater in Vienna on 9 October, 1895

CONTENTS

CHARACTERS
ACT ONE
ACT TWO ACT THREE

Burgtheater, Vienna

CHARACTERS

Hans Vyring, violinist at the city theatre
Christine, his daughter
Toni Schlager, milliner
Catherine Binder, wife of a stocking-maker
Lena, her nine-year-old daughter
Fritz Loheimer, young man
Theodore Kaiser, young man
A Gentleman

The action takes place in Vienna at the present day

ACT ONE

FRITZ'S ROOM. COZY but elegantly furnished.

Theodore. (Enters in advance. He carries a stick, has an overcoat flung over his arm; takes off his hat upon entering.)

Fritz. (Outside.) So nobody has been here?

Voice. No, sir.

Fritz. (Entering.) I suppose we might let the carriage go?

Theodore. Of course. I thought you had.

Fritz. (Goes to the door.) Send the carriage away. And... you can go, too. I don't need you any more. (Returning.) Why don't you lay down your things?

Theodore. (At the desk.) Here are a couple of letters. (Throws coat and hat on a chair, keeps his stick.)

Fritz. (Hastens to the desk.) Oh!...

Theodore. Now, now!... I believe you're frightened!

Fritz. From dad.... (Opens a second letter.) From Lensky.

Theodore. Don't let me disturb you.

Fritz. (Skims the letters.)

Theodore. What does your father say?

Fritz. Nothing special.... He wants me to spend a week on the estate at Whitsuntide.

Theodore. Excellent plan. I'd like to send you there for six months.

Fritz. (Turns to face him.)

Theodore. I certainly would! — riding, driving, fresh air, dairy-maids —

Fritz. Idiot, there aren't any dairy-farms out there.

Theodore. Well, you know what I mean, don't you?

Fritz. Will you come along?

Theodore. You know I can't.

Fritz. Why not?

Theodore. My dear fellow, I have my doctor's exam, coming! If I went along, it would be only for the sake of keeping you there.

Fritz. Oh, come, you needn't worry about

Theodore. You see, all you need is fresh air; I'm convinced of that — I saw that today. Out yonder in the open where we found the genuine green springtime, you Were a very pleasant fellow again.

Fritz. Thanks.

Theodore. And now — now of course you are collapsing. We're too close to the dangerous atmospheric zone again.

Fritz. (Makes a gesture of irritation.)

Theodore. Why, you've no idea how jolly you were out there. You were actually reasonable for once; it was like the good old days. And then a couple of days ago, when we were out with those two jolly little girls, you were very nice; but now — that's all over again, and you find it absolutely necessary to think — (With ironical pathos.) — of that woman.

Fritz. (Rises, vexed.)

Theodore. You don't know me, my dear fellow. I don't intend to stand that any longer.

Fritz. My goodness, but you're ambitious!

Theodore. Oh, I don't demand of you that you forget — (as before) — that woman... I only hope — (warmly) — my dear Fritz, that this miserable affair, that keeps me trembling for you all the time, means no more to you than any trivial love affair... Look here, Fritz, some day, when you stop worshipping "that woman," you'll be surprised how congenial she is to you. Then you'll find out that there's nothing demoniac in her at all, but that she is a very sweet little woman — one that you can have plenty of fun with, just as you can with all women that are young and pretty, and that have a little temperament.

Fritz. Why do you say "tremble for me"?

Theodore. You know why.... I must confess that I am in constant terror that you will run off with her some fine day.

Fritz. That was what you meant?

Theodore. (After a short pause.) That isn't the only danger.

Fritz. Right you are, Theodore — there are others, too.

Theodore. But then we never do anything silly.

Fritz. (To himself.) There are others, too....

Theodore. What's the matter?... You're thinking of something in particular.

Fritz. Oh, no, I'm not... (Glances at the window.) She was deceived once before.

Theodore. What?... What's that?... I don't understand you.

Fritz. Oh, nothing.

Theodore. What? Do talk sense.

Fritz. She's been afraid lately... at times.

Theodore. Why? — There must be a reason for it.

Fritz. Not at all. Nervousness — (ironically) — an uneasy conscience, if you will.

Theodore. You say she was deceived once —

Fritz. Well, yes — and again to-day, I suppose.

Theodore. To-day — well, what does all this mean?

Fritz. (After a slight pause.) She thinks... we are watched.

Theodore. What?

Fritz. She sees apparitions; really, she has actual hallucinations. (At the window.)
She sees some person standing on the street corner,.. through the crack in the curtain, and thinks — (Breaks off.) Is it possible, anyway, to recognize a face at this distance?

Theodore. Scarcely.

Fritz. Why, that's what I say. But then that's terrible. She's afraid to go out; she has all sorts of queer feelings; she gets hysterical; she wants to die with me —

Theodore. Of course.

Fritz. (Short pause.) To-day I had to go down and take a look. Went down as cheerfully as if I were leaving the house alone; of course then' wasn't a familiar face to be seen anywhere....
Theodore, (Is silent.)

Fritz. Well, that ought to set fears at rest, oughtn't it? A man can't suddenly be swallowed up by the earth, hey?...Answer, can't you?..

Theodore. What sort of an answer do you want? Of course a man can't be swallowed up. But a man can hide inside the gates.

Fritz. I looked behind them all.

Theodore. You must have looked very innocent at that.

Fritz. There was nobody there. I tell you it's hallucinations.

Theodore. Certainly. But it ought to teach you to be more careful.

Fritz. And I couldn't have helped knowing it, if he suspected it. Why, I ate supper with them yesterday after the play — with him and her — and it was so pleasant I... ridiculous, I tell you!

Theodore. I beg of you Fritz, be sensible; do me that favor. Give up this whole cursed affair, for my sake, if nothing else. I have nerves, too... I know you're not the kind of man who can escape from such an affair unaided, and so I made it so easy for you — gave you a chance to save yourself by starting another...

Fritz. You did?

Theodore. Well, didn't I take you along with me when I had an appointment with little Miss Toni a while back? And didn't I ask her to bring along her prettiest friend?
And can you deny that you like her?

Fritz. Certainly, she is sweet!... So sweet! And you have no idea how I longed for such an affection as that, so sweet and quiet, that would hover about me and soothe me, and help me to recover from these everlasting irritations and torments.

Theodore. That's exactly it. Recover! That's the deeper purpose of it. They help us to recover. That's why I'm against these so-called interesting women. It's not the business of women to be interesting, but to be agreeable. You must seek happiness where I have sought and found it — where there are no grand scenes, no dangers, no tragic entanglements — where the beginning has no special difficulties, and the ending no torments — where you take your first kiss with a smile, and part with very gentle emotion.

Fritz. Yes, that's it.

Theodore. Those women are so happy in their healthy every-day womanhood — what compels us to make demons or angels out of them at all cost?

Fritz. She is really a treasure. So affectionate, so dear. Often it seems to me she is too dear for me.

Theodore. You're incorrigible, apparently.
If you intend to take that affair seriously again....

Fritz. No, no, not a thought of it. We are agreed, I need to recover.

Theodore. If you did, I'd give you up for good. I've had enough of your lovetragedies. You bore me with them. And if you feel like coming at me with your famous "conscience," I'll give you my simple rule for treating such cases: Better it were I than some one else. For that "some one else" is as sure as fate itself.

(There is a ring.)

Fritz. What's that now?...

Theodore. Go and see. There you are, all pale again! Set your fears at rest. It's the two sweet little girls.

Fritz. (Agreeably surprised.) What?

Theodore. I took the liberty of inviting them here to-day.

Fritz. (Going out.) Oh, you — why didn't you tell me? Now I've sent away my man.

Theodore. So much the cozier.

Fritz. (Outside.) Greetings, Toni.

Toni. (Enters, carrying a package.)

Fritz. (Re-enters behind her.) And where's Christine?

Toni. She'll be here soon. Greetings, Dore.

Theodore. (Kisses her hand.)

Toni. You'll have to excuse us, Mr. Fritz; but Theodore invited us....

Fritz. Why, it was a splendid idea. Only he forgot something, Theodore did.

Theodore. Theodore forgot nothing!
(Takes the package from Toni.) Did you bring everything I wrote down for you?

Toni. Of course. (To Fritz.) Where can I put it?

Fritz. Just give it to me, Toni; we'll put it on the sideboard for the present.

Toni. I bought something else, Dore, besides what you told me.

Fritz. Give me your hat, Toni, that's right. (Lays it on the piano, also her boa.)

Theodore. (Dubiously.) What?

Toni. A coffee cream-cake.

Theodore. Oh, what a sweet tooth!

Fritz. Well, but tell me, why didn't Christine come with you?

Toni. She's going to take her father to the theatre first. Then she'll come along on the street car.

Theodore. What an affectionate daughter!...

Toni. I should say so, and especially since he went into mourning.

Theodore. Why, who died there, anyway?

Toni. The old gentleman's sister.

Theodore. Ah, a widow?

Toni. No, it was an old maiden lady, who has lived with them always. Well, and so he feels so lonesome, somehow.

Theodore. He's a little man with short gray hair — her father — isn't he?

Toni. (Shakes her head.) No, he has long hair.

Fritz. How do you come to know him?

Theodore. Recently I was in the theatre with Lensky, and I took a look at the men playing the bass-viols.

Toni. Why, he doesn't play the bassviol — he plays the violin.

Theodore. Oh, is that so? I thought he played the bass-viol. (Toni laughs.) Nothing funny about that; how should I know, child?

Toni. What a beautiful place you have, Mr. Fritz — just wonderful! What view is that?

Fritz. This window opens on Straw Lane, and in the next room ——

Theodore. (Quickly.) Do tell me, why are you so formal, you two?

Toni. At supper we'll get better acquainted.

Theodore. A lady of principle, I see.
Well, that's some comfort, just the same.
How's your mother, anyhow?

Toni. (Turns to him, her face suddenly showing concern.) Only think, she's got —

Theodore. Toothache, I know, I know. Your mother always has the toothache. She ought to go to a dentist one of these times.

Toni. But the doctor says it's only rheumatic pains.

Theodore. (Laughing.) Well, if it's rheumatic...

Toni. (An album in her hand.) Nothing but pretty things. (Turning the pages.)
Who is that?... Why, that's you, Mr. Fritz,.. in uniform? You're in the army?

Fritz. Yes.

Toni. Dragoon! — Are you in the yellows or the blacks?

Fritz. (Smiling.) In the yellows.

Toni. (As in a reverie.) The yellows.

Theodore. There she goes a-dreaming.
Wake up, Toni!

Toni. But now you're lieutenant in the reserves?

Fritz. Surely.

Toni. You must look very nice in the fur cap.

Theodore. How much she knows about it!
— Look here, Toni, I'm in the army, too.

Toni. Are you in the dragoons, too?

Theodore. Yes.

Toni. Well, why can't you tell a body that?

Theodore. I want to be loved for myself.

Toni. Come, Dore, you must put on your uniform some time when we're going out together.

Theodore. In August' there will be manoeuvres, anyway.

Toni. Heavens! by August.

Theodore. Yes, that's so — eternal love doesn't last that long.

Toni. Who thinks about August in May? Isn't that so, Mr. Fritz? — Say, Mr. Fritz, why did you run away from us yesterday?

Fritz. What do you mean?

Toni. Why — after the play.

Fritz. Didn't Theodore make my excuses to you?

Theodore. To be sure, I excused you.

Toni. What good do your excuses do me, or rather Christine? When a man makes a promise, he ought to keep it.

Fritz. I really would rather have gone with you.

Toni. Really?

Fritz. But I couldn't. You saw yourselves I was in a box with friends, and afterward I couldn't get away from them.

Toni. Yes, you couldn't get away from the pretty ladies. Do you think we didn't see you from the gallery?

Fritz. Well, I saw you, too.

Toni. You were sitting backwards in the box.

Fritz. Not all the time.

Toni. But most of it. Behind a lady With a black velvet dress you sat and kept — (Imitating.) — looking forward like this.

Fritz. You must have watched me closely.

Toni. Why, it's nothing to me. But if I were Christine... Why did Theodore have time after the play? Why doesn't he have to take supper with friends?

Theodore. (Proudly.) Why don't I have to take supper with friends?
(There is a ring. Fritz hastens out.)

Theodore. Toni, you can do me a favor.

Toni. (Assumes questioning expression.)

Theodore. Forget your military recollections — at least, for a time.

Toni. Why, I haven't any.

Theodore. Come, now, you didn't learn all that just by accident, that's plain enough.

Christine. (Enters with flowers in her hand. Fritz behind her. With a trace of embarrassment.) Good-evening. (General salutation. To Fritz.) Are you glad we came — You're not angry?

Fritz. But — my dear child! Sometimes, you know Theodore is cleverer than I am.

Theodore. Well, is your father fiddling by now?

Christine. Surely; I took him to the theatre.

Fritz. Toni told us.

Christine. (To Toni.) And Catherine stopped me, too.

Toni. Oh, pshaw! the false cat!

Christine. Oh, no, she isn't false at all; she is very good to me.

Toni. You trust every one, anyway.

Christine. Why should she be false to me?

Fritz. Who is Catherine?

Toni. The wife of a stocking-maker; and she's always vexed because some girls are younger than she is.

Christine. Why, she's quite young herself.

Fritz. Bother Catherine! — What have you got there?

Christine. I brought along a few flowers for you.

Fritz. (Takes them from her and kisses her hand.) You're a little angel. Here, we'll put them in the vase.

Theodore. No, no! You've no talent as decorator. The flowers will be scattered at random on the table —— That is, later on, when the table is set. We really ought to fix it so that they would fall from the ceiling. But that can't be done.

Fritz. (Laughing.) Scarcely.

Theodore. Meanwhile we'll put them in here, after all. (Puts them into the vase.)

Toni. Children, it's getting dark!

Fritz. (Helps Christine to take off her coat, and she takes off her hat. He puts hat and coat on a chair in the background.)
We'll light the lamp right away.

Theodore. Lamp! I should say not! Candles we must have. Their light is so much prettier. Come, Toni, you can help me.

(He and Toni light the candles, in the branched candelabra before the pierglass, one on the desk, two candles on the sideboard. Meanwhile Fritz and Christine converse.)

Fritz. How are you, sweetheart?

Christine. I'm all right now.

Fritz. Well, but not at other times?

Christine. I have longed so for you.

Fritz. Why, we saw each other only yesterday.

Christine. Saw each other... from away off.... (Shyly.) Fritz, it wasn't very nice of you to...

Fritz. Yes, I know; Toni told me. But you're always a child. I couldn't get away.
You've got to understand such things.

Christine. Yes.... Fritz,.. who were the people in the box?

Fritz. Friends of mine — it doesn't matter what their names are.

Christine. Well, who was the lady in the black velvet dress?

Fritz. Child, I have no memory for dresses.

Christine. (Coaxingly.) Come, come!

Fritz. That is to say,.. I do have a sort of a memory for them — in certain cases. For example, I remember very well that dark-blue waist you had on the first time we saw each other. And the black and white one you wore to the theatre yesterday.

Christine. Why, I'm wearing it to-day!

Fritz. Sure enough;... from the distance, you know, it looks different — I mean it! Oh, and that medallion — I know that, too.

Christine. (Smiling.) When did I wear that?

Fritz. Oh, — that time we went walking in the public gardens, where all the children Were playing — isn't that right?

Christine. Yes... So you do think of me 'sometimes?

Fritz. Rather frequently, my child.

Christine. Not so often as I think of you.
I am always thinking of you... all day long;... and I can only be happy when I see you.

Fritz. Then don't we see each other often enough?

Christine. Often...

Fritz. Certainly. In the summer we shan't see each other so much. Just think!
Suppose, for example, I went away for a couple of weeks — what would you say?

Christine. (Anxiously.) What? You are going away?

Fritz. No.... And still it might be possible that I would like the notion of being all alone for a week.

Christine. Oh, why?

Fritz. I'm simply talking about possibilities. I know myself, I get such notions.
And you, too, might some time take the whim of not wanting to see me for a few days.... I'll always understand that.

Christine. No, I'll never have that whim, Fritz.

Fritz. You can't tell about that.

Christine. But I can.... I love you.

Fritz. I love you, too, very much.

Christine. But you are everything to me, Fritz; for you I could — (Breaks off.) No, I can't imagine an hour ever coming when I wouldn't want to see you. As long as I live, Fritz —

Fritz. (Interrupts.) Child, I beseech you... don't say anything like that.... I don't like big words. We won't talk about eternity.

Christine. (Smiling sadly.) Have no fear, Fritz.... I know this can't be for always.

Fritz. You misunderstand me, child. Of course it's possible — (Laughing.) — that we simply won't be able to live without each other, but we can't tell for sure, can we?
We're only human.

Theodore. (Pointing to the lighted candles.) Kindly turn your eyes upon that... Isn't that different from a stupid lamp?

Fritz. You're really a born decorator.

Theodore. Children, what do you say — shall we think about eating?

Toni. Yes!... Come, Christine.

Fritz. Wait; I'll show you where to find everything.

Toni. First of all, we need a table-cloth.

*Theodore. (With German accent, as on the vaudeville stage.! "*A table-clot'?"

Fritz. What?

Theodore. Don't you remember that fellow in the Orpheum? "Dot is a table-clot'."
"Dot is a shtool."
"Dot is a liddle piannino."

Toni. Say, Dore, when are you going to the Orpheum with me? You promised me a little while ago. Then Christine will come along, and Mr. Fritz, too. (She is just taking from Fritz the table-cloth which he has taken out of the sideboard.) Then we'll be your friends in the box.

Fritz. Yes, yes.

Toni. Then the lady with the black velvet dress can go home alone.

Fritz. Why do you keep thinking about that lady in black? It's too stupid.

Toni. Oh, we don't think about her....

There.... And the silver? (Fritz shows her the things in the open sideboard.) Yes... And the plates?... Yes, thanks.... There, now we can do it alone all right. Go, go away now, you're only getting in our way.

Theodore. (Has meanwhile stretched out on the couch; Fritz advances toward him.)

You'll excuse me.

Toni. Did you see the picture of Fritz in his uniform?

Christine. No.

Toni. You must have a look at it. Swell!
(They talk on.)

Theodore. Such evenings are my delight, Fritz.

Fritz. Well, they are nice.

Theodore. Then I feel so cozy.... Don't you?

Fritz. Oh, I wish I could always feel so contented.

Toni. Tell me, Mr. Fritz, is there coffee in the machine?

Fritz. Yes. You can start the lamp under it right away — it takes a good hour on that machine, before the coffee is done.

Theodore. I'd give a dozen demoniac women for a sweet girl like that.

Fritz. There's no comparison.

Theodore. You see, we hate the women that we love — and only love the women that are indifferent to us.

Fritz. (Laughs.)

Toni. What's the joke? We'd like to hear it, too.

Theodore. Nothing for you, children. We're philosophizing — If this were to be our last meeting with these girls, we'd be just as jolly, wouldn't we?

Fritz. The last time?... Well, there's certainly something melancholy about that.
Parting always gives pain, even if you've been looking forward to it eagerly for a long time.

Christine. Say, Fritz, where's the small silver?

Fritz. (Goes rear to the sideboard.) Here it is, sweetheart.

Toni. (Comes forward, runs her hand through Theodore's hair; he still reclining on the couch.)

Theodore. You pussy-cat!

Fritz. (Opens the package Toni brought.) Grand!

Christine. (To Fritz.) You have everything in such good order.

Fritz. Yes. (Arranges the things. Toni brought — sardines, cold meat, butter, cheese.)

Christine. Fritz... won't you tell me?

Fritz. Tell you what?

Christine. (Very timidly.) Who the lady was.

Fritz. No; don't make me cross. (More gently.) You see, that's one thing we agreed upon expressly: No questions asked. That's the nice thing about it. When I am with you the world disappears, like that — (Snaps his fingers.) I don't ask you any questions, either.

Christine. You can ask me anything you like.

Fritz. But I don't. I don't want to know anything.

Toni. (Returns to table.) Goodness, what a mess you're making! (Takes the edibles, puts them on the plates.) There....

Theodore. Say, Fritz, have you anything to drink here?

Fritz. Oh, yes, I think I can find something. (Exit into front room.)

Theodore. (Raises himself and inspects the table.) Good.

Toni. There, I think we've got everything now.

Fritz. (Returns with some bottles.) Here's something to drink, too.

Theodore. Where are the roses that fall from the ceiling?

Toni. That's right, we forgot the roses.
(She takes the roses out of the vase, climbs on a chair, and lets the roses fall on the table.) There!

Christine. My, what a wild girl you are to-night!

Theodore. Here, not on the plates.

Fritz. Where do you want to sit, Christine?

Theodore. Where is the cork-screw?

Fritz. (Gets one from the sideboard.)
Here is one.

Toni. (Tries to open a bottle.)

Fritz. No, let me do that.

Theodore. No, let me do it.... (Takes bottle and cork-screw from him.) Meanwhile you might —— (Moves his fingers as at the piano.)

Toni. Yes, yes, that's grandi... (She runs to the piano, takes the things off it, and opens it.)

Fritz. (To Christine.) Shall I?

Christine. Oh, please do, I've wanted that for so long.

Fritz. (At the piano.) You can play a little too?

Christine. (With a gesture.) Oh goodness.

Toni. She plays fine, Christine does.... she can sing too.

Fritz. Really? You never told me that.

Christine. Did you ever ask me?

Fritz. Where did you learn to sing?

Christine. I really never learned. Father taught me a little — but I haven't got much voice. And you know, since auntie died, the one that always lived with us, it's even quieter at home than it was before.

Fritz. What do you do, anyway, all day long?

Christine. Oh, I have plenty to do!

Fritz. Around the house, I suppose?

Christine. Yes. And then I copy notes quite a lot.

Theodore. Music notes?

Christine. Surely.

Theodore. They must pay you tremendously for that. (The others laugh.) Well, I'd pay tremendously for it. Music copying must be a terrible task, I think.

Toni. There's no sense in her working so hard, either. If I had as much voice as you have, I'd have been in the theatre long ago.

Theodore. You wouldn't even need a voice.... Of course you do nothing all day, hey?

Toni. Well, I like that! I have two little brothers that are going to school. I have to dress them in the morning. And then I help them with their lessons —

Theodore. That's a lie, every word of it.

Toni. Well, if you won't believe me. And until last autumn I was in a store from eight in the morning till eight at night.

Theodore. (Mockingly.) Where was that?

Toni. In a millinery store. Mother wants me to go back there.

Theodore. (As above.) Why did you leave it?

Fritz. (To Christine.) Then you must sing something for us.

Theodore. Come on, children, let's eat first, and then you'll play, won't you?

Fritz. (Rising, to Christine.) Come, sweetheart. (Leads her to the table.)

Toni. The coffee! There's the coffee boiling over, and we haven't begun to eat.

Theodore. Nothing matters now.

Toni. But it's boiling over! (Blows out the flame.)
(All sit down at the table.)

Theodore. What will you have, Toni? But let me tell you this: the cake comes last!... First you've got to eat nothing but sour things.

Fritz. (Pours out the wine.)

Theodore. Not that way: we do it differently now. Don't you know the latest fashion? (Stands up, affects magniloquence; to Christine, bottle in hand.) Special quality, genuine Johannisberger, eighteen hundred — (Mumbles the last figures. Fills glass, then goes to Toni, to Fritz, repeating the same ceremony and words; finally stands at his own place, and repeats as before.
Seats himself.)

Toni. (Laughing.) He's always doing something silly.

Theodore. (Raises his glass; all clink.) Prosit.

Toni. Your health, Theodore.

Theodore. (Rising.) Ladies and Gentlemen...

Fritz. Oh, not yet!

Theodore. (Sits again.) Well, I can wait.

Toni. Oh, that's what I like, — after-dinner speeches. I have a cousin that always makes his speeches in rhymes.

Theodore. What regiment is he in?

Toni. Come, stop that... He talks if off by heart and in rhyme, and it's just splendid, Christine. And he's an elderly gentleman now, too.

Theodore. Oh, it sometimes happens that elderly gentlemen can still talk in rhyme.

Fritz. But you're not drinking at all, Christine! (Clinks with her.)

Theodore. (Clinks with Toni.) To the old gentleman who talks in rhymes.

Toni. (Merrily.) To the young gentlemen, even if they don't talk at all... for example, to Mr. Fritz.... Say, Mr. Fritz, now we'll drink to our better acquaintance, if you wish — and Christine must do the same with Theodore.

Theodore. But not with this wine, that's not the right kind for it. (Rises, takes another bottle, same ceremony as before.) Xeres de la Frontera mille huit cent cinquante —

Toni. (Sips.) Ah —

Theodore. Can't you wait till we all drink together? Now then, children...Before we solemnly drink to our better acquaintance, let us drink to the happy chance that, that... and so forth...

Toni. Yes, that's enough. (They drink, Fritz taking Toni's arm, Theodore Christine's.)

Fritz. (Kisses Toni.)

Theodore. (Starts to kiss Christine.)

Christine. Is that necessary?

Theodore. Absolutely, else the whole ceremony is null.... (Kisses her.) There, and now to your seats I...

Toni. But it's getting terribly hot in the room.

Fritz. That's because of all the candles Theodore lit.

Toni. And the wine, too. (She leans back in her chair.)

Theodore. Come here, the best of all is coming now. (He cuts off a slice of the cake and puts it in her mouth.) There, sweet tooth, — that good?

Toni. Awfully!... (He gives her another.)

Theodore. Come, Fritz, now's the time. Now you might play something.

Fritz. Do you want me to, Christine?

Christine. Please do!

Toni. Play something swell.

Theodore. (Fills the glasses.)

Toni. No more. (Drinks.)

Christine. (Sipping.) The wine is so heavy.

Theodore. (Pointing to the glass.) Fritz.

Fritz. (Empties the glass, goes to piano.)

Christine. (Goes and sits by him.)

Toni. Mr. Fritz, play the "Double Eagle."

Fritz. The "Double Eagle" — how does it go?

Toni. Dore, can't you play it?

Theodore. I can't play at all.

Fritz. I know the thing; but I can't think of it.

Toni. I'll sing it for you.... La... la... lalalala....

Fritz. Aha, now I know. (Does not play quite correctly.) —

Toni. (Goes to the piano.) No, this way. (Plays the melody with one finger.)

Fritz. Yes, yes.... (He plays, Toni sings.)

Theodore. Recollections again, hey?

Fritz. (Plays wrong again and stops.)
Can't do it. I've got no ear. (He starts to improvise.)

Toni. (After the first measure.) That's no good.

Fritz. (Laughs.) Don't say that, I made it up.

Toni. But it's no good for dancing.

Fritz. Just try it once....

Theodore. (To Toni.) Come, let's try.
(They dance.)

Christine. (Sits by the piano and looks at the keys.)
(There is a ring.)

Fritz. (Suddenly stops playing; Theodore and Toni dance on.)

Theodore and Toni. (Together.) What's all this? Come!

Fritz. The bell just rang.... (To Theodore.) Did you invite anybody else?

Theodore. I should say not — you don't need to answer the bell.

Christine. (To Fritz.) What's the matter with you?

Fritz. Nothing....
(There is another ring.)

Fritz. (Stands up, rooted to the spot.)

Theodore. You are simply not at home.

Fritz. You can hear the piano out in the corridor.... And you can see from the street that the room is lit.

Theodore. What folly is this? You're simply not at home.

Fritz. But it makes me nervous.

Theodore. Well, what do you suppose it's going to be? A letter — or a telegram —— You're not going to have a visitor at (Looks at his watch.) nine o'clock.
(There is another ring.)

Fritz. Rubbish, I must go and see — (Exit.)

Toni. But you're not a bit swell — (Strikes a few keys on the piano.')

Theodore. Here, stop that now! — (To Christine.) What ails you? Does the bell make you nervous too?

Fritz. (Returns, in forced calm.)

Theodore and Christine. (Together.)
Well, who was it? — Who was it?

Fritz. (With a forced smile.) You must be good enough to excuse me for a moment.
Go in there meanwhile.

Theodore. What is it?

Christine. Who is it?

Fritz. Nothing, child, I simply have to say a few words to a gentleman.... (Fritz has opened the door of the adjoining room, conducts the girls into it. Theodore, going in last, looks questioningly at Fritz.)

Fritz. (In a low voice, with an expression of horror.) He!

Theodore. Ah!

Fritz. In with you!

Theodore. I beg of you, don't do anything stupid, it may be a trap....

Fritz. Go... go.... (Theodore exit. Fritz goes rapidly through the room to the corridor, so that the stage is empty for a few seconds. Then he enters again, allowing an elegantly dressed gentleman of about thirty-five years to precede him. The Gentleman wears a yellow mantle, holds his hat in his gloved hand. While entering.) Pardon me for making you wait.... I beg you....

The Gentleman. (In a very easy tone.)
Oh, that is nothing. I regret extremely to have disturbed you.

Fritz. By no means. Will you not....
(Indicates a chair.)

The Gentleman. Why, I see that I have disturbed you? A little entertainment, I presume?

Fritz. A few friends.

The Gentleman. (Seating himself, amicable.) A masquerade, no doubt?

Fritz. (Embarrassed.) Why do you say that?

The Gentleman. Well, your friends have ladies' hats and cloaks.

Fritz. Well yes.... (Smiling.) There may be lady friends among them....
(Silence.)

The Gentleman. Life is at times very merry... yes... (Looks rigidly at Fritz.)

Fritz. (Endures the glance a while, then looks away.) I presume I may permit myself to inquire what gives me the pleasure of your visit?

The Gentleman. Certainly.... (Calmly.)
You see, my wife forgot to take her veil away from here.

Fritz. Your wife... here? Her...(Smiling.) The jest is a trifle strange....

The Gentleman. (Suddenly rising, very loudly, almost wildly, supporting himself by resting one hand on the chair arm.) She did forget it.

Fritz. (Rises also, and the two men stand facing each other.)

The Gentleman. (Raises his clenched fist, as if to launch it at Fritz; in jury and loathing.) Oh!...

Fritz. (Makes a parrying motion, takes a short step backward.)

The Gentleman. (After a long pause.)
Here are your letters. (He throws on the desk a packet of letters which he has taken from his overcoat pocket.) I wish those which you have received.

Fritz. (Parrying motion.)

The Gentleman. (Vehemently, significantly.) I do not wish to have them found — later — in your rooms.

Fritz. (Very loudly.) They will not be found.

The Gentleman. (Looks at him. Pause.)

Fritz. What else do you wish of me?

The Gentleman. (Scornfully.) What else?

Fritz. I am at your disposal....

The Gentleman. (Bows coolly.) Very well. (He casts a glance around the room; as he again sees the table and the girls' hats, a sudden flash crosses his face, as if he would burst into a new fit of rage.)

Fritz. (Notices this.) I am wholly at your disposal. — I shall be at home to-morrow till noon.

The Gentleman. (Bows and turns to go.)

*Fritz. (*Accompanies him to the door, The Gentleman motioning him away. When he is gone, Fritz goes to the desk and stands there a moment. Then he hastens to the window, looks through a crack in the blind, and can be seen to follow the motions of the gentleman passing along the street. Leaving the window he looks down for a moment; then goes to the door of the adjoining room, opens it halfway, and calls.) Theodore, one moment.

(The following scene very rapid.)

Theodore. (Excited.) Well?...

Fritz. He knows.

Theodore. He knows nothing. You simply fell into his trap. I'll wager you even confessed. You're a fool, I tell you....You

Fritz. (Pointing to the letters.) He brought me back my letters.

Theodore. (Startled.) Oh!... (After a pause.) I always say, a man ought not to write letters.

Fritz. It was he, this noon, down below.

Theodore. Well, what happened? — Tell me about it.

Fritz. You must do me a great service now, Theodore.

Theodore. I'll fix up the whole business for you.

Fritz. That is out of the question now.

Theodore. Then...

Fritz. In any case it will be well....
(Breaks off.) — But we can't let the poor girls wait so long.

Theodore. Let them wait. What were you going to say?

Fritz. It will be well if you go to Lensky to-day.

Theodore. At once, if you wish.

Fritz. You won't find him now... but between eleven and twelve he will surely come into the coffee-house... perhaps the two of you will then come here....

Theodore. Come, don't make up such a face... ninety-nine times out of a hundred it turns out all right....

Fritz. He will see to it that this one doesn't turn out all right.

Theodore. But I beg you, remember that affair of last year, between Doctor Billinger and Herz — that was exactly the same.

Fritz. None of that! You know yourself he ought to have shot me down right here in the room — it would have come to the same thing.

Theodore. (Acting.) Well, that is fine, I must say. That's a grand idea.... And so Lensky and I count for nothing? You think we'll agree that...

Fritz. I beg of you, no more of that!... You simply accept what is proposed.

Theodore. Ah, —

Fritz. What's the sense of all this, Theodore? As if you didn't know.

Theodore. Nonsense. And anyway, it's all a matter of luck.... You have just as much chance of...

Fritz. (Without listening to him,) She foreboded it. We both foreboded it. We knew it....

Theodore. Come, Fritz....

Fritz. (Goes to the desk, locks up the letters.) Oh, what is she doing this minute?
Did he... Theodore, you must find out to-morrow what happened over there.

Theodore. I will try.

Fritz. And see to it that no useless delay...

Theodore. It can scarcely be before day after to-morrow in the morning.

Fritz. (Almost horrified.) Theodore!

Theodore. And so... head up. — You believe a little in inward conviction, don't you — and I have a firm conviction that everything will turn out all right. (With forced merriment.) I don't know why myself, but I have the conviction, anyway!

Fritz. (Smiling.) What a good fellow you are. But what shall we say to the girls?

Theodore. That doesn't matter. Let's simply send them away.

Fritz. No, no. Let's be as merry as we can. Christine must not suspect anything. I'll sit down at the piano again; and you call them in. (Theodore turns to do this, with discontented face.) And what shall you say to them?

Theodore. That it's none of their business.

Fritz. (Who has sat down at the piano, turning toward him.) No, no ——

Theodore. That it's about a friend — I'll invent something.

Fritz. (Plays a few notes.)

Theodore. Ladies, I beg you to enter.

(Has opened the door.)

Toni. Well, at last! Has he gone?

Christine. (Hastening to Fritz.) Who was here, Fritz?

Fritz. (At the piano, playing.) Curious again.

Christine. I beg you, Fritz, tell me.

Fritz. Sweetheart, I can't tell you; it really concerns people that you don't know at all.

Christine. (Coaxingly.) Come, Fritz, tell me the truth.

Theodore. Of course she won't leave you in peace.... But mind you tell her nothing! You promised him.

Toni. Come, don't be so tiresome, Christine, let them have their fun. They're simply putting on airs.

Theodore. I must finish that waltz with Miss Toni. (German accent.) Bleaze, Mister Music-maker — a liddle museek.

Fritz. (Plays.)
(Theodore and Toni dance a few measures.)

Toni. (After a few moments.) I can't. (She falls back into a chair.)

Theodore. (Kisses her, seats himself beside her on the chair-arm.)

Fritz. (Stays at the piano, takes both Christine's hands, looks at her.)

Christine. (As if awakening.) Why don't you play on?

Fritz. (Smiling.) Enough for to-day....

Christine. That's the way I'd like to be able to play.

Fritz. Do you play much?

Christine. I don't get much chance; there's always something in the house that needs to be done. And then you know we have such a poor piano.

Fritz. I'd like to try it once. I'd like to see your room once, anyway.

Christine. (Smiling.) It isn't as pretty as here.

Fritz. And something else I'd like: to have you tell me about yourself... a whole lot... I really know so little about you.

Christine. There isn't much to tell. — And I haven't any secrets either... like some others.

Fritz. You never loved any man before?

Christine. (Merely looks at him.)

Fritz. (Kisses her hands.)

Christine. And never shall love any other.

Fritz. (With an almost pained expression.) Don't say that... don't... What do you know, about it?... Does your father love you very much, Christine?

Christine. Oh, how much!... And there was a time when I used to tell him everything.

Fritz. Well, child, don't reproach yourself. People have to have secrets once in a while — that's the way of the world.

Christine. If I only knew that you loved me — it would all be right.

Fritz. Then don't you know?

Christine. If you would always talk to me like that then...

Fritz. Christine! You haven't a very comfortable seat, though.

Christine. Let me be — this is all right.

(She lays her head against the piano.)

Fritz. (Stands up and strokes her hair.)

Christine. Oh, that feels good. (The room is quiet.)

Theodore. Where are the cigars, Fritz?

Fritz. (Advances to him as he stands by the sideboard looking.)

Toni. (Has fallen asleep.)

Fritz. (Hands him a small box of cigars.)
And black coffee. (He pours two cups.)

Theodore. Children, don't you want some coffee, too?

Fritz. Toni, shall I pour a cup?...

Theodore. Let them sleep. — You ought not to drink coffee to-day. You ought to go to bed as soon as possible and try to sleep well.

Fritz. (Looks at him and laughs bitterly.)

Theodore. Well, things are as they are... and now it's not a question of being magnificent or deep, but of being as sensible as you can... that's the point... in such cases.

Fritz. You'll bring Lensky to me to-night, will you?

Theodore. That's nonsense. To-morrow is time enough.

Fritz. I beg you, bring him.

Theodore. All right, then.

Fritz. Will you take the girls home?

Theodore. Yes, and right away, too. —
Toni!... Get up!

Toni. Oh, you're drinking black coffee.
Give me some, too.

Theodore. Here you are, child.

Fritz. (To Christine, going to her.)
Tired, my sweetheart?

Christine. How sweet, when you talk that way.

Fritz. Very tired?

Christine. (Smiling.) It's the wine. — And I have a little headache, too.

Fritz. Well, that will pass off in the open air.

Christine. Are we going now? Will you go with us?

Fritz. No, child. I'm going to stay right here. I have some things to do.

Christine. (Recollecting.) Now... What have you got to do now?

Fritz. (Almost sternly.) Christine, that's something you must stop. — (Gently.) You see, I'm all used up... we walked around in the country for two hours to-day, Theodore and I.

Theodore. Oh, that was delightful. One of these days we'll all drive out into the country together.

Toni. Yes, that will be swell. And you'll put on your uniform.

Theodore. There's feeling for nature!

Christine. When shall I see you again?

Fritz. (Somewhat nervously.) I'll write you.

Christine. (Sadly.) Good-bye. (Turns to go.)

Fritz. (Notices her sadness.) To-morrow, Christine.

Christine. (Happily.) Truly?

Fritz. In the public gardens out there — at — say at six o'clock.... Will that suit you?

Christine. (Nods.)

Toni. (To Fritz.) Are you going with us, Fritz?

Fritz. No, I shall stay here.

Toni. He has an easy time of it. Think of the long journey home we have.

Fritz. But Toni, you have left almost the whole of that cake. Wait, I'll wrap it up for you, shall I?

Toni. (To Theodore.) Is that proper?

Fritz. (Wraps up the cake.)

Christine. She's like a little child.

Toni. (To Fritz.) Wait, I'll help you put out the candles. (Puts out one after another.) The candle on the desk is left burning.

Christine. Shan't I open the window for you? The air is so heavy. (She opens the window, looks at the house opposite.)

Fritz. There, children. Now I'll light you down the stairs.

Toni. Are the lights out on the stairs?

Theodore. Why, of course.

Christine. Oh, the air is nice, coming in here.

Toni. May breezes.... (At the door to Fritz, who holds the candlestick.) Well, we thank you for a warm welcome.

Theodore. (Urging her forward.) Come, come, come, come....

Fritz. (Goes out with them. The door stays open. The voices are heard outside.
The outer door is heard to open.)

Toni. Bah!

Theodore. Look out for the steps there.

Toni. Thanks for the cake.

Theodore. Shh, you'll wake people up.

Christine. Good night.

Theodore. Good night.

(Fritz can be heard to close and bolt the outer door. As he enters and puts the light on the desk, the street-door is heard to open and close.)

Fritz. (Goes to the window and bows, looking down.)

Christine. Good night.

Toni. (In high spirits.) Good night, my darling child.

Theodore. (Reprovingly.) Toni! (One can hear his words, her laughter; the steps die away. Theodore whistles the melody of the "Double Eagle," which is the last thing heard. Fritz looks out a few moments longer, then sinks down on the chair nearest the window.)

ACT TWO

CHRISTINE'S ROOM. MODEST and neat.

Christine. (Is dressing to go out.)

Catherine. (Enters after knocking.) Good evening, Miss Christine.

Christine. (Standing before the mirror, turns around.) Good evening.

Catherine. You're just going out?

Christine. I'm not in such a great hurry.

Catherine. My husband sent me to ask if you wouldn't go and take supper with us in the Zoological Garden; there's a band there to-night.

Christine. Thank you very much, Mrs.

Binder. I can't to-night. Another time, perhaps? — But you're not angry?

Catherine. Not a bit, why should I be?
You'll probably have a better time than with us.

Christine. (Looks at her.)

Catherine. Has your father gone to the theatre?

Christine. Oh, no; he comes home first. It doesn't begin till half past seven now.

Catherine. That's so, I keep forgetting. I'll just wait for him. I've wanted for a long time to ask him about free tickets to the new piece. I suppose they can be had now?

Christine. Surely, nobody goes there any more now, when the evenings are so lovely.

Catherine. People like us never get a chance to go, unless we happen to know somebody in a theatre. — But don't let me keep you, Miss Christine, if you have to go. To be sure, my husband will be very sorry... and somebody else too.

Christine. Who?

Catherine. Binder's cousin goes with us, of course. Do you know, Miss Christine, that he has a steady job now?

Christine. (Indifferently.) Oh.

Catherine. And a very nice salary. And such a fine young fellow. And he has such respect for you —

Christine. Well — good-bye, Mrs. Binder.

Catherine. A body could tell him anything about you — he wouldn't believe a word of it....

Christine. (Looks at her.)

Catherine. There are such men.

Christine. Good-bye, Mrs. Binder.

Catherine. Good-bye.... (Not too maliciously.) See that you aren't late to your appointment, Miss Christine.

Christine. What do you want of me, anyway?

Catherine. Why, nothing; you're quite right. You can't be young but once.

Christine. Good-bye.

Catherine. But I'd like to give you one piece of advice, just the same, Miss Christine: you ought to be a little more careful.

Christine. Why, what do you mean?

Catherine. Look, — Vienna is such a big city.... Do you have to have your meetings a hundred paces from your house?

Christine. I suppose that's nobody's business.

Catherine. I didn't want to believe it, when Binder told me. He saw you, you know.... Come, I said to him, you were mistaken, you saw somebody else. Miss Christine is not the girl to go walking with elegant young gentlemen in the evening, and if she did, she would be wise enough not to go walking through these streets. Well, says he, you can ask her yourself. And, says he, it's no wonder, either — she doesn't come to see us any more at all. Instead of that she's going around all the time with Toni Schlager, and what sort of company is that for a decent young girl? — You see, men are so low-minded, Miss Christine. — And of course he had to go and tell everything to Franz right away too; but he got fine and angry, he did, and for Miss Christine he'd burn his hand off, and anybody that said anything about her would have to deal with him. And you're so domestic and were always so sweet with your old auntie — God grant her eternal rest — and you live so modestly and so retiringly and all that.... (Pause.) Perhaps you'll come to hear the music, after all?

Christine. No....

Vyring. (Enters, a laurel branch in his hand.) Good evening. — Ah, Mrs. Binder.
How are you?

Catherine. Thank you, well.

Vyring. And little Lena? And your husband?

Catherine. All well, God be praised.

Vyring. Well, that's fine. (To Christine.) You're still at home in all this fine weather?

Christine. I was just going out.

Vyring. That's right. The air outside, — it's something wonderful, eh, Mrs. Binder?
I just came through the public gardens; the lilacs are in bloom, simply gorgeous. I broke the law a little, too.
(Gives the branch to Christine.)

Christine. Thank you, father.

Catherine. Thank your lucky stars that the guard didn't catch you.

Vyring. Just go out there once, Mrs.

Binder. It smells just as good as if I hadn't plucked the little twig.

Catherine. But if everybody thought the same —

Vyring. Well, that would be a mistake, to be sure.

Christine. Good-bye, father.

Vyring. If you could wait a few minutes, you might go to the theatre with me.

Christine. I... I promised Toni that I would go for her....

Vyring. Oh, yes. Well, that's wiser, too. Youth belongs with youth. Good-bye,

Christine.

Christine. (Kisses him.) Good-bye, Mrs.

Binder. (Exit. Vyring's eyes follow her tenderly.)

Catherine. That's a very close friendship with her and Miss Toni.

Vyring. Yes — I'm really glad that she has such company and doesn't have to sit at home all the time. What sort of a life does that girl have, anyway?

Catherine. Yes, to be sure.

Vyring. I can't tell you, Mrs. Binder, how it hurts me sometimes when I come home from rehearsal and find her sitting there and sewing; and then we've scarcely got up from the table at noon when she sits down again and goes to copying notes.

Catherine. Yes, yes, the millionaires have an easier time of it, to be sure, than we do.
But how about her singing?

Vyring. It's not much. Her voice is big enough for a room, and her singing is good enough for her father — but you can't live on that.

Catherine. That's too bad.

Vyring. I am glad she sees it herself.
She at least will be spared from disappointments. Of course I could get her into the chorus in our theatre.

Catherine. Of course, with such a figure!

Vyring. But there's no future there.

Catherine. A girl brings really a good many cares. When I think that in five or six years my little Lena will be a grown girl too —

Vyring. But why don't you sit down, Mrs. Binder?

Catherine. Oh, thanks; my husband is coming for me right away — I only came to invite Christine.

Vyring. Invite?...

Catherine. Yes, to hear the band in the Zoological Gardens. I thought that might cheer her up a bit. She really needs it.

Vyring. Couldn't do her a bit of harm, especially after this sad winter. Why doesn't she go with you?

Catherine. I don't know.... Perhaps because Binder's cousin is with us.

Vyring. Ah, that's possible. You know she can't stand him. She told me that herself.

Catherine. Well, why not? Franz is a very decent fellow — and now he's even got a steady job, and that's a piece of good fortune nowadays for a...

Vyring. For a... poor girl —

Catherine. For any girl.

Vyring. Now, tell me, Mrs. Binder, is a blooming young creature like that really made for nothing but for some such decent fellow who happens to have a steady job?

Catherine. Why, that's the best thing, after all. You can't wait for a count, and when one happens to come along, he usually takes his leave before he's married you.
(Vyring is at the window. Pause.) Well, and that's why I always say you can't be careful enough of a young girl, especially of the company she keeps.

Vyring. Well, I wonder if it's worth while to throw away all your young years like that. — And what good does all her goodness do a poor creature like that, even if, after years of waiting, the stockingmaker actually comes? —

Catherine. Mr. Vyring, if my husband is a stocking-maker, he is an honest and good man, that I've never had to complain of....

Vyring. (Soothingly.) Why, Mrs. Binder, do you think I'm aiming at you?...
You didn't fling your youth out of the window, either.

Catherine. I have forgotten all about that.

Vyring. Don't say that. — You can say what you like, memories are, after all, the best thing in your life.

Catherine. I haven't any memories.

Vyring. Now, now....

Catherine. And if a body does have such memories as you mean, what remains behind?... Regret.

Vyring. Well, and what remains behind — if she — doesn't even have anything to remember? If her whole life simply goes by (Simply and without emotion.), day after day, without happiness or love — I suppose you think that's better?

Catherine. But, Mr. Vyring, just think of the old lady, of your sister.... But it still pains you to have her spoken of, Mr. Vyring.

Vyring. It still pains me, yes.

Catherine. Of course... when two people have clung to each other so warmly... I always said that brothers like you aren't found every day.

Vyring. (Makes a gesture of deprecation.)

Catherine. Well, it's true. You had to be both father and mother to her, and such a young man.

Vyring. Yes, yes —

Catherine. And that must be a kind of consolation, too. Then you know that you have been the benefactor and the protector of a poor girl like that —

Vyring. Yes, I imagined that, too — when she was still a pretty young girl — and God knows how clever and noble I thought myself. But then, later on, when the gray hairs came and the wrinkles, and one day passed like all the others — and her whole youth — and the girl gradually (you scarcely notice such things) turned into the old maid — then for the first time I began to see what I had done.

Catherine. But Mr. Vyring —

Vyring. I still see her before me, as she often used to sit opposite me in the evening, sitting by the lamp here in the room, and used to look at me with her quiet smile, with a certain resigned expression, — as if she wanted to thank me for something; — and I — I could have gladly gone down on my knees to her, and begged her forgiveness that I had guarded her so well against all dangers — and all happiness! (Pause.)

Catherine. And many a girl would be happy just the same, if she always had such a brother by her side... and nothing to regret....

Toni. (Enters.) Good evening.... Why, it's all dark here, you can scarcely see a thing. — Ah, Mrs. Binder. Your husband is down-stairs waiting for you, Mrs. Binder... Isn't Christine at home?

Vyring. She went out a quarter of an hour ago.

Catherine. Didn't you meet her? She was going to meet you.

Toni. No... we evidently missed each other. — You're going to hear the band tonight, your husband says.

Catherine. Yes, he is so fond of it. What a charming little hat you have on, Miss

Toni. Isn't it a new one?

Toni. I should say not. — Don't you know this style any more? Last spring's style, only freshly trimmed.

Catherine. Did you trim it yourself?

Toni. Well, of course.

Vyring. So clever!

Catherine. Oh, yes — I keep forgetting that you worked for a year in a milliner shop.

Toni. I shall probably go back again.
Mother wants me to, and that settles it.

Catherine. How is your mother?

Toni. Well enough — she has a little toothache — but the doctor says it's rheumatic pains.

Vyring. Well, it's time for me...

Catherine. I'll go right down with you, Mr. Vyring.

Toni. I'll go, too. But take your overcoat, Mr. Vyring; it's going to be quite cool later on.

Vyring. You think so?

Catherine. Yes, indeed. — How can you be so foolish?

Christine. (Enters.)

Toni. Why, there she is.

Catherine. Back from your walk already?

Christine. Yes, Hello, Toni, — I have a headache. (Seats herself.)

Vyring. Headache?

Catherine. That's from the air.

Vyring. Come, what's the matter, Christine? — Please, Miss Toni, will you light the lamp?

Toni. (Sets about it.)

Christine. But I can do that myself.

Vyring. Let me see your face, Christine.

Christine. But, father, it is nothing; it's just the air outside.

Catherine. Lots of people can't stand the spring air.

Vyring. Miss Toni, you'll stay with Christine, won't you?

Toni. Of course I will.

Christine. But it isn't anything, father.

Toni. My mother doesn't make such a fuss over me, when I have a headache.

Vyring. (To Christine, still sitting.)
Are you so tired?

Christine. (Standing up.) I'll get right up again. (Smiling.)

Vyring. There — now you look quite different again. (To Catherine.) She looks quite different when she smiles, don't you think? Well, good-bye Christine. (Kisses her.) And see to it that your little head isn't aching when I come home. (He is at the door.)

Catherine. (Softly to Christine.) Have you quarreled?

Christine. (Makes an angry gesture.)

Vyring. (At the door.) Mrs. Binder!

Toni. Good-bye.
(Exeunt Vyring and Catherine.)

Toni. Do you know what your headache comes from? From the sweet wine yesterday. I'm surprised that I don't feel the effects of it. But it was jolly, wasn't it?

Christine. (Nods.)

Toni. They're swell people, aren't they? — both of them, you can't say anything different, can you? — And such nice rooms as Fritz has, really splendid. At Dore's place.. (Interrupts herself.) Oh, well. — Say have you still got such a headache? Why don't you talk?... What's the matter with you?

Christine. Only think, — he didn't come.

Toni. Left you in the lurch, did he? Serves you right.

Christine. Why, what do you mean? What have I done?

Toni. You spoil him, that's all; you're too nice to him. A man just can't help getting tyrannical.

Christine. You don't know what you're talking about.

Toni. I do know quite well. — I've been angry with you this long time. He comes late to his appointments; he doesn't take you home; he goes into a theatre-box with strangers; he leaves you in the lurch — and you take it all calmly and make sheep's eyes (imitating) at him into the bargain.

Christine. Oh, don't talk so,, don't make yourself out worse than you are. You love Theodore too.

Toni. Love him — di course I love him.
But he won't find me grieving about him, and no man will, not any more. There isn't one of these men that is worth it.

Christine. I never heard you talk so, never!

Toni. No. Tina — we never talked like this before. I never dared, you see. You don't know how afraid of you I was!...But I always thought this: when you once get it, you'll get it bad. And the first time it certainly does give you a shaking up. — But you can be thankful that you've got such a good friend to help you through your first love affair.

Christine. Toni!

Toni. Don't you believe me when I say I'm a good friend to you? If I wasn't here to tell you that he's just a man like the rest, and that the whole manpack isn't worth a single bad hour, God knows what thoughts might come into your head. But I always will say, you never can believe a word men say.

Christine. What do you mean by saying men, men — what do I care about men! —
I'm not asking about the others. — As long as I live I shall never think about another man.

Toni. Well, what are you thinking of?... has he?... Of course — such things have happened; but then you ought to have gone at the affair differently.

Christine. Do keep still!

Toni. Well, what do you want? I can't help it if it's so. — You have to think about a thing like that. You simply have to wait till somebody comes that you can see is in earnest from his face....

Christine. Toni, I can't stand such words to-day; they hurt me.

Toni. (Good-humouredly.) — Oh, now, come ——

Christine. Leave me alone... don't be angry... leave me alone!

Toni. Why should I be angry? I'll go. I didn't want to hurt you, Christine, truly not. (Turns to go.) Ah, Mr. Fritz.

Fritz. (Has entered.) Good evening.

Christine. (With a joyous cry.) Fritz! Fritz! (Rushes into his arms.)

Toni. (Steals out, her face saying: I'm not needed here.)

Fritz. (Freeing himself.). But —

Christine. They all say you will forsake me! But you won't, will you — not yet — not just yet?

Fritz. Who says it? What ails you?
(Patting her.) But, sweetheart,.. I really thought you would be startled when I suddenly came walking in here.

Christine. Oh — so long as I have you!

Fritz. Come, calm yourself — did you wait long for me?

Christine. Why didn't you come?

Fritz. I was detained and that made me late. Just now I was in the gardens and didn't find you — and was going home again.
Suddenly I had such a longing, such a longing for your dear little face...

Christine. (Happily.) Oh, truly?

Fritz. And then, too, I had such an indescribable desire to see where you live — yes, really — I just had to see it once. And so I couldn't stand it and came up here... and so you really don't mind?

Christine. Oh, the idea!

Fritz. Nobody saw me; and I knew your father was in the theatre.

Christine. What do I care about people!

Fritz. So this is — (Looks around the room.) — this is your room? Very pretty.
Christine, You can't see anything. (Is about to take the shade off the lamp.)

Fritz. No, don't do that, the light blinds me, it's better this way. So that's the window you've told me about, where you always sit and work, eh? — And the pretty view! (Smiling.) But just look at all the roofs you see. — And over there — what's that black thing I see over yonder?

Christine. That's Bald Mountain.

Fritz. Sure enough. You really have a better view than I.

Christine. Oh!

Fritz. I'd like to live up so high, and be able to overlook all the roofs; I think that is very nice. And I suppose the alley is quiet?

Christine. Oh, in the daytime there's noise enough.

Fritz. Do any teams go past?

Christine. Not often, but there's a locksmith in the house opposite.

Fritz. Oh, that's very unpleasant. (He has sat down.)

Christine. You get used to it; you don't hear it any more.

Fritz. (Rises again hastily.) Is this really my first visit? Everything seems so familiar to me.... I have imagined everything just this way. (He starts to look around the room.)

Christine. No, you mustn't look at anything.

Fritz. What are those pictures?

Christine. Oh, stop!

Fritz. Ah, I want to look at them. (He takes the lamp and lights the pictures.)

Christine. "Parting and Return."

Fritz. Sure enough— "Parting and Return."

Christine. I know well enough that the pictures aren't pretty. — There is a much better one in father's room.

Fritz. What picture is it?

Christine. It is a girl looking out of the window, and outside it's winter, you know — and it's name is "Forsaken."

Fritz. Oh. — (Puts down the lamp.) Ah, and that's your library. (Sits down beside the little book-rack.)

Christine. You'd better not look at them.

Fritz. Why not? Ah! Schiller...
Hauff... Pocket Encyclopaedia... Goodness gracious!

Christine. It only goes to G.

Fritz. (Smiling.) Oh.... A book for old and young....You look at the pictures in it, I suppose?

Christine. Of course I've looked at the pictures.

Fritz. (Still seated.) Who is the gentleman there on the stove?

Christine. Why, don't you know? That's Schubert.

Fritz. (Rising.) Sure enough.

Christine. Because father likes him so much. Father used to compose songs himself, very beautiful ones.

Fritz. And now he doesn't?

Christine. Not any more. (Pause.)

Fritz. (Sits down.) How cosy it is here.

Christine. Do you really like it?

Fritz. Very much.... What is that?
(Takes up a vase of artificial flowers standing on the table.)

Christine. He's found something else!

Fritz. No, child, that doesn't belong in here.... It looks so dusty.

Christine. But they certainly aren't dusty.

Fritz. Artificial flowers always look dusty.... Real flowers ought to be in your room, flowers that are fresh and sweet-smelling. From now I shall... (Breaks off, turns to conceal his emotion.)

Christine. What? What were you going to say?

Fritz. Nothing, nothing.

Christine. (Rises. Tenderly.) What was it?

Fritz. I was going to say that I would send you fresh flowers to-morrow.

Christine. Well, and did you want to take it back so soon? — Of course! To-morrow you won't be thinking of me any more.

Fritz. (Deprecatory gesture.)

Christine. Certainly, it's out of sight, out of mind, with you.

Fritz. What are you saying?

Christine. Oh, yes, I know. I can tell.

Fritz. How can you imagine such a thing?

Christine. You are to blame yourself. Because you're always keeping secrets from me.... Because you never tell me about yourself. — What do you do all day?

Fritz. Why, sweetheart, that's very simple. I go to lectures — sometimes — then I go into the coffeehouse... then I read... or sometimes I play the piano — then I chat with somebody — then I go calling... but all that is of no account. It's tiresome to talk about it. — But now I must go, child.

Christine. So soon ——

Fritz. Your father will soon be here.

Christine. Not for a long time yet, Fritz, — Stay awhile — just a minute — stay awhile.

Fritz. And then I have... Theodore is expecting me.... I have something to talk over with him.

Christine. To-day?

Fritz. Surely to-day.

Christine. You can see him to-morrow, too.

Fritz. Perhaps I shan't be in Vienna tomorrow.

Christine. Not in Vienna?

Fritz. (Noticing her alarm, calmly, cheerfully.) Well, that wouldn't be anything wonderful, would it? I'm going away for a day — or perhaps for two, you child, you.

Christine. Where to?

Fritz. Where?... Oh, anywhere. — Good heavens, don't make up such a face....
I'm going out to my father's estate.... Well, is that so terrible to you?

Christine. And you never tell me about him, either.

Fritz. No; what a child you are....You don't understand how nice it is to be all alone together. Tell me, don't you feel that?

Christine. No, it isn't nice at all that you never tell me anything about yourself... You see, I'm interested in everything that touches you,.. yes, everything. —
I'd like to have more of you than just the one hour in the evening that we can spend together sometimes. Then you are gone again, and I don't know anything.... Then the whole night goes and a whole day, with so many hours in it — and still I don't know anything. And that often makes me so sad.

Fritz. Why does that make you sad?

Christine. Why, because I have such a longing for you as if you weren't in the same city at all, as if you were somewhere else. You simply disappear, as far as I am concerned, so far away...

Fritz. (Somewhat impatient.) But ——

Christine. Well, it's true!

Fritz. Come here to me. (She does so.) After all, the only thing you know is that I — that you love me at this moment....(She wishes to speak.) Don't talk about eternity. (More to himself.) Perhaps there are moments that scatter around them the aroma of eternity. — That is the only one that we can understand, the only one that belongs to us. (He kisses her. Pause. He rises. With a sudden outburst.) Oh, how beautiful it is here, how beautiful! (He stands at the window.) So far from the world you are in here, among all the many houses.... I seem to be so alone here, just with you.... (Softly.) So sheltered.

Christine. If you always talked like that... I could almost believe...

Fritz. Believe what, child?

Christine. That you loved me as I dreamed it — the day you kissed me the first time,.. do you remember?

Fritz. (Passionately.) I do love you! —
(He embraces her; tears himself from her.)
But now let me go.

Christine. Are you sorry you said it, so soon again? You are free, you know you are free — you can go and leave me whenever you like... you haven't promised me anything — and I haven't demanded anything of you.... It doesn't matter what becomes of me, then: I've been happy for once, and that's all I ask of life. I only want you to know that and to believe that I never — loved any man before you, and that I never shall love any man — when you get tired of me —

Fritz. (More to himself.) Don't say it, don't say it — it sounds — so sweet.
(There is a knock.)

Fritz. (Starts.) That's probably Theodore.

Christine. (Startled.) He knows that you are here?

Theodore. (Enters.) Good evening. — Impudent of me, eh?

Christine. Do you have such important matters to discuss with him?

Theodore. I certainly have; and have been looking everywhere for him.

Fritz. (In a low voice.) Why didn't you wait below?

Christine. What are you whispering to him?

Theodore. (Wishing her to hear.) Why I didn't wait below.... Well, if I had absolutely known that you were here....But I couldn't risk walking up and down outside for two hours.

Fritz. (Pointedly.) Then... you will go with me to-morrow?

Theodore. (Comprehending.) Surely.

Fritz. That's right.

Theodore. But I've been hurrying so that I must beg permission to sit down for a few seconds.

Christine. Please do. (Busies herself at the window.)

Fritz. (Softly.) Anything new? — Did you find out about her?

Theodore. No. I merely came to get you because you are so incautious. What's the use of these unnecessary excitements? You ought to try to sleep.... It's rest you need.... (Christine is near them again.)

Fritz. Tell me, isn't this a dear little room?

Theodore. Yes, it is very nice. (To Christine.) Do you stay here at home all day long? — Really, it is very homelike here.
A little high up for my taste.

Fritz. That's just what I like about it.

Theodore. But now I'm going to take Fritz away from you; we've got to get up early in the morning.

Christine. Then you are really going away?

Theodore. He will come again, Miss Christine.

Christine. Will you write to me?

Theodore. But if he comes back tomorrow —

Christine. Oh, I know he's going to stay longer than that.

Fritz. (Starts.)

Theodore. (Notices it.) Well, does he have to write immediately? I wouldn't have thought you so sentimental.... Well... kiss each other good-bye, since it'll be so long.... (Breaks off.) I'm simply not here. (Fritz and Christine kiss.)

Theodore. (Takes out a cigarette-case and puts a cigarette in his mouth; seeks vainly for a match.) Tell me, dear Christine, haven't you a match?

Christine. Oh, yes, there are some.

(Points to a holder on the chest of drawers.)

Theodore. It's empty.

Christine. I'll get you one. (Hurries into adjoining room.)

Fritz. (Looking after her.) Oh, God, how such hours lie to us!

Theodore. Why, what hours?

Fritz. I'm almost ready to believe that my happiness is here, that this sweet girl — (Breaks off.) — but this hour is a tremendous liar....

Theodore. Absurd talk.... How you will laugh at it.

Fritz. I don’t think I shall have any time for that.

Christine. (Returns.) Here you are.

Theodore. Thanks very much.... Goodbye, then. — (To Fritz.) Well, what do you want now?

Fritz. (Looks back and forth around the room, as if to deepen the impression in his mind.) It’s hard to leave it.

Christine. Oh, make fun of it if you like.

Theodore. (Firmly.) Come. — Good-bye, Christine.

Fritz. Farewell.

Christine. Till we meet again. (Theodore and Fritz exeunt. She stands a moment, anxious, then goes to the open door, softly.) Fritz!

Fritz. (Comes back again and presses her to his heart.) Farewell.

ACT THREE

THE SAME SCENE as the second act. It is noon.

Christine. (Alone, sitting sewing by the window; lays down her work.)

Lena. (Enters.) Good day, Miss Christine.

Christine. (Very absent-mindedly.) Good day, child; what is it?

Lena. Mother sent me to see if I could get the theatre tickets.

Christine. Father hasn't got home yet, child; will you wait?

Lena. No, Miss Christine; then I'll come after lunch again.

Christine. Very well.

Lena. (Going, turns back.) And mother said to ask Miss Christine if her headache was gone yet.

Christine. Yes, child.

Lena. Good-bye, Miss Christine.

Christine. Good-bye.

Toni. (Enters just as Lena is going out.)

Lena. Good day, Miss Toni.

Toni. Hello, little monkey!

Lena. (Exit.)

Christine. (Rises to meet Toni.) Then they are back?

Toni. How should I know?

Christine. And you haven't any letter, nothing?

Toni. No.

Christine. You have no letter, either?

Toni. What should we write to each other?

Christine. They've been gone since day before yesterday.

Toni. Yes, yes, that's not such a long time. You needn't make such a fuss on that account. I don't understand you... and how you look, — your face is all tearstained. Your father will surely notice it when he comes home.

Christine. (Simply.) My father knows everything.

Toni. (Almost frightened.) What?

Christine. I told him.

Toni. That's another of your bright ideas.
But of course your face shows everything.
And does he know who it is?

Christine. Yes.

Toni. And did he scold?

Christine. (Shakes her head.)

Toni. What did he say, then?

Christine. Nothing.... He went away very quietly, as usual.

Tom. And still it was stupid of you to tell. You'll see.... Do you know why your father said nothing? Because he thinks Fritz will marry you.

Christine. Why do you speak of that?

Toni. Do you know what I think?

Christine. Well, what?

Toni. That this whole story of a journey is a lie.

Christine. What?

Toni. Perhaps they haven't gone away at all.

Christine. They have gone — I know they have. Yesterday evening I went past his house; the blinds were down; he isn't there.

Toni. Oh, I believe that. They're away all right. But they won't come back — at least not to us.

Christine. (Anxiously.) Oh ——.

Toni. Well, it's possible.

Christine. You say that so calmly.

Toni. Why yes — whether it happens today or tomorrow — or in six months — it comes to the same thing.

Christine. Oh, you don't know what you are saying.... You don't know Fritz....
He isn't like what you think. I found that out when he was here in my room the other day. Often he only pretends to be indifferent — but he does love me.... (As if she divined Toni's reply.) Yes, yes, not forever, I know that... but it can't stop all at once!

Toni. Well, I don't know Fritz so well.

Christine. He will come back, and Theodore will come back too; I am sure of it.

Toni. (Makes a gesture indicating indifference.)

Christine. Toni... do me a favor.

Toni. Don't be so excited — what is it you want?

Christine. Go to Theodore's, it's right near here.... Ask in the house whether he's got back yet, and if he isn't back, perhaps they'll know when he's coming.

Toni. I'm not going to run after a man.

Christine. He doesn't need to find it out. Perhaps you'll happen to meet him. It's almost one o'clock now — he'll be just going to lunch.

Toni. Why don't you go and ask at Fritz's house?

Christine. I'm afraid to — he doesn't like that.... And he is certainly not back yet.
But perhaps Theodore is back by now and knows when Fritz is coming. Oh, please Toni!

Toni. You're so childish sometimes.

Christine. Do it for me! Go and ask! It won't do any harm.

Toni. Well, if it means so much to you I'll go. But it won't do much good. I'm sure they aren't back yet.

Christine. And you'll come right back, won't you?

Toni. Yes, yes; mother can wait lunch a little.

Christine. I thank you, Toni, you're so good.

Toni. Of course I'm good — but now you be sensible, won't you?... Well, so long.

Christine. Oh, thank you!

Toni. (Exit.)

Christine. (Arranges the room, folds up her sewing, etc. Then she goes to window and looks out. After a moment VYRING enters without her seeing him at first. He is in great excitement, looks anxiously at his daughter.)

Vyring. She knows nothing yet, nothing.
(He remains standing in the doorway and does not venture to take a step into the room.)

Christine. (Turns, sees him, starts.)

Vyring. (Tries to smile. He steps in.) Well, Christine.... (As if calling her to him.)

Christine. (Goes to him, as if to fall before him.)

Vyring. (Prevents her.) Well... what are you thinking of, Christine? We...(With a new resolve.) We'll just forget it, shall we?

Christine. (Raises her head.)

Vyring. Why yes... I — and you!

Christine. Father, didn't you understand me this morning?

Vyring. Well, what would you have, Christine?... I surely must tell you what I think about it, don't you think so? Well, then...

Christine. Father, what does this mean?

Vyring. Come here, my child.... Listen to me quietly. You know I listened quietly to you, when you told me. We must —— — 'Christine. Oh, I beg you, don't speak to me so, father. If you have thought it over, and find that you can't forgive me, then drive me away — but don't speak that way.

Vyring. Just listen quietly to me, Christine. You can still do whatever you will.
.. See, Christine, you are so young.
Haven't you ever thought... (With great hesitation.) that the whole thing might be a mistake?

Christine. Why do you say that to me, father? I know so well what I have done — and I don't ask anything — not from you and not from anybody in the world, if it has been a mistake.... I just told you, drive me away, but...

Vyring. (Interrupting.) How can you talk so.... Even if it was a mistake, is that any reason for getting desperate right away, such a young creature as you are? Just think how beautiful, how wonderful life is. Just think how many things there are to give you joy, how much youth and how much happiness still lies before you.... See, I don't have much of the world any more, and even for me life is still beautiful — and I can still look forward to so many things. How we shall be together — how we shall plan our life, you and I — how you will begin to sing again, now that the beautiful days are here — and how we'll take a whole day off, when summer comes, and go out into the green country — Oh, there are so many lovely things... so many. It is silly to give up everything, because one must give up his first happiness, or anything that he thought was that.

Christine. Why... (Anxiously.) then must I give it up?

Vyring. Well, was it happiness? Do you really think, Christine, that you had to tell your father today? I have known it for a long time — and I knew too that you would tell me. No, it never was happiness for you.... Don't I know those eyes? There wouldn't have been tears in them so often, and those cheeks wouldn't have been pale so much, if you had loved a man who was worthy of it.

Christine. Why, how can you... what do you know... what have you heard?

Vyring. Nothing, nothing at all.... But you yourself told me what he is.... A young fellow like that — what does he know?
Has he the faintest idea of what falls into his hands — does he know the difference between the true and the false — and all your mad love — did he ever understand that?

Christine. (More and more alarmed.) You and he.... Were you at his house?

Vyring. Why, what are you thinking of!
He went away, didn't he? But Christine, I still have a head on my shoulders, and my eyes in my head. Come, child, forget about it, do! Your future lies in an altogether different place. You can, you will still be as happy as you deserve. You will find a man some time who will know what a treasure he has in you.

Christine. (Has hurried to the chest of drawers to get her hat.)

Vyring. What are you doing?

Christine. I'm going out.

Vyring. Where to?

Christine. To him... to him.

Vyring. What are you thinking of?

Christine. You're keeping something from me — let me go.

Vyring. (Holding her firmly.) Come to your senses, child. He isn't there at all.
Perhaps he's gone away for a very long time.... Stay here; what do you want there?... Tomorrow or this evening I'll go there with you. You can't go out on the street like that... do you know how you look?

Christine. You will go with me?

Vyring. I promise you I will. Only stay here now; sit down and come to your senses again. It's enough to make a man laugh, almost, to look at you.... and all for nothing. Can't you stand it here with your father at all any more?

Christine. What is it you know?

Vyring. (More and more helpless.) What should I know?... I know that I love you, that you are my only child, that you must stay with me all the time —

Christine. Enough — let me go. (She wrests herself from him and opens the door; Toni appears in it.)

Toni. (Utters a little cry, as Christine) rushes toward her.) Why do you frighten me so?

Christine. (Steps back, seeing Theodore behind Toni.)

Theodore. (Remains in the doorway; he is dressed in black.)

Christine. What... what is... (No answer. She looks Theodore in the face; he cannot meet her eyes.) Where is he, where is he?... (In the greatest terror.
No answer; all faces are embarrassed and sad.) Where is he? (To Theodore.) Speak, can't you?

Theodore. (Tries to speak.)

Christine. (Looks at him wide-eyed, looks around her, comprehends the look on their faces, her face shows the dawn of this understanding, she utters a terrible cry.) Theodore... he is...

Theodore. (Nods.)

Christine. (Seizes her forehead, cannot understand it; she goes to Theodore, takes him by the arm, as if demented.) He is... dead? (As if asking herself.)

Vyring. My child ——

Christine. (Thrusting him away.) Speak, Theodore, speak!

Theodore. You know all.

Christine. I know nothing.... I don't know what has happened... do you think... I can't hear everything now?... how did it happen... Father... Theodore.. (To Toni.) You know it too.

Theodore. An unfortunate accident.

Christine. What, what?

Theodore. He fell.

Christine. What does that mean: he...

Theodore. He fell in a duel.

Christine. (Shrieks. She is about to fall, Wring sustains her, motions to Theodore to go. She notes it and seizes him.) Stay here.... I must know all. Do you think you can keep anything from me now?

Theodore. What else do you want to know?

Christine. Why — why did he fight a duel?

Theodore. I don't know the reason.

Christine. With whom, with whom?...You surely know who killed him?... Well, well, who...

Theodore. Nobody you know.

Christine. Who, who?

Toni. Christine!

Christine. Who? You tell me! (To Toni.)... Father, you tell me... (No answer. She starts to go out. Vyring holds her back.) Can't I know who killed him, and for what cause?

Theodore. It was... a trivial cause...

Christine. You're not telling the truth... why, why...

Theodore. Dear Christine....

Christine. (As if about to interrupt, goes up to him; looks at him in silence, then suddenly shrieks.) On account of a woman?

Theodore. No ——

Christine. Yes — for a woman... (Turning to Toni.) for that woman — for that woman that he loved. And her husband — yes, yes, her husband killed him... And I... what am I? What was I to him?... Theodore... haven't you anything for me at all... didn't he write down anything?... Didn't he tell you anything for me? Didn't you find anything... a letter... a note...

Theodore. (Shakes his head.)

Christine. And that evening... when he was here, when you came to get him... he knew it, he knew then that he perhaps would never... And he went away from here to be killed for another woman. No, no, it is not possible... didn't he know what he was to me... didn't...

Theodore. He did know. On the last morning, when we drove out together... he spoke of you too.

Christine. He spoke of me too! Of me too! And of what else? Of how many other people, of how many other things, that meant just as much to him as I did? Of me too! Oh, God!... And of his father and his mother and his room and of the springtime and of the city and of everything, everything that belonged to his life and that he had to give up just as much as he gave up me — of everything he talked to you... and of me too...

Theodore. (Moved.) He surely loved you.

Christine. Love? He? I was nothing to him but a pastime — and he died for another woman! And I — I worshiped him! Didn't he know that?... That I gave him everything I could give, that I would have died for him — that he was my God and my bliss of Heaven — didn't he see that at all? He could go away from me with a smile, out of my room, and be shot down for another woman.... Father, father, can you understand that?

Vyring. (Goes to her.) Christine!

Theodore. (To Toni.) Child, you might have spared me this.

Toni. (Looks at him venomously.)

Theodore. I have had enough distress... these last days...

Christine. (With sudden resolve.) Theodore, take me to him — I want to see him — once more I want to see him — his face — Theodore, take me to him.

Theodore. (With a gesture, hesitatingly.) No....

Christine. Why "no"? You can't refuse me that! Surely I can see him once more?

Theodore. It is too late.

Christine. Too late? To see his corpse... is it too late? Yes... yes... (She does not understand.)

Theodore. He was buried this morning.

Christine. (With the greatest horror.)
Buried... And I didn't know about it?
They shot him... and put him in his coffin and carried him out and buried him down in the earth — and I couldn't even see him once more? He's been dead two days — and you didn't come and tell me?

Theodore. (Much moved.) In these two days I have... You cannot dream all that I... Consider that it was my duty to notify his parents — I had to think of many things — and then my own state of mind.

Christine. Your...

Theodore. And then the... it was done very quietly.... Only the closest relatives and friends...

Christine. The closest —? And I ——?... What am I?

Toni. They would have asked that.

Christine. What am I? Less than all the rest —? Less than his relatives, less than — you?

Vyring. My child, my child. Come to me, to me.... (He embraces her. To Theodore.) Go... leave me alone with her.

Theodore. I am very... (With tears in his voice.) I never suspected...

Christine. Never suspected what? That I loved him? (Vyring draws her to him; Theodore looks down; Toni stands near Christine. Freeing herself.) Take me to his grave!

Vyring. No, no —

Toni. Don’t go, Christine.

Theodore. Christine... later... tomorrow... when you are calmer ——

Christine. Tomorrow? When I shall be calmer? And in a month completely consoled, eh? And in six months I can laugh again, can I? (Laughing shrilly.) And then when will the next lover come?

Vyring. Christine...

Christine. Stay here, then... I can find the way alone...
Vyring and Toni. (Together.) Don’t go.

Christine. It’s even better... if I... let me go, let go.

Vyring. Christine, stay here.

Toni. Don’t go! Perhaps you’ll find the other one there — praying.

Christine. (To herself, her eyes fixed.) I won’t pray there... no... (She rushes out; the others speechless for the moment.)

Vyring. Hurry after her.
(Theodore and Toni exeunt.)

Vyring. I can’t, I can’t... (He goes painfully from the door to the window.)
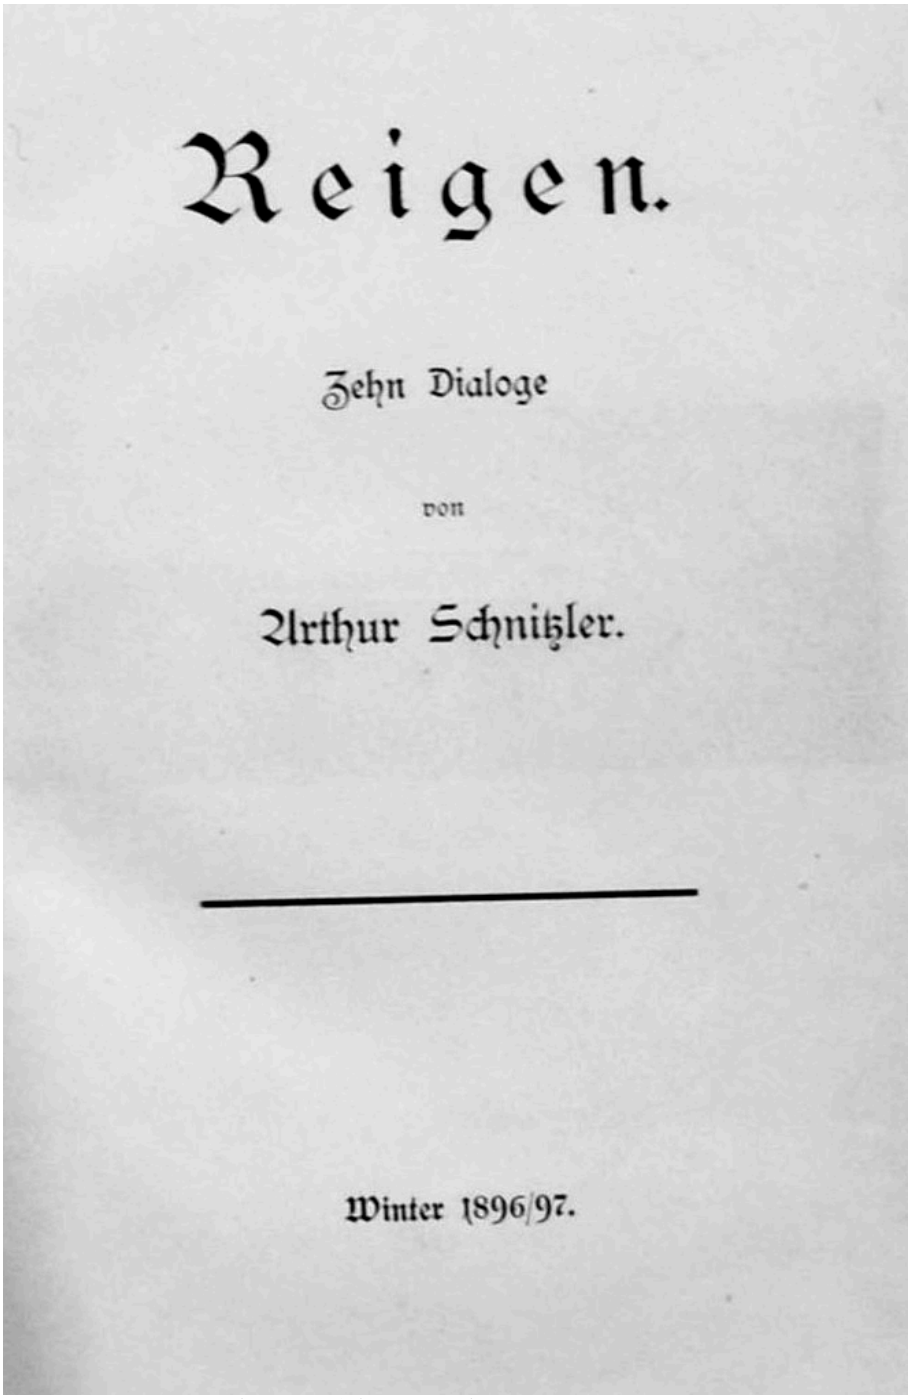
What does she want... what does she want... (He looks through the window.)
She won’t come back — she won’t come back!

(He sinks to the floor, sobbing loudly.)

THE END

Hands Around (1897)



A CYCLE OF TEN DIALOGUES

Original German Title: 'Reigen'

Translated by L. D. Edwards and F. L. Glaser, 1920

Schnitzler's works were often controversial, both for their frank description of sexuality and for their strong stand against anti-Semitism. In a letter to Schnitzler Sigmund Freud confessed, "I have gained the impression that you have learned through intuition — although actually as a result of sensitive introspection — everything that I have had to unearth by laborious work on other persons." Schnitzler was branded as a pornographer after the release of the following drama, Reigen, in which ten pairs of characters are portrayed before and after the sexual act, leading and ending with a prostitute. Initially printed privately in 1900 in a limited edition, it was freely published in 1903 by Fritz Freund's publishing house in Vienna. The furor after the presentation of this play was couched in the strongest anti-Semitic terms. Reigen was made into a French language film in 1950 by the German-born director Max Ophüls as La Ronde. The film achieved considerable success in the English-speaking world, with the result that Schnitzler's play is better known there under its French title.

Reigen scrutinises the sexual morality and class ideology of its day through successive encounters between pairs of characters before or after a sexual encounter. By choosing characters across all levels of society, the drama offers social commentary on how sexual contact transgresses class boundaries. The play was not publicly performed until 23 December 1920 in Berlin and 1 February 1921 in Vienna. It elicited violent critical and popular reactions. Schnitzler suffered moralistic and personal attacks as a Jewish pornographer and the outcry came to be known as the "Reigen scandal." Despite a 1921 Berlin court verdict that dismissed the charges of immorality, Schnitzler withdrew the play himself from public production in German-speaking countries.

Title page of the original 1900 private printing

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION
CHARACTERS
THE GIRL OF THE STREETS AND THE SOLDIER
THE SOLDIER AND THE PARLOR-MAID
THE PARLOR MAID AND THE YOUNG MAN
THE YOUNG MAN AND THE YOUNG WIFE
THE YOUNG WIFE AND THE HUSBAND
THE HUSBAND AND THE SWEET YOUNG MISS
THE SWEET YOUNG MISS AND THE POET
THE POET AND THE ACTRESS
THE ACTRESS AND THE COUNT
THE COUNT AND THE GIRL OF THE STREETS

INTRODUCTION

HUMANITY SEEMS GAYEST when dancing on the brink of a volcano. The culture of a period preceding a social cataclysm is marked by a spirit of light wit and sophisticated elegance which finds expression in a literature of a distinct type. This literature is light-hearted, audacious and self-conscious. It can treat with the most charming insouciance subjects which in another age would have been awkward or even vulgar. But with the riper experience of a period approaching its end the writers feel untrammeled in the choice of theme by pride or prejudice knowing that they will never transgress the line of good taste.

So it was in the declining days of the Roman civilization when Lucian of Samosata wrote his Dialogues of the Hetærai and countless poets penned their intricate epigrams on the art and experience of love. So it was in England when the fine vigor of the Elizabethan and Miltonic age gave way to the Restoration and the calculating brilliance of a Congreve or a Wycherly.

But the exquisite handling of the licentious was elaborated into a perfect technique in eighteenth century France. The spirit of the Rococo with its predilection for the well-measured pose was singularly well adapted to the artistic expression of what in a cruder age could only have been voiced with coarseness and vulgarity. In the literature of this period we meet again the spirit that animates the gracious paintings of Watteau and Fragonard. The scenes we admire in their panels recur in literary style in works like Choderlos de Laclos' Liaisons dangereuses and Louvet de Couvray's Les amours du Chevalier de Faublas. Again the same note is heard in Beaumarchais' Le Mariage de Figaro, in which the society of the period is travestied with brilliant wit and worldly philosophy. The court of Louis XVI. quite unaware, looked on and applauded a play which Napoleon later characterized as "the revolution already in action."

During the closing years of the nineteenth century a similar spirit has hovered over Vienna, when it was the last and staunchest stronghold of aristocracy in the modern world. Its literature reflected the charm of a fastidious amatory etiquette which is forbidden in sterner and soberer environment, while it gayly ignored the slow gathering of the clouds which foreshadowed its own catastrophe and martyrdom. As Percival Pollard once so well put it: "All that rises out of that air has had fascination, grace, insinuation, and intrigue. Neither tremendous passion nor tremendous problems have stirred, to all appearances, these polite artists of Vienna. Passion might be there, but what was to be artistically expressed was, rather, the witty or ironically mournful surfaces of passion."

The literary master of this world is concededly Arthur Schnitzler, in whom are curiously combined the sophisticated elegance of the Viennese man of letters and the disenchanting wisdom of the practising physician. He was born in Vienna in 1862, the son of a doctor. He studied medicine himself, took his degree in 1885, and was for two years connected with a hospital. Since then he has practised privately, and has also found the time to write a long series of plays, both in prose and verse, several novels, and many shorter stories. Of these a considerable number have appeared in English.

Reigen, here translated as Hands Around, is a series of ten comedies — miniatures in dialogue between man and woman in various ages and walks of life. But transgressing the merely literary they are psychological studies of the interplay of sex, and keen analyses of the sophisticated modern soul, done with freedom and finesse. There are no grim questions of right and wrong in these subtle revelations of the merely human. In fact one might call them studies in the etiquette of the liaison and all its nuances.

The cycle begins with a girl of the streets and a soldier. Then come the soldier and a parlor-maid, the parlor-maid and a young man, the young man and a young wife, the young wife and her husband, the husband and a sweet young miss, the sweet young miss and a poet, the poet and an actress, the actress and a count, until finally the cycle is completed with the count and the girl of the streets. A vicious circle, some may say, and such it surely would have been in the hands of a lesser artist than Schnitzler, for he would only have made the book hideously fleshly, instead of a marvelous psychological study in the ecstacies and disillusions of love and the whole tragedy of human wishes unsatisfied even in their apparent gratification.

But as it is the silken portières of discreet alcoves are opened quietly before our eyes, and we hear the whisper of the most intimate secrets. But with all their realism there is no word in these dialogues which could antagonize the susceptibilities of any sincere student or true lover of humanity. All stratagems of sex are uncovered not through the curious observations of a faunic mind, but through the finer eyes of a connoisseur of things human.

The Puritan fanatic with his jaundiced inhibitions or the moral ideologist with his heart of leather may toss the book aside resentful because of its inherent truth. The philosopher of human life, taking the larger aspect of this drama, will close it with the serene smile of understanding.

Any attempt to turn a dialogue so full of delicate shades as is this of Schnitzler into a language like English, whose genius tends rather toward a graphic concreteness and realism, is full of pitfalls and difficulties. The translators, however, hope that they have accomplished their task with reasonable success, thinking always of the spirit rather than the letter. They also take this occasion to express their appreciation to Dr. Arthur Schnitzler for his kindness in granting them his authorization for this translation of Reigen.

F. L. G.
L. D. E.

New York

1920

CHARACTERS

THE GIRL OF the Streets,

The Soldier,

The Parlor Maid,

The Young Man,

The Young Wife,

The Husband,

The Sweet Young Miss,

The Poet,

The Actress,

The Count.

THE GIRL OF THE STREETS AND THE SOLDIER

LATE IN THE evening near the Augarten Bridge.

SOLDIER
(Enters whistling, on his way home)

GIRL
Hello, my beautiful angel!

SOLDIER
(Turns and continues on his way)

GIRL
Don't you want to come with me?

SOLDIER
Oh, I am the beautiful angel?

GIRL
Sure, who else? Do come with me. I live very near here.

SOLDIER
I've no time. I must get back to the barracks.

GIRL
You'll get to your barracks in plenty of time. It's much nicer with me.

SOLDIER
(Close to her) That's possible.

GIRL
Ps-st! A guard may pass any minute.

SOLDIER
Rot! A guard! I carry a saber too!

GIRL
Ah, come with me.

SOLDIER
Let me alone. I have no money anyway.

GIRL
I don't want any money.

SOLDIER

(Stopping. They are under a street-lamp) You don't want any money? What kind of a girl are you, then?

GIRL

The civilians pay me. Chaps like you don't have to pay me for anything.

SOLDIER

Maybe you're the girl my pal told me about.

GIRL

I don't know any pal of yours.

SOLDIER

You're she, all right! You know — in the café down the street — He went home with you from there.

GIRL

Lots have gone home with me from that café… Oh, lots!

SOLDIER

All right. Let's go!

GIRL

So, you're in a hurry now?

SOLDIER

Well, what are we waiting for? Anyhow, I must be back at the barracks by ten.

GIRL

Been in service long?

SOLDIER

What business is that of yours? Is it far?

GIRL

Ten minutes' walk.

SOLDIER

That's too far for me. Give me a kiss.

GIRL

(Kissing him) I like that best anyway — when I love some one.

SOLDIER

I don't. No, I can't go with you. It's too far.

GIRL

Say, come to-morrow afternoon.

SOLDIER
Sure. Give me your address.

GIRL
But maybe you won't come.

SOLDIER
If I promise!

GIRL
Look here — if my place is too far to-night — there … there…
(She points toward the Danube)

SOLDIER
What's there?

GIRL
It's nice and quiet there, too … no one is around.

SOLDIER
Oh, that's not the real thing.

GIRL
It's always the real thing with me. Come, stay with me now. Who knows, if we'll be alive to-morrow.

SOLDIER
Come along then — but quick.

GIRL
Be careful! It's dark here. If you slip, you'll fall in the river.

SOLDIER
Would be the best thing, perhaps.

GIRL
Sh-h. Wait a minute. We'll come to a bench soon.

SOLDIER
You seem to know this place pretty well.

GIRL
I'd like to have you for a sweetheart.

SOLDIER
I'd fight too much.

GIRL
I'd cure you of that soon enough.

SOLDIER
Humph —

GIRL
Don’t make so much noise. Sometimes a guard stumbles down here. Would you believe we are in the middle of Vienna?

SOLDIER
Come here. Come over here.

GIRL
You are crazy! If we slipped here, we’d fall into the river.

SOLDIER
(Has grabbed her) Oh you —

GIRL
Hold tight to me.

SOLDIER
Don’t be afraid…

GIRL
It would have been nicer on the bench.

SOLDIER
Here or there, it doesn’t matter to me… Well, pick yourself up.

GIRL
What’s your hurry —?

SOLDIER

I must get to the barracks. I’ll be late anyhow.

GIRL
Say, what’s your name?

SOLDIER
What’s that to you?

GIRL
My name is Leocadia.

SOLDIER
Humph! I never heard such a name before.

GIRL

Listen!

SOLDIER
Well, what do you want?

GIRL
Give me just a dime for the janitor.

SOLDIER
Humph!… Do you think I'm your meal-ticket? Good-by, Leocadia…

GIRL
Tightwad! Pimp!
(He disappears)

THE SOLDIER AND THE PARLOR-MAID

PRATER GARDENS. SUNDAY Evening. A road which leads from the Wurstelprater into dark tree arcades. Confused music from the Wurstelprater can still be heard; also strains from the cheap dancehall, a vulgar polka, played by a brass band. THE SOLDIER. THE PARLOR-MAID.

MAID
Now tell me why you wanted to leave.

SOLDIER
(Grins sheepishly)

MAID
It was so beautiful and I so love to dance.

SOLDIER
(Puts his arm around her waist)

MAID
(Submitting) But we aren't dancing now. Why do you hold me so tight?

SOLDIER
What's your name? Katy?

MAID
You've always got a "Katy" on your mind.

SOLDIER

I know — I know … Marie.

MAID
Goodness, it's dark here. I'm afraid.

SOLDIER
You needn't be afraid when I'm with you. I can take care of myself!

MAID
But where are we going? There's no one around. Come, let's go back!… It's so dark!

SOLDIER
(Pulling at his cigar until it glows brightly) There … it's already getting brighter. Ha —! Oh, you dearie!

MAID
Oh! what are you doing there? If I had known this before!

SOLDIER
The devil take me, if any one at the dance to-day felt softer and rounder than you, Miss Marie.

MAID
Did you find it out in the same way with all the others?

SOLDIER
You notice things … dancing. You find out lots that way!

MAID
But you danced much oftener with that cross-eyed blonde than with me.

SOLDIER
She’s an old friend of one of my pals.

MAID
Of the corporal with the upturned mustache?

SOLDIER
Oh no, I mean the civilian. You know, the one who was talking with me at the table in the beginning. The one who has such a husky voice.

MAID
Oh I know. He’s fresh.

SOLDIER
Did he do anything to you? I’ll show him! What did he do to you?

MAID
Oh nothing… I only noticed how he was with the others.

SOLDIER
Tell me, Miss Marie…

MAID
You’ll burn me with your cigar.

SOLDIER
Pardon me! — Miss Marie — or may I say Marie?

MAID
We’re not such good friends yet…

SOLDIER
There’re many who don’t like each-other, and yet use first names.

MAID
Next time, if we… But, Frank!

SOLDIER
Oh, you remember my name?

MAID
But, Frank…

SOLDIER
That's right, call me Frank, Miss Marie.

MAID
Don't be so fresh — but, sh-h, suppose some one should come!

SOLDIER
What if some one did come? They couldn't see anything two steps off.

MAID
For goodness' sake, where are we going?

SOLDIER
Look! There's two just like us.

MAID
Where? I don't see anything.

SOLDIER
There … just ahead of us.

MAID
Why do you say: "two like us" —

SOLDIER
Well, I mean, they like each other too.

MAID
Look out! What's that there? I nearly fell.

SOLDIER
Oh, that's the meadow-gate.

MAID
Don't shove me so. I'll fall.

SOLDIER
Sh-h, not so loud.

MAID
Stop! Now I'm really going to scream — What are you doing?… Stop now —

SOLDIER
There’s no one anywhere around.

MAID
Then, let’s go back where the people are.

SOLDIER
We don’t need them. Why — Marie, we need … for that…

MAID
Stop, Frank, please, for Heaven’s sake! Listen to me, if I had … known … oh … come!

SOLDIER
(Blissfully) Once more… Oh…

MAID
… I can’t see your face at all.

SOLDIER
Don’t matter — my face…

SOLDIER
Well, Miss Marie, you can’t stay here on the grass all night.

MAID
Please, Frank, help me.

SOLDIER
Oh, come along.

MAID
Oh, Lord help me, Frank.

SOLDIER
Well, what’s the matter with me?

MAID
You’re a bad man, Frank.

SOLDIER
Yes, yes. Say, wait a minute.

MAID
Why do you leave me alone?

SOLDIER
Can’t you let me light my cigar!

MAID
It’s so dark.

SOLDIER
It’ll be light again to-morrow morning.

MAID
Tell me, at least, you love me.

SOLDIER
Well, you must have felt that, Miss Marie!

MAID
Where are we going now?

SOLDIER
Back, of course.

MAID
Please, don’t walk so fast.

SOLDIER
Well, what’s wrong? I don’t like to walk around in the dark.

MAID
Tell me, Frank … do you love me?

SOLDIER
But I just told you that I loved you!

MAID
Won’t you give me a little kiss?

SOLDIER
(Condescendingly) There… Listen — There’s the music again.

MAID
Would you really like to go back, and dance again?

SOLDIER
Of course, why not?

MAID
But, Frank, see, I have to get home. Madame will scold me anyway, — she’s cranky … she’d like it best if I never went out.

SOLDIER
Well, you can go home.

MAID
But, I thought, Frank, you'd take me home.

SOLDIER
Take you home? Oh!

MAID
Please, it's so sad to go home alone.

SOLDIER
Where do you live?

MAID
Not very far — in Porzellanstrasse.

SOLDIER
So? Then we go the same way … but it's still too early for me … me for the dance… I've got late leave to-day… I don't need to be back at the barracks before twelve o'clock. I'm going to dance.

MAID
Oh, I see, now it's that cross-eyed blonde's turn.

SOLDIER
Humph! — Her face isn't so bad.

MAID
Oh Lord, how wicked men are. I'm sure you do the same to every one.

SOLDIER
That'd be too much! —

MAID
Please, Frank, no more to-day — stay with me to-day, you see —

SOLDIER
Oh, very well, all right. But I suppose I may dance.

MAID
I'm not going to dance with any one else to-night.

SOLDIER
There it is already…

MAID
What?

SOLDIER
The hall! How quick we got back. They're still playing the same thing … that tatata-tum tatata-tum (He hums with the band)… Well, I'll take you home, if you want to wait for me … if not … good-by —

MAID
Yes, I'll wait.
(They enter the dancehall)

SOLDIER
Say, Miss Marie, get yourself a glass of beer. (Turning to a blonde who is just dancing past him in the arms of another, very formally) Miss, may I ask for a dance? —

THE PARLOR MAID AND THE YOUNG MAN

SULTRY SUMMER AFTERNOON. The parents of the YOUNG MAN are away in the country. The cook has gone out. The PARLOR-MAID is in the kitchen writing a letter to the soldier who is now her sweetheart. The YOUNG MAN'S bell rings. She gets up and goes to his room. The YOUNG MAN is lying on a couch, smoking a cigarette and reading a French novel.

MAID
Yes, Sir?

YOUNG MAN
Oh, yes, Marie, oh, yes; I rang, yes … I only wanted … yes, of course… Oh, yes, of course, let the blinds down, Marie… It's cooler with the blinds down … yes…
(The MAID goes to the window and pulls down the blinds)

YOUNG MAN
(Continues reading) What are you doing, Marie? Oh, yes. But, now, I can't see to read.

MAID
You are always so studious, Sir.

YOUNG MAN
(Ignoring the remark) There, that's better.
(MARIE goes.)

YOUNG MAN
(Tries to go on with his reading, lets the book fall, and rings again)

MAID
(Enters)

YOUNG MAN

I say, Marie … let's see, what was it I wanted to say? … oh, yes… Is there any cognac in the house?

MAID
Yes, but it's locked up.

YOUNG MAN
Well, who has the key?

MAID
Lini.

YOUNG MAN

Who is Lini?

MAID
The cook, Mr. Alfred.

YOUNG MAN
Well, then ask Lini for it.

MAID
Yes, but it's Lini's day out.

YOUNG MAN
So…

MAID
Can I get anything for you from the café, Sir?

YOUNG MAN
Thank you, no… It is hot enough as it is. I don't need any cognac. Listen, Marie, bring me a glass of water. Wait, Marie, — let it run, till it gets quite cold.
Exit MAID. The YOUNG MAN gazes after her. At the door the MAID looks back at him, and the YOUNG MAN glances into the air. The MAID turns on the water and lets it run. Meanwhile, she goes into her room, washes her hands, and arranges her curls before the mirror. Then she brings the glass of water to the YOUNG MAN. She approaches the couch. The YOUNG MAN raises himself upon his elbow. The MAID gives him the glass of water and their fingers touch.

YOUNG MAN
Thank you — Well, what is the matter? — Be careful. Put the glass back on the tray. (He leans back, and stretches himself) How late is it?

MAID
Five o'clock, Sir.

YOUNG MAN
Ah, five o'clock. — That's fine. —

MAID
(Goes. At the door she turns around. The YOUNG MAN has followed her with his eyes; she notices it, and smiles)

YOUNG MAN
(Remains stretched out awhile; then, suddenly, he gets up. He walks to the door, back again, and lies down on the couch. He again tries to read. After a few moments, he rings once more.)

MAID
(Appears with a smile which she does not try to hide)

YOUNG MAN
Listen, Marie, there was something I wanted to ask you. Didn't Dr. Schueller call this morning?

MAID
No, Sir, nobody called this morning.

YOUNG MAN
That is strange. Then, Dr. Schueller didn't call. Do you know Dr. Schueller by sight?

MAID
Of course, I do. He's the big gentleman with the black beard.

YOUNG MAN
Yes. Then, perhaps, he called after all?

MAID
No, Sir. Nobody called.

YOUNG MAN
(Resolutely) Come here, Marie.

MAID
(Coming a little nearer) Yes, Sir.

YOUNG MAN
Still nearer … so … ah … I only thought…

MAID
Do you want anything, Sir?

YOUNG MAN

I thought… Well, I thought — only about your blouse … what kind of a blouse is it … can't you come closer. I won't bite you.

MAID
(Comes close to him) What is the matter with my blouse? Don't you like it, Sir?

YOUNG MAN
(Takes hold of her blouse, and draws her down to him) Blue? It is a nice blue. (Simply) You are very prettily dressed, Marie.

MAID
But, Sir…

YOUNG MAN
Ah… What is the matter?… (He has opened her blouse. In a matter of fact tone) You have a beautiful white skin, Marie.

MAID
You are flattering me, Sir.

YOUNG MAN
(Kissing her on the breast) That can't hurt you.

MAID
Oh, no.

YOUNG MAN
But you sigh so. Why are you sighing?

MAID
Oh, Mr. Alfred…

YOUNG MAN
And what charming little slippers you have…

MAID
… But … Sir … if the doorbell should ring. —

YOUNG MAN
Who will ring now?

MAID
But, Sir … look … it is so light…

YOUNG MAN
You needn't feel at all shy with me. You needn't feel shy with anybody … any one as pretty as you. Yes, really, you are, Marie… Do you know your hair actually smells sweet.

MAID
Mr. Alfred…

YOUNG MAN
Don't make such a fuss, Marie… Anyway, I've already seen you otherwise. When I came home the other night and went to get some water, the door to your room was open … well…

MAID
(Covering her face) Oh, my, I didn't know that Mr. Alfred could be so wicked.

YOUNG MAN

I saw lots then … that … and that … that … and —

MAID
Oh, Mr. Alfred!

YOUNG MAN
Come, come … here … so — that's it…

MAID
But if the doorbell should ring now —

YOUNG MAN
Now forget that … we simply wouldn't open the door.

(The bell rings)

YOUNG MAN
Confound it… What a noise that fellow makes — Perhaps he rang before, and we didn't notice it.

MAID
Oh, no. I was listening all the while.

YOUNG MAN
Well, see what's the matter. Peek through the curtains.

MAID
Mr. Alfred … you are … no … such a bad man.

YOUNG MAN
Please go and see…
(Exit MAID)

YOUNG MAN
(Opens the blinds quickly)

MAID
(Returns) He must have gone away again. Anyway, no one is there now. Perhaps, it was Dr. Schueller.

YOUNG MAN
(Annoyed) Thank you.

MAID
(Drawing close to him)

YOUNG MAN
(Evading her) Listen, Marie, — I'm going to the café now.

MAID
(Tenderly) So soon … Mr. Alfred.

YOUNG MAN
(Formally) I am going to the café now… If Dr. Schueller should call —

MAID

He won’t come any more to-day.

YOUNG MAN

(Severely) If Dr. Schueller should come, I — I am in the café.

(He goes to the adjoining room. The MAID takes a cigar from the smoking-stand, puts it in her blouse and goes out.)

THE YOUNG MAN AND THE YOUNG WIFE

EVENING — A drawing-room furnished with cheap elegance in a house in Schwind street. The YOUNG MAN has just come in; and, still wearing his hat and overcoat, he lights the gas. Then he opens a door to a side-room and looks in. The light from the drawing-room shimmers over the inlaid floor as far as the Louis Quinze bed, which stands against the opposite wall. A reddish light plays from the fire-place in the corner of the bedroom upon the hangings of the bed. The YOUNG MAN now inspects the bedroom. He takes an atomizer from the dressing-table, and sprays the bed-pillows with a fine rain of violet perfume. Then he carries the atomizer through both rooms, constantly pressing upon the bulb, so that soon the odor of violets pervades the place. He then takes off his hat and coat. He sits down in a blue velvet armchair, lights a cigarette, and smokes. After a short pause he rises again, and makes sure that the green shutters are closed. Suddenly, he goes into the bedroom, and opens a drawer in the dressing-table. He puts his hand in it, and finds a tortoise-shell hair-pin. He looks for a place to hide it, and finally puts it into a pocket of his overcoat. He opens the buffet in the drawing-room; takes a silver tray, with a bottle and two liqueur glasses, and puts them on the table. He goes back to his overcoat, and takes from it a small white package. Opening this, he places it beside the cognac. He goes again to the buffet, and takes two small plates and knives and forks. He takes a candied chestnut from the package and eats it. Then he pours himself a glass of cognac, and drinks it quickly. He then looks at his watch. He walks up and down the room. He stops a while before a large mirror, ordering his hair and small mustache with a pocket-comb. He next goes to the door of the vestibule and listens. Nothing is stirring. Then he closes the blue portières, which hang before the bedroom. The bell rings. He starts slightly. Then he sits down in the armchair, and rises only when the door has been opened and the YOUNG WIFE enters.

YOUNG WIFE
(Heavily veiled, closes the door behind her, pausing a moment with her left hand over her heart, as though mastering a strong emotion)

YOUNG MAN
(Goes toward her, takes her left hand, and presses a kiss on the white glove with black stitching. He says softly.) Thank you.

YOUNG WIFE
Alfred — Alfred!

YOUNG MAN
Come, Madame… Come, Emma…

YOUNG WIFE
Let me be for a minute — please … oh, please, please, Alfred!
(She is still standing at the door)

YOUNG MAN
(Standing before her, holding her hand)

YOUNG WIFE
Where am I?

YOUNG MAN
With me.

YOUNG WIFE
This house is terrible, Alfred.

YOUNG MAN
Why terrible? It is a very proper house.

YOUNG WIFE
But I met two gentlemen on the staircase.

YOUNG MAN
Acquaintances of yours?

YOUNG WIFE

I don’t know. It’s possible.

YOUNG MAN
But, Madame — You surely know your friends!

YOUNG WIFE

I couldn’t see their faces.

YOUNG MAN
But even had they been your best friends — they couldn’t possibly have recognized you… I, myself … if I didn’t know it was you … this veil —

YOUNG WIFE
There are two.

YOUNG MAN
Won’t you come closer?… And take off your hat, at least?

YOUNG WIFE
What are you thinking of, Alfred? I promised you: Five minutes… Not a moment more … I swear it, no more —

YOUNG MAN
Well, then, your veil —

YOUNG WIFE
There are two of them.

YOUNG MAN
Very well, both of them — you will at least let me see your face.

YOUNG WIFE
Do you really love me, Alfred?

YOUNG MAN
(Deeply hurt) Emma! You ask me…

YOUNG WIFE
It's so warm here.

YOUNG MAN
You're still wearing your fur-coat — really, you will catch cold.

YOUNG WIFE
(Finally enters the room, and throws herself into the armchair) I'm tired — dead tired.

YOUNG MAN
Permit me.
(He takes off her veil, removes her hat-pin, and puts hat, pin, and veil aside)

YOUNG WIFE
(Permits it)

YOUNG MAN
(Stands before her, and shakes his head)

YOUNG WIFE
What is the matter?

YOUNG MAN
You've never been so beautiful.

YOUNG WIFE
How is that?

YOUNG MAN
Alone … alone with you — Emma —
(He kneels down beside her chair, takes both her hands, and covers them with kisses)

YOUNG WIFE
And now … now let me go again. I have done what you asked me to do.

YOUNG MAN
(Lets his head sink into her lap)

YOUNG WIFE

You promised me to be good.

YOUNG MAN
Yes.

YOUNG WIFE
It is stifling hot in this room.

YOUNG MAN
(Gets up) You still have your coat on.

YOUNG WIFE
Put it with my hat.

YOUNG MAN
(Takes off her coat, and puts it on the sofa)

YOUNG WIFE
And now — good-by —

YOUNG MAN
Emma —! Emma —!

YOUNG WIFE
The five minutes are long past.

YOUNG MAN
Not one yet! —

YOUNG WIFE
Alfred, tell me truly now, how late it is.

YOUNG MAN
It is now exactly a quarter past six.

YOUNG WIFE

I should have been at my sister's long ago.

YOUNG MAN
You can see your sister any time…

YOUNG WIFE
Oh, Merciful Heaven, Alfred, why did you tempt me to come?

YOUNG MAN
Because … I adore you, Emma!

YOUNG WIFE
To how many have you said the same thing?

YOUNG MAN
Since I met you, to no one.

YOUNG WIFE
What a foolish woman I am! If anybody had predicted … just a week ago … or even yesterday…

YOUNG MAN
But you had already promised me the day before yesterday.

YOUNG WIFE
You plagued me so. But I didn't want to do it. God is my witness — I didn't want to do it… Yesterday, I was firmly decided… Do you know I even wrote you a long letter last night?

YOUNG MAN

I didn't receive any.

YOUNG WIFE

I tore it up later. Oh, if only I had sent it to you.

YOUNG MAN
It is better as it is.

YOUNG WIFE
Oh, no, it's awful … of me. I don't understand myself. Good-by, Alfred, let me go.

YOUNG MAN
(Seizes her, and covers her face with burning kisses)

YOUNG WIFE
So … is that the way you keep your word…

YOUNG MAN
One more kiss — one more.

YOUNG WIFE
The last.
(He kisses her, and she returns the kiss; their lips remain joined for a long time)

YOUNG MAN
Shall I tell you something, Emma? It is now for the first time that I know what happiness is.

YOUNG WIFE
(Sinks back into the armchair)

YOUNG MAN
(Sits on the arm of the chair, and puts one arm lightly about her neck) … or rather, I know now what happiness might be.

YOUNG WIFE
(Sighs deeply)

YOUNG MAN
(Kisses her again)

YOUNG WIFE
Alfred — Alfred, what are you doing to me!

YOUNG MAN
Wasn't I right? — It isn't so awfully uncomfortable here… And we are so safe here. It's a thousand times better than those meetings outdoors…

YOUNG WIFE
Oh, don't remind me of them.

YOUNG MAN

I shall always recall them with a thousand delights. Every minute you have let me spend with you is a sweet memory.

YOUNG WIFE
Do you remember the ball at the Manufacturers' Club?

YOUNG MAN
Do I remember it…? I sat beside you through the whole supper — quite close to you. Your husband had champagne…

YOUNG WIFE
(Looks at him with a hurt expression)

YOUNG MAN

I meant to speak only of the champagne. Emma, would you like a glass of cognac?

YOUNG WIFE
Only a drop, but first give me a glass of water.

YOUNG MAN
Surely… But where is — oh, yes, I remember…
(He opens the portières, and goes into the bedroom)

YOUNG WIFE
(Follows him with her eyes)

YOUNG MAN
(Comes back with a water-bottle and two glasses)

YOUNG WIFE
Where have you been?

YOUNG MAN
In … the adjoining room.
(Pours her a glass of water)

YOUNG WIFE
Now I'm going to ask you something, Alfred — and you must tell me the truth.

YOUNG MAN

I swear —

YOUNG WIFE
Has there ever been any other woman in these rooms?

YOUNG MAN
But, Emma — this house was built twenty years ago! —

YOUNG WIFE
You know what I mean, Alfred … in these rooms, with you!

YOUNG MAN
With me — here — Emma! — It's not kind of you even to imagine such a thing.

YOUNG WIFE
Then there was … how shall I… But, no, I'd rather not ask. It is better that I shouldn't ask. It's my own fault. Every fault has its punishment.

YOUNG MAN
But what is wrong? What is the matter with you? What fault?

YOUNG WIFE
No, no, no, I mustn't think… Otherwise I would sink through the floor with shame.

YOUNG MAN
(With the water-bottle in his hand, shakes his head sadly) Emma, if you only knew how you hurt me.

YOUNG WIFE
(Pours a glass of cognac)

YOUNG MAN

I want to tell you something, Emma. If you're ashamed of being here — if you don't care for me — if you don't feel you are all the happiness in the world for me — then you'd better go. —

YOUNG WIFE
Yes, I shall go.

YOUNG MAN
(Taking hold of her hand) But if you feel that I cannot live without you, that a kiss upon your hand means more to me than all the caresses of all the women in the whole world… Emma, I'm not like other young men, who are experienced in love-making — perhaps, I am too naïve … I…

YOUNG WIFE
But suppose you were like other young men?

YOUNG MAN
Then you wouldn't be here to-night — because you are not like other women.

YOUNG WIFE
How do you know that?

YOUNG MAN
(Drawing her close beside him on the sofa)

I have thought a lot about it. I know you are unhappy.

YOUNG WIFE
(Pleased) Yes.

YOUNG MAN
Life is so dreary, so empty — and then, — so short — so horribly short! There is only one happiness — to find some one who loves you. —

YOUNG WIFE
(Takes a candied pear from the table, and puts it into her mouth)

YOUNG MAN
Give me half of it!
(She offers it to him with her lips)

YOUNG WIFE
(Catches the hands of the Young Man that threaten to stray) What are you doing, Alfred?… Is that the way you keep your promise?

YOUNG MAN
(Swallows the pear, then, more daringly) Life is so short.

YOUNG WIFE
(Weakly) But that's no reason —

YOUNG MAN
(Mechanically) Oh, yes.

YOUNG WIFE
(Still more weakly) Alfred, you promised to be good … and then it's so light…

YOUNG MAN
Come, come, you only, only…
(He lifts her from the sofa)

YOUNG WIFE
What are you doing?

YOUNG MAN
It's not so light in the other room.

YOUNG WIFE
Is there another room?

YOUNG MAN
(Drawing her with him) A beautiful one … and quite dark.

YOUNG WIFE
We'd better stay in here.

YOUNG MAN
(Already past the bedroom portières with her, loosening her waist)

YOUNG WIFE
You are so… O merciful Heaven, what are you doing with me! — Alfred!

YOUNG MAN

I adore you, Emma!

YOUNG WIFE
So then wait, wait a little… (Weakly) Go… I'll call you.

YOUNG MAN
Let you help me — let us help you (becoming confused) … let … me — help — you.

YOUNG WIFE
But you'll tear everything.

YOUNG MAN
You have no corset on?

YOUNG WIFE

I never wear a corset. Odilon doesn't wear any either. But you can unbutton my shoes.

YOUNG MAN
(Unbuttons her shoes and kisses her feet)

YOUNG WIFE
(Slips into bed) Oh, how cold it is.

YOUNG MAN
It'll be warm in a minute.

YOUNG WIFE
(Laughing softly) Do you think so?

YOUNG MAN
(Slightly hurt, to himself) She ought not to have said that.
(He undresses in the dark)

YOUNG WIFE
(Tenderly) Come, come, come!

YOUNG MAN
(Mollified) In a minute, dear —

YOUNG WIFE
It smells like violets here.

YOUNG MAN
That's you… Yes (To her) you, yourself.

YOUNG WIFE
Alfred… Alfred!!!!

YOUNG MAN
Emma…

YOUNG MAN
Apparently I love you too much … yes… I am as if out of my senses.

YOUNG WIFE
… …

YOUNG MAN

I have been beside myself all these days. I was afraid of this.

YOUNG WIFE
Don't mind.

YOUNG MAN
Oh, certainly not. It's perfectly natural, if one…

YOUNG WIFE
No … don't… You are nervous. Calm yourself first.

YOUNG MAN
Do you know Stendhal?

YOUNG WIFE
Stendhal?

YOUNG MAN
The "Psychologie de l'amour."

YOUNG WIFE
No. Why do you ask me?

YOUNG MAN
There's a story in that book which is very much to the point.

YOUNG WIFE
What kind of a story?

YOUNG MAN
There is a gathering of cavalry officers —

YOUNG WIFE
Yes.

YOUNG MAN
And they are telling each other about their love affairs. And each one of them tells that with the woman he loved best — most passionately, you know … that with him, that then — well, in short, that the same thing happened just as it happened to me now.

YOUNG WIFE
Yes.

YOUNG MAN
That is very characteristic.

YOUNG WIFE
Yes.

YOUNG MAN
The story is not yet ended. One of them maintained … that this thing had never in his life happened to him, but, adds Stendhal — he was known as a great boaster.

YOUNG WIFE
And. —

YOUNG MAN
And, yet, it makes you feel blue — that's the stupid side of it, even though it's so unimportant.

YOUNG WIFE
Of course. Anyway, you know … you promised me to be good.

YOUNG MAN
Sh-h! Don't laugh. That doesn't help things any.

YOUNG WIFE
But no, I'm not laughing. That story of Stendhal's is really interesting. I have always thought that only older people … or people who … you know, people who have lived fast…

YOUNG MAN
The idea! That has nothing to do with it. By the way, I had completely forgotten the prettiest of Stendhal's stories. One of the cavalry officers went so far as to say that he stayed for three or even six nights… I don't remember now — that is he stayed with a woman, whom he wanted for weeks — desirée — you understand — and nothing happened all those nights except that they wept for happiness … both…

YOUNG WIFE
Both?

YOUNG MAN
Yes. Does that surprise you? It seems very comprehensible — especially when two people love each other.

YOUNG WIFE
But surely there are many who don't weep.

YOUNG MAN
(Nervously) Certainly … however, that is an exceptional case.

YOUNG WIFE
Oh — I thought Stendhal said that all cavalry officers weep on such an occasion.

YOUNG MAN
Look here, now you are laughing at me.

YOUNG WIFE
What an idea! Don't be childish, Alfred.

YOUNG MAN
Well, it makes me nervous anyway… Besides I have the feeling that you are thinking about it all the time. That embarrasses me still more.

YOUNG WIFE
I'm not thinking of it at all.

YOUNG MAN
If I were only sure that you love me.

YOUNG WIFE
Do you want still further proofs?

YOUNG MAN
Didn't I tell you … you are always laughing at me.

YOUNG WIFE
How so? Come, let me hold your sweet little head.

YOUNG MAN
Oh, that feels so good.

YOUNG WIFE
Do you love me?

YOUNG MAN
Oh, I'm so happy.

YOUNG WIFE
But you needn't cry about it.

YOUNG MAN
(Moving away from her, highly irritated) There! Again! I begged you not to…

YOUNG WIFE
To tell you that you shouldn't cry…

YOUNG MAN
You said: "You needn't cry about it."

YOUNG WIFE
You are nervous, sweetheart.

YOUNG MAN

I know.

YOUNG WIFE
But you ought not to be. It is beautiful even that … that we are together like good comrades…

YOUNG MAN
Now you are beginning again.

YOUNG WIFE
Don't you remember! That was one of our first talks. We wanted to be comrades, nothing more. Oh, how nice that was … at my sister's ball in January, during the quadrille… For heaven's sake, I should have gone long ago… My sister expects me — what shall I tell her… Good-by, Alfred —

YOUNG MAN
Emma! — You will leave me in this way!

YOUNG WIFE
Yes — so! —

YOUNG MAN
Five minutes more…

YOUNG WIFE
All right. Five minutes more. But you must promise me … not to move?… Yes?… I want to give you a good-by kiss… Psst … be still … don't move, I told you, otherwise I'll get up at once, you, my sweetheart, sweet…

YOUNG MAN
Emma … my ador… …

YOUNG WIFE
My Alfred!

YOUNG MAN
Oh, it is heaven to be with you.

YOUNG WIFE
But now I've really got to go.

YOUNG MAN
Oh, let your sister wait.

YOUNG WIFE

I must go home. It is much too late to see my sister. How late is it?

YOUNG MAN
How should I know?

YOUNG WIFE
You might look at your watch.

YOUNG MAN
My watch is in my waistcoat.

YOUNG WIFE
Get it.

YOUNG MAN
(Gets up with a jump) Eight o'clock.

YOUNG WIFE
(Jumps up quickly) For heaven's sake… Quick, Alfred, give me my stockings. What shall I say? They must be waiting for me at home … eight o'clock…

YOUNG MAN
When shall I see you again?

YOUNG WIFE
Never.

YOUNG MAN
Emma! Don't you love me any more?

YOUNG WIFE
Just for that reason. Give me my shoes.

YOUNG MAN
Never again? Here are your shoes.

YOUNG WIFE
My button-hook is in my bag. Please, be quick…

YOUNG MAN
Here is the button-hook.

YOUNG WIFE
Alfred, this may cost us our lives.

YOUNG MAN
(Unpleasantly moved) In what way?

YOUNG WIFE
What shall I say, if he asks me where I've been?

YOUNG MAN
At your sister's.

YOUNG WIFE
Oh, if I only could lie.

YOUNG MAN
Well, you'll have to.

YOUNG WIFE
Everything for a man like you. Oh, come here … let me give you a last kiss. (She embraces him) — And now — leave me by myself, go in the other room. — I can't dress, if you are around.

YOUNG MAN
(Goes into the drawing-room, where he dresses. He eats some pastry and drinks a glass of cognac)

YOUNG WIFE
(Calls after a while) Alfred!

YOUNG MAN
Yes, sweetheart.

YOUNG WIFE
Isn't it better that we didn't weep?

YOUNG MAN
(Smiling, not without pride) How can you talk so frivolously? —

YOUNG WIFE
Oh, how difficult it will be now — if we should meet by chance in company?

YOUNG MAN
By chance? — sometime?… Surely you are coming to Lobheimer's to-morrow?

YOUNG WIFE
Yes. You too?

YOUNG MAN
Of course. May I ask for the cotillion?

YOUNG WIFE
Oh, I shall not go. What do you imagine? — I would… (She enters the drawing-room fully dressed, and takes a piece of chocolate pastry) sink through the floor.

YOUNG MAN
To-morrow at Lobheimer's. That's fine.

YOUNG WIFE
No, no… I shall decline … certainly decline —

YOUNG MAN
Well, the day after to-morrow … here.

YOUNG WIFE
The idea!

YOUNG MAN
At six…

YOUNG WIFE
There are cabs at this corner, aren't there?

YOUNG MAN
Yes, as many as you want. Well, the day after to-morrow, here at six o'clock. Please say "yes," sweetheart.

YOUNG WIFE
… We'll discuss that to-morrow night during the cotillion.

YOUNG MAN
(Embracing her) My angel.

YOUNG WIFE
Don't muss my hair again.

YOUNG MAN
Well then, to-morrow night at Lobheimer's, and the day after to-morrow in my arms.

YOUNG WIFE
Good-by…

YOUNG MAN
(Suddenly anxious again) And what will you — tell him to-night? —

YOUNG WIFE
Don't ask me … don't ask me … it's too terrible. — Why do I love you so? — Good-by — If I meet any one again on the stairway, I shall faint. — Ugh!

YOUNG MAN
(Kisses her hand for the last time)

YOUNG WIFE
(Exit)

YOUNG MAN
(Remains standing. Then he sits down on the couch. He smiles reflectively, and says to himself) Now, at last, I have an affair with a respectable woman.

THE YOUNG WIFE AND THE HUSBAND

A COMFORTABLE BEDROOM. It is half past ten at night. The WIFE is lying abed and reading. The HUSBAND enters the room in a dressing gown.

YOUNG WIFE
(Without looking up) You have stopped working?

HUSBAND
Yes. I'm too tired. And besides…

YOUNG WIFE
Well? —

HUSBAND
I felt so lonely at my desk all at once. A longing for you came over me.

YOUNG WIFE
(Looking up) Really?

HUSBAND
(Sitting down on the bed beside her) Don't read any more to-night. You will ruin your eyes.

YOUNG WIFE
(Closing the book) What's the matter with you?

HUSBAND
Nothing, child. I'm in love with you. But you know that.

YOUNG WIFE
One might almost forget it sometimes.

HUSBAND
One must forget it sometimes.

YOUNG WIFE
Why?

HUSBAND
Because, otherwise, marriage would be something imperfect. It would … how shall I express it … it would lose its sanctity.

YOUNG WIFE
Oh…

HUSBAND
Believe me — it is so… If we hadn't sometimes forgotten that we are in love with each other during the five years we have been married — we might not be in love any longer.

YOUNG WIFE
That's beyond me.

HUSBAND
The case is simply this. We have had perhaps ten or twelve love-affairs with each other… Doesn't it seem that way to you, too?

YOUNG WIFE

I haven't counted them!

HUSBAND
If we had enjoyed the first one to the last drop, if I had from the very beginning surrendered without restraint to my passion for you, the same thing would have happened to us that has happened to millions of other lovers. We would be tired of each other.

YOUNG WIFE
Ah … do you mean that?

HUSBAND
Believe me — Emma — in the early days of our marriage, I was afraid that this would happen.

YOUNG WIFE
I, too.

HUSBAND
See? Am I not right? Therefore, it is wise every now and then to live only as good friends.

YOUNG WIFE
Oh.

HUSBAND
And some can always experience new honeymoons, especially since I am careful never to let such weeks of honeymoon…

YOUNG WIFE
Run into months.

HUSBAND
That is true.

YOUNG WIFE
And now … now it seems we are at the end of another such period of friendship —?

HUSBAND
(Pressing her tenderly to him) So it might seem.

YOUNG WIFE
But if … if I should feel differently?

HUSBAND
You couldn't. You are the wisest and most delicious being in the world. I am very happy to have found you.

YOUNG WIFE
You know how to make love very well — every now and then.

HUSBAND
(Who has also gone to bed) Well, for a man who has looked about in the world a bit — come, lay your head on my shoulder — who has seen something of the world, marriage is really something much more mysterious than it is for you sheltered young girls. You come to us entirely innocent and … to a certain degree, at least, ignorant of things, and therefore you really understand the essence of love much better than we.

YOUNG WIFE
(Laughing) Oh!

HUSBAND
Certainly. For we get all tangled up by the many experiences that we have to go through before marriage. You women, of course, hear a lot of things, you know a lot of things, no doubt read too much, but you can't have any real idea of the things men experience. We men really become quite disgusted with this thing people call love, for the kind of creatures to which we are restricted really are…

YOUNG WIFE
Tell me — what kind of creatures are they?

HUSBAND
(Kissing her on the forehead) You ought to be glad, dear child, that you never have had a glimpse of relations like that. After all most of the poor things deserve pity — it is not for us to throw stones.

YOUNG WIFE
But — this pity — it doesn't seem quite appropriate to me.

HUSBAND
(With gentle benevolence) They deserve it. You young girls of good family, who wait quietly under the care of your parents for the man who desires you in marriage, — you won't know the misery that drives most of these poor creatures into the arms of sin.

YOUNG WIFE
Do all of them really sell themselves?

HUSBAND

I would hardly say that. I don't mean the material misery alone. There is also — one might call it — a moral misery, a lack of appreciation for what is permissible, and, especially, for what is noble.

YOUNG WIFE
But why are they to be pitied? — They seem to enjoy themselves.

HUSBAND
You have strange ideas, my child. You must not forget that such people are predestined by nature to sink lower and lower. There is no stopping them.

YOUNG WIFE
(Cuddling to him) It seems pleasant to fall.

HUSBAND
(Hurt) How can you say things like that, Emma? I should think that to good women like you, nothing could be more repulsive than those who are not!

YOUNG WIFE
Of course, Karl, of course. I was just thinking. Go on, tell me more. I like it when you talk like this. Tell me something.

HUSBAND
What? —

YOUNG WIFE
Why — about these people.

HUSBAND
The idea!

YOUNG WIFE
But, I asked you a long time ago — you know, when we were first married to tell me something of your younger days.

HUSBAND
Why does that interest you?

YOUNG WIFE
Aren't you my husband? Isn't it a sort of injustice that I really know nothing about your past?

HUSBAND
You surely don't think I have such bad taste, as to — No, Emma … it would be like a profanation.

YOUNG WIFE
And yet you have … heaven knows how many other women you have held in your arms, just as you are holding me now.

HUSBAND
Don't say "women." You are the woman.

YOUNG WIFE
But you must answer one question … otherwise … otherwise … there won't be any honeymoon.

HUSBAND
That's a nice way to talk … remember you are a mother … our little girl is sleeping in there…

YOUNG WIFE
(Snuggling against him) But I want a boy, too.

HUSBAND
Emma!

YOUNG WIFE
Don't be silly … of course, I am your wife … but I'd like also to be … to be your sweetheart.

HUSBAND
Would you?…

YOUNG WIFE
Well — now my question.

HUSBAND
(Accommodating) All right.

YOUNG WIFE
Was there … a married woman … amongst them?

HUSBAND
Why? What do you mean?

YOUNG WIFE
You know what I mean.

HUSBAND
(Slightly disconcerted) What makes you think of a thing like that?

YOUNG WIFE

I would like to know if … I mean — there are such women… I know that very well. But did you?…

HUSBAND
(Seriously) Do you know such a woman?

YOUNG WIFE
Well, I hardly know.

HUSBAND
Is there, perhaps, such a woman among your friends?

YOUNG WIFE
How can I be sure that there is — or that there isn't?

HUSBAND
Did any of your friends … women talk about a lot of things — alone among themselves — did any of them ever confess —?

YOUNG WIFE
(Uncertainly) No.

HUSBAND
Do you suspect any of your friends — that she…

YOUNG WIFE
Suspect … oh … suspect.

HUSBAND
It would seem so.

YOUNG WIFE
No, indeed, Karl, most certainly not. When I think things over — I don't believe there is any one.

HUSBAND
No one?

YOUNG WIFE
Not among my friends.

HUSBAND
Promise me something, Emma.

YOUNG WIFE
Well?

HUSBAND
That you will never associate with a woman about whom you have the slightest suspicion that she … doesn't lead a completely blameless life.

YOUNG WIFE
And you think it necessary for me to promise that?

HUSBAND

I know that you will not seek out the company of such women. But, it might happen that you … in fact it often happens that such women, whose reputations are not of the best, seek out good women, partly to give them standing, and partly because they feel … how shall I say?… because they feel a certain homesickness for virtue.

YOUNG WIFE
Do they?

HUSBAND
Yes. I believe what I just said is very true. Homesickness for virtue. For all of these women are at heart very unhappy; you can believe that.

YOUNG WIFE
Why?

HUSBAND
You ask me, Emma? — How can you even ask? — Just imagine what a life these women lead! Full of lies, perfidy, vulgarity, and danger.

YOUNG WIFE
Yes, of course. You are right.

HUSBAND
Truly … they pay for their little happiness … their little…

YOUNG WIFE
Pleasure.

HUSBAND
Why “pleasure”? Why do you call it “pleasure”?

YOUNG WIFE
Well, — there must be something in it —! Otherwise, they wouldn’t do it.

HUSBAND
It is nothing … an intoxication.

YOUNG WIFE
(Pensively) An intoxication…

HUSBAND
No, it is not even intoxication. Like everything — it is dearly paid for, that much is certain.

YOUNG WIFE
Well … it has happened to you, hasn’t it?

HUSBAND
Yes, Emma. — And it is the thing I most regret.

YOUNG WIFE

Who was she? Tell me! Do I know her?

HUSBAND
The idea!

YOUNG WIFE
Was it long ago? Was it very long before you married me?

HUSBAND
Don’t ask me. Please, don’t ask.

YOUNG WIFE
But, Karl!

HUSBAND
She is dead.

YOUNG WIFE
Are you in earnest?

HUSBAND
Yes … it sounds almost ridiculous, but I have the feeling that all such women die young.

YOUNG WIFE
Did you love her very much?

HUSBAND
One doesn’t love women who lie.

YOUNG WIFE
Then why…

HUSBAND
An intoxication…

YOUNG WIFE
Really?

HUSBAND
Don’t talk about it any more, please. All that is passed long ago. I have only loved one woman — that is you. You only love where there is purity and truth.

YOUNG WIFE
Karl!

HUSBAND
Oh, how secure, how happy one feels in such arms. Why didn’t I know you as a child? I am sure I wouldn’t then even have looked at other women.

YOUNG WIFE
Karl!

HUSBAND
And how beautiful you are!… beautiful!… Oh, come…
(He puts the light out)

YOUNG WIFE
Do you know what I am thinking of to-night?

HUSBAND
What, sweetheart?

YOUNG WIFE
Of … of … of Venice.

HUSBAND
Our first night…

YOUNG WIFE
Yes…

HUSBAND
What then? Tell me!

YOUNG WIFE
You love me as much to-day.

HUSBAND
Yes, just as much.

YOUNG WIFE
Oh … if you would always…

HUSBAND
(In her arms) If I would what?

YOUNG WIFE
My Karl!

HUSBAND
What do you mean? If I would always?…

YOUNG WIFE
Well, yes.

HUSBAND
Well, what then, if I would always?…

YOUNG WIFE
Then I would always know that you love me.

HUSBAND
Yes. But you must know that anyway. One cannot always be a lover, sometimes one has to go out into the cold world to struggle and achieve! Don’t forget that, my child. There is a time for everything in marriage — that is the beauty of it. There are not many who can remember their Venice after five years.

YOUNG WIFE
True!

HUSBAND
And now … good-night, my child.

YOUNG WIFE
Good-night!

THE HUSBAND AND THE SWEET YOUNG MISS

A PRIVATE DINING-ROOM in the Riedhof, comfortably furnished with moderately good taste. A gas-grate is burning. The HUSBAND and the SWEET YOUNG MISS are disclosed. The remains of dinner are on the table, cream-cakes, fruit, cheese. In the wine-glasses is a Hungarian white wine.

HUSBAND
(Is smoking a Havana cigar, and leaning against the corner of a sofa)

MISS
(Sits beside him in an armchair, eating the cream out of a cake with a spoon, and tasting it with satisfaction)

HUSBAND
Is it good?

MISS
(Without stopping) Oh!

HUSBAND
Do you want another?

MISS
No. I've eaten too much already.

HUSBAND
Your wine is all gone.
(He fills her glass)

MISS
No … stop. I'll leave it anyway.

HUSBAND
Why are you so shy?

MISS
Am I? — Well, it takes time to get acquainted.

HUSBAND
Come and sit here with me.

MISS
Right away… I'm not ready yet.

HUSBAND
(Rises and stands behind her chair, and puts his arms around her, turning her face toward him)

MISS
What's the matter?

HUSBAND

I want a kiss.

MISS
(Kissing him) You are … excuse me, you have a lot of nerve.

HUSBAND
You're just finding that out?

MISS
Oh, no, I knew that long ago … from the first, in the street. — You must —

HUSBAND
What?

MISS
You must have a nice opinion of me.

HUSBAND
Why?

MISS
Because I went right away with you to a private dining room.

HUSBAND
Well, you can hardly say "right away."

MISS
But you asked in such a nice way.

HUSBAND
Do you think so?

MISS
And, after all, what is the harm?

HUSBAND
Of course.

MISS
Whether we go walking or —

HUSBAND
Besides, it's much too cold for walking.

MISS
Yes, it was too cold.

HUSBAND
But here it's nice and warm, isn't it?
(He sits down again, puts his arms around the girl, and draws her to his side)

MISS
(Weakly) Don't.

HUSBAND
Tell me… You noticed me before, didn't you?

MISS
Certainly. Several blocks before you spoke to me.

HUSBAND

I don't mean to-day. I mean yesterday and the day before, when I was following you.

MISS

A lot of people follow me.

HUSBAND

I don't doubt that. But did you notice me?

MISS
Guess … do you know what happened to me the other day? My cousin's husband followed me in the dark, and didn't recognize me.

HUSBAND
Did he speak to you?

MISS
What do you suppose? Do you imagine every one is as bold as you?

HUSBAND
But they sometimes do, don't they?

MISS
Of course, they do.

HUSBAND
Well, and what do you do?

MISS

Why nothing — I just don't answer.

HUSBAND
Hm-m … but you answered me.

MISS
Are you sorry?

HUSBAND
(Kisses her violently) Your lips taste like cream-cakes.

MISS
Oh, they are sweet by nature.

HUSBAND

I suppose many have told you that?

MISS
Many! What are you dreaming of?

HUSBAND
Now, be honest. How many have kissed this mouth before?

MISS
Why do you ask? You wouldn't believe me anyhow, if I told you.

HUSBAND
Why not?

MISS
Guess, then.

HUSBAND
All right, I'll guess — but you mustn't get angry!

MISS
Why should I get angry?

HUSBAND
Well, then, I'll guess … twenty.

MISS
(Slipping away from him) So — why not make it a hundred?

HUSBAND
Oh, I was just guessing.

MISS
You guessed badly.

HUSBAND
Say — ten.

MISS
(Offended) Oh, of course. A girl who lets a man talk to her on the street, and goes right away with him to a private dining-room!

HUSBAND
Don't be childish. Whether we walk about in the streets or sit in a room… We are in a restaurant. The waiter may come in at any moment — it doesn't signify anything at all…

MISS
That's just what I thought.

HUSBAND
Have you ever been in a private dining-room before?

MISS
If I must tell the truth — yes.

HUSBAND

I am glad that you are honest with me at least.

MISS
But it wasn't — no it wasn't the way you imagine. I was in a private dining-room with a friend and her fiancé, once during the carnival.

HUSBAND
It wouldn't have been anything tragic, if you had ever gone — with your sweetheart —

MISS
Of course, it wouldn't have been anything serious. But I haven't any sweetheart.

HUSBAND
Oh, come now.

MISS

I swear, I haven't.

HUSBAND
But you don't expect to make me believe that I…

MISS

Make you believe what?… I haven't any — at least, haven't had for six months.

HUSBAND

I see… But before then? Who was he?

MISS
Why are you so curious?

HUSBAND

I am curious because I love you.

MISS
Really?

HUSBAND
Of course! You should have noticed that. Tell me about him.
(Presses her tightly to him)

MISS
What do you want me to tell?

HUSBAND
Don't keep me in suspense so long. Who was he, that's what I want to know.

MISS
(Laughing) Just a man.

HUSBAND
Well — well — who?

MISS
He looked something like you.

HUSBAND
No!

MISS
If you hadn't looked so much like him —

HUSBAND
Well, what then?

MISS
Now, don't ask, don't you see that…

HUSBAND

(Understanding) That's why you let me speak to you.

MISS
Yes, that's it.

HUSBAND

I really don't know whether I ought to be pleased or angry.

MISS
If I were you, I'd be pleased.

HUSBAND
All right.

MISS
You also remind me of him the way you speak … and the way you look at one…

HUSBAND
What was he?

MISS
And then, the eyes —

HUSBAND
What was his name?

MISS
Please don't look at me that way; please don't.

HUSBAND
(Embraces her. A long, burning kiss)

MISS
(Trembles, and tries to get up)

HUSBAND
Why do you want to leave me?

MISS
It's time to go home.

HUSBAND
Later.

MISS
No, I really have to get home. What do you think mother will say.

HUSBAND
You live with your mother?

MISS
Of course, I live with my mother. What did you imagine?

HUSBAND
So — with your mother. Do you live alone with her?

MISS
Oh, yes, alone! There are five of us! Two boys and two more girls.

HUSBAND
Don’t sit so far away from me. Are you the oldest?

MISS
No, I’m the second. First comes Kitty. She’s working in a flower store. Then come I.

HUSBAND
Where do you work?

MISS

I stay at home.

HUSBAND Always?

MISS
One of us has to stay home.

HUSBAND
Of course, — and what do you tell your mother, when you — come home so late?

MISS
That happens so seldom.

HUSBAND
Well, to-day, for example. Your mother will ask you, won’t she?

MISS
Of course, she’ll ask. It doesn’t matter how careful I am when I come home, she always wakes up.

HUSBAND
And what do you tell her?

MISS
Oh — that I’ve been to the theater.

HUSBAND
Does she believe that?

MISS
Why shouldn't she believe it? I often go to the theater. I saw an opera on Sunday with my friend and her fiancé, and my oldest brother.

HUSBAND
Where did you get the tickets?

MISS
My brother is a hairdresser.

HUSBAND
Oh, yes, a hairdresser … at the theater, I suppose?

MISS
Why are you asking so many questions?

HUSBAND
Because I am interested. What does your other brother do?

MISS
He's still going to school. He wants to become a teacher. Just imagine!

HUSBAND
And you also have a little sister?

MISS
Yes, she is a mere child, but you have to keep an eye on her all the time already. You have no idea how girls are spoiled at school. Just imagine! The other day I caught her keeping a date.

HUSBAND
Really?

MISS
Yes! She was out walking one evening at half-past seven with a boy from the school across the way. A mere child like her!

HUSBAND
And what did you do?

MISS

I gave her a spanking.

HUSBAND
Are you as strict as all that?

MISS
Well, who would be if I wasn't? My older sister is working and mother does nothing but grumble — everything always depends on me.

HUSBAND
You are a dear, sweet girl! (Kisses her, and grows more tender) You also remind me of some one.

MISS
So — of whom?

HUSBAND
Of no one in particular … of bygone days … of my youth. Come, drink, child!

MISS
How old are you?… You … why … I don't even know your name.

HUSBAND
Karl.

MISS
Is it possible? Your name is Karl?

HUSBAND
Was his name also Karl?

MISS
No, but that's the queer thing … that is … the eyes … (shaking her head) the way you look at me…

HUSBAND
And who was he? — You haven't told me yet.

MISS
Oh, he was a bad man — that's sure, otherwise he wouldn't have gone away.

HUSBAND
Did you love him very much?

MISS
Of course, I loved him.

HUSBAND

I know what he was — a lieutenant.

MISS
No, he wasn't in the army. He couldn't pass the examinations. His father owns a house in … but why do you have to know?

HUSBAND
(Kisses her) You have gray eyes. I thought, at first, they were black.

MISS
Well aren't they pretty enough?

HUSBAND
(Kisses her eyes)

MISS
Don't please — I can't bear it… O, please don't … let me get up … only for a moment — please.

HUSBAND
(More tenderly still) No, indeed.

MISS
But, please, Karl…

HUSBAND
How old are you? — eighteen — isn't it?

MISS
Just past nineteen.

HUSBAND
Nineteen … and I —

MISS
You are thirty…

HUSBAND
And a little more — Don't let's talk about it.

MISS
He was thirty-two, when I first met him.

HUSBAND
How long ago was that?

MISS

I don't remember… Listen, there must have been something in the wine.

HUSBAND
What makes you think so?

MISS

I am quite … see — everything is turning round about me.

HUSBAND
Then hold tight to me. So… (He holds her close to him, and becomes more and more tender. She hardly resists) I'll tell you something, dear, we might go now.

MISS
Yes … home.

HUSBAND
Well, not exactly home…

MISS
What do you mean?… O, no — no… I won't go anywhere else. What do you think I am?

HUSBAND
But listen to me, child — the next time we meet, you know, we will arrange it so that … (He has slipped to the floor with his head in her lap) This is so comfy, oh, so comfy!

MISS
What are you doing? (She kisses his hair) Something must have been in that wine — I'm so sleepy … what would happen, if I couldn't get up again? But, but — look, but Karl … if some one should come in … please … the waiter.

HUSBAND
No … waiter … will ever come in … here…

MISS
(Leaning with closed eyes in the corner of the sofa)

HUSBAND
(Pacing up and down the little room, after having lighted a cigarette)
(Long silence)

HUSBAND
(Looking for a long time at the girl; speaking to himself) Who knows what sort of a person she really is — Confound it … so quickly … that wasn't very cautious of me … hm-m…

MISS
(Without opening her eyes) There must have been something in the wine.

HUSBAND
Why?

MISS
Otherwise…

HUSBAND
Why do you blame everything on the wine?…

MISS
Where are you? Why do you stay so far away? Come to me.

HUSBAND
(Sits beside her)

MISS
Now tell me if you really love me.

HUSBAND
But you know that… (He interrupts himself quickly) Of course.

MISS
Listen… There must have … come, tell me the truth, what was in the wine.

HUSBAND
Well, do you think I … I would drug your wine?

MISS
Well, see, I can't understand it. I'm really not that kind… We've known each other only since… Dear, I'm not that kind … honestly, I'm not — if you think that of me —

HUSBAND
Well — why worry about that? I don't think anything bad of you. I only think that you love me.

MISS
Yes…

HUSBAND
After all, when two young people are alone in a room, and have dinner, and drink wine … there doesn't need to be anything in the wine.

MISS

I merely said it to say something.

HUSBAND
But, why?

MISS
(Almost defiantly) Because I was ashamed.

HUSBAND
How absurd! There is no reason to be. Especially, since I made you think of your first sweetheart.

MISS
Yes.

HUSBAND
Your first sweetheart.

MISS
Yes, yes…

HUSBAND
Now I should like to know who the others were.

MISS
There weren't any.

HUSBAND
That is not true, it can't be true.

MISS
Oh, please, don't tease me.

HUSBAND
Would you like a cigarette?

MISS
No, thanks.

HUSBAND
Do you know how late it is?

MISS
Well?

HUSBAND
Half-past eleven.

MISS
Really?

HUSBAND
Well … and your mother? She's used to this, is she?

MISS
Do you really want to send me home?

HUSBAND
But earlier in the evening you yourself wanted —

MISS
You are quite changed. What have I done to you?

HUSBAND
But, child, what is the matter with you, what do you imagine?

MISS
And it was only your looks, believe me, or you would have had to wait … many men have asked me to go with them to a private dining-room.

HUSBAND
Well, would you like … to come here again with me soon … or rather somewhere else?

MISS

I don't know.

HUSBAND
What do you mean by, "I don't know"?

MISS
Well, why don't you make a date?

HUSBAND
When? First of all, I must explain that I do not live in Vienna. I am only here for a few days' visit now and then.

MISS
Oh, you're not a Viennese?

HUSBAND
Yes, I am a Viennese. But I am living out of town now…

MISS
Where?

HUSBAND
Oh, well, that doesn't matter.

MISS
Oh, don't be frightened, I won't come to see you.

HUSBAND
If it would give you any pleasure you may come. I live in Graz.

MISS
Honestly?

HUSBAND
Yes, why does that surprise you?

MISS
You are married, aren't you?

HUSBAND
(Greatly surprised) What makes you think that?

MISS

I just got the impression.

HUSBAND
And you wouldn't mind that at all?

MISS
Well, I would rather that you were single. — So you are married! —

HUSBAND
But, tell me first what made you think of that?

MISS
If a man says he doesn't live in Vienna, and he doesn't always have time —

HUSBAND
But that's not so improbable.

MISS

I don't believe it.

HUSBAND
And wouldn't it hurt your conscience to have caused a married man to become unfaithful?

MISS
Oh, my, no doubt your wife acts just like you.

HUSBAND
(Very indignant) That will do. No more of such remarks.

MISS

I thought you didn't have a wife.

HUSBAND
Whether I have one or not — such remarks are uncalled for.
(He has risen)

MISS
But Karl, Karl, what is the matter? Are you angry? I really didn't know that you were married. I was just talking. Come, don't be angry.

HUSBAND
(Comes back to her after a few minutes) You are strange creatures, you … women.
(He becomes tender again)

MISS
Stop … don't … it's too late now.

HUSBAND
Well, listen to me a minute. Let's talk seriously. I would like to see you again, to see you often.

MISS
Would you?

HUSBAND
But one thing is necessary … that I can depend upon you. I can't look out for you.

MISS
Oh, I can look out for myself.

HUSBAND
You are … well, I can't just say inexperienced — but, you are young — and — men in general are pretty unscrupulous.

MISS
Oh, my!

HUSBAND

I don't mean on the moral side only. — Well, you know what I mean —

MISS
Tell me, what do you think I am?

HUSBAND
Look here — if you want me — me only — we can easily arrange it — even if I do generally live in Graz. In a place like this where some one may come in at any moment, it isn't very comfortable.

MISS
(Snuggles up to him)

HUSBAND
Next time … we shall go somewhere else, won't we?

MISS

Yes.

HUSBAND
Where we may be entirely alone.

MISS
Yes.

HUSBAND
(Embracing her passionately) We'll discuss the rest on the way home. (He rises, and opens the door) Waiter … the bill!

THE SWEET YOUNG MISS AND THE POET

A SMALL ROOM, furnished with taste and comfort. Red curtains half-darken the room. A large writing-table strewn with books and papers. A piano against the wall. The SWEET YOUNG MISS and the POET are disclosed. They are just entering. The POET closes the door.

POET
(Kisses her) My darling!

MISS
(With hat and coat) Oh! It's very pretty here! Only you can't see anything!

POET
Your eyes will have to get used to this semi-darkness. — Those sweet eyes —
(Kisses her eyes)

MISS
But there won't be time enough.

POET
Why not?

MISS
Because I can only stop a moment.

POET
But, you can take your hat off, can't you?

MISS
Just for the sake of a minute?

POET
(Takes the pin out of her hat which he removes)
And your coat —

MISS
The idea! — I have to leave right away.

POET
But you must rest a while first. We have been walking for three hours.

MISS
Riding, you mean.

POET

Yes, we rode home — but we ran around for a full three hours in the country. Now come, sit down, child … wherever you like — here at my desk; — no, that's not comfortable. Sit down on the sofa. — That's it. (He presses her down) If you are very tired, you may as well lie down. So. (He stretches her out on the sofa) There, put your head on the cushion.

MISS
(Laughing) But I'm not tired at all!

POET
You merely imagine you're not. So — and if you are sleepy, you can go to sleep. I shall be very quiet. And what's more I can play you a lullaby … one of my own…
(He goes to the piano)

MISS
One of yours.

POET
Yes.

MISS
But I thought, Robert, you were a professor.

POET
I? But I told you I was a writer. But what made you think of that?

MISS
Because you said the piece you are playing is your own.

POET
Yes … perhaps it is, perhaps it isn't. But that doesn't matter. Well? Anyway it doesn't matter who composed it, if only it is beautiful. Don't you agree?

MISS
Of course … it must be beautiful … that's the chief thing! —

POET
Do you know what I meant by that?

MISS
By what?

POET
By what I just said.

MISS
(Sleepily) Of course I do.

POET
(Gets up, goes to her, and strokes her hair) You didn't understand a word.

MISS
I'm not as stupid as that.

POET
Certainly you are, but that is just the reason why I love you. It is so beautiful, when girls are stupid. I mean in the way you are.

MISS
Go on, you are talking nonsense.

POET
Angel, little one! Isn't it comfy on this soft, Persian couch cover?

MISS
Indeed, it is. Won't you play something else on the piano?

POET
No, I'd rather stay near you.
(Caressing her)

MISS
But hadn't you better light the lamp?

POET
Oh, no… The dim light is so restful. We were as if bathed in sunbeams all day. Now we've just climbed out of the bath and slipped on … the twilight like a bathrobe — (Laughs) No — that ought to be expressed differently… Don't you think so?

MISS

I don't know.

POET
(Moves slightly away from her) Absolutely divine, this stupidity!
(He takes out a notebook, and writes a few words in it)

MISS
What are you doing? (She turns toward him) What are you writing?

POET
(Softly) Sun, bath, twilight, cloak … so… (He puts the notebook back. Aloud) Nothing… Now tell me, sweetheart, wouldn't you like something to eat or drink?

MISS

I'm not thirsty, but I am hungry.

POET
Hm … it would suit me better, if you were thirsty. I have some cognac at home, but I have to send out for food.

MISS
Can't you send somebody?

POET
That is difficult, my servant isn't here now — but, wait a minute — I will go myself … what would you like?

MISS
Oh, really don't bother; I have to go home anyway.

POET
Child, that's out of the question. Now I will tell you something; when we leave, we will go together somewhere for supper.

MISS
Oh, no. I haven't time for that. And, then, where could we go? Somebody we know might see us.

POET
Do you know such a lot of people?

MISS
Well, it takes only one to make trouble for us.

POET
Why trouble?

MISS
Well, suppose mother should hear about it…

POET
We can go somewhere, where no one can see us. There are plenty of restaurants with private dining-rooms.

MISS
(Singing) "Let's dine in a chambre separée!"

POET
Have you ever been in a private dining-room?

MISS
To tell the truth — yes.

POET
Who was the happy man?

MISS
Oh, it wasn't the way you imagine… I went with a friend and her fiancé. They took me along.

POET
And you expect me to believe that?

MISS
You needn't believe it!

POET
(Close to her) Did you blush? You can hardly see anything. I can't even distinguish your features. (He touches her cheeks with his hands) But even so I recognize you.

MISS
Well, be careful that you don't take me for some one else.

POET
It is strange, I don't seem to remember how you look.

MISS
Thank you!

POET
(Seriously) It is almost uncanny. I can't imagine any longer how you look — In a certain way I have already forgotten you — Now, if I couldn't remember even the sound of your voice … what would you do then? — Something near and far away at the same time … it's uncanny.

MISS
What are you talking about?

POET
Nothing, my angel, nothing. Where are your lips?…
(He kisses her)

MISS
Wouldn't it be better to light the lamp?

POET
No… (Very tenderly) Tell me, do you love me?

MISS
Very much … oh, so much!

POET
Have you ever loved any one as much as me?

MISS

I told you already that I didn't.

POET
But…
(He sighs)

MISS
He was my fiancé.

POET
I'd rather you wouldn't think of him now.

MISS
Why … what's the difference … look…

POET
We might imagine now that we were in a palace in India.

MISS
I'm sure people there wouldn't be as wicked as you are.

POET
How idiotic! Perfectly divine — Ah, if you only know what you are to me…

MISS
Well?

POET
Don't always push me away, I'm not going to hurt you —

MISS
My corset hurts me.

POET
(Simply) Take it off.

MISS
Yes. But you must behave.

POET
Of course!

MISS
(Rises, and takes off her corset in the darkness)

POET
(Sits in the meantime on the sofa) Tell me, aren't you at all curious to know my name?

MISS
Yes, what is it?

POET
I'd rather not tell you my real name, but the name I go by.

MISS
What is the difference?

POET

I mean the name I use as a writer.

MISS
Oh, you don't write under your real name?

POET
(Close to her)

MISS
Oh … stop … don't.

POET
What fragrance! How sweet.
(He kisses her breasts)

MISS
You are tearing my chemise.

POET
Away with it … away with it … everything is superfluous.

MISS
Oh, Robert.

POET
And now enter into our Indian palace.

MISS
Tell me first — do you really love me?

POET

I adore you. (Kisses her passionately) I adore you, my sweetheart, my springtime … my…

MISS
Robert … Robert…

POET
It was heaven… My name is…

MISS
Robert — oh, my Robert!

POET

I call myself Biebitz.

MISS
Why do you call yourself Biebitz?

POET
My name is not Biebitz — I just use it as a pseudonym … well, don't you recognize the name?

MISS
No.

POET
You don't know the name Biebitz? Ah — Perfectly divine! Really? You are just pretending you don't know it, aren't you?

MISS
No really, I never heard it.

POET
Don't you ever go to the theater?

MISS
Oh, yes — I was at the opera only the other day with — you know, with one of my friends and her uncle, to hear Cavalleria Rusticana.

POET
Hm, you don't go then to see plays.

MISS

I never get tickets for them.

POET
I'll send you a ticket soon.

MISS
Oh, do! And don't forget it. But for something funny.

POET
Oh … something funny … you don't care to see anything sad?

MISS
Not very much.

POET
Not even if it is a play of mine.

MISS

A play of yours? Do you write for the theater?

POET
Let me light a candle now. I haven't seen you since you have become my best beloved — Angel!
(He lights a candle)

MISS
Don't. I'm ashamed. Give me a cover at least.

POET
Later!
(He approaches her with the light, and looks at her a long while)

MISS
(Covering her face with her hands) Go away, Robert!

POET
You are beautiful, you are Beauty itself. You are Nature herself. You are the simplicity which is holy.

MISS
Ouch! You are dropping wax on me. Look, why aren't you more careful?

POET
(Puts the candle away) You are that for which I have long sought. You love me for my own sake. You would love me even if I were only a counter-jumper. That's balm to one's heart. I must confess I was suspicious until this moment. Tell me, honestly, you didn't have any notion that I am Biebitz?

MISS
Oh, pshaw, I don't even know what you are talking about. I never heard of any Biebitz.

POET
What is fame! No, forget what I have told you. Forget even the name. I am Robert and I want to remain Robert to you. I was only joking. (Lightly) I am not a writer at all. I'm a clerk, and in the evening I play the piano in a dancehall.

MISS
But now I'm all mixed up … and the way you look at one. What is the matter, yes, what do you mean?

POET

It is very strange — something that has never happened to me, sweetheart; I am on the verge of tears. You move me deeply. We ought to live together. Will you? We will be very much in love with each other.

MISS
Is it true about the dancehall?

POET
Yes, but don't ask any more about it. If you love me, don't ask me anything. Tell me, can't you get away for a few weeks?

MISS
How do you mean get away?

POET
Well, I mean, leave home?

MISS
How absurd! How could I! What would mother say? And without me everything would be topsy-turvy at home in no time.

POET
It would be so wonderful to live with you a few weeks, all alone with you, somewhere far away, in the forest, in the world of nature… Nature. And then, some day, "Good-by" — each going, without the other knowing where.

MISS
You are talking already about saying good-by. And I thought that you loved me such a lot.

POET
That is just the reason — (Bends over her, and kisses her upon the forehead.) You sweet darling!

MISS
Please, hold me tight. I feel so cold.

POET

I fancy it's time for you to dress. Wait, I'll light a few more candles for you.

MISS
(Rising) Don't look this way.

POET
No. (At the window) Tell me, child, are you happy?

MISS
What do you mean?

POET

I mean are you happy the way things are in general?

MISS
Well, they might be better.

POET
You misunderstand me. You have told me enough about your conditions at home. I know you are not a princess. Leaving all that aside, do you feel alive. Do you feel life pulsing through you?

MISS
Come, have you a comb?

POET
(Goes to the dressing-table, hands her a comb, and watches her) Good Lord, how lovely you look!

MISS
Please … don't!

POET
Please, stay a while yet. I'll get something for supper, and…

MISS
But it is awfully late already.

POET
It is not yet nine.

MISS
Dear me, I must hurry. Please!

POET
When shall I see you again?

MISS
When would you like to see me?

POET
To-morrow.

MISS
What day is to-morrow?

POET
Saturday.

MISS
Oh, then I can't. I must take my little sister to her guardian.

POET
Then Sunday … hm … Sunday … on Sunday … now I'll have to explain something to you. — I'm not Biebitz, but Biebitz is a friend of mine. I'll introduce him to you sometime. Biebitz's play will be given Sunday. I'll send you tickets, and take you home after the performance. You will tell me then how you liked the play. Won't you?

MISS
Here you are talking about this Biebitz again. — I don't understand what it is all about.

POET

I won't know you really, until I know what impression the play made on you.

MISS
Now … I'm ready.

POET
Come, sweetheart.
(They go out)

THE POET AND THE ACTRESS

A ROOM IN an inn in the country. It is an evening in spring; moonlight floods the meadows and hills; the windows are open. A deep silence reigns. The POET and the ACTRESS enter, and as they cross the threshold, the candle which the POET is carrying in his hand is blown out.

POET
Oh…

ACTRESS
What's the matter?

POET
The candle. — But we don't need any. Look, how light it is. Wonderful!

ACTRESS
(Sinks suddenly down at the window with her hands folded)

POET
What's the matter with you?

ACTRESS
(Remains silent)

POET
(Going to her) What are you doing?

ACTRESS
(Indignant) Can't you see that I am praying? —

POET
Do you believe in God?

ACTRESS
Of course I do; I am not a fool.

POET
Oh, I see!

ACTRESS
Come, kneel down beside me. It will do you good to pray just once. None of the gems will drop out of your crown.

POET
(Kneels beside her, and puts his arm around her waist)

ACTRESS
Libertine! — (Rises). And do you know to whom I prayed?

POET
To God, I suppose.

ACTRESS
(With deep sarcasm) Oh, of course! It was to you to whom I prayed.

POET
Then why did you look out of the window?

ACTRESS
Tell me rather where you have lured me.

POET
But, child, it was your idea. You wanted to go to the country — and picked out this very place.

ACTRESS
Well, wasn't I right?

POET
Certainly. It's charming here. When you consider that we are just two hours from Vienna — complete solitude. And delightful scenery!

ACTRESS
Isn't it? If you had any real talent, this place might inspire you to write.

POET
Have you been here before?

ACTRESS
Have I been here before? Indeed I have! I have lived here for years.

POET
With whom?

ACTRESS
With Dick, of course.

POET
Oh, really!

ACTRESS
How I adored that man! —

POET
You've told me all about that already.

ACTRESS

I am sorry — I can go away again, if I bore you!

POET
You bore me?… You can't imagine what you mean to me… You are a whole world in itself… You are divine, you are a genius… You are the simplicity which is holy… Yes, you… But you oughtn't to talk about Dick now.

ACTRESS
That was merely a slip! Well! —

POET

I am glad that you feel that way.

ACTRESS
Come, give me a kiss!

POET
(Kisses her)

ACTRESS
But now we had better say good night. Good night, darling!

POET
What do you mean by that?

ACTRESS

I mean, I am going to lie down and go to sleep.

POET
Yes, — that's very well, but when it comes to saying "good night" … where do I sleep?

ACTRESS
There are surely a lot of other rooms in this house.

POET
But they don't appeal to me. Don't you think I had better light a candle now?

ACTRESS
Yes.

POET
(Lights a candle, which stands upon the dressing-table) What a charming room … and what pious people they must be. Pictures of saints everywhere… It would be interesting to spend some time among people like this … quite another world. How little we know of the lives of others!

ACTRESS
Don’t talk nonsense, but just give me the bag from the table.

POET
Here, beloved!

ACTRESS
(Takes a small framed picture out of the hand-bag and puts it on the dressing-table)

POET
What’s that?

ACTRESS
That’s the Virgin.

POET
Do you always carry her around with you?

ACTRESS
She is my talisman. And now go, Robert!

POET
You are joking? Can’t I help you?

ACTRESS
No, you must go now.

POET
And when may I return?

ACTRESS
In ten minutes.

POET
(Kisses her) Au revoir!

ACTRESS
Where will you go?

POET

I shall walk up and down under your window. I love to wander about outdoors at night time. My finest inspirations come to me that way. And especially near you, under the breath of your longing, I might call it … entwined in your art.

ACTRESS
You talk like an idiot…

POET
(Hurt) There are women who might say … like a poet.

ACTRESS
Oh, well, but do go now. But don't start to flirt with the waitress. —

POET
(Goes)

ACTRESS
(Undresses. She hears the POET going down the wooden stairway, and, then hears his footsteps below her window. As soon as she is undressed, she goes to the window and looks down to where he stands waiting. She calls to him in a whisper) Come!

POET
(Comes quickly upstairs and runs toward her. She in the meantime has gone to bed, and extinguished the light. He locks the door)

ACTRESS
So, now you may sit down beside me, and tell me a story.

POET
(Sits down on the bed beside her) Hadn't I better close the window? Isn't it too cold for you?

ACTRESS
Oh, no!

POET
Now, what shall I tell you?

ACTRESS
Tell me to whom you are unfaithful at this moment?

POET
I'm sorry, I'm not unfaithful yet.

ACTRESS
Well, if it's any satisfaction to you, I am unfaithful to some one too.

POET
So I can imagine.

ACTRESS
And who do you suppose it is?

POET
But, child, how do you expect me to know?

ACTRESS
Guess, then.

POET
Wait … your manager.

ACTRESS
My dear man, I'm not a chorus-girl.

POET
Well, I am only guessing.

ACTRESS
Guess again.

POET
Then it's your leading-man … Benno —

ACTRESS
Nonsense! He doesn't care for women at all … didn't you know that? He carries on with his postman!

POET
No, really! —

ACTRESS
Now come, kiss me.

POET
(Embraces her)

ACTRESS
But what are you doing?

POET
Why do you torment me so?

ACTRESS
Listen, Robert, I have a suggestion to make to you. Come lie down in bed with me.

POET

I accept.

ACTRESS
Come quickly, come quickly!

POET
Yes … if I had had my way, I would have been there long ago… Listen…

ACTRESS
What?

POET
The crickets are chirping outside.

ACTRESS
You are crazy, child, there are no crickets here.

POET
But surely you hear them.

ACTRESS
Hurry up.

POET
(Beside her) Here I am.

ACTRESS
Now lie quite still… Sh … don't move…

POET
Yes, but why?

ACTRESS
You would rather like to have an affair with me?

POET

I should think that's obvious by now.

ACTRESS
There are many who would like that…

POET
But it would seem that at the moment the odds are on my side…

ACTRESS
Then, come, my cricket! I shall call you "cricket" from now on.

POET
All right…

ACTRESS
Now, tell me, whom am I deceiving?

POET
Whom?… Perhaps me…

ACTRESS
Child, you have softening of the brain.

POET
Or some one … some one whom you have never seen … some one, whom you don't even know, some one — who is predestined for you and whom you will never find…

ACTRESS
Please don't talk such magnificent nonsense.

POET
… Isn't it strange … you too — and yet one could think. — But no, it would destroy the best in you, if one should … come, come — come. —

ACTRESS
That's better than acting in idiotic plays… Don't you think so?

POET
Well, it seems to me, that it is a good thing you sometimes have to act in an intelligent one.

ACTRESS
You conceited puppy. I suppose you are thinking of one of your own plays again.

POET
Yes, I am.

ACTRESS
(Seriously) It is really a splendid play!

POET
Well, then!

ACTRESS
You are a great genius, Robert!

POET
And you might also tell me now why you didn't turn up the day before yesterday. There was absolutely nothing the matter with you.

ACTRESS
Well, I wanted to annoy you.

POET
But why? What have I done to you? —

ACTRESS
You were over-bearing.

POET
In what way?

ACTRESS
Everybody at the theater thinks you are.

POET
Really.

ACTRESS
But I told them, he has a perfect right to be over-bearing.

POET
And what did they say?

ACTRESS
What could they say? I am not on speaking-terms with any of them.

POET
Oh, I see.

ACTRESS
They would like nothing better than to poison me, every one of them. But they won't succeed.

POET
Don't think now of others. Let's be happy that we are here together, and tell me that you love me.

ACTRESS
What further proof can you want?

POET
It's a thing that can't be proven anyway.

ACTRESS

I like that! What else do you want?

POET
How many are there that you have tried to convince in this way … did you love all of them?

ACTRESS
No, I have loved only one.

POET
(Embraces her) My…

ACTRESS
Dick.

POET
My name is Robert. What can I mean to you, if you are thinking of Dick, now?

ACTRESS
You are a mood of mine.

POET

I am pleased to know it.

ACTRESS
Well, tell me, aren't you proud?

POET
Why should I be proud?

ACTRESS
It seems to me that you have good reason to be.

POET
Oh, because of that.

ACTRESS
Yes, because of that, my little cricket! — What about the chirping? Are they still chirping?

POET
All the time. Don't you hear them?

ACTRESS
Of course, I hear them. But, child, those are frogs.

POET
You are wrong. Frogs croak.

ACTRESS
Of course, they croak.

POET
But this is not croaking, child, this is chirping.

ACTRESS
You are about the most stubborn person I have ever met. Kiss me, froggie.

POET
Please don't call me that. It gets on my nerves.

ACTRESS
Well, what shall I call you?

POET
My name is Robert.

ACTRESS
Oh, but that's stupid.

POET
But won't you please call me simply by my own name?

ACTRESS
Well, then, Robert, give me a kiss… Ah! (She kisses him) Now, are you satisfied, froggie?

POET
May I light a cigarette?

ACTRESS
Give me one too. (He takes his cigarette-case from the dressing-table; takes two cigarettes out; lights both, and gives her one) By the way, you haven't said a word about my performance yesterday.

POET
What performance?

ACTRESS
Well.

POET
Oh, yes. I wasn't at the theater.

ACTRESS
You are joking.

POET
Not in the least. When you didn't turn up the day before, I assumed you hadn't fully recovered yesterday, and so I decided not to go.

ACTRESS
You missed something wonderful.

POET
Yes.

ACTRESS
It was a sensation. The people actually grew pale.

POET
You saw that?

ACTRESS

Benno said: Child, you acted divinely.

POET
Hm!… And so ill the day before.

ACTRESS
Indeed I was. And do you know why? Because I felt such a longing for you.

POET

A little while ago you said that you stayed away just to annoy me.

ACTRESS
But what do you know about my love for you? Everything leaves you cold. And I have been delirious for nights. In a high fever — hundred and four degrees.

POET
Rather high for a mood.

ACTRESS
You call that a mood? I am dying for love of you, and you call it a mood —?

POET
And Dick…?

ACTRESS
Dick?… Don’t talk to me about that galley-slave! —

THE ACTRESS AND THE COUNT

THE BEDROOM OF the ACTRESS*, luxuriously furnished. It is midday. The curtains are still down; a candle is burning on the dressing-table. The* ACTRESS is disclosed in her four-poster bed. Many newspapers are strewn about on the cover. The COUNT in the uniform of a captain of the Dragoons enters. He remains standing at the door.

ACTRESS
Ah, Count.

COUNT
Your mother said I might, otherwise I would not —

ACTRESS
Please, come closer.

COUNT

I kiss your hand. Pardon me — when you come in from the street … I can't see a thing yet. So … here we are (at her bed). I kiss your hand.

ACTRESS
Please sit down, Count.

COUNT
Your mother said, My daughter isn't well… Nothing serious, I hope.

ACTRESS
Nothing serious? I was on the verge of death.

COUNT
Oh, dear, oh, dear, is it possible?

ACTRESS
It is very good of you to have taken the trouble to call.

COUNT
On the verge of death! And only last night you acted divinely.

ACTRESS
It was a great triumph, wasn't it?

COUNT
Tremendous!… The audience was carried away. I won't say anything about myself.

ACTRESS
Thanks, for the beautiful flowers.

COUNT
Nothing at all, Mademoiselle.

ACTRESS
(Indicating with her eyes a large flower-basket, which stands on a little table near the window) There they are.

COUNT
You were literally overwhelmed with flowers and wreaths yesterday.

ACTRESS
They are still in my dressing-room. All I brought home was your flowers.

COUNT
(Kissing her hand) How sweet of you.

ACTRESS
(Suddenly seizes his hand, and kisses it)

COUNT
But, Mademoiselle.

ACTRESS
Don't be frightened, Count, it doesn't put you under any obligations.

COUNT
You are a strange being … a sort of a problem almost — (Pause)

ACTRESS
Miss Birken, I suppose, is much less of a problem.

COUNT
That little lady isn't a problem at all, although … I really know her only very slightly.

ACTRESS
Oh!

COUNT
That's the actual truth. But you are a problem. I've always had a yearning for a problem. It's really been a deep personal loss to me, that until yesterday… I never saw you act.

ACTRESS
Really?

COUNT
Yes! You see, going to the theater is so complicated. I am used to dining late … then when I get there, the best part of the play is over. Isn't that true?

ACTRESS
From now on, I suppose, you will dine earlier.

COUNT
I've thought of that too. Or maybe I won't dine at all. Dining isn't a special pleasure anyhow.

ACTRESS
Are there any pleasures left to an old man like you?

COUNT
That's a question I often ask myself. But I am not an old man. There must be some other reason.

ACTRESS
Do you think so?

COUNT
Yes. Bobby, for instance, says, that I am a philosopher. You know he means that I do too much thinking.

ACTRESS
Yes … thinking is a misfortune.

COUNT

I have too much time, that's why I reflect. You see, I've often thought if they would transfer me to Vienna, things would be better. There's diversion here, stimulation. But at the bottom, it's not really very different from up there.

ACTRESS
What do you mean by "up there"?

COUNT
Well, down there, you know, in Hungary, in the God forsaken country towns, where I've been stationed most of the time.

ACTRESS
And what did you do in Hungary?

COUNT
Well, as I am telling you, military service.

ACTRESS
Yes, but why did you stay in Hungary so long?

COUNT

Oh, things happen that way.

ACTRESS
But it must be enough to drive one mad.

COUNT
But why? You have a lot more work there, than here. You know, drilling recruits, breaking in mounts … and the country really isn't as bad as they say. They are really quite beautiful, the lowlands — and marvelous sunsets. Too bad I'm not a painter, I've often thought if I were, I would paint them. We had a young chap, Splany, in our regiment, who could do it. — But, dear me, what dull stories I am telling you.

ACTRESS
Please go on; they are delightful!

COUNT
Do you know, the nice thing about you is the way one can chat with you, Bobby told me all about it. And it's so seldom one can find any one like that.

ACTRESS
Down there in Hungary, I suppose.

COUNT
But it's quite the same in Vienna! People are always the same. Where there are more of them, the crowd is larger. That's the whole difference. Tell me, do you really like people?

ACTRESS
Like them —? I hate them! I hate to look at them. I never see any one. I'm always alone. Nobody enters my house.

COUNT
You see, I sort of thought that you hated people. It must often be the case with artists. If one lives in the higher regions… Well, you are lucky, you know at least why you live!

ACTRESS
Who told you that? I haven't the slightest notion what I'm living for!

COUNT
But really — to be famous — to be fêted —

ACTRESS
Does that mean happiness?

COUNT
Happiness? There really is no such thing as happiness. All the things that people talk about most, don't exist … for instance, love. That's one of them.

ACTRESS

I suppose you are right.

COUNT
Enjoyment … intoxication … very good, nobody can deny them … they are something real. Now, when I am enjoying myself … very good, I am aware that I am enjoying myself. Or I am intoxicated, good. That also is something real. And when it's over, well then it's over.

ACTRESS
(Grandly) It is over.

COUNT
But as soon as one does not, how shall I express it, as soon as one does not give oneself up to the moment, I mean, if one thinks of the future or the past … well, everything is over in a moment… Afterwards … there is sadness … before … there is uncertainty … in a word, one only becomes confused. Isn't that so?

ACTRESS
(Nods with wide open eyes) It seems, you have grasped the essence of things.

COUNT
And, you see, when you have once clearly grasped this, it really doesn't matter whether you live in Vienna or in the Puszta or in Steinamanger. You see, for instance … where may I put my cap? Yes, thank you … what were we talking about?

ACTRESS
About the Puszta.

COUNT
Of course. Well, as I said, there isn't much difference, whether I spend the evening in the officers' mess or at the club. It's all the same.

ACTRESS
And what about love?

COUNT
If you believe in it, some one will always be there who will love you.

ACTRESS
Like Miss Birken, for example.

COUNT

I really don't see why you always have to come back to that little lady.

ACTRESS
But she's your mistress, isn't she?

COUNT

Who says so?

ACTRESS
Everybody knows it.

COUNT
Except myself, strange to say.

ACTRESS
But you fought a duel on her account!

COUNT
Maybe. I was even killed without my knowing it.

ACTRESS
You are a gentleman, won't you sit closer to me?

COUNT
With pleasure.

ACTRESS
Here. (She draws him to her, and passes her hand through his hair) I knew you would come to-day.

COUNT
How did you know?

ACTRESS

I knew it last night in the theater.

COUNT
You saw me from the stage, then?

ACTRESS
But man alive! Didn't you notice that I acted for you alone?

COUNT
No, really?

ACTRESS

I was as on wings, when I saw you sitting in the first row.

COUNT
As on wings? On my account? I hadn't the slightest suspicion that you noticed me!

ACTRESS
Your aristocratic reserve is enough to drive one to despair.

COUNT
But…

ACTRESS
“But”!… At least, take your saber off!

COUNT
If you permit.
(Takes it off, and leans it against the bed)

ACTRESS
And now give me a kiss.

COUNT
(Kisses her, she clings to him)

ACTRESS
It would have been better if I had never seen you.

COUNT
But this seems better to me.

ACTRESS
Count, you are a poseur!

COUNT
I — why?

ACTRESS
Can’t you imagine how happy many a man would be if he were in your place!

COUNT
I’m perfectly happy.

ACTRESS
Well, I thought happiness didn’t exist. Why do you look at me that way? I believe you are afraid of me, Count!

COUNT

I told you, Mademoiselle, you are a problem.

ACTRESS
Oh, don’t bother me with your philosophy … come to me. And ask me for anything at all … you can have whatever you want. You are so handsome.

COUNT
Well then, may I ask (kissing her hand) that I may call again this evening?

ACTRESS
This evening … but I have to act then.

COUNT
After the play.

ACTRESS
And you ask for nothing else?

COUNT

I shall ask for everything else after the play.

ACTRESS
(Hurt) You can beg a long while then, you abominable poseur.

COUNT
But, see, we've been perfectly frank with each other so far … it seems to me it would be so much more beautiful after the play … much cozier than now, when … I have a sort of feeling the door might open any moment…

ACTRESS
It does not open from the outside.

COUNT
Well, you see, I have an idea one shouldn't lightly spoil in advance something which may be very beautiful.

ACTRESS
Possibly!…

COUNT
To tell the truth, love in the morning seems rather horrible to me.

ACTRESS
Well — you are about the worst case of lunacy I have ever met!

COUNT

I am not talking about women in general … because in general it doesn't make any difference anyway. But women like you … no, you may call me a fool a hundred times over. But women like you … one doesn't take them before breakfast. And so … you know … so…

ACTRESS
Oh, but you are a darling!

COUNT
You understand, what I have said, don't you? I sort of imagine it like…

ACTRESS
How do you imagine it?

COUNT
Like this… I wait for you in a carriage after the play, then we drive somewhere for supper —

ACTRESS

I am not Miss Birken.

COUNT

I didn't mean to say you were. Only, it seems to me, you have to be in the right sort of mood for everything. In my case the mood doesn't come until supper. The most beautiful thing of all is when we drive home together, and then…

ACTRESS
And then?

COUNT
And then … well, that depends upon circumstances.

ACTRESS
Do sit closer. Closer.

COUNT
(Sitting down on the bed) Seems to me, that out of the pillows comes a fragrance … mignonette — isn't it?

ACTRESS
It's very warm in here, don't you think so?

COUNT
(Bends down, and kisses her neck)

ACTRESS
Oh, Count, that is contrary to your program.

COUNT
Who said anything about "program." I never have any program.

ACTRESS
(Drawing him close to her)

COUNT
It really is very warm.

ACTRESS
Do you think so? And so dark, just as if it were evening… (Draws him toward her) It is evening … it is night… Close your eyes, if there is too much light for you. Come!… Come!…

COUNT
(Offers no further resistance)

ACTRESS
And what about atmosphere now, you poseur?

COUNT
You are a little devil.

ACTRESS
What a thing to say!

COUNT
Well, then an angel.

ACTRESS
You should have been an actor! Really! You understand women! And do you know, what I shall do now?

COUNT
Well?

ACTRESS

I shall tell you that I shall never see you again.

COUNT
But why?

ACTRESS
Never, never. You are too dangerous! You would drive a woman mad. Here you are standing before me, as though nothing had happened.

COUNT
But…

ACTRESS
Please remember, Count, I have just given you everything.

COUNT

I shall never forget it!

ACTRESS
And what about to-night?

COUNT

What do you mean?

ACTRESS
Well — you wanted to wait for me after the theater?

COUNT
Oh, yes, let’s say, the day after to-morrow.

ACTRESS
What do you mean by “the day after to-morrow”? We were talking about to-day.

COUNT
There wouldn’t be much sense in that.

ACTRESS
Old man!

COUNT
You don’t quite understand me. What I mean has rather to do, how shall I express myself, rather concerns the soul.

ACTRESS
What concern of mine is your soul?

COUNT
Believe me, it has much to do with it. It seems all wrong to me, this notion, that you can separate the two.

ACTRESS
Don’t bother me with your philosophy. If I want any of that, I can read books.

COUNT
One never learns from books.

ACTRESS
Very true! And that’s why you ought to wait for me to-night. As to the soul, we will come to some sort of an understanding, you villain!

COUNT
Well, then, if I may, I shall wait in my carriage…

ACTRESS
You shall wait for me here in my home —

COUNT
… After the play.

ACTRESS
Of course.

(He buckles on his sword)

ACTRESS
What are you doing?

COUNT
It seems to me it is time for me to go. For a formal call I have stayed a bit too long as it is.

ACTRESS
Well, this evening it shall be a formal call.

COUNT
Do you think so?

ACTRESS
I'll take care of that. And now give me a last kiss, you darling little philosopher. Here, you seducer, you … sweet child, you seller of souls, you … panther. (After she has ardently kissed him several times, she thrusts him violently away) Count, you have done me a great honor.

COUNT
Not at all, mademoiselle! (At the door) Au revoir.

ACTRESS
Good-by, and love to Steinamanger.

THE COUNT AND THE GIRL OF THE STREETS

IT IS MORNING toward six o'clock. A poorly furnished room with one window. The dirty yellowish blinds are down. Tattered, greenish curtains. On the dresser are several photographs, and beside them a cheap woman's hat of conspicuously bad taste. Behind the mirror are cheap Japanese fans. On the table over which is drawn a reddish cover is an oil-lamp. It is burning low with a disagreeable odor, and has a shade of yellow paper. Beside it is a pitcher with remains of beer, and a half-empty glass. — On the floor beside the bed a woman's clothes are lying in disorder. They look as though they had just been quickly thrown off. The GIRL lies sleeping in the bed, breathing quietly. The COUNT is lying on the sofa fully dressed with his light overcoat on. His hat lies on the floor at the head of the sofa.

COUNT

(Stirs, rubs his eyes, sits up suddenly, remains seated, and looks around) Where am I?… Oh, yes … I actually went home with the woman, it seems… (He rises quickly, notices her bed) Oh, there she is… Queer, what sort of things can happen, even at my age. I haven't the faintest notion, did they carry me up here? No… I remember — coming into the room… I was still awake then, or waked up … or … or maybe it's only the room that reminds of something?… 'Pon my soul, yes, of course … it was yesterday I saw it… (Looks at his watch) What! yesterday, a couple of hours ago! — But, I knew, that something had to happen… I felt it in my bones … when I began to drink yesterday, I felt that … and what has happened?… Nothing… Or did there…? 'Pon my soul … for … for ten years it hasn't happened to me that I don't know… Well, let's be honest at any rate, I was drunk… If I only knew since when… I remember perfectly when Bobby and I went into the all-night café, and … no, no… We left together … and then on the way… Yes, that's it, Bobby and I rode in my carriage… But, why do I worry my brains about it? It doesn't really matter. Let's see that we get out of here. (Rises. The lamp shakes) Oh! (Looks at the sleeping GIRL) Well, she sleeps the sleep of the just. I don't remember anything — but I'll put the money on the table … and then, good-by… (He stands in front of her, and looks at her for a considerable time) If I didn't know what she is! (Studies her) I've known many who didn't look as virtuous even in their sleep. 'Pon my soul… Bobby would say again, I'm philosophizing, but the truth is, sleep makes all equal, so it seems to me — like its brother, death… Hm, I should like to know, whether… No, I'd remember that… No, no, I dropped like a log on the sofa right away … and nothing happened… It is unbelievable how much alike all women sometimes look… Well, let's go (He is about to go) Oh, of course.

(He takes his wallet, and is about to take out a banknote)

GIRL

(Awakening) Well … who's there so early in the morning —? (Recognizing him) Good morning, sonny!

COUNT

Good morning. Have a good sleep?

GIRL

(Stretching) Oh, come here. Give me a little kiss.

COUNT
(Bends down to her, considers, and draws back) I was just going…

GIRL
Going?

COUNT
It's really about time.

GIRL
You want to go away?

COUNT
(Half-embarrassed) Well…

GIRL
Well, good-by, you'll come some other time.

COUNT
Yes, good-by. But, won't you give me your hand?

GIRL
(Reaches out her hand from under the cover)

COUNT
(Takes her hand, and kisses it mechanically, and becoming aware of it, he smiles) Just as with a princess. Besides, if one only…

GIRL
Why do you look at me that way?

COUNT
If one only sees the head, as now … anyway, each and every one looks innocent when she first awakes … 'pon my soul, one might imagine almost anything, if the kerosene didn't smell so…

GIRL
Yes, the lamps are always a nuisance.

COUNT
How old are you really?

GIRL
Well, what would you guess?

COUNT
Twenty-four.

GIRL

Oh, of course!

COUNT
Older?

GIRL
I'm not yet twenty.

COUNT
And how long have you been…

GIRL

A year.

COUNT
You began early.

GIRL
Better too early, than too late.

COUNT
(Sits down upon her bed) Tell me, are you really happy?

GIRL
Am I, what?

COUNT

I mean, are things going well with you?

GIRL
Oh, things always go well with me.

COUNT
Yes… Well, did it never occur to you that you might become something else?

GIRL
What might I become?

COUNT
Well… You are a very pretty girl. You might take a lover, for example.

GIRL
Do you imagine I haven't any?

COUNT
Yes, I know that — But I mean just one single one, who would take care of you, so that you wouldn't have to go with everybody.

GIRL

I don’t go with everybody. Thank heaven, I don’t have to. I pick those I want.

COUNT
(Looks around the room)

GIRL
(Noticing it) We move downtown next month, to the Spiegelgasse.

COUNT
We? Who?

GIRL
Well, the Madam, and the couple of other girls who live here.

COUNT
There are others —

GIRL
Next door … don’t you hear?… that is Milly. She was in the café too.

COUNT

I hear some one snoring.

GIRL
That’s Milly. She will snore the whole day long until ten o’clock to-night. Then she gets up, and goes to the café.

COUNT
What an awful life!

GIRL
Of course it is. It annoys the Madam a lot. I’m always on the streets by noon.

COUNT
What do you do on the streets at noon?

GIRL
What do you suppose I do? I’m going on my beat then.

COUNT
Oh, yes … of course… (Rises, takes out his wallet, and puts a banknote on the table) Good-by!

GIRL

Going already… Good-by… Call again soon.
(Turns on her side)

COUNT
(Stands still) Tell me, is everything a matter of indifference to you already?

GIRL
What?

COUNT

I mean, don't you get pleasure out of anything any more?

GIRL
(Yawning) I want to sleep.

COUNT
It's all the same to you whether he is young or old or whether he…

GIRL
Why do you ask?

COUNT
… Well (Suddenly hitting upon a thought) 'pon my soul, now I know of whom you remind me, it's…

GIRL
Do I look like some one?

COUNT
Unbelievable, unbelievable. Now please, don't talk, at least not for a minute… (Looking at her) The very same features. (He kisses her suddenly on the eyes), the very image.

GIRL
Well…

COUNT
'Pon my soul, it's too bad that you … aren't something different… You could make your fortune!

GIRL
You talk just like Frank.

COUNT
Who is Frank?

GIRL
The waiter in our café.

COUNT

In what way am I just like Frank?

GIRL
He is also always telling me I might make my fortune, and wanting me to marry him.

COUNT
Why don't you?

GIRL
No thank you… I don't want to marry, no, not for any price… Later on, perhaps.

COUNT
The eyes … the very same eyes… Bobby would surely call me a fool. — But I must kiss your eyes once more … so … and now God bless you, now I must go.

GIRL
Good-by…

COUNT
(At the door) Tell me … aren't you a bit surprised?…

GIRL
At what?

COUNT
That I don't want anything of you.

GIRL
There are many men who aren't in the mood in the morning.

COUNT
Of course… (To himself) Absurd, that I expect to be surprised… Well, good-by… (He is near the door) But really, I'm disappointed. I ought to know that women like her care only about money … what am I saying … it is beautiful, that at least she doesn't pretend; should make one glad… (Aloud) Do you know, I shall come to see you again soon?

GIRL
(With closed eyes) All right.

COUNT
When are you at home?

GIRL
I'm always at home. You only have to ask for Leocadia.

COUNT
Leocadia… All right — Well, God bless you. (At the door) The wine is still in my head. But after all it is sublime… I am with a woman like her and haven't done anything but kiss her eyes, because she reminded me of some one… (Turns toward her) Tell me, Leocadia, does it often happen that any one leaves you in this way?

GIRL
What way?

COUNT
As I do.

GIRL
In the morning?

COUNT
No … have you ever had any one with you, — who didn't want anything of you?

GIRL
No, that has never happened to me.

COUNT
Well, what do you think then? Do you think I didn't like you?

GIRL
Why shouldn't you like me? You liked me well enough by night.

COUNT

I like you now, too.

GIRL
But you liked me better last night.

COUNT
What makes you think that?

GIRL
Why ask such foolish questions?

COUNT
Last night … well, tell me, didn't I drop right down on the sofa?

GIRL
Certainly … with me.

COUNT
With you?

GIRL

Yes, don't you remember?

COUNT

I did … both of us…

GIRL
But you fell asleep right away.

COUNT
Right away… So … that's what happened?…

GIRL
Yes, sonny. But you must have been terribly drunk, that you don't remember.

COUNT
So… And yet … there is a faint resemblance… Good-by… (Listens) … What is the matter?

GIRL
The servant is up. Give her a tip as you go out. The outside door is open, so you won't have to give anything to the janitor.

COUNT
(In the anteroom) Well… It would have been beautiful, if I had kissed her only on the eyes. It would have been almost an adventure… But it wasn't my destiny. (The servant opens the door) Ah — here… Good-night. —

SERVANT
Good morning!

COUNT
Of course … good morning … good morning.

The Mate (1898)

A PLAY IN ONE ACT

Translated by Horace B. Samuel, 1913

Original German Title: 'Die Gefährtin'

CONTENTS

CHARACTERS
THE MATE

CHARACTERS

PROFESSOR ROBERT PILGRAM.

DOCTOR ALFRED HAUSMANN.

PROFESSOR WERKMANN.

PROFESSOR BRAND.

OLGA MERHOLM.

A SERVANT.

The Scene takes place in a summer resort not far from Vienna.

Time: an Autumn Evening,

THE MATE

An artistic room. Wall-paper and furniture in light tones, mostly blue. A lady's escritoire on the Left in front; piano on the Right. On the Right a door, on the Left a door. In the background a large open door which leads on to the balcony.

A view onto the landscape; a street with a gradual incline extending a long distance, eventually shut off from view by a churchyard wall. The wall is not high; gravestones and crosses can be seen. Far army in the distance mountains in a haze, not very high. It is late in the evening, nearly night, the country is plunged in darkness, pale moonlight in the lonely streets.

ROBERT comes out of the room on the Right, leading in two gentlemen, PROFESSOR WERKMANN and PROFESSOR BRAND.

ROBERT. I'm afraid it's very dark here, gentlemen:
I'll fetch a light.

WERKMANN. Thank you, my good friend, we can manage to find our way quite well.

ROB. Just one minute. (Exit.)

WERKMANN and BRAND stand alone in the darkness.

WERK. He is very self-possessed.

BRAND. It's all pose.

WERK. When a man is burying his wife, he doesn't go in for any poses. You take it from me; I've been through it all. What would be the point of it?

BRAND; YOU don't know what Pilgram is like.
It's tremendously effective, don't you see, to bury one's wife in the afternoon and then go and debate scientific subjects for two hours on end in the evening. You see — you were taken in by it as well.

WERK. All the same, one must be a thorough man —

BRAND. Or a thorough-Enter ROBERT with a candlestick, in which two candles are burning,

ROB. Here I am, gentlemen. (The room is only half illuminated,)

WERK. Where are we, then?

ROB. It was my poor wife's room. Those little steps lead straight to the garden gate, and in five minutes you will be at the station.

BRAND. We shall be in time, then, for the nine o'clock train?

ROB. Of course.

The door on the Right opens, the servant enters. He has a wreath in his hand,

ROB. What is it?

SERVANT. Some one from the town has just been here and left this wreath.

ROB. Just now?

WERK. Probably one of your friends who learnt the news too late. You'll see, you'll get some more of these melancholy offerings to-morrow. Yes, yes — I know all about it, unfortunately.

ROB. (has read the inscription on the ribbon).
From my assistant; (explaining) he's still on the north coast.

BRAND. So Dr. Hausmann is on the north coast!

SERV. Where shall I put the wreath, sir?

WERK. The flowers have a shockingly strong scent.

BRAND. Of course they have. They are tuberoses.

ROB. Yes, and lilacs. (To the servant) On the balcony.

The SERVANT does as he is ordered, then exit.

WERK. Your assistant is still on his holiday?

ROB. He'll be back soon, anyway. Probably by to-morrow.

WERK. I suppose you will let him take your place at the beginning of the term.

ROB. Not a bit of it! I have not the slightest intention of making a break in my work.

WERK, (shaking his hand). Quite right, my dear friend; work is the only consolation.

ROB. There's this point as well. Even supposing it wasn't a consolation, it is very questionable if we should be justified in throwing a portion of our short existence clean away. Once we have had the calamity to survive most of what —

Exit with them, letting them go first.

WERK (to BRAND). He never loved his wife.

BRAND. Well, never mind.

All exeunt on the Right; stage empty for a few minutes. OLGA enters on the Left; she is in a dark evening dress without a hat, with a light fur wrap thrown over her. SERVANT comes in from the balcony.

SERV. Good evening, madam.

OLGA. I suppose the Professor is in the garden?

SERV. The Professor has two gentlemen —

OLGA makes a sign to the SERVANT, as

ROBERT comes in on the Left without noticing her.

ROB. (going to the escritoire). I say, Franz, do you know the exact time the last train from town gets here?

SERV. At ten o'clock, sir.

ROB. I see. (Pause.) It's possible that Dr. Hausmann will get here to-night. In that case I want you to show him in immediately.

SERV. Here?

ROB. Yes, here, if I happen to be in this room.
Exit SERVANT, and ROBERT sits down at the escritoire and begins to open it.

OLGA (going behind him.) Good evening.

ROB. (coldly). Olga! (He stands up.)

OLGA (in an embarrassment, which she strains every nerve to master, succeeding for isolated moments). I've never had a chance the whole day of pressing your hand.

ROB. Quite true! We've scarcely exchanged a single word. I thank you. (Holds out his hand.)

OLGA. You have many friends — to-day proved it.

ROB. Yes, the last two have only just gone.

OLGA. Who was here so late, then?

ROB. Brand, and that snivelling windbag Werkmann. He's fatuously proud of the fact that he lost his own wife last year. That's the real truth. He talks about these matters like an expert, the disgusting fellow — (Pause.) But to think of your leaving your villa so late!

OLGA. Do you think I am frightened of taking the path across the fields alone?

ROB. No; but your husband will be uneasy.

OLGA. Oh, no! He quite believes that I am already asleep in my room. Besides, I very often go for a walk in the garden late in the evening — you ought to know that.

ROB. In our avenue, you mean?

OLGA. Our —? You mean the one along the trellis?

ROB. Yes; I always think of it as only for you and me.

OLGA. I often wander about in it, all alone.

ROB. But not at night?

OLGA. In the evenings. It is most beautiful then.

ROB. Your garden has something very peaceful about it.

OLGA. Yes, hasn't it? (sincerely). Anyway, you must soon come and see us. You'll feel much better with us — than you do here.

ROB. That's quite possible. (He looks at her, and then turns towards the back.) You see, that leads outside, (OLGA nods).

ROB. It's hard to believe that it happened only a few hours ago. Can you bring yourself to realise that this same dark path was once bathed in sunlight?
(Pause.) When I close my eyes — I suddenly see the sun again. Strange! I even hear the rumble of the carriages. (Pause. He is very nervous and distrait in his manner.) You are quite right, there were an awful lot of people there. When one thinks that everybody came from town — it's really quite a journey. Have you seen the wreath from my pupils?

OLGA. Of course!

ROB. Magnificent, isn't it? And all that sympathy!
Some of my colleagues have even broken up their holiday in order to come; it is really extraordinarily — what's the word— "considerate," isn't it?

OLGA. It's perfectly natural.

ROB. I daresay it is; but I ask myself if all my grief really deserves this sympathy or this expression of sympathy.

OLGA (almost shocked). How can you say that?

ROB. Because I myself feel so little. I only know that she is dead — but I realise this with such awful clearness that it tortures me — everything is as cold and clear as the air on a winter day.

OLGA. It won't remain so. The pain will come, and that will be much better.

ROB. Who knows if it will come — it is too long ago.

OLGA (frigidly). Too long ago! — what is too long ago?

ROB. Since she — lived for me — since we lived for each other.

OLGA. Yes, that's usually the case in most marriages. (She goes to the balcony and looks at the wreath.)

ROB. It arrived late this evening — from Doctor
Hausmann.

OLGA. Oh! (She looks at the inscription on the ribbon, ROBERT looks at OLGA; she notices it.) He isn't here yet?

ROB. No! But I telegraphed to him at once at Scheveningen, and I regard it as quite on the cards that he'll still arrive to-night. If, when he gets to Vienna, he drives across from one station to the other —

OLGA. He'll be sure to do that.

ROB. In that case he will be here in an hour.

OLGA (with forced confidence). What a great shock it must have been to him.

ROB. No doubt. (Pause; quietly). Be frank with me, Olga. There must be some reason at the bottom of your coming here again; I can see it in your manner. Just tell me quite simply what it is.

OLGA. It is harder than I thought,

BOB. (impatiently, but with great mastery over himself). Well, then?

OLGA. I came to ask a favour of you.

ROB. If I can do it.

OLGA. Quite easily. It's about some letters which
I wrote to poor Eveline, and which I should like to have back.

BOB. Why in such a hurry?

OLGA. I thought that when everything was all over, the first thing that you would do, would of course be —

BOB. What?

OLGA (pointing to the escritoire). What you were on the point of doing when I came in. (In a mollifying tone) I would do the same thing if anyone whom I loved had died.

ROB. (with nervous excitement). "Loved"— "loved."

OLGA. Well, say who was very dear to me — it's just a way of recalling a person. (She speaks the following lines like a passage she has learnt by heart.)
But it might have chanced that just my letters would fall into your hands first — it was to prevent that that I came here to-night. Those letters contain things which you must not read under any circumstances — things which were only intended for another woman — especially certain letters which I wrote two or three years ago.

BOB. Where are they, then? Perhaps you know where they can be found.

OLGA. I'll find them at once, if you will allow me —

ROB. Are you going to —?

OLGA. I think that's the simplest way, as I know where they are. But you can open the drawer and
I will tell you exactly —

ROB. It is not necessary: here is the key.

OLGA. Thank you. But you mustn't think me in any way disingenuous over all this.

ROB. Why? Why should I?

OLGA. Sometime I'll tell you the whole thing — I mean what up to the present only Eveline knew — even at the risk of your losing your regard for me.
But you must not learn it by accident — like this.

ROB. I shall never lose my regard for you.

OLGA. Who knows? You always thought too highly of me.

ROB. I don't think, anyway, that I could learn anything new about you from those letters. I'm sure it's not your own secrets you want to preserve.

OLGA (shrewdly). Whose should they be, then?

ROB. Somebody else's secrets, I should think.

OLGA. What are you thinking about? Eveline had no secrets from you.

ROB. I ask no questions — take your letters.

OLGA (unlocks the escritoire, looks in the drawer).
Here they are. Yes. (She takes out a little packet tied together with a blue ribbon, holding it in such a way that ROBERT cannot see it, and finally conceals it, but not too palpably, under her wrap.) Thank you very much.
Now I must go. Good-bye. (She gets up to go.)

ROB. Wouldn't it be advisable to look in the other drawer as well? Only a single note need be left behind — and all your precautions are useless.

OLGA (less confidently). What do you mean? —
"useless"?

HOB. You could have spared yourself the trouble,
Olga.

OLGA. What do you mean? I don't understand you at all.

ROB. You say that of all people, you who knew perfectly well the relations existing between Eveline and myself?

OLGA. After one has been married ten years —
But that hasn't got anything to do with my letters.

ROB. And you think that even ten years ago I was under any illusion? That would be extremely foolish on the part of a man who married a wife twenty years younger than himself. I knew perfectly well that I had one or two beautiful years at the outside to look forward to. Yes! I was perfectly clear on the point. One can't talk about being under an illusion. But after all, how many years have we got? Life is not long enough for a man to be able straight away to give up a year of happiness. Besides, a year is enough — at any rate, for the happiness one gets out of women. I mean, of course, women with whom one is in love. One has soon finished with them. There are a lot of other things in life which are much more important.

OLGA. That's possible — but one doesn't always realise it.

ROB. I always realised it. She never really filled my life, not even in that year of happiness. In a certain sense she more than filled it — her atmosphere, if you know what I mean. But even her atmosphere must needs of course be dissipated. All these things are really quite obvious. (He speaks with increasing emotion, but still externally calm.) We had nothing more in common than the memory of a short-lived happiness, and I can tell you that that kind of common memories separates people rather than unites them.

OLGA. I can conceive of it turning out quite differently.

ROB. So can I. But not with a creature like Eveline. She was made to be a mistress, not a mate.
You know that as well as I do.

OLGA. Mate! That's a very big word. How many women are really fitted to be that?

ROB. I never asked it of her. As a matter of fact, I never felt lonely. A man who has a calling (I don't mean an occupation — a calling, I say) can never feel lonely, whatever happens.

OLGA (unenthusiastically). That's the splendid thing about men — I mean men like you.

ROB. And when our happiness came to an end, I returned to my own life, which, as you know, she didn't understand much about, and went my own way — as she did hers.

OLGA. No, that wasn't the case. No! no!

ROB. Oh yes, it was! She told you more than you will tell me. So far as I'm concerned, it's quite unnecessary to take any letters away. There are no surprises, and no discoveries left for me. What do you really want? You are positively pathetic. You want to leave me an illusion — no, to envelop me in one, of which I have never been the victim. I know that I lost her long ago — long ago. (With increasing excitement) Or do you think I imagine for a single minute that when Eveline and I ceased to belong to each other, she proceeded to cut short her whole life? that she suddenly became an old woman because she had left me — or I her? I never believed that.

OLGA. But, Robert, I can't make out why you should get such notions into your head.

ROB. I know whose the letters are; they are not yours. I know that there is somebody in the world who is far more deeply to be pitied than I am — somebody who loved her. It is he who has lost her, not I — not I. You see that, so far as I am concerned, all this is unnecessary. It can only be that one who —

OLGA. You have made an awful mistake.

ROB. Please leave the subject, Olga. Otherwise
I may end by reading those letters. (Noticing a movement of Olga's) I won't do it, Olga. We will burn them before he comes.

OLGA. You will do that?

ROB. Yes! I intended to do so before you came.
I should have thrown all the contents of this escritoire into the fire without looking at them.

OLGA. Yes, I am sure you would not have done that.

ROB. You need not reproach yourself in any way.
Perhaps it's a good thing that I know everything now, without having to look at the letters. At any rate, it makes things clear, and that's the one boon that we ought to ask of life.

OLGA (seriously). You might have asked a great deal more.

ROB. I did, long ago, and then I did not ask in vain; but now — She was young, and I was old. That's the whole story: we'd understand it right enough in the case of other people — why not in this one?

At that moment a locomotive whistles in the distance. OLGA gives a start. Pause.

OLGA. As a favour to me, don't see him till to-morrow.

ROB. Do you think that I'm not calm? Do you really think that I? There's only one thing I've got to be careful about. He must never learn that I know — if he did, he would only suspect forgiveness and generosity in every word I spoke. No! I don't want that. That's not the case at all. I never hated him — I don't hate him; there's not the slightest reason why I should hate him, or the slightest reason why I should forgive him. I understand the whole thing far too well. She belonged to him — we mustn't forget the real point. Don't let us once more get so confused by the force of the conventional position as to forget that. It was to him that she belonged, not to me — and it couldn't have gone on much longer.

OLGA. Please, Robert, don't see him to-night.

ROB. You know perfectly well that she wanted to leave me.

OLGA. How should I know that?

ROB. Because she confided in you.

OLGA. Oh no!

ROB. How did you know, then, where these letters were to be found?

OLGA. I found out by chance once when she — read — one of them — when I was there — I didn't mean to hear — but —

ROB. But she had to have a confidante — of course she had. And you couldn't help being hers — that's all perfectly clear to me. No — things couldn't have gone on much longer. Do you think I haven't seen how both of them were ashamed of their lives — how both of them suffered? Why, I have actually longed for the moment to come when they should come to me and say, "Please free us." Why didn't they have the pluck? Why didn't I say to them, "Go, then. I won't keep you"? But we were all too cowardly — they and I. That's the senseless part of the whole thing. We always keep waiting for something to turn up to put an end to an impossible position — something that would have spared us the trouble of being honest with each other; and now and then that something does turn up, as in our case. (The noise of a carriage; short silence. OLGA very moved. ROBERT deliberately calm, goes on speaking.) And one must acknowledge that at any rate it was a dignified end. (The carriage stops.)

OLGA. You will — see him?

ROB. He must not see the letters.

OLGA. Let me go; I'll take them away.

ROB. This way, down these steps.

OLGA. I hear his step.

ROB. He has come through the garden, then.
(Takes the letters out of her hand and quickly shuts them up again in the drawer.) You stay. It is too late.
(Steps outside).

ALFRED comes in quickly; he wears a dark travelling-suit. He is slightly embarrassed when he sees OLGA. ROBERT goes forward to meet him, but remains standing after a few steps and waits for him to approach. ALFRED shakes hands with him, and then goes up to OLGA and shakes hands with her. A short silence.

ALFRED. We could never have dreamt of anything like this, seeing each other under these circumstances, could we?

ROB. You can't have stopped a minute in town, old man.

ALF. No! I couldn't, and be here to-night — and
I had to. (To OLGA) Shocking — shocking! — How did it happen? I know nothing at all. Just a word, I implore you.

ROBERT doesn't answer.

OLGA. It happened quite suddenly.

ALF. A heart attack, then?

ROB. Yes.

ALF. Without any previous symptoms?

ROB. Without any previous symptoms.

ALF. And when? where?

ROB. Two days ago in the afternoon, while she was going for her walk in the garden. The gardener saw her fall — just near the pond. I heard him shout from my room — and when I came down it was all over.

ALF. My poor dear fellow! What you must have suffered! One can't realise it — that young and vital —

OLGA. Perhaps it's the most beautiful fate.

ALF. That's poor consolation.

ROB. My telegram must have been delayed, I suppose?

ALF. Yes; otherwise I should have been here much earlier in the day. Yes, if there were such things as presentiments, something would have made me come home much earlier.

OLGA. But there aren't.

ALF. Quite true. It was a day just like any other — if possible, brighter and more cheerful than usual.

ROB. More cheerful than usual.

ALF. Of course — I remember it now. We had gone for a sail, right out into the sea, and then in the cool of the evening we went for a walk on the sands.

ROB. "We"?

ALF. Of course — a whole lot of us. And when I came back to the hotel I stood by my window looking out on to the sea for perhaps a quarter of an hour. I then turned on the light, and there was the telegram lying on the table. Ah! — (Pause — he holds his hand in front of his eyes. OLGA looks at

ROBERT, who is looking straight in front of him.

ALFRED takes his hands away from his eyes.) So this is — (heavily) her room!

ROB. Yes.

ALF. How often we used to sit here on the balcony. (Turning round, he looks out on to the street and sees the churchyard wall. Shudders.)
Over there?

ROBERT nods.

ALF. We will go there together to-morrow.

ROB. And you can put your wreath there yourself,
Alfred. It has just arrived.
Pause.

ALF. What are you going to do now, Robert?

ROB. What do you mean?

OLGA. I have asked the Professor to spend as much time as he possibly can with us at the villa during the next few months.

ALF. He certainly shouldn't stay here. You shouldn't stay in the place, Robert, where —

ROB. In any case I shall remove to town in the beginning of October. It's not long to wait. Besides, I shall look in at the laboratory once or twice. The two Americans who were here last year have been working since the end of August.

ALF. Yes, you told me that in your last letter.
But you mustn't go to town on that account.
You surely are not going to begin work straight away?

ROB. You really upset my nerves, Alfred. What else am I to do? I assure you that I am in the mood for work and nothing else.

ALF. But you won't be able to now.

ROB. You're saying just what all the others say.
I feel perfectly competent; why, I've even got a real desire for work.

ALF. I quite understand that; but that desire, as a matter of fact, is deceptive. I've got an idea (sincerely).
Come away with me. You'll give me a few more days' leave, and I'll take you with me.
What do you say to that, Frau Merholm?

OLGA (labouredly). A very good idea.

ROB. You want to go away — you want to go away now, Alfred?

ALF. In any case I was going to ask you for a few more days.

ROB. But where do you want to go to, then?

ALF. I want to go to the seaside again.

ROB. Back?

ALF. Yes, but with you. It will do you good — take it from me. Am I not right, Frau Merholm?

OLGA. Oh yes!

ALF. You'll travel with me to Scheveningen, and there spend a quiet few days with us.

ROB. "Us" — you say "us"?

ALF (slightly embarrassed). Yes.

ROB. What do you mean by "us"? Aren't you alone, then?

ALF. Of course I'm alone; but there are people in Scheveningen, don't you know, whom I see something of. There are some with whom I-ROB. Well?

ALF. I was going to tell you in a few days, anyway; but as this is the psychological moment — to put it shortly — I've got engaged there.

ROB. (quite coldly). Oh!

ALF. It makes no odds whether I tell you to-day or to-morrow; the world goes round all the same.
It is rather strange that just now —

ROB. Yes — I congratulate you.

ALF. That's why I said "with us" before; and now you will understand why I want to go back again.

ROB. That's perfectly easy to understand.

ALF. But please come, too. Her parents will be quite delighted to make your acquaintance. I've told them such a lot about you. They are charming people; and as for the girl, well, you'll see for yourself.

ROB. I don't think — I don't think — I — I shall have an opportunity later on. (He keeps up his pose of calmness with a great strain, but with complete success.) It's really quite a mad idea of yours that I should go with you now to the north coast to be introduced to your fiancée. How many millions has she got, by-the-bye?

ALF. (offended). What a question to ask! I am really not the kind of man to marry for money —

ROB. So it's a grande passion, is it?

ALF. Please, Robert, don't let's talk about it any more to-day. It's like — (He half says, "dese-cration.")

ROB. Why not? As you have rightly remarked, "The world goes round all the same." Let us confine ourselves to the land of the living. Where did you meet her? —

ALF. She lives in Vienna.

ROB. Oh! Now I know all about it.

ALF. Quite impossible.

ROB. Once you told me, don't you remember, about a fair-haired sweetheart of yours when you were still a student —

ALF. Well, what about it?

ROB. Well, meeting again after a long time — rebirth of the old love.

ALF. So that's what you think, is it? No, it's not she. I have only known my fiancée for the last two years, and I went to the seaside in order to see her.

ROB. So it was there that you fell in love with her.

ALF. Oh, I have known for ages that she was going to be my wife.

ROB. Really!

ALF. We have been secretly engaged for a year.

ROB. And you didn't breathe a word of it to me — to us. Oh!

ALF. There were certain reasons to be taken into account — her family was at first — but we understood each other from the beginning. I am in a position to say that it was a case of love at first sight.

ROB. Starting two years back?

ALF. Yes.

ROB. You were in love with her?

ALF. Yes.

ROB. And — she with you?

ALF. (almost mechanically). And she with me.

ROB. And what about the other woman? — the other woman?

ALF. What other woman? —

ROB. (holding him by the shoulder and pointing over the street with the other hand). The one over there. (ALFRED glances at OLGA.) What did you do with her?

ALF. (after a pause, leaning on the window). Why have you been playing with me all this time, Robert, if you knew? Why, if you already knew, did you speak to me like a friend? You had the right to do anything to me that you wanted, but not to play with me.

ROB. It was not a case of playing. I would have raised you from the ground if you had been broken by grief. I would have gone with you to her grave — if the woman who is lying over there had been your love; but you have turned her into your wanton, and you have filled this house with lies and foulness right up to the roof till it makes me sick — and that's why — that's why, yes, that's why I'm going to kick you out.

ALF. Perhaps I could explain even this.

ROB. Clear out — clear out — clear out!

Exit ALFRED.

ROB. So that's what you wanted to save me from?
Yes, I understand now; lucky for her that she passed away without an idea — of what she really meant to him.

OLGA (turns towards him). Without an idea?

ROB. What do you mean?

OLGA (after reflecting for a short time). She — knew it.

ROB. What — she actually-OLGA. She knew what she meant to him. Don't you see the whole situation? He neither deceived her nor humiliated her. Why, she had been prepared for his marriage as a matter of course for quite a long time. And when he wrote to her (points to the escritoire) she shed as few tears for him — as he did for her. They would never have come to you — to ask you for their freedom; they had all the freedom they wanted.

ROB. She — knew it? But you! — you wanted to hide those letters from me —

OLGA. Am I not giving you your freedom back again? For years and years you suffered at the hands of that woman — rushed from one self-deception into another, which made you love her more, and consequently suffer more. And now you want to torture yourself still further on account of a calamity which you only imagine, and which this particular woman was absolutely incapable of ever suffering, because she found life so easy, in a way that people like you can never understand.

ROB. And to think that I should know for the first time to-day! — for the first time! Why didn't you, who saw the whole thing, shake me out of my weakness? Why couldn't I know a year ago?
Even three days ago —

OLGA. I was afraid to do so — just as you would have been. Yes, as you would have been. You should have known — either not at all — or to-day.

ROB. Does it make any difference, her being dead?

OLGA. No difference at all! But it is clear, as it otherwise would never have been. So long as she was alive, her very existence — her very smile, would have given some semblance of importance to this miserable trumpery adventure — You could not have felt what you feel to-day, now that she is beyond the reach of your anger — and perhaps it will give you peace to think how far, how infinitely far, that woman lived away from you — that woman who just happened to die in your house. (Exit.)

ROBERT is silent for a short time; he then locks the escritoire drawer; then he stands up, goes to the door and calls “Franz.”

SERV. Yes, sir.

ROB. I am going away early to-morrow. Get everything ready, and have a cab at the house by seven o’clock.

SERV. Very good, sir.

ROB. (after short pause). I’ll give you all further directions to-morrow. Now you can go to bed. (As the SERV. stays) I’ll lock this room up myself — it is to remain locked up until I come back.

SERV. Very good, sir.

ROB. Good-night.

SERV. Good-night, sir. (Exit on the Right.)

ROBERT immediately locks the door. He then goes to the balcony; when he is about to close the windows, he notices the wreath. He picks it up, brings it into the room, and places it on the escritoire. He then goes to the door on the Left, with a light in his hand; he remains standing by the door, turns and looks round the room once more.
He takes a deep breath, and then gives a smile of relief and exit. The noise of his locking up is heard. The dark room remains empty for a time, then the curtain falls.

Paracelsus (1899)

A PLAY IN VERSE IN ONE ACT

Translated by Horace B. Samuel, 1913

CONTENTS

CHARACTERS
PARACELSUS
SCENE I
SCENE II
SCENE III
SCENE IV
SCENE V
SCENE VI
SCENE VII
SCENE VIII
SCENE IX
SCENE X
SCENE XI

CHARACTERS

CYPRIAN, AN ARMOURER.

JUSTINA, his wife.

CECILIA, her sister.

DOCTOR COPUS, Town Physician.

ANSELM, a Gallant.

THEOPHRASTUS BOMBASTUS HOHENHEIM, styled PARACELSUS.

The Scene takes place in Basel at the beginning of the sixteenth century, on a fine June morning, in the house of CYPRIAN.

PARACELSUS

A ROOM IN CYPRIAN'S house. The room is well furnished and has two doors, one leading L. into JUSTINA'S room, the other R. into the ante-room.

JUSTINA sits at the window busy with some work (at a distaff). Enter CECILIA.

SCENE I

JUSTINA (LOOKING UP quickly). What? back betimes?

CECILIA. Too noisy is the town. (She sits down.)
My head so ached, I needs must hie me home.
Had'st thou been with me in the market-place,
Thou had'st returned with me.

JUSTINA. Why so?

CECILIA. Since yonder
Teems such a press and babble of wild tongues
That no one in their wits can suffer it.

JUSTINA. Is there? What's to be seen? Are new jugglers come?

CECILIA. But did the girl not gossip?

JUSTINA. She came not

CECILIA. Nay, of a truth, she comes not home today.
The whole of Basel stands there wonderbound,
For all stream thither and all there remain,
As though the greatest wonder were on view.

JUSTINA. Prithee, what wonder sayst, thou crazy thing?

CECILIA. 'Tis but a mere quacksalver — nothing more.

JUSTINA. That only, sister?

CECILIA. Ay, we have already
Had here enow o' fellows of that kidney.
But what in him they so surpassing find —?

JUSTINA. He must be famous, or has travelled far —
Didst thou not hear his name?

CECILIA. There buzzed and buzzed
So many round me, I forgot it all.
Praise God that I am home — my head is spinning.

SCENE II

JUSTINA, CECILIA. ENTER DR. COPUS.

DR. C. I wish you both good morrow, worthy ladies.

JUSTINA. You come betimes (smiling). The child is sick again.

DR. C. Then 'tis the first to-day that waiteth me,
For all the others from me run away.

JUSTINA. Where are they?

DR. C. Where are they? Why, in the market!
Sir Paracelsus hath appeared to us:
What need remains of Doctor Copus now?

CECILIA. Why, yes, 'twas Paracelsus.

JUSTIN A. Paracelsus!
So it is he, that high renowned leech!

DR. C. (angry). What say you? — high renowned?

CECILIA (mollifying). She means it not.

DR. C. And "leech"? Then prithee dub me quacksalver,
And call me all unknown, if Paracelsus
Renownèd is, and leech!

CECILIA (almost anxiously). What is he then?

DR. C. A knave,
And now enough! (Breaks off.) How are you, gracious Mistress? (Feels CECILIA'S pulse.)

A little quick.

CECILIA. Have I not got the fever?

DR. C. Did you the powder duly take this morn?

CECILIA. For sure; as you prescribed it, Dr. Copus;
But, marry, my pulse is still too quick.

DR. C. And marry,
Had you perchance forborne to take the powder

‘Twere twice as quick.

CECILIA. Do you prescribe another
For me to-day?

DR. C. Your tongue, an so you please.

CECILIA puts out her tongue.

DR. C. Mistress, not bad; your tongue will pass, methinks.

CECILIA. ’Tis many a day since so my head did ache.

DR. C. (without listening to her, suddenly enraged again). And know you who stands yonder with the crowd?

JUSTINA. Who is’t? and where?

DR. C. Our Master Cyprian
Stands in the mart and listens to the knave.

JUSTINA. My husband —

DR. C. He who whilom scorned such folk
As homeless tramp in rags about the streets
Stands in the market — nay, stands on the steps
That lead to Paracelsus’ wooden platform,
And hears, and sees, and wonders, and goes mad.

JUSTINA. But tell me, pray, what is so wonderful
About that man?

DR. C. Now I find wonderful
But this — the mighty impudence he shows —
One word, which I did hear with mine own ears:
“My beard hath deeper erudition
Than all the scribes and doctors in the world.”

JUSTINA. A jest — so rings it!

DR. C. Yea, defend him then:
He mocketh Avicennas, scorneth Galen,
Belittles all the men that were before him
And brought our art to this its lofty height;
Jeers at the school from which himself did spring,
Reviles the leeches and apothecaries;
And the good people’s claps and cries to catch,

What think you that the shameless fellow does —
Does with the physick that sick men have brought him?
The draughts he poureth out upon the ground,
Far hurls the bottles from him into space,
And simply blows the powder in the air,
And shouts the while: A new Hippocrates
And more than that am I, I, Paracelsus,
And all your leeches are crabbed simpletons.

JUSTINA. And Cyprian stands there?

DR. C. With ears aprick!
And half of Basel with him stands and gapes.
And mine own very patients I beheld —
That yonder stand and wait upon his counsel.

JUSTINA. Prescribes he?

DR. C. Will you go to him perchance?
Marry! He doth prescribe — and think you not
To-morrow's death-roll giveth ample proof?
But I would fainer say to you: Farewell,

I go unto the Council, and mine office
Resign; and then what crumbs of life remain
Far from ungrateful Basel I'll enjoy.

CECILIA. Sir Doctor! And my head? What shall I do?

DR. C. Marry, I'll show you how the knave contrives.

JUSTINA. Ay, prithee, show us that.

CECILIA. Upon my aches
Will you with that man's arts experiment?

DR. C. What, Madam, have you headache?

CECILIA. Nay, you know it.

DR. C. AS Paracelsus speak I now: take heed,
Now gaze at me. (He fixes her, makes magnetic gestures with hand.) The headache's flown away.

CECILIA. I have it still — and stronger than before.

DR. C. So doth he do! And all without a powder —

And rails withal at those who do not likewise.
And there you have his much-belauded art.
And this in Basel! Can a man conceive it?

JUSTINA. I trow, such is his practice everywhere.

DR. C. In truth; yet here but thirteen years ago
He still was sitting at his master's feet,
And was Trithemius' scholar! Knew you not?

JUSTINA. Trithemius? The one who died last year?

DR. C. And in good season! And to this self-same town
After unnumbered world-wide journeyings
Through Sweden, Prussia, and through Tartary,
Moving from one place to another — fleeing —
Mark you my meaning: he had cause to flee —
Returneth to the self-same town that taught him
The rudiments of our exalted art,
Which he hath now forgotten and gainsaid.

JUSTINA. Nay, tell me, then, who it is? Lived he in Basel?

DR. C. You knew him well when he was simply styled Bombastus Theophrastus Hohenheim.

JUSTINA (highly excited). What say you? Theophrastus...

DR. C. Hohenheim.

JUSTINA. 'Tis he?

DR. C. Ay, he.

JUSTINA. Then the great Paracelsus,
Hear'st thou, Cecilia, is Hohenheim,
Of whom I told thee.

CECILIA. Nay, what aileth thee?

JUSTINA. Thou did'st not know him — wert as yet a child;
But now I know why Cyprian gives ear.

SCENE III

ENTER ANSELM (A GALLANT), CECILIA, JUSTINA, COPUS.

ANSELM. My knocks you heard not, so I crave withal
Your pardon, that I entered unannounced.
Do I intrude? Is not the Master here?

JUSTINA. Not yet.

ANSELM (with amiable affectation). How fareth the most beautiful
Of dames? and how the loveliest of maidens?
How the most erudite of learned men?

CECILIA. And how the most unbearable of gallants?

ANSELM (looking all the time at JUSTINA). He fareth well — for soon he must depart
This fairest city, and much dear to him.

CECILIA. Are you quite sure? You promised it so oft!

ANSELM. My father calls me; I must home again
Before I (glances at JUSTINA) reach the goal of my desires;
For now is Master Thomas discontented:
My organ play's amiss; my composition
Is not succeeded; and no single song
Have I completed, who began so much.

CECILIA. The cause is simple.

DR. C. You are yet so young,
And Music is no easy art withal.

ANSELM. To him who is not happy, naught comes easy.

CECILIA. And if a man through all the nights carouse,
And play at dice until the grey o' dawn,
Hell ne'er succeed in anything by day.

JUSTINA (reproachfully), Cecilia!

DR. C. Do you so? Nay, 'tis not good.

ANSELM. Have you a remedy 'gainst grief of soul?

DR. C. Dice are no remedy.

ANSELM. Nor even wine.
Yet both oblivion furnish — that is good.

DR. C. Your leech I am not — so must hold my peace.

CECILIA. But pray be mine; for lo! the livelong time
My head aches, and I stand here in distraction.

DR. C. Pardon, good Mistress, I'll prescribe forthwith
What shall assuage your pain within an hour.

CECILIA. Come to my chamber, Doctor.

DR. C. By your leave.
Exeunt COPUS and CECILIA.

SCENE IV

JUSTINA, ANSELM.

ANSELM. Justina.

JUSTINA. Stop!

ANSELM. To-day you do enjoin me vainly;
That I the city needs must leave is true;
True from to-day I ne'er shall see you more,
And I must needs declare —

JUSTINA. I will not hear it.

ANSELM. Then I am silent; but my dumbness speaks.

JUSTINA. Each single word of yours is but an insult,
As are your looks offensive to my honour.

ANSELM. Those looks which upwards gaze unto a goddess,
Those words which upwards mount into a prayer —?

JUSTINA. A truce, I say.

ANSELM. You know me not, Justina;
You know not what I wish — scarce what I am.
You deem me but a botcher — or a fool!

I am not that! I'm more than you divine,
And that which palsies all my spirit's strength
Is that you know it not, and do disdain it.
A smile from those your lips could fashion me
An artist — ah! a kiss a very master!

JUSTINA (has recovered her self-possession, is cold and sharp). Fetch you from others what shall learn you skill;

I have no kisses and no smiles withal.

ANSELM. Then would I sing most wondrous songs in praise
Of my well-lovèd mistress, that our names
Shall travel linked to far posterity.

JUSTINA. Blossoming youth hath never tempted me:

Shall fame, then — shall a shadow lure me?
But, prithee, see — you only asked a smile...
I'll grant you more —

ANSELM. Oh, speak.

JUSTINA. I'll laugh aloud (laughs).

ANSELM. You drive me unto madness.

JUSTINA. Long's the way.

ANSELM. And unto death.

JUSTINA. We must all travel thither.

ANSELM (throws himself down). See! At your feet

I beg you, come this even
Into your garden — there for a last time

I fain will press my lips upon your hand.
No one will witness us... I'll climb within
Over the trellis there... the night is secret,
I'll wait within the arbour.

JUSTINA. You are mad!
Arise. My husband comes.

ANSELM. What then? An he
See me upon my knees, he'll laugh withal —
So blithely doth he walk about the world,
So certain of his wife, and drunken so
With the proud joy of his monopoly.
But I declare to you — such arrogance...

JUSTINA. Arise, for Heaven's sake! Do you not hear —?

SCENE V

ANSELM, JUSTINA, CYPRIAN. Later PARACELSUS.

CYPRIAN (smiling at the embarrassment of both).
My worthy gallant, so you're here again?

ANSELM. I am... I merely wanted...

CYP. (without noticing him further, to JUSTINA).
My sweet child,

I bring to-day a guest right marvellous,
With whom I warrant you we shall divert us.
(JUSTINA gives a slight start.)
My worthy Paracelsus, enter in (PARACELSUS appears at the door.)

A simple burgher's house — and yet methinks,
After your buffets of the midnight air,
It looketh not amiss.

PARACELSUS. I do not scorn
The hospitality of Heaven's roof.

CYP. (pointing to ANSELM). Anselm, a gallant noble who in Basel
At organ-playing — organ-playing, hey? —

ANSELM. Ay, truly, I would learn to play the organ.

CYP. (remembering). To Master Thomas, verily... his father

I furnished a most lordly suit of armour
When with a troop of horsemen here he passed.
(Shaking his head) Warrior the sire... the son is a musician.

ANSELM. Just for a pastime.

CYP. Well. (To PARACELSUS) And now, my worthy,
Be welcome to us; 'tis full time that you
Should spend in honourable company
An hour over a bowl of goodly wine.

PARA. Does your fair spouse still recognise myself?

JUSTINA. Surely I know you.

PARACELSUS looks at her steadfastly.

CYP. Verily for his years
How weatherworn! Now what sayest thou?
The man o'er whom sweeps mystery and gloom,
The never-resting one, whom rumour wild
Ever foreruns like to a madden'd herald,
This sorcerer — is none but Hohenheim,
Whom as a pious student once we knew.

PARA. I am no sorcerer, my noble dame;
I am a leech, but shrewder than the others.

CYP. What leeches are, my friend, that know we well;
They ply not such buffooneries as you.
Yet whatso'er you are, you do divert me,
And now that you have crossed my house's threshold,
Be you my guest — from whenceso'er you come.
And I'm rejoiced I judged you aye aright,
Why, years ago, what time you dwelt in Basel,
Busied yourself with alchemy at Trithem's,
And under certain windows nightly languished,
I ever knew no good would come o' you!

Maid comes with wine; w*hen she has served it, she goes away again*. JUSTINA busies herself a little in arranging the table. PARACELSUS looks sharply at ANSELM.

PARA. You deem?

CYP. But this forsooth my censure is:
Let each man live what fashion makes him glad!
What would it boot, forsooth, by one's own hearth
Serving one's household and the common weal,
To ply one's handicraft an honest burgher,
Were there not others lured to far adventures —
Who fare as errant fellows on their way?
And I am fain at times to see such varlets,
Who bring the flavour of their distant journeys.
Then, when they leave, why, one is triply glad
That one has wife and home and handicraft.

JUSTINA. Your guest still stands the while.

CYP. Nay, sit you down,

And you, my worthy gallant.

ANSELM. Pardon me.
I must depart, for this same night I journey.

CYP. What say you?

ANSELM. Yea, my father calls and urges,
And many duties have I e'er I leave.
I'll come at noon, to bid you my adieus.
(As he leaves) I could not bear that look another moment.

SCENE VI

CYPRIAN, JUSTINA, PARACELSUS.

CYP. WHAT AILS the gallant?

JUSTINA (embarrassed). I know not.

CYP. (smiling). But I!
What boots it that he spake to thee of love?

JUSTINA. But nay.

CYP. That thou wert wrathful with him —:

JUSTINA. Nay.

CYP. And didst despatch him homewards with rough words?

JUSTINA. What a conceit!

CYP. (laughing) I hope thou didst no less.

JUSTINA. Well, then, I did so.

CYP. See how red she grows.

PARA. And bashful as though beauty were a sin.

JUSTINA (almost in tears). I do entreat thee...

CYP. (to PARACELSUS). See, ever the same.

PARA, (meaningly). I see't.

CYP. (jesting). Ashamed of her mute — potency
That each man feels perforce who nigh her comes.
Thou too were wont to sing a song thereof.

JUSTINA (entreating) I beg thee.

PARA. Do — you fear your memory —?
One cannot better rid you of your fear
Than when one wakes the past to life again.

CYP. Whom fears she here withal? The past is past. "
She took me for her spouse, not you, and praises

Daily her God for that election.
Mine is this house, as it my father's was,
And all my forbears for three hundred years.
Waxes its weal by labour and by toil:
Come now — my friend, look at me, this same arm,
Which, as is known, to forge a goodly sword,
And, if needs be, to swing it too hath skill,
Is aptly fashioned to defend a woman.
'Tis that the woman asks, and by that virtue
I won her, by that virtue I can keep her.
Nothing have I to fear — not memory,
Nor any moonish passion: by the present
Encompassed and well trammelled is the woman.
My door stands open wide — I fear no man.

PARA. I would that word were true as it is proud.

CYP. I grant that wish unto you— 'tis fulfilled.

SCENE VII

JUSTINA, CYPRIAN, PARACELSUS. Enter CECILIA. As she sees PARACELSUS, she starts to go.

CYP. Nay, stay! This is Cecilia.

PARA. Your sister.

JUSTINA. She was a child when you did leave the city.
Cecilia, this is a wonder-doctor.

CECILIA. I've seen you, sir, before.

CYP. How were it, think you,
An you on her made trial of your art?

CECILIA. How... what?

CYP. Just bide a while with us. I wager
This man can heal you by his sorcery.

PARA. What say you?— "sorcery"?

CYP. What other word
Fits that which in the market-place I saw?

JUSTINA. But I myself am fain to know at last
What you can complish.

CYP. Now she finds her speech.
Amazement took it — curiosity
Restores it. (Condescendingly) Of all jugglers that have showed here,
He is it who most shrewdly hits the mark.
I have no special favour for such folk;
The art of eating fire or juggling balls,
Goldmaking, quackery, and comedy
Suits not my case. Marry, you all are varlets.

PARA. Maybe; we are not councillors, for certain.

CYP. The jest is bold, yet let it be forgiven,
Since of good humour is my mood to-day,
And you accomplish more than others can.
One sees that you learnt something in the past,
And under all the swindling tricks you ply,

Something there flashes that might learning be.

PARA. (scornfully). You jest!

CYP. Hear, children, what he hath accomplished.

PARA. Prithee forbear....

CYP. Just while I think thereof.
(To JUSTINA and CECILIA) You know the wife o' the smith.

CECILIA. Who is quite palsied?

CYP. She moves since this same morning arm and legs.
What all the others' labour ne'er could complish,
This man in one brief minute did achieve.

CECILIA. Is't possible?

CYP. And there are stranger things.
Know'st thou the threshing-master's little daughter?

JUSTIN A. Who the past winter was struck sudden dumb?

CYP. Again she speaketh since he bid her speak.

JUSTINA. How is't all possible?

CYP. By wizardry!
And I have asked myself, extreme amazed,
How you till now have 'scaped the death of fire.

PARA. Patience, my honoured master; time brings counsel.

CYP. But that which most of all astounds me
Was that which you did practise on Medardus.
(Explaining) He made the lad into a slumber sink
By his eye's potency.

CECILIA. Just by your eyes?

CYP. Then said he unto him — we all could hear it —
You are come homeward from a distant journey,
Through foreign lands, where you have much adventured.
Tell us the tale thereof.

JUSTINA. And he?

CYP. Did tell!

JUSTINA. Of men, of things that he had never seen?

CYP. And of adventures that he never had.

JUSTINA. And he believed therein?

PARA. Not longer than I wished.

I did again those dreams obliterate;
And what he told to us, he knows no more.

CYP. Only yourself can what you gave redeem.

PARA. For sure.

CYP. And haply had you freed him not,
From those dreams which yourself had fashioned him?

PARA. His life long would he swear that it was true.
Stands up; suddenly, in an almost pathetic tone:
So much avail I! Who avails so much?
I can be destiny, if so I please.

CYP. Such stuff, good fellow, dupes the market-place.
Here, leave big words alone, an so you please:
Destiny comes from God, not sorcerers,
And what you work is madness — nowise truth.

PARA. More than the truth, which once was and shall be,
Is madness, that which is... and rules the moment.
Did you avail the past years of your life,
Like written pages to unroll before you,
You scarcely would a single word interpret,
For Memory deceiveth like to Hope.
All’s mystery... the minute passed
As each successive one, only the moment
Is ours — and lo! it flees away already.
Ponder but this — how every night compels us
To travel downwards to a foreign bourne,
Empties us of our potency and riches,
And how all life’s abundance and its guerdons
Are of far lesser puissance than the dreams
That do our helpless, unwilled sleep encounter.

CYP. And many a nightmare hath rid o’er my brain;
Yet what avails it? One wakes up afresh,

There comes the sun, the wholesome noise o' day,
One laughs at dreams and goes about one's work.
Only who striveth after nothingness,
Like you, will let a dream bewilder him.
For men like us, who know their own desires,
Fate only is what shows itself by day,
And doth not vanish when we ope our eyes.
Ay, men like you were very lief, forsooth,
To rase the limits 'twixt the night and day,
And place us all in gloaming and in doubt.
May God be thanked much is there that is certain,

A man like me stands aye on solid ground,
Holds safely what he hath, is just and strong,
And be assured we fear your like no whit.

PARA. Nor is your fear required. But you did wish
That I should heal the worthy lady's sickness.

CYP. Quite right.

CEC. I'm well... besides, I have a doctor.

CYP. Then let Justina tell you, she confides
In her more than in me.

JUSTINA. The girl is peevish,
Nigh melancholy.

CEC. Nay.

JUSTINA. At times she sigheth,
Tears also have I seen within her eyes.

PARA. And no one knoweth why?

CEC. I never weep.

PARA. My noble mistress, I'll not question you,
The causes of your trouble will not probe,

I can away with every pain of yours,
Even without your naming me the reason.

CEC. Nay, nay.

CYP. Methinks it were well worth a trial.

PARA. A leech's questions oft are burdensome.
I'll spare you that, and make you hale and well.

CEC. Take all my pain away?

PARA. That will I do.

CEC. And then shall I be free?

PARA. From every pang.

CEC. And shall be blithe?

PARA. And laugh the livelong day,
And understand not how you e'er were troubled.

CEC. Nay, I'll not laugh; nay, I will not be blithe.

CYP. Come, let a body look upon this fool.
Verily, laughter is God's finest blessing.

PARA. An it please not the lady, we will leave her
To find the course of silent happiness.

CEC. I wish not happiness.

CYP. Thou dost not wish —?

JUSTINA. What dost thou wish, then?

CEC. To be left in peace.

PARA. It seems, my child, the pain oppressing you
Is steeped so deeply in a youthful joy
You would not lack it for the world. My counsel
Is, therefore — keep it truly in your heart.

CECILIA runs army.

SCENE VIII

JUSTINA, CYPRIAN, PARACELSUS.

CYP. And there you smile no whit discomfited.
It seems the magic wand has gone astray,
And in my house your art fails utterly.

PARA. I rather deemed that it had shown itself.

CYP. Perchance your sorcery in the market too
Was well rehearsed with the quickly healed,
As for Medardus, why, I warrant you,
Some paltry groschen bought his services.

PARA. Maybe.

CYP. A leech you style you; you're a vagrant,
Like others, too, who now and then have luck.

PARA. And so not worth your hospitality.
Farewell.

CYP. Oh, no! You'll not escape so lightly.

JUSTINA. You see, my husband jests — you still are welcome.

CYP. Truly! Each guest according to his kind.
Marry, if such a man one home invites,
Then let him show his mettle. Why, the fiddlers,
What folk I have here in mine house at times,
They play to me — or else they enter not.

PARA. 'Tis true. I have not yet earned me this drink.

He steps suddenly in front of JUSTINA.

JUSTINA. What wish you?...

She tries to lift herself and cannot.

CYP. Well?

JUSTIN A. I will....

PARA. You cannot rise.

CYP. Is't true?

PARA. Be not afraid, Justina. Heavy
Are now your eyelids; they do close.
You try to open — cannot move. You are
So tired — tired — very tired. Slumber comes;
Your senses swoon from you. You slumber now (in an almost incantatory tone)
Quite deep — ay, deep — so deep — you sleep — you dream.

She falls asleep. Long pause.

CYP. Excellent — ay. But now then make her dream.

PARA. That will I do. And will with gentle words
Make her traverse a very destiny.

I call it so — you call it but a dream:
Are you contented?

CYP. I am all agog.
What pity that I did not call the neighbours.
Yet could I now —

PARA. Forbear; they would disturb.
He bends over her.

CYP. May I not list to what you're doing?

PARA. No.
I wish to see you marvel utterly.
Empty this goblet — patience have till then.

CYP. Ay, but no longer.

He drinks. PARACELSUS whispers something in JUSTINA'S ear. The position of the two is such that neither his nor her face is visible.

PARA, (while CYPRIAN is still drinking). I am finished.

CYP. (putting down the goblet). Well?

PARA. Awake, Justina! — wake!

CYP. Justina!

PARA. (firmly). Wake!

JUSTINA stares at them both, and finally at CYPRIAN, gives a shriek, and runs away into her chamber, which she bolts on the inside.

CYP. (is at first speechless). Justina! — (To PARACELSUS) Tell me what this signifies!
What have you done?... (At the door) Justina!
(To PARACELSUS) Doth she flee me?
What was it you did whisper in her ear?

PARA. Nay, calm yourself, for it is all in play!
She loves you, too, as much as ever.

CYP. Why
Fled she away? With such a glance! — Justina!

PARA. Tarry! She loves you, yet remorse now racks —

CYP. Remorse?

PARA. Ay, so.

CYP. Explain you, an you please.

PARA, (after a short pause). A pretty stripling, who just took his leave —

CYP. A pretty — who?

PARA. Anselm, methinks, his name —

CYP. What hath he, then?

PARA. What often gallants have.

CYP. She dreams, perchance, that she the gallant loves?
An evil jest, forsooth.

PARA. What a conceit!

CYP. Well, then? Why did she flee me? Tell it quickly!

PARA. Well, since she dreams — withal — what troubles you?

CYP. Tell me; I wish to know it.

PARA. Well, she dreams
That she in Anselm's arms was rocked to rest.

CYP. That he —

PARA. The gallant did possess her e'en as you.

CYP. You gave that phantasy unto her.

PARA. Ay.

CYP. Then is your jest — make it undone — (At the door) Justina! (very anxious).

PARA. A dream, good sir — what signifies it more?
You know far better — you are living Life.

CYP. You could have other trials of your art
Elected. See how you have tortured her.
Speedily free her from the evil dream.

PARA. Why is it evil? It is sweet, perchance!

CYP. You are an insolent! Justina, listen! (at the door).
She's bolted now her chamber door.

PARA. Farewell.

CYP. You are not in your senses. Tarry here,
You damned juggler, and conclude the jest!
It doth suffice.

PARA. (passionately). Nay, it sufficeth not!
Do you preserve Justina as she is,
Guiltless, and verily guilty since she thinks it.
Most chaste — and verily unchaste, for her senses
Tingle with memory of wild delights.
So I will leave your faithful wife to you.

CYP. You're crazy, and shall verily atone,
That you on me, on Master Cyprian,
Should dare so insolent a jest ——

PARA. A jest?
When I see women of such quality,
Who should make happy men of mighty souls,
On such a lout, as you are, thrown away,
I feel anew embittered! And that she,
The woman once beloved by Paracelsus,
And whom they — after counsel — gave to you,
As though her life thus found its consummation —

CYP. Ay, unto me — not such a beggar as you.
In sooth! such damsels are for men like us.

PARA. I know it, they're for you; yet I know also,
One day with me fulfils a deeper yearning

Than fifty years with such an one as you.

CYP. Why boast you thus? As happy as a woman
Can verily be, is she, these thirteen years
Spent by my side.

PARA. But are you certain of it?
Since 'tis of men like you the natural gift,
Creatures of light approaching near you,
Into your sphere of dull and wretched smugness
Downwards to draw — think you, her home is here?
She's nothing but your guest here — even as I.
Wasted I see too much of loveliness
On a gorged insolence that plumes itself.
It is an outrage on the law of nature,
And I strive what amendment I may compass.

CYP. (furious). If you believed that verily, damned villain,
Why not compel her to go hence with you,
Since now you have her by your power enchanted?

PARA. I am no thief. You judge me ill. I wish
From you to take her, yet to no one give her.
Pure shall she bide — for you alone besmirched.
Therefore... farewell.

CYP. You shall without delay
Finish forthwith the witchcraft.

PARA. Nay... farewell.

CYP. Remain you here!

PARA. Who can command me?

CYP. I!
I will have you imprisoned, will impeach you '
For sorcery.

PARA. Why, do so. I have leisure.

CYP. They'd throw you down into a noisome dungeon.

PARA. I shall be silent, and Justina's dream
Preserve for ever.

CYP. They shall torture you.

Ay, they shall kill you.

PARA. And the final hope
With me, that yonder dream can ever finish,
For no one lives who can deliver her.

CYP. Madman! Justina, come to me... Justina,
Dost hear me not?

JUSTINA (from within). O grace!

CYP. Unlock the door!
Justina!

He draws his sword, shatters the door to pieces, draws out JUSTINA, who hides her face.

JUSTINA. Grace!

CYP. Have fear of nothing, wife.

JUSTINA. I know full well thy goodness.

CYP. Thou art guiltless.

JUSTINA. Oh, mock me not.

CYP. Thou dreamest. Thou art guiltless.

JUSTINA. Oh, would ‘twere true! I shudder at myself.
I see myself within his arms, and feel
His kisses burn on neck and lips and cheeks ——

CYP. It is not true! The wizard —

JUSTINA. Ay, thou owest
To him thou knowst the truth.

CYP. It is not true!
Yet once again I turn to you — I know
I have insulted you; you damned varlet,
And do so still. I in your power have faith —
You see I must have faith therein — but now
Let it suffice, prithee! Finish this torture,
I’ll let you go scot-free — nay, glorify
In every place your most especial art,
But work it quickly that my wife awaken.

JUSTINA. I am awake. How strangely thou dost speak!

For heaven's sake! if so it be my guilt
Obscure your senses — Paracelsus, help!

CYP. Dost now entreat him that he should —

JUSTINA. Forgive,
O Cyprian, forgive. 'Tis verily passed —
I will be now to you the best o' wives!
A moment just of weakness hath it been;
It ne'er shall come again, be thou assured.
Yet then there shone the moon so strangely bright,
The perfume from our lilac bushes wafted,
And I was all alone i' the summer-house.

PARA. But further.

CYP. Silence.

JUSTINA. Let all now be told.
'Tis for the best.

CYP. I will not hear it.

PARA. Let her —
Who knows what you shall feel!

CYPRIAN is much overcome.

JUSTINA. I was alone
I' the summer-house — and thou wert in the tavern.

PARA. Wert never there?

CYP. What man hath never been?

JUSTINA. And then he came — and took me by the hand —
And kissed me — and did speak such fiery words —
And then — and then — O Cyprian, forgive!

CYP. Naught is there to forgive! Thou dream'st!

PARA, (meaningly). Who knows?

CYP. You knows't as I do!

PARA. Is she not a woman?
Anselm a man? Is there no summer-house?

CYP. You — say —

PARA. And if it verily were the truth
That I have simply shaken from her heart?

CYP. Why, you gave her the madness — yet you doubt?

PARA. I am a wizard merely — she's a woman!

CYP. You made me mad.

PARA. Who will vouchsafe to us
To know if this her dream was not as well her life?

CYP. You think, Justina — (he hastens to her).

PARA, (to himself). Doth the ironic flood
Of mine own magic close over mine head?
And the dividing limits e'en for me
Run into one another?

SCENE IX

CYPRIAN, JUSTINA, PARACELSUS. ANSELM comes. JUSTINA gives a shriek, ANSELM starts and looks at them all. CYPRIAN and PARACELSUS observe him.

Pause.

He attempts to approach JUSTINA.

CYP. (stopping in front of Anselm). She hath confessed it —

ANSELM. What?

PARA. How he doth quail!

JUSTINA. Out of my sight!

ANSELM. In what have I offended?

CYP. She hath confessed. So mind, you tell no lies!

ANSELM. Justina!

JUSTINA. Go! I will not see you more.
You took from me the peace of mine own soul,
Destroyed the gladness of our happy hearth,
Ruined too much for but a fleeting bliss!
How burns my soul with very shame, that I
Became the victim of your wanton youth
And mine unguarded senses. Woe for me,
That e'er I stepped into the summer-house.

ANSELM (frightened). For God's sake, hold your peace! You talk haphazard!

CYP. (draws his sword). Confess!

JUSTINA. Confess!

PARA. Confess!

ANSELM. Naught have I to confess.

CYP. Dwells no more boldness in your craven heart
Than what sufficeth to approach a woman?

ANSELM. Justina, this revenge lacks graciousness.

CYP. What, is't revenge that she is penitent?
Caitiff!

ANSELM. Your sword I will encounter
At any assignation; yet vouchsafe me
First to declare that my offence is slight.
No more I did than love your beauteous wife,
And dare to speak to her thereof.

CYP. But further! — further!

ANSELM. That is all!

JUSTINA. But nay!
Hell spare me... oh, will you not comprehend
That this is all in vain? — for I myself
In deep remorse confessed to my spouse.

ANSELM (suddenly to PARACELSUS). This is your machination, damned wizard!

CYP. Leave him in peace, I pray! I owe him much.
He brought the truth unto this house of lies;
He is my friend, and I do crave his pardon.

PARA. Nay, softly! As a medley of bright jewels,
Some false, some true, the last hour's fullness lies
Fully displayed; but what to cast away
And what to keep as profit, have I knowledge
At present just as little — as yourselves.
And more for mine own self than for your favour
I will the skein unravel that I wove.
Justina! Slumber!

ANSELM. I am all at sea!

PARA. (firmly). Sleep you!

CYP. What will you?

PARA. Slumber deep, Justina,
Ay, deep — quite deep — to sleep — so is it good!

JUSTINA has sunk motionless on to the chair.

PARA. Justina! Do you hear me?

JUSTINA (sleepily). I do hear.

PARA. Then mark you well! You have forgotten all
That passed from that same minute when I first
Sunk you in sleep, until the next when I
Shall bid you be awake — and this last hour
I hunt from out your mind, as though ‘t had never been;
And now —

CYP. And now? What help is all o’ this,
If she awakens and this hour shall vanish
From out her memory? What know I,’ then,
If she in dreaming spoke perchance the truth!

PARA. There I avail. Justina, mark! One thing
I do enjoin — be true when you awake,
So true as ne’er before — be you so true,
Nay, truer than your wont to your own self,
That like a clear flood i’ the gleaming sun
Your soul shall shine transparent to its bottom,
Until the even of this pregnant day
Free you from this last speech of sorcery.

CYP. But why to even only?

PARA. It sufficeth.
You shall rejoice you that the sun shall set,
Though she be best out of all womankind.

ANSELM. This riddle’s solving vainly I would compass.

PARA. Awake, Justina... be you true... awake!

JUSTINA (opens her eyes and speaks at once, as though nothing had happened). Now say — how long will you yet stare at me?
In vain — your magic worketh not at all.
Nay! had your gaze still as much potency
As in the days when you were Hohenheim —

I mean, for me — but that is long since over.
Oh, gallant Anselm — how came you in, pray?
I heard you not! Bid you adieu to us?

ANSELM. You know... Justina —

JUSTINA. It is good you leave,
And I shall first breathe truly when you’re home
In your sire’s castle.

ANSELM. You... do mean? —

JUSTINA. ’Tis time!
Had you one single night more tarried,
Then had we parted far less innocent;
Still feel I the last quiver of my youth,
Spring flattereth and beauty lures withal.
’Tis well, then, that you go as swift you can,
For oh! what would have been the finish of ‘t?
A little bliss and aye much pain and sorrow.
All that is spared to me. As a true wife (to CYPRIAN)
I can still look thee in thine eyes,
An thou dost guard me, thou canst trust in me.

CYP. By God, that will I do!

JUSTINA. A peaceful bliss,
Although not over-ardent, still’s the best.

SCENE X

CYPRIAN, JUSTIN A, PARACELSUS, ANSELM. Enter CECILIA.

ANSELM (very glad when CECILIA comes). My noble damsel, that again I see you
Affords much pleasure. I do take my leave —

I take my leave for ever now of Basel.

CEC. (smiling). So 'tis in earnest?

JUSTINA. Smilest thou?— 'tis right.

A childish dream departs. My case thou seest.

CEC. What says she then withal?

JUSTINA. Sweet child, thou wilt
Have soon forgot the pretty gentleman.

ANSELM. Cecilia... nay;... I feel as —

PARA. Listen well.

CEC. Justina... Brother... (begging for help).

CYP. Hush! She is inspired.

JUSTINA. See (looking at PARACELSUS), yonder man
I held most verily dear,
Ah, long ago — O Cyprian, how long?
When you went hence those thirteen years ago
Without farewell or word of coming back
I thought I'd die perforce. Had you that night,
That very night in which you left the city,
Again returned — oh, I had everything
That you had craved for given joyfully,
Although I knew full well the coming morrow
Took you for ever from me! So I loved you!
Who knows how many windows in the city
Open each night for one who never comes?

CYP. What do I hear? Oh, may the sun sink soon —

CEC. Justina —

JUSTINA. Theophrastus, think you still of it?
Yet see how all things somehow shape for good;
To-day I do thank God you left the city
That night, and that your courage failed you.
What then were I to-day? While unto you
The unbounded world with all its fame belonged,
Ruined I'd sit at home in shame and mockery —
Ay, Cyprian, so easy hadst thou lost me!
And not an inkling hadst — as is thy way,
Thinking that once I was betrothed to thee
Thou wast assured of my affection.
Marry! on many a night hadst thou but felt
How far from thee I was — truly! less proud
Hadst thou felt of the woman in thine arms.
Yet strong avails the present conquering
With little toil its greatest foe, the past —
And so thou wonnest me, my Cyprian,
And I am thine, and so would fain remain.

CYP. But now the far-off Past is here again.

JUSTINA. Aye... it is he — yet is't not he! Nigh seems
Twixt him and me a wider, deeper gulf
Than me from any other doth divide,
As one who would betoken — yet is not.
He stands by me — a shadow of my youth.
And even so, my sister, be assured,
With thee and Anselm shall it come to pass.
Thou wilt smile at the folly which today
Seemeth life's essence —

ANSELM (affected). Say not folly — no!
The fool was I — yet I dare not a word!
This hour appears to me full marvellous,
With pregnant truth it flashes and it gleams.
Who wrought it — I surmise; what way he did it —
I have no power to fathom; yet I know
That e'en in me a comprehension stirs,
And that I sorely erred, my wanton eye
To raise against an honourable dame.
Pray pardon of your grace my youthful pride,
My noble master, and stretch out your hand.
My erst distraction passeth by degrees,
Much comprehend I — and the clouds now vanish.

He looks at CECILIA.

SCENE XI

Previous characters, COPUS.

COPUS (still at the door). I greet you all. Knows yet your noble circle
The last intelligence?

CYP. Allow me first — (introducing)
Sir Doctor Copus, town physician here —

COPUS (bowing). Sir Theophrastus Hohenheim —

PAHA. I'm he.

COPUS. Then I may now convey the news myself,
I was announcing to this noble circle,
I come immediate from the City Council,
A resolution there was put and carried
To you, good sir, of highest import.

PARA. They drive me out?

COPUS. Oh, if 'twere that! Forgive me.

PARA. Decree's pronounced against me of arrest?

COPUS. What dream you of?

PARA. (smiling). The stake is threatening?

COPUS. How badly judge you this good town of Basel!
Hear, then: the Council will, to honour you,
Create a novel dignity, and chooses
You to be second town physician. I'm
The first. You marvel?

PARA. I do thank the Council.

COPUS. That means — you take the office?

PARA. I'm unable.

COPUS. Oh, think not so. You can! Since I'm the first,
So you, my friend, have good support in me.
In many a thing with pleasure I'll instruct you,
In ticklish cases give you of my counsel;

Masters are fain to see a modest scholar.

PARA. Forgive me, I'm not worthy such an office.
You would not be content, I'm sore afraid.
I do not here abide; I travel forth:
This very even do I leave this city.

COPUS. Is't true?

CYP. You go?

PARA. I bid you all adieu.

CYP. Before you go, explain you, for you leave
Us all bewildered here. Was it in earnest?
Was't play?

JUSTINA. How strangely question you!

COPUS. What means he?

PARA. It was a play! What were it otherwise?
What is not play we ply upon this earth,
Howe'er so great and so profound it seems?
For one will play with hordes of soldiers wild,
Another plays with superstition mad,
Some one perchance with suns and planets —
I play with human souls. And he alone
Will find a sense who seeks one.
Of others naught we know, naught of ourselves.
We ever play: who knows it, he is wise. (Exit.)

JUSTINA (as though leaking up).
What, then, hath happened here? I think I said
So much anent myself as I — ne'er wished to say.

COPUS. Nothing I fathom out of all I hear.
What hath occurred? What did the juggler here?

CYP. I know not if he wished benevolence,
Yet was it good, and therefore will we praise him.
A whirlwind came, who for a moment hath
Torn open all the portals of our souls,
And we have looked within us for a while....
'Tis over, and the portals close again —
Yet what I saw to-day, for future time,

Shall hold me safe from all excess of pride.
It was a play, yet I did find its sense,
And know that I shall keep the right road hence.

THE CURTAIN FALLS

The Green Cockatoo (1899)

GROTESQUERY IN ONE ACT

Original German Title: ‘Der grüne Kakadu’

Translated by Grace Isabel Colbron, 1917

CONTENTS

CHARACTERS
THE GREEN COCKATOO

CHARACTERS

EMILE, DUKE DE Cadignan

FRANÇOIS, Vicomte de Nogeant

ALBIN, Chevalier de la Tremouille

MARQUIS DE LANSAC

SEVERINE, his wife

ROLLIN, Poet

PROSPERE, host of "The Green Cockatoo," formerly manager of a theatre

Prospère's troupe:
HENRI
BALTHASAR
GUILLAUME
SCAEVOLA
JULES
ETIENNE
MAURICE GEORGETTE
MICHETTE
FLIPOTTE

LEOCADIE, actress, Henri's wife

GRASSET, philosopher

LEBRET, tailor

GRAIN, a tramp

A POLICE SERGEANT

ARISTOCRATS, ACTORS and ACTRESSES

CITIZENS of Paris

The action takes place in Paris on the evening of July 14th, 1789, in Prospère's wine-room, "The Green Cockatoo."

THE GREEN COCKATOO

WINE-ROOM OF "THE Green Cockatoo."

A cellar room of moderate size into which seven steps lead down from a door at the right, well to the rear. There is another door in the back wall at the left, scarcely visible. About all the available space in the room is plied by plain wooden tables and chairs. The bar is in the center of the left wall, behind it are casks of wine fitted with bungpipes. The room is lit by small hanging lamps.

PROSPERE is behind the bar, GRASSET and LEERET enter.

Grasset (still on the steps). This way, Lebrêt. I know this source. My old friend and former manager always has a cask of wine hidden somewhere hereabouts when all Paris else is athirst.

Prospère. Good evening, Grasset — showing yourself here again? At odds with philosophy, eh? Have you a wish to take engagement with me again?

Grasset. In a manner, yes — I want wine. I am the guest, you the host.

Prospère. Wine, indeed? And where should I get wine, Grasset? They plundered all the wine shops of Paris last night — and I wager you had a hand in it.

Grasset. Bring wine, I say. For the rabble that will be here in an hour — (He listens as if to some sound outside) — do you hear anything, Lebrêt?

Lebrêt. It is like distant thunder.

Grasset. Well done, citizens of Paris! (To PROSPERE.) You surely have a cask in hiding for the rabble you expect later. Bring it out now. My friend and admirer here, Citizen Lebrêt, tailor of the Rue St. Honoré, will pay for all we drink.

Lebrêt. Yes, yes, I will pay. (PROSPERE hesitates.)

Grasset. Show him that you have money, Lebrêt. (LEBRET takes out a well-filled purse.)

Prospère. Well, I will see if — (He fils two glasses from one of the casks.) Where have you been, Grasset? At the Palais Royal?

Grasset. Yes, and I made a speech there, too. It is my turn now, friend Prospère. And do you know whom I followed with my speech?

Prospère. Well?

Grasset. Camille Desmoulins! Yes, I dared it! And tell me,
Lebrêt, which of us had the greater applause, Desmoulins or I?

Lebrêt. You did, beyond a doubt.

Grasset. And how did I bear myself?

Lebrêt. Magnificently.

Grasset. Do you hear that, Prospère? I stood on the table — I looked like some great monument — yes, I did. And all the thousand, the five thousand, the ten thousand, gathered around me just as they had gathered around Camille Desmoulins, and called to me, and cheered me —

Lebrêt. They cheered louder for you.

Grasset. Yes — not much, but still it was louder — and now they are storming the Bastille — and I may say they have followed my call — before the evening is out we will have taken it.

Prospère. Maybe — if the walls could fall before your speeches.

Grasset. Speeches? Have you no ears? They're shooting now. Our valiant soldiers are with us — they have the same hellish hatred for that accursed prison that we have — they know it is their fathers and their brothers who are behind those walls — but they would not shoot had they not heard us talk. Yes, my dear Prospère, great is the power of the intellect. (To LEBRET.) Where are the papers?

Lebrêt. Here they are. (He draws a handful of pamphlets from his pocket.)

Grasset. Here are the newest pamphlets given out in the Palais Royal. Here is one by my friend Cerutti, "A Record for the French People;" here is one by Desmoulins — he speaks better than he writes— "Free France" —

Prospère. And where will yours appear, that you're always telling me about?

Grasset. We need no more words, the time for deeds has come. A coward, who sits within his four walls today, — a man's place is in the streets.

Lebrêt. Bravo! Bravo!

Grasset. They've killed their Mayor in Toulon; they've plundered a dozen houses in Brignolles; we Parisians are the stupid dolts who endure everything —

Prospère. They can hardly say that of us now.

Lebrêt (has been drinking steadily). Arise! — citizens — arise!

Grasset. To arms! — shut up your place and come with us.

Prospère. I will come, at the proper time.

Grasset. When there's no longer any danger?

Prospère. I am as great a lover of Freedom as you are, friend — but I have my business.

Grasset. There is but one business for citizens of Paris today — and that is to set their brothers free.

Prospère. For those-who have nothing else to do, you mean.

Lebrêt. What's that? He's mocking us?

Prospère. No such intention. But see that you take yourselves off now. My performance will begin shortly, and I have no use for you then.

Lebrêt. A performance? Is this a theatre?

Prospère. It is. Your friend here played with us not two weeks ago.

Lebrêt. You played here, Grasset? Do you let the rascal make game of you unpunished?

Grasset. Calm yourself — it is true. I did play here. This is no ordinary wine-room, it is a den of thieves — come now.

Prospère. Payment first, please.

Lebrêt. If this is a den of thieves, I sha'n't pay a sou.

Prospère. Tell your friend where he is.

Grasset. This is a strange place. There are people here who play the criminal — and others who are criminals without knowing it.

Lebrêt. Indeed!

Grasset. I would like you to notice that what I have just said was extremely brilliant. It would make the success of an entire speech.

Lebrêt. But I don't understand a word of it all.

Grasset. I told you that Prospère was my former manager. He is still acting here with his troupe, but not in the usual way. My former colleagues sit round here and pretend to be criminals. Do you understand? They tell hair-raising stories that never happened — they speak of awful deeds which they never committed — and the audience that assembles to hear them enjoys the sensation of sitting in the same room with the most dangerous scum of Paris — with swindlers, thieves, and murderers.

Lebrêt. What sort of an audience is it?

Prospère. The most fashionable people of Paris —

Grasset. Noblemen-Prospère. Gentlemen of the Court —

Lebrêt. Down with them!

Grasset. This is something to their taste — this whips up their jaded senses. Yes — this is where I began,

Lebrêt, this is where I made my first speech, in pretended jest — and this is where I began to hate the dogs as they sat here with us — with their fine clothes, their perfumes, their rottenness. And I am well pleased, my good Lebrêt, that you should see the place from whence your great friend went forth to larger things — (In a changed tone.) Say, Prospère, if there should be any slip —

Prospère. Slip? How?

Grasset. In my political career — would you engage me again?

Prospère. Not at any price.

Grasset (easily). Why not? Don't you think there could be a chance for anyone beside your belovéd Henri?

Prospère. Apart from that — I'd be afraid you would forget yourself some day and really attack one of my paying customers —

Grasset (flattered). That might be possible —

Prospère. I — I can control myself.

Grasset. Of a truth, Prospère, I could admire your selfcontrol — did I not happen to know that you are a coward.

Prospère. My dear friend, I am satisfied with my own way of doing things. I find sufficient pleasure in telling them my true opinion of them, to their very faces — in reviling them to my heart's desire — while they look upon it as a joke.
That, too, is a way of relieving one's feelings. (He draws a dagger and turns it to catch the light.)

Lebrêt. What does this mean, Citizen Prospère?

Grasset. Don't be afraid, I wager the dagger is not even sharpened.

Prospère. You might lose your wager, friend. The day will come when the joke turns to bitter earnest — and I am ready for it.

Grasset. That day is near! It is a great age we live in.
Come, Citizen Lebrêt, we must join the others. Farewell,
Prospère — you will see me as one of the great ones — or never again!

Lebrêt (staggering). As one of the great — or — never.

(They both go out.)

Prospère (seats himself on a table, reads from one of the pamphlets). "The beast is in the noose, strangle it." Not bad, little Desmoulins. "Never was richer booty for a conqueror — forty thousand palaces and castles, two-fifths of all the wealth in France, will be the reward of bravery — those who think themselves the conquerors will be overthrown, and the nation will be purged." (The POLICE SERGEANT enters.)

Prospère (measures him). The rabble is appearing in good season tonight.

Sergeant. Spare your jokes, friend Prospère. I am the Police Sergeant for your district.

Prospère. And what can I do for you?

Sergeant. I have been ordered to attend this evening's performance in your place here.

Prospère. I am greatly honored.

Sergeant. That's not the point, good Prospère. The authorities wish to know just exactly what happens here. For some weeks —

Prospère. It is a pleasure resort, Sergeant, nothing more.

Sergeant. Let me talk, please. For some weeks, so they say, this place has been the scene of vile orgies.

Prospère. The rumor is false, Sergeant. Jokes, harmless jokes, that is all.

Sergeant. That's the way it begins, I know. But it ends very differently, my report says — you were an actor?

Prospère. A manager, Sergeant. Manager of an excellent troupe which played last in St. Denis.

Sergeant. That is immaterial. (He reads from a notebook.) You inherited some money —

Prospère. Hardly worth mentioning.

Sergeant. Your ensemble scattered?

Prospère. So did the money.

Sergeant. Very good. (Both smile, then seriously again.)
You opened this wine-room?

Prospère. Which paid very badly.

Sergeant (still reading). Then you hit upon an idea to which a certain originality cannot be denied.

Prospère. You flatter me, Sergeant.

Sergeant. You collected your troupe again, and let them give a performance, which has been characterized as peculiar — and somewhat doubtful.

Prospère. If it were at all doubtful, Sergeant, I should not have my audience — I may say — the most aristocratic audience in Paris. The Vicomte de Nogeant is my daily guest. The Marquis de Lansac comes very frequently, and the Duke de Cadignan, Sergeant, is the most ardent admirer of my leading actor, the celebrated Henri Baston.

Sergeant. And an admirer also of the art — or the arts — of your actresses?

Prospère. If you could see my little actresses, Sergeant, you would not blame anyone for admiring them.

Sergeant. Enough of this. It has been reported to the authorities that the amusement offered by your — what shall I say?

Prospère. The word "artists" might suffice.

Sergeant. I shall use the word "hirelings" — the amusement offered by your hirelings goes beyond the bounds of the permissible. The report says that there are speeches made by — what shall I say? by your artificial criminals which — what does the report say? — (He reads from his notebook) — which are not only immoral — that would not trouble us — but which are most seditious and liable to do harm — this cannot be a matter of indifference to the authorities, particularly not in such troublous times.

Prospère. My dear Sergeant, my only answer to all this is a polite invitation to visit the performance. You will soon discover that there is nothing seditious going on — mainly because my audience would not be susceptible to sedition.
We give a theatrical performance, that is all.

Sergeant. I am not allowed to accept your invitation, but I shall remain here in my official capacity.

Prospère. I can promise you a very pleasant evening. But if you permit a word of advice, I would recommend that you exchange your official uniform for civilian clothes. The spontaneity of my artists — and the mood of my audience, would both suffer from the presence of a police official in uniform.

Sergeant. You are right, M. Prospère. I will disappear for a short time and return as a young gentleman of fashion.

Prospère. That will be easy for you, Sergeant. And you are equally welcome as a vagabond — that would not attract attention here — only not as police official.

Sergeant. Good evening, then. (He goes towards door.)

Prospère (bowing). When will that blessed day dawn, when you and your like — (The SERGEANT meets GRAIN in the doorway. GRAIN, who is ragged and dirty, starts when he sees the SERGEANT. The SERGEANT looks at him sharply, then smiles and turns to PROSPERE.)

Sergeant. One of your artists already? (He goes out.)

Grain (comes down, whining). Good evening.

Prospère (when he has looked him over sharply). If you are one of my actors I must compliment you — for I do not recognize you.

Grain. What did you say?

Prospère. Stop this nonsense and take off your wig. I want to know who you are. (He pulls at GRAIN'S hair.)

Grain. Ouch! —

Prospère. The devil — that is real hair — who are you? You seem to be a genuine tramp.

Grain. I am.

Prospère. Then what do you want of me?

Grain. Have I the honor of addressing Citizen Prospère? — host of "The Green Cockatoo?"

Prospère. I am he.

Grain. Grain is my name — or sometimes Carniche — and they sometimes call me the "Bellowing Brimstone": — but they imprisoned me under the name of Grain, Citizen Prospère, and that's the main point.

Prospère. Oh, I understand. You want an engagement here and are showing me what you can do. Good — continue.

Grain. Citizen Prospère, pray don't think me a swindler. I am a man of honor. When I tell you that I have been in prison, I am telling you the truth. (PROSPERE looks at him suspiciously and GRAIN takes a paper from his pocket.) Citizen Prospère, look at this. It will tell you that I was released yesterday afternoon at four o'clock.

Prospère (reading the paper). After an imprisonment of two years — why, this is — genuine.

Grain. Did you still doubt it, Citizen Prospère?

Prospère. But what did you do, to be imprisoned two years?

Grain. They would have hanged me — but fortunately I was still half a child when I murdered my poor aunt —

Prospère. Man! Why did you murder your aunt?

Grain. I should not have done it, Citizen Prospère, had she not been false to me, and with my best friend, too —

Prospère. Your aunt?

Grain. Yes. She was more to me than aunts usually are to their nephews. Our family relationships were peculiar.
I was embittered — deeply embittered. Shall I tell you about it?

Prospère. Yes, do. We may be able to come to an agreement.

Grain. My sister was still half a child when she ran away — and with whom do you think?

Prospère. I could not possibly guess.

Grain. With her uncle. Then he deserted her, left her with a child.

Prospère. A whole child — I hope.

Grain. Citizen Prospère — it is indelicate of you to joke on such subjects.

Prospère. Listen to me, you Bellowing Brimstone — these family affairs of yours bore me. Do you think I am here to listen to every chance vagabond's story of his murders? I suppose you want something of me?

Grain. I do, Citizen Prospère. I come to ask for work.

Prospère (scornfully). I call your attention to the fact that this is a pleasure resort — there are no aunts to murder here.

Grain. One such experience is enough for me, thank you.
I wish to become an honest man. I have been sent to you —

Prospère. By whom?

Grain. By a most amiable young man whom they put into my cell three days ago. Now he is alone there — Gaston is his name — you know him.

Prospère. Gaston? That explains why I haven't seen him the last three evenings. He is one of my best men for pickpockets — he can tell stories — the audience shook with laughter.

Grain. Yes — but now they have caught him.

Prospère. Caught him? He didn't really steal?

Grain. Yes, he did. But it must have been the first time, for he seems to have been incredibly clumsy at it. Just imagine — (Confidentially) — he puts his hand in a lady's pocket on the Boulevard des Capucines — and just pulled out her purse — like a real amateur. You inspire confidence, Citizen Prospère, so I'll confess to you there was a time when I would do that sort of little trick myself — but never without my dear father. Ah — while I was still a child — when we were all together — when my poor aunt was still alive —

Prospère. Stop that snivelling, it is very bad taste. Didn't you kill her yourself?

Grain. Alas, too late. But as I was going to say — take me into your service. I wish to reverse Gaston's method. He acted the criminal and then became one in earnest — I —

Prospère. I'll try you, your appearance will help you considerably. At the proper moment you can tell about your aunt — just as it happened — some one will start you off with a question.

Grain. I thank you, Citizen Prospère — and as for my salary —

Prospère. You play on trial tonight, I cannot pay you for that. You will have plenty to eat and drink, and a few francs for a night's lodging, if you need it.

Grain. I thank you. You can introduce me to the other players as a guest from the province.

Prospère. No, we'd better tell them at once that you are a real murderer — they will like that better.

Grain. Pardon me, I don't want to say anything to my own discredit — I can't quite understand —

Prospère. When you have been on the stage a little longer you will understand.

SCAEVOLA and JULES enter.)

Scaevola. Good evening, most genial Manager.

Prospère. Mine host, please. How often must I tell you that you spoil the whole effect if you call me manager?

Scaevola. Well, whatever you are — I don't believe we'll play tonight.

Prospère. Why not?

Scaevola. People won't be in the mood for it — there's a hellish noise in the streets and the mob before the Bastille are screaming like mad devils.

Prospère. What does that matter to us? We have had the noise now for months and our audience has never failed us. They enjoy themselves just the same.

Scaevola. Yes, with the enjoyment of people about to be hanged.

Prospère. If I could only live to see it!

Scaevola. But meanwhile give us something to drink, to put me in the right mood. I don't feel at all inspired tonight.

Prospère. That happens to you frequently, friend. Let me tell you that I wasn't at all satisfied with you yesterday.

Scaevola. May I ask why not?

Prospère. Your story of the house robbery was simply silly.

Scaevola. Silly?

Prospère. Yes, silly and quite unconvincing. You can't get your effect by mere yelling.

Scaevola. I never yell.

Prospère. You always yell. I see I must rehearse these things with you. I cannot depend upon your own ideas. Henri is the only one —

Scaevola. Henri! Always Henri! Henri is a ranter. My robbery yesterday was a masterpiece, Henri couldn't do it in a lifetime. If you are not satisfied with me, friend
Prospère, I shall go to some respectable theatre. (Sees GRAIN.) Who is this? He's not one of us. Are you engaging new people? What sort of a make-up does he call that?

Prospère. Don't be alarmed, he is not a professional. He is a real murderer.

Scaevola. Oh, I see. (He goes to GRAIN.) Delighted to make your acquaintance. My name is Scaevola.

Grain. Thank you. They call me Grain. (JULES has been walking up and down all this time, halting occasionally, like a man suffering from strong emotion.)

Prospère. What's the matter with you, Jules?

Jules. I'm studying.

Prospère. Studying what?

Jules. Pangs of conscience. I'll show you a conscience stricken sinner tonight. Look at me — how do you like the furrow in my brow? Do I not look as if all the furies of hell were pursuing me? (He rages up and down.)

Scaevola (roars). Wine, bring wine!

Prospère. Keep cool, the audience hasn't arrived yet —

(HENRI and LEOCADIE come in.)

Henri (to PROSPERE). Good evening. (With a light gesture towards the others.) Good evening, gentlemen.

Prospère. Good evening, Henri. But what's this I see?
You're with Léocadie?

Grain (has been looking attentively at LEOCADIE, speaks aside to SCAEVOLA.) Why, I know her. (Speaks further with him.)

Léocadie. Yes, dear Prospère, it is I.

Prospère. I haven't seen you for a whole year. Permit me.

(Is about to kiss her.)

Henri. None of that, please. (His eyes rest on her with pride and passion, but with a certain anxiety.)

Prospère. Why, Henri, old friends like us! And your former manager, Léocadie!

Léocadie. Ah, those were pleasant days, Prospère.

Prospère. Why do you sigh? You've made your career — of course, it's easier for a beautiful young woman —

Henri (angrily). I will not hear it.

Prospère. You needn't scream at me so, just because you happen to be with her again.

Henri. Stop that talk — she is my wife — since yesterday —

Prospère. Your wife? (To LEOCADIE.) Is he joking?

Léocadie. No, he has really married me.

Prospère. My congratulations. Scaevola, Jules, Henri is married.

Scaevola (comes forward). Congratulations! (Winks at LEOCADIE. JULES shakes hands with both.)

Grain (comes forward, speaks to PROSPERE). Strange — I saw this woman — just a few moments after they had let me out.

Prospère. How is that?

Grain. It was the first beautiful woman I had seen for two years. I was greatly moved — but there was another man with her — (Talks to PROSPERE.)

Henri (in a high-pitched tone of ecstasy, which must not be declamatory). Léocadie, my belovéd — my wife — all that has been is no more — a moment like this wipes out all the past. (SCAEVOLA and JULES drop back. PROSPERE comes forward to HENRI.)

Prospère. What moment?

Henri. A holy sacrament unites us now — that is more — far more, than mere human vows. God now watches over us — we can forget all that has gone before. A new life begins for us, Léocadie — our love is sacred, our kisses, however wild they may be, are holy now. Léocadie, my belovéd, my wife.

(With a passionate glance.) Is she not different now, Prospère? is not her glance clearer, her brow more pure? all that was, is wiped out — is it not so, my Léocadie?

Léocadie. Certainly, Henri.

Henri. And all is well with us. We leave Paris tomorrow. Léocadie appears tonight for the last time at the Porte St. Martin and this is my last evening with you.

Prospère (startled). Are you crazy, Henri! You want to leave me? — The manager of the Porte St. Martin won't think of letting Léocadie go? She is his greatest success — the men flock to see her, they say.

Henri. Be quiet! Léocadie goes with me — she will never leave me. Tell me you will never leave me, Léocadie? (Brutally.) Tell me —

Léocadie. I will never leave you, Henri.

Henri. If you did, I would — (Pause.) I am weary of this life, I want rest — peace.

Prospère. But what will you do with yourself, Henri? It is absurd. Listen. I have a suggestion to make. Take Léocadie away from the Porte St. Martin, if you want to, but let her stay here with me. I'll engage her. I lack a clever actress anyway.

Henri. My decision is made, Prospère; we leave the city — we go out into the country.

Prospère. Into the country? Where?

Henri. To my old father, who lives all alone in his poor village — my father, whom I have not seen for seven years. He had scarcely hoped to see his lost son again — he will welcome me with joy.

Prospère. And what will you do there? The people are starving in the country. They're worse off even than in Paris here. What will you do with yourself there? You are not the man to till the fields — don't delude yourself into thinking you are.

Henri. I will prove that I am.

Prospère. There'll soon be no more grain growing in all
France — you go to certain misery.

Henri. To certain happiness, Prospère — is it not so, Léocadie? We've dreamed of it often — ah — I long for the peace of the great open stretches — yes, Prospère, in my dreams I see myself walking with her evenings across the fields, in an endless quiet — under a marvellously soothing sky. We will flee this horrible, this dangerous city, and a great peace will come over us. — Have we not often dreamed of it, my Léocadie?

Léocadie. Yes, we have often dreamed of it.

Prospère. Listen, Henri, think it over. I will raise your salary gladly, and I will give Léocadie just as much as I give you.

Léocadie. Oh Henri, do you hear that?

Prospère. I don't know of anyone who can take your place here. None of my people have such clever ideas as you do, and not one of them is as popular with our audience — don't leave me.

Henri. I can easily believe that you'll not find anyone to take my place.

Prospère. Stay here, Henri. (He looks meaningly at LEOCADIE and she answers with a glance that intimates she will arrange it.)

Henri. The parting will be hard, I promise you — for the others, not for me. I have prepared something for my last appearance today — something that will make them all shudder — they will feel the breath of coming annihilation, of the end of their world — for the end of their world is near. I shall not be here to see it. They will tell us of it out there, Léocadie, many days later. — But they will shudder tonight
I promise you. And you yourself, Prospère, you will say that Henri never played so well before.

Prospère. What will you play? Do you know, Léocadie?

Léocadie. He never tells me anything.

Henri. Does anyone realize what an artist I am?

Prospère. We do, of course we do. And that is why I say you should not bury a talent like yours in the country — you wrong yourself, you wrong the cause of art —

Henri. What do I care for art? I want peace, rest. You cannot understand it, Prospère; you have never loved —

Prospère. Oh —

Henri. As I love. I want to be alone with her — thus only,
Léocadie, can we forget it all. And we shall be happy — happier than ever mortals before us. We will have children. You will be a good mother, Léocadie — and a good wife — all else — all, will be wiped out forever — (There is a long pause.)

Léocadie. It is growing late, Henri, I must be at the theatre. Good-bye, Prospère. I am glad I've finally seen this celebrated place of yours where Henri scores such triumphs.

Prospère. Why have you never been here before?

Léocadie. Henri did not wish it — he does not want me to sit about with the men, you know.

Henri (goes back). Let me have a taste of that, Scaevola.

(He drinks.)

Prospère (alone with LEOCADIE). (Aside to her.) Henri is a fool — you have done worse things than that.

Léocadie. No remarks, please.

Prospère. I warn you, you Canaille, have a care — he will kill you some day.

Léocadie. What's the matter now?

Prospère. You were seen with one of your fellows, only yesterday.

Léocadie. Idiot, do you know who that was —?

Henri (turns suddenly). What are you saying to her? No whispering, please — no secrets from me — she is my wife now.

Prospère. What did you give her for a wedding present?

Léocadie. Oh, he never thinks of such things.

Henri. You shall have your present today.

Léocadie. What?

Scaevola and Jules. What are you going to give her?

Henri (absolutely serious). When your scene is out, you may come here to see me act. (The others laugh.) No woman ever had a more costly present. Come now, Léocadie. Au revoir, Prospère; I will be back shortly. (HENRI and LEOCADIE go out. FRANÇOIS, VICOMTE DE NOGEANT and ALBIN, CHEVALIER DE LA TREMOUILLE, come in together.)

Scaevola. What a contemptible braggart!

Prospère (to the newcomers). Good evening, pigs. (ALBIN starts.)

François (pays no attention'). Was not that little Léocadie of the Porte St. Martin who went out there with Henri?

Prospère. Surely it was. I suppose she could make even you remember that you're something of a man, if she tried hard, eh?

François (laughing). Possibly. We are early, it seems.

Prospère. You can amuse yourself with your minion, for a time. (ALBIN starts angrily.)

François. Don't do that — I told you what it was like here. Bring us wine.

Prospère. I will. But the time will come when you will be glad to get water from the Seine.

François. Possibly. However, I want wine today, and of the best.

(PROSPERE goes to the bar)

Albin. What a dreadful man!

François. It is all a joke, I tell you. But there are places where you might hear such things said in earnest.

Albin. Is it not forbidden?

François (laughs). It's easy to see you are fresh from the province.

Albin. It's nearly as bad down our way these days: the peasants are becoming alarmingly insolent. We hardly know what to do about it.

François. The poor devils are hungry, that's the whole secret.

Albin. But how can I help that? Or my great-uncle either?

François. Why your great-uncle?

Albin. They held a meeting in our village and they called my great-uncle, the Count de Tremouille, a grain usurer — just imagine.

François. Was that all?

Albin. Well, I must say —

François. We will go to the Palais Royal tomorrow, and you'll hear some speeches that will surprise you. But we let them talk — it is safest. They are good souls at bottom; it is wisest to let them vent their feelings this way.

Albin (looking at SCAEVOLA and JULES). What suspicious looking fellows — how they stare at us. (He puts his hand to the sword.)

François (seizes ALBIN'S hand). Don't be a fool. (To the actors.) You needn't begin until more audience comes in.

(To ALBIN.) Those are the actors, the most respectable people imaginable. I warrant you, you have sat at table with far worse rogues.

Albin. But they were better dressed.

(PROSPERE brings them the wine. MICHETTE and FLIPOTTE come in)

Francois. Good evening, children, come here to us.

Michette. Here we are — come on, Flipotte. She's still so shy.

Flipotte. Good evening, young gentleman.

Albin. Good evening, ladies.

Michette. What a dear boy! (She seats herself on his knee.)

Albin. Please explain, François, are these respectable women?

Michette. What's that he says?

François. The women who come here? Don't be so absurd, Albin.

Prospère. What do the Duchesses command?

Michette. Sweet wine for me.

François (pointing to FLIPOTTE). Your friend?

Michette. We live together, and we haven't but one bed between us.

Flipotte (with a blush). Will you find that inconvenient when you come to see her?

She seats herself on FRANÇOIS' knee.)

Albin. I should not call her very shy.

Scaevola (rises, comes to table, speaks with gloomy mien). Have I found you at last? (To ALBIN.) Miserable seducer, she is mine — (PROSPERE watches him.)

François (to ALBIN). A joke, I tell you.

Albin. She is not his?

Michette. I shall sit where it pleases me. (SCAEVOLA stands still with clenched fist.)

Prospère (behind him). Well?

Scaevola. Ha! Ha!

Prospère (takes him by the collar, speaks aside to him) Is that all you can do? You haven't a sou's worth of talent. You can't do anything but yell.

Michette (to FRANÇOIS). He was much better the other evening.

Scaevola (to PROSPERE). I'm not in the mood yet. I'll do it better when there are more people present. I need an audience.

(Enter the DUKE DE CADIGNAN)

Duke. In full blast already? (MICHETTE and FLIPOTTE run to him.)

Michette. My sweet Duke!

François. Good evening, Emile. (Introducing.) My young friend Albin, Chevalier de la Tremouille — Duke de Cadignan.

Duke. I am charmed to meet you. (To the girls who cling to him.) Not so close, girls. (To ALBIN.) You've come to have a look at this queer wine-room?

Albin. It quite dazes me.

François. The Chevalier has only just come to Paris.

Duke (laughing). You have chosen a good time to come.

Albin. Why?

Michette. He's using another delicious perfume! There isn't a man in Paris smells so sweet.

Duke. She is thinking of the seven or eight hundred others whom she knows as well as she knows me.

Flipotte. May I play with your sword? (She draws out his sword and lets it sparkle in the light.)

Grain (aside to PROSPERE). That was the man — the man who was with her. (He talks further to him, and PROSPERE seems surprised.)

Duke. Henri not here yet? (To ALBIN.) When you see Henri you will not regret coming here.

Prospère (to the Duke). So you are here again? Charmed — but I sha'n't have that pleasure long.

Duke. Why not? I rather like it here.

Prospère. I believe that. But you are likely to be one of the first to go —

Albin. What does he mean?

Prospère. He understands — the most fortunate will be the first to fall. (He goes back to the bar.)

Duke (after a moment's thought). If I were king I would make that man my Court Jester — that is, I would have many jesters, but he should be one of them.

Albin. What did he mean? That you were too fortunate?

Duke. Chevalier, he means —

Albin. Oh pray do not call me Chevalier, they all call me Albin. Because I look so young, you know.

Duke (smiling). Gladly. But you must call me Emile.

Albin. If you permit it, Emile.

Duke. These people grow alarmingly witty.

François. Why alarming? It reassures me — As long as the mob is in a mood for jesting, nothing serious can happen.

Duke. The jests are passing strange, sometimes. I have just heard of something that set me thinking.

François. Tell us about it.
Michette and Flipotte. Yes, tell us, sweet Duke.

Duke. Do you know Lelange?

François. The village? Why yes, the Marquis de Montserrat has one of his finest hunting preserves there.

Duke. Quite right. My brother is with him at his castle, and he wrote me of this affair. They have a Mayor in Lelange who is very unpopular.

François. Can you name one who is not unpopular now?

Duke. But listen — the women of the village marched to the Mayor's house, carrying a coffin.

Flipotte. Carrying a coffin? Oh, I could never carry a coffin.

François. Be quiet, child, no one asks that you shall.

(To the DUKE.) Well?

Duke. Some of the women entered the Mayor's room and announced that he was about to die — but that he should be granted the honor of a burial.

François. Well, and did they kill him?

Duke. No — at least my brother did not mention that.

François. There, you see — braggarts, blusterers, clowns — that's all they are. Here in Paris they are yelling at the Bastille for a change — as they have done half a dozen times before.

Duke. Yes — were I the king, I should have put an end to it long ago.

Albin. Is it true that the King is so mild and gentle?

Duke. You haven't been presented to His Majesty yet?

François. The Chevalier is in Paris for the first time.

Duke. Yes, you are incredibly young — how old are you, if I may ask?

Albin. I only look so young. I am seventeen.

Duke. Seventeen — ah, how much lies before you yet! I am four and twenty — and already I begin to regret that I have lost so much of my youth.

François (laughing). That's good! You, Duke, you count each day lost, on which you have not won a woman or killed a man.

Duke. But one hardly ever wins the right woman — and invariably kills the wrong man. And so youth is lost after all — just as Rollin says —

François. What does Rollin say?

Duke. I was thinking of his new play that they are giving in the Comédie — he makes such a pretty comparison, do you remember?

François. I have no memory for verse.

Duke. Nor I unfortunately — I can only remember the sense of the words. He says that youth which is not enjoyed is like a feather-ball left lying in the sand instead of being tossed into the air.

Albin (precocious). Very true.

Duke. Is it not? The feathers lose their color and fall out — it is better to toss it somewhere into a bush where it cannot be found again.

Albin. How do you understand that, Emile?

Duke. It's more a matter of feeling — If I knew the verses you would understand it at once.

Albin. I believe you could write verse, Emile, if you wanted to.

Duke. Why do you think so?

Albin. Since you came in, all life seems to flame up brighter.

Duke (smiling). Indeed?

François. Will you not sit down here with us?

(Two more noblemen have come in and taken places at another table. PROSPERE brings them wine and appears to be insulting them.)

Duke. I can't stay now — but I will come back later.

Michette. Stay with me.

Flipotte. Take me with you. (The girls try to hold him.)

Prospère (joins them). Let him go, you are not bad enough for his taste — he's going to some woman of the street — that's where he feels happiest.

Duke. I'll return surely — I would not miss Henri.

François. Oh, just as we came in, we met Henri going out with Léocadie.

Duke. Yes, he has married her. Did you know it?

François. Really? What will the others say to that?

Albin. What others?

François (laughing). She is a great favorite.

Duke. And he wants to take her away from Paris — so I am told.

Prospère. Ah — so you are told. (With a meaning glance at the DUKE.)

Duke. It is too stupid. Léocadie was created to be one of the world's greatest courtesans.

François. Who does not know that?

Duke. Could there be anything more unreasonable than to take a human being out of his or her true profession?

(FRANÇOIS laughs.) No, I am not jesting now — a courtesan is born, not made — Just as is a conqueror or a poet.

François. You are paradoxical.

Duke. I am sorry for her — and for Henri. He should remain here — that is, not in this den — I would have him in the Comédie — although even there I feel as if no one could understand him as I do. I may deceive myself however — I often have that sensation where any artist is concerned who pleases me. But I will say, that were I not the Duke de Cadignan, I would prefer to be an actor — such an actor —

Albin. Like Alexander the Great.

Duke (smiling). Yes, like Alexander the Great. (To FLIPOTTE.) Give me my sword. (He puts his sword back in its sheath, speaking slowly.) Is there a better way to mock at the world? He who can show himself to the world in any shape he may choose is greater than all of us — (ALBIN looks at him in surprise.) Don't trouble your head about anything I may say. It is true only in the moment that I utter it. Au revoir.

Michette. Give me a kiss before you go.

Flipotte. And me?

(The girls cling to the DUKE. He kisses them both, as they go to the door with him.)

During this:

Albin. What a marvellous man!

François. True — but the fact that such men exist is a sufficient reason for not marrying.

Albin. Tell me what sort of women those are.

François. They are actresses of Prospère's troupe. He's now the host of this wine-room. They never did much more than they are doing now, however.

Guillaume (rushes in breathless, staggers to where the actors sit, breathing painfully, with his hands clasped to his heart). Saved — I am saved!

Scaevola. What is the matter? What has happened?

Albin. What is the matter with the man?

François. Listen now, this is part of the performance.

Albin. Oh —

Michette and Flipotte (joining Guillaume). What is it? What has happened?

Scaevola. Sit down — take a drink —

Guillaume. More wine, Prospère, more wine. Ah, how I ran — my tongue cleaves to my palate — they are at my heels.

Jules (starts). Hush — they are at our heels, always —

Prospère. Come, tell us what has happened? (Aside to the actors.) More movement there — livelier!

Guillaume. Women — where are the women? (Throws his arm around FLIPOTTE.) Ah, that gives fresh strength again. (Suddenly to ALBIN who is quite startled.) Devil take me, boy, if I thought I should ever see you in this life again. (As if listening.) They are coming — they are coming. (He runs to the door.) No — nothing. It is nothing. (Back again.)

Albin. How odd? — there really is a noise outside, as if many people were hurrying past — do they stage that from here?

Scaevola (aside to JULES). He does that trick every time — stupid.

Prospère. Tell us why they are at your heels.

Guillaume. Oh, it's nothing of importance. But if they caught me it might cost me my head. I set fire to a house —

(During this scene more young noblemen come in and take places at the tables.)

Prospère (aside). Go on, go on.

Guillaume. Go on? Isn't that enough?

François. Why did you set fire to the house?

Guillaume. Because the President of the Supreme Court lived in it. We've chosen him to begin with — we wish to teach the good house-owners of Paris that it is dangerous to have tenants who can send us poor devils to prison if they so please.

Grain. That is good — that is good.

Guillaume (looks at GRAIN in surprise, then continues). All such houses must be razed — three more such men as I am and there'd soon be no judges left in Paris.

Grain. Death to all judges!

Jules. There is one judge whom we cannot destroy.

Guillaume. I'd like to know who he is.

Jules. The Judge within our own conscience.

Prospère (aside). That's insipid, stop it. Scaevola, roar your loudest — this is the moment.

Scaevola. Bring wine, Prospère, bring wine — we will drink to the death of all the judges in France.

(During the last words, the MARQUIS DE LANSAC, SEVERINE, his wife, and the Poet, ROLLIN, enter from the street)

Scaevola. Death to all those who now hold power — death!

Marquis. You see, Séverine, this is the way they receive us.

Rollin. I warned you, Marquise.

Séverine. And why should you?

François (rising). Marquise! is it really you? (He kisses her hand.) Good evening, Marquis, — greetings, Rollin — you venture to enter here, Marquise?

Séverine. I have heard so much about this place — and then we seem to be out for adventure today.

Marquis. Yes, just fancy, Vicomte, where do you suppose we have been? To the Bastille.

François. Are they still making such a noise there?

Séverine. Noise indeed — it looks as if they intended to storm the prison.

Rollin (declaims).
Like to the flood, that breaks upon the rocks
In anger grim that his own child, the earth,
Should dare resistance.

Séverine. Don't, Rollin — we halted our carriage quite close — it was well worth seeing. Great crowds are always magnificent.

François. Yes — if only they didn't smell so vilely.

Marquis. And then my wife insisted upon us bringing her here.

Séverine. Well, and what is there so remarkable about this place?

Prospère (to the MARQUIS). You here, too, you dried-up old rascal? Did you bring your wife because you were afraid to leave her at home alone?

Marquis (with a forced laugh). He is such an original.

Prospère. Have a care that you do not lose her here. These fine ladies sometimes take a fancy to see what a real vagabond is like.

Rollin. I cannot stand this, Séverine.

Marquis. I warned you, my dear — we can still go if you wish it.

Séverine. What is the matter? I think it charming here. Sha'n't we sit down?

François. Marquise, will you permit me to introduce the Chevalier de la Tremouille, who is also here for the first time? Marquis de Lansac, Rollin, the celebrated poet.

(They bow to each other and all sit down)

Albin (aside to François). Is she one of the actresses, or —
I am quite confused.

François. Don't be so dull-witted. That is the real wife of the Marquis de Lansac, a lady of position.

Rollin (aside to SEVERINE). Tell me that you love me?

Séverine. Yes, yes, but don't ask me so often.

Marquis. Have we lost any good scenes?

François. Not much — that fellow there is acting the incendiary.

Séverine. Chevalier, are you not the cousin of little Lydia de la Tremouille who was married today?

Albin. I am, Marquise. The wedding was the main reason for my coming to Paris.

Séverine. I remember seeing you in the church.

Albin (embarrassed). I am greatly flattered, Marquise.

Séverine (to ROLLIN). What a dear boy.

Rollin. Ah, Séverine, you never saw the man yet who did not please you.

Séverine. Oh yes, one — so I married him at once.

Rollin. And yet I fear there are moments when even your own husband attracts you.

Prospère (brings them the wine). Here is your wine. I wish it were poison, but I am not permitted to give you that yet — Canaille!

François. The time will come, Prospère.

Séverine (to ROLLIN). Who are those two pretty girls? Why don't they come nearer? As I am here I want to see and do all that there is to be seen and done. Thus far, I think it is most disgustingly stupid.

Marquis. It will be livelier soon.

Séverine. The street is by far the most amusing place these days. Just imagine what happened to us yesterday as we were driving down the Promenade de Longchamps —

Marquis. My dear Séverine, why mention that —

Séverine. One fellow sprang up on the step of our carriage and screamed into our faces, "Next year you'll stand up behind your coachman and we will ride in your carriages."

François. That is rather strong.

Marquis. The less said about these things the better, I think. Paris is in fever — it will soon pass over.

Guillaume (suddenly). I see flames — red flames — everywhere — high red flames.
Prospère (aside to him). That's a madman, not a criminal.

Séverine. He sees flames?

François. This is only preliminary fun, Marquise.

Albin (to ROLLIN). I can't tell you how all this confuses me.

Michette (comes to MARQUIS). I haven't said good evening to you yet, you dear old pig.

Marquis (in embarrassment). She is joking, Séverine.

Séverine. It sounds quite real. Tell me, little one, how many lovers have you had?

Marquis (to FRANÇOIS). IS it not remarkable how the Marquise can adapt herself to any situation?

Rollin. It is indeed admirable.

Michette. Have you counted yours?

Séverine. I did — when I was still as young as you are.

Albin (to ROLLIN). Tell me, M. Rollin, is the Marquise acting, or is she really — I can't tell what is true and what is false here.

Rollin. Reality — acting — can you always tell the difference,
Chevalier?

Albin. Why, yes, I think so.

Rollin. I cannot — and what I find so remarkable here is that the apparent differences are done away with. Truth dissolves into pretense, pretense into truth. Look at the Marquise now — see how she chats with those women as if she were one of themselves — and yet she is —

Albin. Something quite different.

Rollin. I thank you, Chevalier.

Prospère (to GRAIN). What was that story?

Grain. What story?

Prospère. The story about your aunt, the affair that cost you two years in prison?

Grain. I told you, I strangled her.

François. He's weak. He must be an amateur. I haven't seen him here before.

(GEORGETTE comes in dressed like a prostitute of the lowest grade)

Georgette. Good evening. Is my Balthasar here yet?

Scaevola. Georgette, come here and sit down by me. Your Balthasar will settle his affair all right.

Georgette. If he isn't here in ten minutes, he hasn't settled it right — he'll not be here at all then.

François. Watch her, Marquise. In real life she's the wife of this Balthasar she is talking about. She's playing a low street-walker, and Balthasar is her bully. But she's really the most faithful wife in all Paris.

(BALTHASAR comes in, GEORGETTE runs to him, embraces him)

Georgette. My Balthasar!

Balthasar. That affair's settled. (The others are quiet and listen.) It was hardly worth the trouble — I'm almost sorry for him. You should choose your people more carefully, Georgette. I'm sick of killing promising youth for the sake of a few francs.

François. Excellent!

Albin. What?

François. His phrasing is so good.

(The POLICE SERGEANT comes in, in disguise, sits down at a table)

Prospère (aside to him). You've come just at the right time, Sergeant. This is one of my best actors.

Balthasar. I must look for some other livelihood. On my soul, I'm none of your cowards, but this is hard-earned bread.

Scaevola. I believe you.

Balthasar. I tell you, Georgette, you're too affectionate with those young men.

Georgette. What a silly he is. I have to be affectionate to win their confidence.

Rollin. Her words are deeply true.

Balthasar. If I ever thought that you had any feeling — with another man —

Georgette. Listen to that! This stupid jealousy will be his death yet.

Balthasar. I heard a sigh today — and that in a moment when his confidence was quite won —

Georgette. I can't stop pretending all in a moment.

Balthasar. Have a care, Georgette — the Seine is deep — (Wildly.) If you deceive me —

Georgette. Never — never.

Albin. I can't understand that at all.

Séverine. Rollin, that is the true philosophy —

Rollin. Do you think so?

Marquis. We can still go, if you wish it, Séverine.

Séverine. But why? I am beginning to enjoy myself.

Georgette. My Balthasar. I adore you — (Embrace.)

François. Bravo! — Bravo!

Balthasar. Who is that imbecile?

Sergeant. That is too much —

(MAURICE and ETIENNE come in dressed as young noblemen, but in shabby theatre costumes)

The Actors. Who are those?

Scaevola. Devil take me, but I believe it is Maurice and Etienne.

Georgette. Of course it is.

Balthasar. Georgette!

Séverine. What good-looking young men.

Rollin. It is painful to see how every attractive face excites you, Séverine.

Séverine. Well, what did I come here for?

Rollin. Then at least you might tell me that you love me.
Séverine (throws him a glance). You have a short memory.

Etienne. Where do you think we have been today?

François. Listen to them, Marquise, they are clever boys.

Maurice. We have been to a wedding.

Etienne. You have to dress up for that. Otherwise the confounded Secret Service police are after you at once.

Scaevola. Did you make a good haul?

Prospère. Yes, show us what you took.
Maurice (taking several watches from his coat). What will you give me for these?

Prospère. A louis for this one.

Maurice. I dare say.

Scaevola. That is all it is worth.

Michette. That is a lady's watch, give it to me.

Maurice. What will you give me for it?

Michette. Look at me, is that not enough?

Flipotte. No, look at me — give it to me —

Maurice. Dear children, I can have that pleasure any day without risking my head for it.

Michette. You are a conceited little monkey.

Séverine. I don't believe that is acting.

Rollin. No, there is a shred of truth in all of it — and that's just the charm.

Scaevola. What wedding was it?

Maurice. The wedding of Mlle, de la Tremouille — she married the Comte de Banville.

Albin. François, do you hear that? I assure you these are real thieves.

François. Nonsense. I know the men. I have seen them act a dozen times. They make a specialty of pick-pockets.

(MAURICE takes several purses from his coat)

Scaevola. You two can afford to be generous today.

Etienne. It was a very fine wedding. The entire nobility of France was present and the King sent a representative.

Albin (excited). That is all true.

Maurice (throws money on the table). Here's something for you, my friends, to show you that we are loyal.

François. Theatrical properties, my dear Albin. We can have some of it, too. (He rises and catches a few coins.)

Prospère. Yes, take it — you've never earned any so honestly before.

Maurice (holds up a jeweled garter). To whom shall I give this? (GEORGETTE, MICHETTE and FLIPOTTE snatch at it.) Patience, my darlings. We'll talk it over. I will give it to the one who invents a new caress.

Séverine (to ROLLIN). Would you allow me to enter the competition?

Rollin. Séverine, you drive me mad.

Marquis. Shall we not go, Séverine? I really think —

Séverine. Oh, no, I am enjoying myself immensely. (To ROLLIN.) Ah, it excites me so —

Michette. How did you get that garter?

Maurice. There was such a crowd in the church — she thought I was making advances —

(They all laugh. GRAIN steals FRANÇOIS' purse)

Francois (returning to ALBIN). There, you see, they're only counters — are you satisfied now?

(GRAIN attempts to steal from the room)

Prospère (catches him, speaks low). Give me that purse at once — give it to me, I say, or you will regret it.

Grain. You needn't get rough about it. (Gives him the purse.)

Prospère. And do not leave this place. I have no time to search you now and you may have taken something else. Go back to your place. (GRAIN obeys.)

Flipotte: I'll win that garter!

Prospère (goes to FRANÇOIS, throws him the purse.) Here is your purse; it fell out of your pocket.

François. Thanks, Prospère. (To ALBIN.) YOU see what a respectable place we are in.

(HENRI has been present for some time, sitting at a rear table. He now rises suddenly)

Rollin. Henri — there is Henri.

Séverine. Is that the man you told me of?

Marquis. Yes. It is really for his sake that we come here.

(HENRI walks forward in, with exaggerated theatricism. He is still silent)

Actors. What is it, Henri?

Rollin. Observe his glance, what a world of passion — he plays the criminal from passion.

Séverine. I admire that.

Albin. Why doesn't he speak?

Rollin. He is in a trance — watch him now — he has committed some dreadful crime.

François. He is rather theatrical tonight — he seems to be preparing a monologue.

Prospère. Henri, where have you been?

Henri. I have just killed a man.

Rollin. What did I say?

Scaevola. Who?

Henri. My wife's lover.

(PROSPERE looks at him with a momentary flash of belief that it might be true)

Henri (looks up). Yes, I have done it — why do you all stare at me so? These things happen — what is there so remarkable about it? You all know what my wife is — it could end only that way —

Prospère. And she? Where is she?

François. See how the host appears to believe it. That makes it seem so real — (Noise outside, not too loud.)

Jules. What noise is that?

Marquis. Do you-hear it, Séverine?

Rollin. It sounds as if troops were passing.

François. Oh, no, that is our dear people of Paris — hear them growl. (There is a slight uneasiness among the guests in the cellar, the noise outside dies away.) Go on, Henri.

Prospère. Yes, tell us, Henri — where is your wife? Where did you leave her?

Henri. I am not alarmed for her; it will not kill her. This one or that one, what does a woman like that care? There are a thousand other handsome men in Paris — what does it matter?

Balthasar. So be it with all of them — all those who take our women from us.

Scaevola. With all who take what belongs to us?

Sergeant (to PROSPERE). Those are revolutionary speeches.

Albin. It is dreadful — those people really mean what they say!

Scaevola. Down with the usurers of France! Shall we wager that the fellow he found with his wife was one of those damned dogs who steal our bread as well.

Albin. Oh, let us go.

Séverine. Henri! Henri!

Marquis. Marquise!

Séverine. Oh, my dear Marquis, please ask the man how he discovered his wife's infidelity — or shall I ask him myself?

Marquis (after a vain attempt at refusal). Tell us how you found them, Henri?

Henri (has been sunk in thought). Do you know my wife? She is the most beautiful and the most depraved creature under the sun — and I loved her. We had known each other seven years; but she is my wife only since yesterday. In all these seven years there was not one day — not one single day, on which she did not lie to me — for everything about her lies, her eyes and her lips — her kisses and her smile.

François. He is a little declamatory today.

Henri. The old ones and the young ones; every one who interested her — every one who would pay her — every one even who desired her — could have her — and I knew it.

Séverine. Not every man can say that.

Henri. And yet she loved me, friends — can you understand that? Again and again she came back to me — came back from everywhere, from everyone — from the handsome ones and the ugly — from the clever and from the stupid ones — from the vagabonds and the cavaliers — came back to me always.

Séverine (to ROLLIN). If you could but understand that this coming back is real love.

Henri. Oh, how I suffered — torture — torture!

Rollin. It is heartrending.

Henri. And yesterday I married her. We dreamed a dream — no, it was I who dreamed — I dreamed I might take her away from here — away into silence and solitude — into the peace of the wide fields. We should live as do other happy couples. I dreamed of a child, too.

Rollin (very low). Séverine!

Séverine. Yes — yes —

Albin. François, this man speaks the truth.

François. Certainly, the love story is real — the murder is the fiction.

Henri. I was one day late — she'd forgotten one — otherwise — I believe — there wasn't one missing — but I found them together — and he is dead.

The Actors. Who? Who? How did it happen? Where is he?
Are they following you? How was it? Where is she?

Henri (more and more excited). I accompanied her to the theatre — it was to be the last time — I kissed her — at the door. She went up to her dressing room — I walked away like a man who has nothing to fear. But scarce a hundred paces from the house — it began in me — do you understand? — a horrible unease — something pulled and tugged at me to go back — and I did turn and go back. — Then I was ashamed and walked away again — and again I was an hundred paces from the theatre — and again it seized and tore me — and I returned again. Her scene was over — she hasn't much to do — she stands a short time on the stage — half naked — and then she is through. I stood before her dressing room — I put my ear to the door and listened — I heard whispering — I could not hear the words. The whispering stopped — I broke open the door. (Screams like a wild animal.) It was the Duke de

Cadignan — and I killed him —

Prospère (who now believes it to be true). Madman!

(HENRI looks up, gazes at PROSPERE as if dazed.)

Séverine. Bravo! Bravo!

Rollin. O Marquise, what are you doing? The moment you applaud, you drag it all down to the level of an ordinary theatre — and the delicious shivery sensation is lost.

Marquis. I can't say that I find the shivers so delightful.
Let us applaud, friends, and free ourselves from this spell.

Prospère (comes to HENRI, during the applause, whispers), Henri, save yourself. Flee for your life!

Henri. What — what?

Prospère. That is enough — hurry now — get away from here.

François. Silence there! — listen to what our host is saying.

Prospère (after a second's thought). I tell him that he must get away before the watch at the city gates have been notified. The handsome Duke was a favorite with the king — they will put you to the wheel! Ah, had you but killed that wretch, your wife, instead!

François. What splendid ensemble work! — magnificent!

Henri. Prospère, it is you or I that is mad now. (He tries to read the other's eyes.)

Rollin. It is marvellous — we all know that he is acting — and yet if the Duke de Cadignan should come in now, he would seem like a ghost to us.

(The noise outside has been growing stronger for some time — the door is thrown open, faces took in — yells and shouts are heard — people press in at the door, led by GRASSET, LEBRET following him. Shouts of "Liberty! liberty!" outside)

Grasset. Here we are friends — this is the place.

Albin. What is that? Is that part of the play?

François. No —

Marquis. What does this mean?

Séverine. Who are these people?

Grasset. This way, friends. As I told you — my friend Prospère has always an extra barrel of wine hidden somewhere — and we have earned it tonight. Friends — brothers — we have taken it — we have taken it!

(Shouts outside "Liberty! Liberty!")

Séverine. What is happening?

Marquis. Let us go — the mob is crowding in.

Rollin. How do you think to get out?

Grasset. The Bastille has fallen — the Bastille has fallen!

Prospère. What's that you're saying? — Is he telling the truth?

Grasset. Can't you hear? (ALBIN puts his hand to his sword.)

François. No — don't do that — we are lost if you do —

Grasset (staggers down the steps). If you hasten, you can see a merry sight out there — you can see the head of our beloved Delaunay on the top of a tall pole.

Marquis. Is the man crazy?

Shouts. Liberty! — Liberty!

Grasset. We've lopped off a dozen of their heads. The Bastille is ours — the prisoners are free! Paris belongs to the people!

Prospère. Do you hear? Do you hear? Paris is ours!

Grasset. See! — See! — now he has courage! Scream all you want to, Prospère, you cannot come to harm now.

Prospère (to the noblemen). What do you say to this, you pigs? The comedy is over —

Albin. Did I not say so?

Prospère. The people of Paris have conquered.

Sergeant. Quiet there — (Several laugh.) I forbid the continuation of this performance.

Grasset. What imbecile is this?

Sergeant. Prospère, I make you responsible for these revolutionary speeches —

Grasset. Is the man crazy?

Prospère. The comedy is over, don't you understand? Henri, tell them — you can tell them now; we will protect you — the people of Paris will protect you —

Grasset. Yes, the people of Paris.

(HENRI stands as if dazed)

Prospère. Henri has really murdered the Duke de Cadignan.

François and Marquis. What's that?

Albin and Others. Henri! What does this all mean?

Prospère. He found him with his wife — and he killed him.

Henri. But it isn't true!

Prospère. You need have no fear now — you can shout it out for all the world to hear. An hour ago I could have told you myself that your wife was the Duke's mistress — by God, I was near telling you — you — Bellowing Brimstone, you — we knew it, didn't we? — you saw them.

Henri. Who saw them? Where were they seen?

Prospère. What does that matter now? The man's crazy! — you killed him — what more could you do?

François. For Heaven's sake — is this true or not?

Prospère. Yes, it is true.

Grasset. Henri, you must be my friend — hurrah for Liberty! — Liberty!

François. Henri — won't you speak?

Henri. She was his mistress? She was the Duke's mistress? I did not know it — and he still lives — he lives —

(Strong emotion in the audience)

Séverine. What is the truth now?

Albin. My God —!

(The DUKE pushes his way through the crowd on the steps)

Séverine (first to see him). The Duke!

Several Others. The Duke!

Duke. Why, yes — what is the matter?

Prospère. Are you a ghost?

Duke. Not that I know — let me pass here.

Rollin. Shall we wager that it is all part of the comedy? That mob there are Prospère's troupe — Bravo Prospère! It was a great success.

Duke. Are you still trifling here? While outside — do you not know that things are happening outside —? I have seen the head of Delaunay carried past me on a pole —
Why do you all look at me like this? (Comes forward.)
Henri —

François. Have a care of Henri! (HENRI hurls himself at the DUKE like a madman and buries his dagger in his throat.)

Sergeant. This is going too far.

Albin. He bleeds!

Rollin. This is murder!

Séverine. The Duke is dying!

Marquis. I am inconsolable, my dear Séverine, to think I should have brought you here just today.

Séverine. And why? (With difficulty.) It was a rare chance — one cannot see a real Duke really murdered every day —

Rollin. I am still dazed.

Sergeant. Quiet there — no one must leave the place.

Grasset. What does the fool mean?

Sergeant. I arrest this man in the name of the law.

Grasset (laughs). We make the laws now, imbecile. Out with this rabble here! He who kills a Duke is the friend of the people — hurrah for liberty!

Albin (draws his sword). Make way there — follow me, friends.

(LÉOCADIE pushes in through the crowd on the steps)

Several Voices. Léocadie!

Others. His wife!

Léocadie. Let me in here — where is my husband! (She runs forward, sees what has happened, screams.)

Who did that? Henri?

(HENRI looks at her)

Léocadie. Oh, Henri, why did you do it?

Henri. Why?

Léocadie. Ah yes, I know — it was for my sake — ah no — no — say it was not that — I am not worth it — I am not worth it!

Grasset (beginning a speech). Citizens of Paris, let us celebrate our victory. Chance has led us through the streets of Paris to this agreeable resort — we could not have hit upon a better place — nowhere could the cry of "Liberty forever." sound more beautiful than beside the corpse of a Duke.

Shouts. Liberty forever!

François. We had better go — the mob is quite mad —

Albin. Shall we leave them the body?

Séverine. Liberty forever! Liberty!

Marquis. Are you crazy?

Citizens and Actors. Liberty — Liberty forever!

Séverine (at the head of the group of aristocrats as they go towards the door, aside to ROLLIN). Rollin, wait before my window tonight — I will throw down the key as before — we will have an hour of bliss — my nerves are deliciously excited.

Shouts. Hurrah for liberty — hurrah for Henri!

Lebrêt. Watch the dogs — they are running away.

Grasset. Let them go for today — let them go — they will not escape us!

CURTAIN

Living Hours (1902)

A CYCLE OF FOUR ONE-ACT PLAYS

Original German Title: ‘Lebendige Stunden’

Translated by Grace Isabel Colbron, 1917

CONTENTS

PART I. LIVING HOURS

CHARACTERS

LIVING HOURS

PART II. THE LADY WITH THE DAGGER

CHARACTERS

THE LADY WITH THE DAGGER

PART III. LAST MASKS

CHARACTERS

LAST MASKS

PART IV. LITERATURE

CHARACTERS

LITERATURE

PART I. LIVING HOURS

CHARACTERS

ANTON HAUSDORFER

HEINRICH

BORROMÄUS, gardener

LIVING HOURS

A carefully tended little garden in a suburb of Vienna. A small house fills the right side of the stage, the veranda towards the garden. Three steps lead down from the veranda. Under a spreading tree on the left side of the stage, down towards the front, is a little table surrounded by several chairs, one of them a comfortable armchair. A high iron railing running from the left side at back over to the house, separates the garden from the street. Beyond are the trees and grassy stretches of a park. It is early Autumn, near the close of day. Deep stillness broods over the garden. BORROMÄUS, the gardener, is working at a flower-bed. He is an old man with rather longish gray hair. ANTON HAUSDORFER comes slowly down the steps from the veranda. HAUSDORFER is nearly sixty, smoothshaven with close-cut, gray hair but young eyes. He wears a quiet dark suit, easy in fit, but well made, and a broadbrimmed, dark straw hat.

Hausdorfer. Good evening, Borromäus.

Borromäus. Good evening, sir. You've been to the city this afternoon, haven't you, sir?

Hausdorfer. No.

Borromäus. I thought maybe, sir, because you didn't take your coffee out here in the arbor this afternoon either.

Hausdorfer. No, I did not go to town. I was in the house, lying on the sofa. I had a bit of a headache. What are you doing now? You'll soon have the entire garden turned over.

Borromäus. Surely, sir, it's quite necessary. We may have a frost any night now. I'm not lettin' these mild nights deceive me, once it's October. Do you remember the Autumn of '93, sir? We sat outdoors that evening — the 28th of October it was, and next morning at three there was a heavy frost. And in '87 and '88 it was the same way. No, sir, I'm not lettin' these fine days deceive me.

Hausdorfer. Quite right, Borromäus. (He looks on at the work.) And what shall we plant here now? (He falls into deep thought and pays little heed to the answer.)

Borromäus. Just what I wanted to talk to you about, sir.
I went over to see Franz today —

Hausdorfer (absently). Who?

Borromäus (surprised). Why, Franz, sir, — Baron Weiseneck's gardener across the way. He 'thinks a bit of himself but he knows a bit, too. He's studied it all in books, twenty or more of them he has on his shelf, so I don't mind askin' him a question now and then —

Hausdorfer (he has not been listening). Yes, yes, — you ought to do that —

Borromäus. Do what, sir?

Hausdorfer. Whatever he told you. I'm quite willing you should.

Borromäus. (still more surprised). But, sir, I haven't said anything yet —

Hausdorfer (as before). It will be the right thing to do', no doubt.

Borromäus (now quite alarmed). Why, sir —

Hausdorfer (as if awakening). What is it?

Borromäus. Oh, sir, I understand — if I may take the liberty of asking, sir — I'm sure it's that Mrs. Councillor is worse again. (HAUSDORFER does not answer, BORROMÄUS becomes embarrassed.) I thought maybe, sir, since it's over three weeks that the lady was out here the last time —

Hausdorfer. She is dead — I thank you for your sympathy —
Mrs. Councillor is dead. (He sits down by the table.)

Borromäus (startled, pulls off his cap hastily). Oh — sir —

(There is a pause.)

Hausdorfer. Yes. She will never come out here again to see us.

Borromäus. Is it possible, sir! I didn't think the lady was as ill as that. (Shakes his head.) And quite a young lady one might almost say.

Hausdorfer. Young, Borromäus? Well, she was seven years younger than I. But then I'm nearly sixty.

Borromäus. Yes, that's true, sir.

Hausdorfer. Still, people do live longer than that.

Borromäus. You see, sir, it's because I saw Mrs. Councillor so often, almost every day it seems like now, in these fifteen or twenty years — Hausdorfer. Yes, we were all younger twenty years ago.

Borromäus. But even this last year, sir, she didn't look like an old lady. And this summer, when she grew so pale and thin — anyone would have thought — why, one evening, sir, when
I went past the gate late and saw her sitting here, I really thought — beggin' your pardon, sir, I thought it must be Mrs.
Councillor's younger sister.

Hausdorfer (after a short pause). Well, Borromäus, and what did our arrogant friend Franz have to say?

Borromäus. Oh, no, sir, I won't bother you with such things now. (Kisses his hand.) I know what it means, sir, I had a wife once and — buried her. (He is suddenly frightened at what he has said.) That is — I meant, sir —

Hausdorfer. I understand, Borromäus. (There is another pause.)

Borromäus. And the young gentleman, sir?

Hausdorfer. Who?

Borromäus. Young Mr. Heinrich, sir. Oh, dear, it's too dreadful! When I think how he used to bring his mother out here all this last year, and then come for her again in the evening —

Hausdorfer. Yes, he's greatly to be pitied.

Borromäus. Is he ill himself, sir, that he doesn't come out here?

Hausdorfer. No, no, I expect him any day. He has been away, traveling. But he should return any day now. He had to rest a little — to brighten himself up — he has to work again.

Borromäus. Yes, sir, when a man has his calling —

Hausdorfer. And such a calling — a poet! (He rises.) A poet! Do you know what that means?

Borromäus. Why, yes, sir —

Hausdorfer. No, you don't — you don't know anything about it. We don't know anything about it at all, — we ordinary mortals, who can do nothing but putter about in our gardens —

Borromäus. Oh, sir, but you once had —

Hausdorfer. You mean, I had something else to do once upon a time? But it wasn't any better than what I'm doing now. I sat at a desk in an office, in the city, from eight o'clock until two, sometimes even until three or four.

Borromäus. It must be right hard to sit in one spot for six hours every day. I've often felt sorry for you, sir, in those days, when you couldn't get out here until so late. And when it was Winter —

Hausdorfer. One has to do something, Borromäus. Another man has my desk now, and if he sticks at it as long as I did he'll get his pension, too, and someone else will fall into his place. It matters so little who sits there, anyone would do.
But a poet — he's a different sort of being from you and me,
Borromäus. When he retires it may be a long, long time before anyone comes to fill his place. A poet must take good care of himself, he owes it to the world — you understand that, Borromäus?

Borromäus. Why, yes, sir.

Hausdorfer. No, you don't — you don't understand it at all. Have you noticed anything queer about Heinrich? — anything unusual? Have you never noticed the halo around his head? No? Well, there you see, you don't understand it at all.

(BORROMÄUS laughs, then looks serious.) Don't worry about me, Borromäus. I'm not losing my mind. I don't mean a real halo, only an imaginary one. You couldn't see it — nor could

I — but his mother saw it.

Borromäus. Yes, I know what you mean, sir. You mean the papers say so much about Mr. Heinrich, although he's so young yet — and because people talk about him — and that's it, isn't it? (He draws his hand around his head as if describing a halo. HEINRICH, dressed in deep mourning, passes back of the fence. He bows and goes on into the house. HAUSDORFER looks after him and BORROMÄUS follows HAUSDORFER'S glance with his eyes.)

Hausdorfer. Here he comes. (He remains seated, silent.)

Borromäus. If you please, sir — I haven't had any chance yet to tell the young gentleman how sorry I am — (HEINRICH comes out onto the veranda from the house.)

Hausdorfer. Go and tell him now — tell him you are sorry for him. (BORROMÄUS goes to meet HEINRICH who comes down the steps into the garden and takes the old man's hand.)

Heinrich. Thank you, Borromäus — I understand. I thank you. (BORROMÄUS goes out R. softly, as HEINRICH comes down towards the table. HAUSDORFER rises now, goes a step or two to meet him and takes his hand.)

Hausdorfer. You've come home again?

Heinrich. Yes, sooner than I thought. It is better at home —

Hausdorfer (nods). You went away — that same evening?

Heinrich. Yes. I went home from the cemetery, packed my bag and left. I couldn't have endured the night in the house.

Hausdorfer. I can understand. Where did you go?

Heinrich. I went to Salzburg first.

Hausdorfer. Indeed?

Heinrich. I've always felt happy there. It's a consoling town —

Hausdorfer. Are there such towns? That would be fortunate.

Heinrich. There are such towns — under certain conditions. I did not go to Salzburg on a mere chance. I had an experience once, seven or eight years ago — tragic, or, at least, painful — you know, Mr. Hausdorfer, one of those affairs — well, I thought I would never get over it. I went away, and I went to Salzburg. And that very afternoon, during a solitary stroll in Hellbrunn, in the charming Rococo garden, I felt my pain lighten. Next morning I awoke strong and well — and could work again.

Hausdorfer. Is it possible?

Heinrich. Of course, I was scarcely twenty then, and it was Springtime — you have to take that into consideration.

Hausdorfer. Yes — that's true.

Heinrich. But this time I found no comfort — nothing — rather the contrary.

Hausdorfer. Then there are times when Hellbrunn cannot heal? How long did you stay in Salzburg?

Heinrich. I left the next day — left for Munich. I hoped for the quieting influence of the old pictures. I went to the old Pinakothek where my beloved Dürers and Holbeins hang — and there, for the first time in many, many months, I seemed to feel relief. (There is a pause.) You don't mind my telling you all this, do you? I feel a real need to talk it all out with you —

Hausdorfer (takes his hand, speaks more kindly than before). Please do —

Heinrich. Thank you. (He sits down.) You see, Mr. Hausdorfer, I've — I've felt it deeply — that you and I — during these last years — that we seem to have — to have grown so apart.

Hausdorfer. How do you mean?

Heinrich. I've seen it plainly — that you — that you weren't as fond of me as you were once, — long ago, — when I was a little boy playing on the meadow there.

Hausdorfer. Yes — that was a long time ago, Heinrich. And you must acknowledge that it was you who first — oh, well, it's only natural that you should want to go your own way. It wasn't particularly interesting out here for a young man — you have your own circle of friends. But I have not complained — or have I?

Heinrich. Oh, no. But I wanted you to know how deeply — after this unsuccessful journey, this flight — how deeply I realize that you are nearer to me than anyone else. You will understand. You know how grateful I must be to you. You were so much to my poor mother — you made her last years of life beautiful!

Hausdorfer (with a gesture of protest). Yes — yes — but tell me more about yourself. You went to Munich and you saw the pictures? And they comforted you?

Heinrich. Only as long as I remained in the cool, quiet halls.
When I stepped out into the street again, it was all gone. And then the evenings — the long, lonely evenings!
I tried to work, to think — impossible! Everything seemed dead within me.

(There is a pause. He rises.) How long will this last, I wonder?

Hausdorfer. It must be distressing — when you're used to regular work —

Heinrich. Used to it? I haven't been — for a long time now.
That's just the trouble. I haven't accomplished anything for two or three years. You know —

Hausdorfer. Yes — I know.

Heinrich. It was an absolute impossibility. To see someone you love — your mother, suffering — suffering like that — and to know that there is no hope — and that she knows it — that was the terrible part of it — this knowledge that I could see shining in her eyes when I sat by her bed evenings, reading to her. (There is a long pause.) I have given up the apartment.

Hausdorfer. You have? Well, it would be too large for you alone.

Heinrich. Apart from that — I could never write a line in those rooms again. Night after night I'd still believe that I could hear that moaning from the next room, that moaning that cut deep into my heart, that robbed me Of the power or the desire to work — to live even. Oh, my God — (Pause.) Do you know what Dr. Heusser told me the Sunday before her death?

Hausdorfer. What was it?

Heinrich. He said — it might go on — for two or three years more.

Hausdorfer (with a start that is almost of anger). Two or three years more? (Controlling himself.) He said it might go on for two or three years more? —

Heinrich. Yes. And it would have been much worse. She wouldn't have been able to leave her room — she couldn't even have had her few hours out here — here in this garden where she's always been so happy. (He stands looking down at the empty armchair.)

Hausdorfer. I might have found my way into town occasionally — don't you think?

Heinrich (with a sense of shame). Dear Mr. Hausdorfer, here I am talking about myself all this time — I am young — there may be something of a future for me yet — but you — how much you have lost?

Hausdorfer. Yes, I have lost much.

Heinrich. I know how near my mother was to you. I have always known it — even — then — years ago.

Hausdorfer. Even then —

Heinrich. I was not so very little when he — who was my father — left us.

Hausdorfer. Yes — yes.

Heinrich. I can still remember the day mother told me that my papa had gone away. When he did not return I imagined he must be dead and I used to cry bitterly, some nights. Then one day I met him on the street with — the other woman — for whose sake he had deserted my mother. I hid in a doorway that he might not see me — I felt ashamed, child that I was.
Oh, yes, I early learned to understand that my mother was free — as free as if she had been widowed.

Hausdorfer. Then — it seems — you have forgiven us?

Heinrich (slightly offended), I beg your pardon, I must have expressed myself awkwardly. (Warmer again.) Why shouldn't we talk naturally and simply about natural, simple things, particularly in a moment like this. I long to press your hand, as a son to a father, for I know how my mother loved you. (It is now growing dark.

The lanterns on the street are lit up one by one.)

Hausdorfer. Love? That would not mean so much. Love comes easily when one is young. We were friends, Heinrich, old people and friends. Do you know what that means? Or has the word no meaning yet for such young ears? Ah, yes, how could you understand it? — you young people — with the world opening before you — the future at your feet — and you, just you with your gifts, your prospects — no wonder —

Heinrich. Oh, you are mistaken, Mr. Hausdorfer, I do understand it. If I could bring her back to you — to us — could bring back my poor mother and see her sitting there, — if only just for one evening — what would I not give to do it?

Hausdorfer (bitterly). What would you give?

Heinrich (hesitating). I feel now as if I would give my entire future, all I can accomplish, all that I hope to achieve — give it all for that.

Hausdorfer. Heinrich, don't be angry — but — you don't believe that yourself.

Heinrich. If I could do it — if it lay in my power —

Hausdorfer. No, Heinrich, that is not true — even if it lay in your power — I know you — I know you all — I know what you are like — you artists — all of you.

Heinrich. All of us? I do not have to answer for anyone else.

Hausdorfer. No, you do not have to answer for anyone else.
But when I say all of you, I know what I mean. There was a man in my office — about ten years ago it was — he occupied himself with music in his leisure hours; something of his was given as a concert by the Choral Society. His name was Franz
Thomas. He lost an only child, a boy of seven, handsome and intelligent. I knew him, he used to come to the office with his mother sometimes. Diphtheria killed him one night, and I went to pay my visit of condolence. He — the father — was at the piano playing — and the dead child lay in his coffin in the very same room. He sat there playing and he didn't stop when I came in — he just nodded to me and whispered, when I came up behind him: "Listen to this, Mr. Hausdorfer — this is in memory of my poor boy — the melody just came to me—" and there lay the dead child in its coffin — yes — it turned me cold —

Heinrich (listens with great interest and finally with a sense of satisfaction). Yes — I think I can understand that many people — many very worthy people, feel a sort of horror at such things.

Hausdorfer. Horror? That is the right word.

Heinrich. But tell me, Mr. Hausdorfer, aren't they to be envied — the people who can escape like that — escape from their sorrows into their work, into their art? — who may even possess the magic power to shape their grief into something beautiful, instead of pouring it out in useless tears?

Hausdorfer. Into something beautiful? Does that bring back the dead?

Heinrich. As little as do the tears. I don't say that our joy in our work can outweigh the grief for a beloved one lost. But isn't it all that is left to us? This work of ours? Will you not tend your garden as carefully as before? And I — I long for the day when I shall be able to work again, to accomplish something worth while. We must all bow to the inevitable.

Hausdorfer. To the inevitable — yes, that may be true.

Heinrich. This was inevitable.

Hausdorfer. No — no —

Heinrich (slightly surprised). But it was. Why torture yourself with such thoughts? Didn't you speak to the doctor yourself not more than six weeks ago — he told you the truth then — it had to come.

Hausdorfer. But not so soon — not yet.

Heinrich. How can you say that, Mr. Hausdorfer? You don't mean — that there was any neglect —

Hausdorfer. Oh, no — oh, no, forgive me. Everything was done that could possibly be done.

Heinrich. Well, then?

Hausdorfer. Didn't you tell me yourself, just now, that she might have had two or three years more to live?

Heinrich. Why, yes, that's true. But the doctor warned us that death might come suddenly any day — you know that as well as I do.

Hausdorfer. Suddenly? Yes, it came suddenly enough. (Hesitating, then with decision.) But whether it came — naturally — that's another question.

Heinrich (startled). What? Why? — I don't understand how you could suggest such a thing — when there wasn't the slightest — the doctor would surely have noticed —

Hausdorfer. Why should he? An overdose of morphine — death before morning — the family are prepared —

Heinrich. You say that — with such strange conviction — did my mother ever — speak about —?

Hausdorfer. I am not mistaken — let that suffice.

Heinrich. Since you have already said so much, Mr. Hausdorfer, you will understand that I —

Hausdorfer. I know what I am talking about — don't ask any more.

Heinrich. You mean — the letter on her desk —

Hausdorfer (nods). Yes. (There is a pause.)

Heinrich (alarmed, doubtful). The letter? Hm — Yet why should I be surprised? How many times in those terrible nights have I asked myself — I will confess it now, even at the risk of giving you the horrors — I have asked myself why we poor mortals should suffer so much misery — such agony, when it is in our power to end it all any moment.

Hausdorfer. Heinrich!

Heinrich. If my mother has done — what you say she has — then she has done right.

Hausdorfer. Heinrich!

Heinrich. That is my honest opinion.

Hausdorfer. But you don't know; Heinrich — you don't know the truth. She would have lived on — even in torture — as long as God gave her life — she would have lived on for my sake and for her own — for our few hours in the garden here — so full of memories of our youth, and our happiness. She died for your sake, Heinrich — now you know, — she died for you.

Heinrich (in growing excitement). For me —? For me? I don't understand you at all — for me? What do you mean?

Hausdorfer. Can't you really understand? Can't you imagine? Didn't you speak of it yourself, just now?

Heinrich. Speak of what?

Hausdorfer. Haven't you just told me what has been going on in you this last year? And do you think your mother wouldn't notice it?

Heinrich. Notice what?

Hausdorfer. That her illness hampered you in your work? — that you couldn't write — that you were afraid your talent was dead — that you — you — were the martyr, that you were a ruined man — she saw all that — and because she saw it —

Heinrich. Because of that? Oh, no, no — it isn't possible.

Hausdorfer. She was your mother — it was quite possible.

Heinrich. Oh, no, no. Mr. Hausdorfer, your grief leads you into surmises that are quite unjustified. Of course I realize that my state of mind cannot have been a secret to my mother — although I did my best to hide it from her. But that this should have been the reason for — oh, no — no.

Hausdorfer (interrupting vehemently). Why won't you believe me? Do you think I am lying to you? Why should I?

(He takes a letter from his pocket.) Here, read this — read this — this letter was written with full consciousness — it's the letter that was found on her desk. She wrote it that last evening — and half an hour later — read it — read it — it's all there — because she saw you suffer — she saw you — suffer — she — left us — before her time had come — that's why — she died.

Heinrich (reads the letter quickly). Mother! mother! (He sinks down as if crushed.) For me — for my sake — why then — then I am her — oh, my God — Mother! (He kneels before the armchair, burying his head in its seat. HAUSDORFER looks down at him and nods slowly. There is a long pause. Finally, HEINRICH rises and speaks quietly.)

Heinrich. I will go now. I can imagine how painful it is for you to see me here. This letter — (He still holds it in his hand) — it is written in full consciousness and it tells the truth. I cannot doubt it. (After a moment's hesitation.) But may I — may I call your attention to one sentence?

Hausdorfer. Which?

Heinrich. This one, in which my mother implores you never to betray the contents of this letter to me. (Reading.) "I implore you—" She implores you to leave me in the belief that she died a natural death. This letter was intended for you alone and certainly not for me.

Hausdorfer. But I intend that you shall know of it. I take the responsibility. You will survive it.

Heinrich. Your action has destroyed the very reason for her voluntary death, for her great sacrifice. She did not will that I should feel myself her murderer, that I should go through life as one accursed. And some day you may come to realize that you have done a great wrong, not only to me but to her — a wrong as great as mine has been.

Hausdorfer. I will take it upon myself, Heinrich — I can tell you — you. You will not feel guilty long — you will live on — you will work — you will shape it into something beautiful.

Heinrich. That is my right — it is even my duty now. There is nothing for me now but to kill myself, or to give the proof that my mother — has not died in vain.

Hausdorfer. Heinrich! Your mother was alive less than a month ago and you can talk like this? She killed herself for your sake — and you can shake it off? A few days more and you'll be thinking, perhaps, that what she did was only her duty. Am I not right? You are all alike, you artists — great and small — all alike — proud, arrogant! What is all your writing — even if you were the greatest genius — what is all your writing compared to one such living hour? — one of those hours when your mother sat here in this armchair and talked to us — or just sat silent — but she was here — and she was alive — she was alive — alive I —

Heinrich. Living hours? They live no longer than the life of him who remembers them. And it is no mean vocation to give such hours an enduring existence beyond the grave. Good-bye, Mr. Hausdorfer. Today your grief gives you the right to misunderstand me. In the Spring, when your garden blooms anew, we will meet again. For you, too, — will go on living.

(He goes out through the veranda. As he opens the door of the house a broad stream of light from the lamp shines out into the now darkened garden.)

CURTAIN

PART II. THE LADY WITH THE DAGGER

A DRAMA

CHARACTERS

REMIGIO

PAULINE (Paola)

LEONHARD (Lionardo)

THE LADY WITH THE DAGGER

A small room in a picture gallery, hung with works of the Italian Renaissance. On the center wall, in a conspicuous position, is a large picture of a beautiful woman in a flowing gown, somewhat in the style of Palma Vecchio.
She holds a dagger in her upraised right hand and stares at the ground at her feet, as if someone lay there whom she had murdered. The only furniture on the stage is a bench in the center of the room. Silence broods over the scene. An attendant passes slowly across the stage. When he has gone, PAULINE comes in from the Left, holding a catalogue. She saunters through the room, stops to look at a picture on the Right wall. She wears a handsome street dress with rich furs. A few seconds later.

LEONHARD comes in from the opposite side. He is a good-looking young man, wearing a long overcoat of the latest cut. He stops behind PAULINE.

Leonhard. Good morning —

Pauline (turns to him, smiling). Good morning. I have just arrived. Room 9, that would be right, wouldn't it?

Leonhard. How do you mean?

Pauline. It was room 8 in which we parted last time.

Leonhard. Quite right. I didn't know you were so particular about the pictures. I scarcely dared hope you would come today.

Pauline. You had my promise.

Leonhard. Last night's affair was a late one?

Pauline. Until morning almost. Too bad you had to leave so early. It was a delightful affair.

Leonhard. They certainly lionized him.

Pauline. Did that distress you?

Leonhard. The whole world may kneel at his feet for all
I care. But you, Pauline, you loved him more than ever last night — you were proud of him.

Pauline. Had I not cause? Do you not admire him yourself? You were shaken to your inmost soul — you applauded as madly as any of them when the curtain fell on the last act.

Leonhard. You noticed that?

Pauline. I looked down at you often enough. (He kisses her hand, she draws it gently away.) Didn't you want to show me a picture which you think so like me?

Leonhard. Quite right. Here it is — this large one.

Pauline (walks over to the picture of the Lady with the Dagger). This one? Yes — it has something of me.

Leonhard. The resemblance is remarkable — apart from the dagger naturally.

Pauline (smiling). Why "naturally"? You never can tell.

(Looking in her catalogue.) Number 726 — Lady with Dagger — unknown artist, died about 1530 —

Leonhard. Those are your eyes.

Pauline. Are? — they might be. Let us stay here a while. I feel at home in this room.

Leonhard. Pauline —

Pauline. Not altogether on your account. In there, where the old Dutch and German masters hang, I was not so happy. But I have a sort of feeling of being at home here. I really believe I must have seen all these people somewhere. Look at that old gentleman. (She points to a picture on the right wall.) He certainly looks as if he knew me. It would not surprise me in the least if he were to bow to me.

Leonhard. He may have been a guest at your house in the early days of the 16th century.

Pauline. Why not? My mother's people came from Florence. They wore prettier clothes then than now, don't you think? But this is not intended for a slur on your new overcoat, which is really vastly becoming.
(LEONHARD bows.)
Still — I will not deny —

Leonhard. Deny what?

Pauline (smiling). That if I had met you in a costume like any of these —

Leonhard. It is my misfortune that I did not have the honor of knowing you in those days.

Pauline. Are you sure you did not? We may have forgotten it, perhaps.

Leonhard. I assure you I could not have forgotten — you —

Pauline (pondering). Perhaps — if we exert our will power — (There is a pause, as her eyes wander from one picture to another.)

Leonhard. Your husband's name is on every tongue today.

Pauline (coming back to the present). Yes, I can imagine it.

Leonhard (with meaning). And yours also.

Pauline. Naturally. (She turns as if to go.)

Leonhard. Pauline!-Pauline (she turns to him somewhat absently). Well, what is it?

Leonhard. Pauline — how can you endure it? (She looks at him with a peculiar smile). Everyone in the theatre knew the history of that play. It was simply the story —

Pauline (interrupts quickly). Of Princess Marie.

Leonhard. That was what they called it.

Pauline. And who gives you the right to imagine that it was anything else?

Leonhard. I imagine only what the whole town knows — but I know more.

Pauline. And that is? —

Leonhard. I know that there was a moment last evening when you hated him.

Pauline. Hated whom?

Leonhard. The man for whom you and your fate mean nothing more than an opportunity to show his wit — his genius if you will.

Pauline. My whole life may have no other meaning —

Leonhard (simply, without pathos). And is that part of your life's meaning that its secrets should be bared to the mob? Princess Marie? Everyone knew that it was Princess Marie up there in the box. Master Gottfried? Everyone knew that it was he who had written the play. And all the words and all the kisses on the stage — his treachery and her despair — his remorse and her forgiveness — all the passion and all the misery — it was all true — and Master Gottfried had made it into a play, and Princess Marie sat in her box and looked on as it was played. Oh, Pauline, I felt yesterday as if I must go to you — and free you — as if I must carry you away with me — you seemed so like a slave — a helpless, humiliated slave. I pitied you — and I was ashamed.

Pauline. Ashamed? Why?

Leonhard. Because I love you, Pauline. (She looks at him calmly.) Do not be angry with me, Pauline. I know I have no right to speak thus to you — no right except that nothing else in all the world matters to me — nothing but you — and that I'm ready to die for you — and that I am young.

Pauline. That means more than a little. But let us drop the subject and move on. Come, let us see what is in the next room. No — no more of that, I beg you.

Leonhard (imploringly). Then tell me, Pauline, why are you here today? Why did you come yesterday and last week?
And why, as we sat here quietly together and your knee touched mine, why did you tremble? Why do your eyes grow moist when I speak to you, and your lips pout with longing, even while we stand here so calmly?

Pauline. Why question me so vehemently, Leonhard? I deny nothing — denials are vulgar and cowardly. But it would be the worst of all lies if I were to tell you that I love you.

There has never been a moment when I believed it myself. But there was a moment when I was ready to become your mistress. You let that moment pass and it will not return — you will never guess when it was even. Yes — that is life. It is no disgrace for me and no particular honor for you. It has happened many million times before. But most women in my position would say, “I will give you the love of a sister, a friend — ask for no other.” I, Leonhard, I say to you that I have for you about every feeling you could wish me to have except friendship — no, I do not feel that. (She stops suddenly.) Haven’t I said that to you — once before?

Leonhard (passionately). No — you have never spoken to me like this.

Pauline (dreamily). Strange — I seemed to think so.

Leonhard. Why did you stop so suddenly?

Pauline (dazed). What is the matter with me? Where am
I? I stopped — (As if slowly awakening.) Well — I stopped because I had nothing more to say. Good-bye.

Leonhard (hurt). What does that mean?

Pauline. It means that we have met for the last time.

Leonhard. The last?

Pauline. Yes. I leave for Italy tomorrow morning with my husband.

Leonhard. And when do you return?

Pauline. I do not know — never for you.

Leonhard. Pauline — you are joking — we never imagined that.

Pauline. How could we? I did not know it myself until this morning.

Leonhard. Then what has happened? Tell me — why —?

Pauline. Why? Simply because I do not care to imperil my peace of mind, my life’s happiness, my life itself, perhaps, for — what is it they call it?— “one short hour of bliss—”

Leonhard. And your husband? What does he think of this sudden decision?

Pauline. My husband? I asked him to take me away.

Leonhard. What excuse did you give?

Pauline. None. I told him the truth as I always do.

Leonhard. Always?

Pauline. I promised him — on the very first day — that I would confess every emotion of my heart to him — he promised the same.

Leonhard. And this morning?

Pauline. I told him that I am in danger.

Leonhard. And what did he say?

Pauline. I told you. We leave tomorrow morning.

Leonhard. Pauline! Do you think he will ever forgive you?

Pauline. Why not? I have forgiven him more.

Leonhard. He is a man and we men are all vain. He is a poet and therefore a thousand times vainer than other men. He will make you repent it all the rest of your life.

Pauline. I must endure it.

Leonhard. He will torture you as cruelly as if you had really sinned.

Pauline. Had I sinned he would kill me.

Leonhard. Nonsense. He would make a new play of it and be grateful to you at the last.

Pauline. Possibly. He is the man to combine the two.

Leonhard. When do you start?

Pauline. Tomorrow morning, as I told you.

Leonhard. Tomorrow? Then today is still ours.

Pauline. Are you mad?

Leonhard. I shall expect you this evening, Pauline.

Pauline. You are quite mad.

Leonhard. I was never so sane as in this moment.

Pauline. But, Leonhard — now that he knows so much —

Leonhard. I would die a thousand deaths for you, Pauline.

(He takes her hand.)

Pauline. No. No. Good-bye — this is utter nonsense — I do not love you — Good-bye —

Leonhard. Pauline! (A loud, deep bell, like a church bell, begins slowly to toll the noon hour.)

Pauline. Let me go. I must get home — listen — it is twelve o'clock. He knows that I am here to say good-bye to you — if I should dare to go out this evening —

Leonhard. Well?

Pauline. It would go hard with both of us.

Leonhard. I will wait for you, Pauline — (They stand before the picture of The Lady with the Dagger. The bell tolls slowly.)

Pauline (looking more closely at the picture). Who lies here in the shadow?

Leonhard. Where?

Pauline. Can't you see?

Leonhard. I can't see anything.

Pauline. It is you!

Leonhard. I? What a queer idea!

Pauline. And all these others —? (She looks around the room, then back at the picture.) Who painted it?

Leonhard. We just read it — unknown artist. About 1530.

Pauline. Unknown —?

Leonhard. Pauline, what is the matter?

Pauline. It is I, myself — do you not recognize me?

Leonhard. Why, yes. I said the resemblance was remarkable.

Pauline. It is I — my very self. Do you not recognize me?
And here — in the black shadow — the dead youth — it is you.

Leonhard. Pauline — what is the matter?

Pauline. Do you not remember, Leonhard? (She takes his hand. They sit down slowly on the divan with their faces turned toward the picture.)

Leonhard. Remember?

Pauline. Lionardo, dost thou remember?

(The stage is plunged in sudden darkness. The bell is heard tolling slowly until it grows light again. Then it stops suddenly. During the moment of darkness the scene has changed to REMIGIO'S studio, in the gray of early morning. It is a large, highceilinged room with a huge Gothic window at the back. To the left is a small door; to the right, a heavy dark red portière covers the entrance to an inner room. There are pictures on the wall appropriate for the epoch, copies of antique statues about the room, an easel near the front, to the right, bears a large picture which is veiled. Furnishing and decoration of the sixteenth century. LIONARDO (Leonhard) lies on the floor near the portiere, but he is not asleep. There is silence in the room for a moment, until PAOLA (Pauline) comes in from behind the portiere. She wears a loose white robe, her hair hanging free. She is now exactly like the picture of the first scene. She passes LIONARDO without seeing him, goes slowly to the easel and raises the veil gently from the picture. It is the picture of the first scene, but still incomplete, for the raised arm holding the dagger is missing. The picture cannot be seen distinctly until the stage grows lighter. PAOLA stands looking at it long and silently. LIONARDO rolls over to where she is standing and kisses the hem of her garment.)

Paola (starts slightly). Are you still here? Have you not left the house?

Lionardo. No, love, I lingered here before your door.

Paola. Then hurry now.

Lionardo.
While still the fragrance of your kisses clings
About my hair? I grudge the balmy wind
Of jealous night the power to bear it off.

Paola.
'Twas little wise: some servant might awake
And mark your going. See, the dawn is gray.

Lionardo (he rises).
Then, Paola, I'll wait day's coming here,
And catch the light's first glow upon my work.

Paola.
Ah, spare your toil! Why do you strive in vain?
Yes, if you were young Bassano's pupil,
Franco's or Andrea Galbi's even —
I then, perhaps, could understand your zeal.
But here where genius blazes on the walls
How do you dare to ply the futile brush?
How comes it that you do not each new morn
Destroy the labor of the day before,
And sink in humbleness upon the ground,
Where treads the Mighty and Unequalled One?

Lionardo.
I know I am a dauber, Paola
Not worthy with the master here to work.
And many a morning stole so sluggishly

Out of night's clouds, when I would fain
Have ended all my useless life at once.
But this day, this! It is another dawn.
And not for all the master's genius, fame,
Would I exchange the mem'ry of this night,
When you, his wife, I held within my arms.
And ask Remigio if, were he to choose,
Which he would choose.

Paola (gravely).
None has the choice: not he, nor I, nor you.
It comes to us —

Lionardo. And comes to each of us as he deserves.

Paola (absently). Think you?

Lionardo.
For he sees naught in you of what you are,
While I see more than you can see yourself.
Fulfillment of all beauty — of my dream —
Glows through your body, and from out your eyes
Gleams back the meaning of life's hidden deeps.
For him your whole existence is naught else
Than his art's spur: for when his trait'rous kiss
Calls up the glow of love upon your face
'Tis but to paint a picture in its guise.
And trust me, when this last completed is,
That still imperfect waits your lord's return,
Then dies his love for you —

Paola.
I know it! I myself am nothing more:
Am all exhausted: and the thing I was
Now pulses in this picture —
(She stands before the picture.)
It is a riddle here for me to solve.
I look at mine own face and know it, yet
I know it not. I ne'er looked so and yet
I might look so. Some fate that is before me
Might cast a shadow on me like to this
Better or worse than all the past can show —
Than all I ever thought or felt or was —
Some possibility with half-closed lids

Lies here for life athirst. Would he but come!
Whence this fierce longing? Is it from my heart?
Or from that woman's on the easel there?
Thou art long away — too long, Remigio —
A year is endless.

Lionardo.
You dream, my Paola! Hardly one month
Has he been gone.

Paola (with passion).
Longing counts not the hours. But he will come
Today! Ah, yes! Today at last he'll come.

Lionardo.
Again you err. For if, as first was planned,
He yesterday from Florence took to horse
He cannot come until tomorrow noon.

Paola.
No, he comes today.

Lionardo. Impossible! (With a touch of scorn.)
For not on longing's wings
The Master comes, but on an earthly steed
And subject unto earth's compelling laws
Of sleep and food as other mortals are,
Thus must he come.

Paola.
Not till tomorrow? Why may I not crush
The empty hours like nuts within my palm!
One whole long day! A day that just now dawns!
Ah, I would give and gladly, what of life
Remains to me, could he come now, at once.

Lionardo.
Paola!

Paola (indifferently). Yes?

Lionardo (with passion), Paola, look at me! (He takes her hand and holds it.)

Paola (she leaves her hand in his, but does not turn to him).
And why? I know thee well enough: thou art
Young Lionardo — yes — I know.

Art pigment-mixer? No? Thou art not? What then?

A page at Court? Or e'en a prince, perhaps?
Forgive! Not pigment-mixer, prince nor page,
Thou art a painter, Lionardo called,
And thou art fair, I know. Why asketh thou
That I should look at thee? With fast-closed eyes
I'll tell thee more, I'll tell thee all thou wilt.
Thy hair is brown and soft and lightly curled:
Thine eyes are blue and dark the brows above,
Thy throat is slim and white as any maid's,
Thy limbs are willow-slender, strong thine arm.
Well, is't not enough? Must I still see thee?
Drop thou my hand! (She draws away her hand.)

Lionardo. Paola, wilt play with me?

Paola (she has no eyes for him).
From Florence will he bring new orders home?
If so, then next time I will go with him.
Think, Lionardo, not since girlhood passed
Have I in Florence been, seen Cosmo's glory —
Nor met my brothers since. But 'tis not that
That plagues me so. The ladies of the court
Of Medici o'er-full of passion are
And over-gallant: when an artist comes
Like him with name and fame from distant parts,
They'll wait all night, 'tis said, before his door
Until their turn shall come.

Lionardo. What is't to you with whom Remigio sleeps?

Paola (with a quick glance).
True, Lionardo! To live the waking hours together,
That alone has meaning! Yet, 'tis true
Experience teaches that some nightly revel
Though insignificant it seems, will oft
Obtrude itself into the day's bright light
And plume and pride itself, as it had life.

Lionardo. Paola, yesternight thou were't —

Paola. Thine, thou wilt say?
Dare but to speak it now the dawn is come!
Did'st hear me murmur as the others do

“I’ve waited for thee — thee alone I love?”
There came no other sound from out these lips
But only stifled cries of wanton lust.
It is no more and therefore never was.

Lionardo.
No, Paola, it was and therefore is,
And always will be as my right to thee.

Paola.
Thy right? Thy right to me? Dost thou not see
That all its semblance faded with the stars?
And that thou hast no more of right to me
For all thy youth and beauty, courage, strength,
Than if thou were’t hideous, lame, or old and senile.

Leonardo.
Paola! tell me that these cruel words
Are but to prove me! Enough, have pity!

Paola. Be still. The morning came.

Lionardo. The night will come again.

Paola. Never for us! Away! Keep to thy place!

Lionardo (on his knees before her). This is my place — or else it is the grave.

Paola. Be careful not to touch me.

Lionardo.
How hard and cold and threatening those eyes,
That promised and fulfilled so much of love
For me this night.

Paola.
Enough, enough. Stand up, I tell thee now,
Or I will treat thee as I saw Remigio
Treat that bold girl, red Perugrina,
Who came as you do loudly clamoring
And kneeling in the dust and crying out
“I love thee so,” and “Ah, I love thee so,”
And “Thou hast kissed me, dost remember it?”
And “’Twas this night,” and “Ah, and woe is me!”

Lionardo. What did Remigio?

Paola. He chased the shameless huzzy from his door. (There is a long pause.)

Lionardo (rises slowly, speaks in quite another tone).
No, I am not like Perugrina, no!
For were this woman I, or like to me,
Then she had done what I shall surely do.
Farewell.

Paola. Would'st kill thyself? Well, I am worth it!

Lionardo.
Thou art, my Paola, and therefore I must do it —
With thine own dagger here before thy door.
Then all will think, as will Remigio,
That unrequited love has goaded me.
Yes, I will do it: and for mine own sake,
For shame burns deep — and yet beyond all this
I die for you as well — for your own sake.

Paola. For me?

Lionardo.
To free you from the grip of fear,
Lest any word or look of mine
Betray you or reveal your guilt.

Paola. What say'st thou? Fear? What think'st thou that I fear?

Lionardo.
What many a wife ere now has dreaded
From him whom she deceived. Breathe free again,
The steel shall reach the heart of all thy care.

Paola.
Stay, Lionardo! Dar'st thou to say,
My cowardice does drive thee to thy death?

Lionardo.
Thou art no coward, Paola, but thou would'st live —
That is the courage of the guilty heart.

Paola.
Courage is to confess the guilt.
Stay here!

Lionardo. Paola — (Hoof-beats in the court below. They both stop and listen.)

Paola. Hark! Dost hear it?

Lionardo. ’Tis he.

Paola. Then his longing was
Stronger than earthly law. He’s come, he’s come.

(She hastens to the window.) He is dismounting. Come — for
I am ready.

Lionardo. What would you do?

Paola. I said it.

Lionardo.
No, Paola, no. I do beseech you.
Not this wild thought! believe me that you trust
Too strongly in his greatness.

Paola. His smiling eye seeks mine. (She waves her scarf from the window.)
Welcome, Remigio.
Alas, I fear thou’lt smile no more today.

Lionardo.
If conscience drive you to confessing all
Then put the blame on me alone: tell him
I hid a potion in your wine: nay, more —
Threatened your life unless you yielded to me —
But spare him knowledge of your fault. His pride
Is dearer to him than his wife. And that
He threw in laughing words — in idle jest —
Across the table at the Prince’s feast —
I heard it well, I sat across from you
And as he mocking spoke your eyes sought mine.

Paola. You still remember?

Lionardo.
He’ll keep it, I assure you, Paola —
His laughing vow to bury his white teeth
As would a hungry beast, in your soft throat.
I beg you, Paola — I beseech you —
His step is on the stair — if once the words
Escape your lips then there is only death.
Forget my hasty speech, forgive me, love —
Ne’er shall my hated self your eyes offend.

I leave this city e'er the evening falls.
I was a shadow only on the wall
And as a shadow will I fade away.
Mine you are not, and neither are you his:
Life only has the perfect right to you,
Do not refuse it! It were sin to light
And spring time if you die. Live, Paola!
For you are much too fair — too glorious
To die. You leave behind you here too much
That's worth the living for. The door without Turns gently on the hinge — I know you're brave
Be gracious and forgive me — then I swear
That in an hour's time I'll be no more!
His hand is on the latch — ah! — Paola!

(REMIGIO comes in, smiling and happy.)

Paola (draws back from him).
Take care that you embrace me not too soon —
This man here was my lover yesternight.

(There is a long pause.)

Remigio. Go, Lionardo!

Lionardo.
Remigio, kill me!
I'll take no mercy at your hands.

Remigio.
It is not mercy bids thee go from here
Nor is it anger that would bar the way.
There is no thought within my heart of thee:
I do not need thee, so I bid thee go!

Lionardo. Remigio, I beseech you, kill me!

Remigio.
He kills who hates, and he who loves can kill.
Indifference has no weapon. Should I break
The humble glass that the forbidden draught
Was quaffed from by a reckless, wayward child?
Because thou hast the gift of conscious life
Makes thee no more to me than what thou art,
The miserable instrument of chance.

Lionardo. I begged for death, but I demand it now!

Remigio. Thy wish moves me as little as thy prayer.

Lionardo. I'll force you to do it.

Remigio. No man has forced me yet.

Lionardo.
I'll stand out in the market-place and cry
That Paola, your wife, was mine this night.

Remigio. They'll know an hour earlier, that's all.

Lionardo.
I'll call you rogue before the court! I'll scorn you
As coward playing the magnanimous.
I'll swear your wife pursued me till I fell.

Remigio. '*T*will help thee little thus to slur the dead.

Lionardo.
Once more, Remigio, I pray you, strike!
Ere you have let the one right moment pass.
For new desire of life within me moves,
I have more work to do before I die.
I hate you more than e'er before a man
Did hate another: always hated you,
But knew it only now since the hot shower
Of poisoned scorn you pour upon my head.
I hate you so that I must live to kill you,
And yet the more that not a thousand deaths
From my poor hand could really take your life.
For in your work you'll live for all the world:
In your wife's longing you will live for her:
For me, stronger than death, in my wild hate.
And yet I'll kill you, for the uselessness
Whips up my lagging will with scorpion thrusts.
Let me not go, Remigio, for as sure
As if a thousand swords were bared for you,
You're lost, when I through yonder door shall pass.

Remigio (goes to the door and opens it). The door is open, you may go your way. (He turns back again, LIONARDO goes to the door.)

Paola. Let him not go! He'll surely hold his vow —

Lionardo (turning at door). While I have life!

Paola. While you have life! (She runs to him and buries her dagger in his throat. LIONARDO sinks dying at her feet.

PAOLA stands over him with a dagger in her upraised hand, now exactly like the picture in the first scene. She remains thus motionless, until the end of this scene.)

Remigio. Paola! (He stares at her long and intently. Slowly a change comes over his face. He grows calmer, almost bright.)
Was that the answer? Is my prayer fulfilled?
That light might come for this great work of mine?
This is the answer! I will finish it —
Ah, gracious Heaven, that brought this thing to me,
Grant me one hour of calm within my soul,
And power for my hand to work my will.

(He goes to the door and locks it, then comes down to his easel. PAOLA remains in her position until a sudden darkness jails upon the stage and the bell begins to toll as before. In a few moments the little gallery room is revealed, and the bell stops when the stage is light again. Altogether it has struck just twelve times. PAULINE and LEONHARD are seated on the divan with their faces turned toward the picture on the center wall.)

Pauline. Dost thou remember —

Leonhard. Pauline! Where are you? Are you dreaming?

Pauline (as if in a dream). It comes again? All that we once have lived? Lionardo — must it be?

Leonhard. Pauline — what is it?

Pauline (as if awakening). Leonhard! (She looks around.)

Leonhard. You seemed to have lost yourself for a moment.

Pauline. Only a moment?

Leonhard. Were you dreaming?

Pauline. Was I? (She looks at him long and intently.) If you do not know then you can never understand. Good-bye.

(She rises and turns away from him.)

Leonhard. Pauline! Is this really — good-bye?

Pauline. Forever.

Leonhard. And this evening?

Pauline. This evening? This evening — (Into her eyes there comes an expression as if some fate were hanging over her from which she cannot escape. She takes his hand, looks him gravely in the eyes and speaks, in a tone that expresses decision rather than love.) I will come — (She turns and goes out quickly.)

CURTAIN

PART III. LAST MASKS

A DRAMA

CHARACTERS

KARL RADEMACHER, JOURNALIST

FLORIAN JACKWERTH, actor

ALEXANDER WEIHGAST

DR. HALMSCHLAEGER, Assistant Doctor in the Vienna Public Hospital

DR. TANN, Assistant Doctor in the Vienna Public Hospital

JULIANA PASCHANDA, hospital nurse

LAST MASKS

In the Public Hospital, Vienna. Small room, separated by linen curtains from a public ward. To the left is a small white bed, beside it a large armchair. There is a large table in the center of the room on which are bottles, papers, records, etc. Two plain chairs stand to right and left of the table, a candle is burning on the table. There is no other furniture. The only entrance is through the curtains at back.

KARL RADEMACHER, past fifty, terribly emaciated and very gray, is in the armchair by the bed, leaning back with eyes closed.

JULIANA PASCHANDA, the nurse, is at the table writing. She is stout, good-natured, of indefinite age.

FLORIAN JACKWERTH raises the flap of the curtain and comes in. FLORIAN is twenty-eight, thin, smooth-shaven, with eyes shining in fever. He wears a loose linen gown, which he drapes about himself in impressive folds. When he raises the curtain the main room beyond can be seen, dimly lighted by a hanging lamp.

Florian. Always busy, Miss Paschanda?

Nurse. Are you up again? What will the doctor say? Go back to your bed and go to sleep.

Florian. Surely. I shall even take a long, long sleep. May I not help you, fair lady? That is — of course, I don't mean in the matter of sleeping! (The NURSE pays no attention to him. He creeps on tiptoe to RADEMACHER'S chair, whispers.) Miss Paschanda — look here — please look here —

Nurse. What is it?

Florian (coming back to her). On my soul — I thought the man was dead.

Nurse. He'll last for a while yet.

Florian. Think so? Well, good-night then, Miss Juliana Paschanda.

Nurse. I'm not Miss, I'm married.

Florian. Oh, I beg your pardon. Haven't had the honor of meeting your husband yet.

Nurse. I hope for your sake you won't. He's an attendant in the Morgue.

Florian. No, thanks — no use for that just at present. (Confidentially.) Say, Mrs. Paschanda, did you see the young lady who honored me with a visit this afternoon?

Nurse. The young lady with the red hat?

Florian (offended). Red hat — red hat — yes, she's a fellow player. We were engaged together last season in Olmütz — she was leading lady — yours truly, leading juvenile. Take one look at me — I need say no more. Yes — I wrote her a postal card, just an ordinary postal card, and she came at once. There is such a thing as fidelity, even on the stage! And she promised to look around, to speak to the agents about a summer engagement for me, when I'm let out of this place. So you see the young lady has a good heart, even if she does wear a red hat, Mrs. Paschanda. (He coughs.) She might come again. I'll write her to wear a blue hat next time, since you don't like red, Mrs. Paschanda. (He goes off into a bad fit of coughing.)

Nurse. Hush — the patients are asleep. (Listens as if she heard something outside.)

Florian. What is it?

Nurse. I thought I heard the doctor. (The hospital clock strikes the hour.)

Florian. What time is it?

Nurse. Nine o'clock.

Florian. Who makes the rounds tonight?

Nurse. Dr. Halmschlaeger.

Florian. Oh, Dr. Halmschlaeger. Nice man, but just a little conceited. (He sees that RADEMACHER is awake.) Your servant, Mr. Rademacher. (The latter nods. FLORIAN continues, imitating DR. HALMSCHLAEGER.) Well, my dear Rademacher, how are we today? (Pretends to take off his overcoat and hand it to the NURSE.) Mrs. Paschanda, will you be so kind?
Thank you.

Nurse (laughing in spite of herself.) How you can imitate people.

Florian (in quite another tone novo, turns as if going from one bed to another). Nothing new today? Nothing new? Nothing new? Good — very good. Good — good.

Nurse. Why — why, that's the head doctor! If he could see you now —!

Florian. Oh, that's nothing, now watch. (He lets himself fall into a chair, his face distorted as if in mortal pain, his eyes rolling up.)

Nurse. For mercy's sake, that's —

Florian (interrupting his trick for a moment). Well?
Guess —?

Nurse. The man in bed 17 — the roofer, who died yesterday. Oh, do stop it — it's a sin.

Florian. My dear Mrs. Paschanda, do you think I'm wasting my time in this hospital? There's a great deal to be learned here.

Nurse. Here's the doctor. (She goes out through the curtain. HALMSCHLAEGER and TANN can be seen further down the large room.)

Florian. Yes, Mr. Rademacher, I'm making interesting studies here.

Rademacher. Are you?

Florian. It pays an actor to be in a hospital for a while. You think I can't use what I see here because I'm a comedian? Wrong. All wrong. It's a discovery of my own, Mr. Rademacher. (Important.) True dramatic intuition can reconstruct the comic mask from the saddest face, even from the face distorted in pain. When I see a man die I know just how he looked when he laughed at a good joke — but what's the matter, Mr. Rademacher? Oh, come now, man — courage — courage! — don't lose your sense of humor, whatever you do. Look at me now. Not a week ago I was done for — not only in the doctor's opinion, that wouldn't have mattered much, — but in my own mind. And now, I'm as cheery as can be — and in a week more — ta ta! Farewell, ye quiet halls! And herewith I take the liberty of inviting you to my first appearance.

(He has a bad fit of coughing.)

Rademacher. That'll hardly be possible.

Florian. Say, isn't it queer? If you and I had stayed well, we'd have been deadly enemies.
Rademacher, Why?

Florian. Why — I'd have acted and you'd have written mean things about me — and I never like critics who say mean things about me. But this way we're the best of friends. Say, listen, tell me, Mr. Rademacher, did I look as bad as you do, a week ago?

Rademacher. There's a difference —

Florian. Nonsense. You have to exert your will-power, that's all. Do you know how I made myself well again? (RADEMACHER looks at him.) You needn't look at me like that — I'm nearly well anyway. I simply wouldn't allow any sad thoughts to come up in my mind.

Rademacher. How did you prevent it?

Florian. I thought of all the people who'd ever made me angry and I said the nastiest things I knew to them — in my thoughts. That's a great comfort, let me tell you. I even figured out whom I wanted to haunt when I was dead. There's a fellow critic of yours in Olmutz — a malicious beast — and then the manager who docked half my salary because I extemporized — and the audience laughing at me all the time and not at the fool play — he ought to have been grateful to me, instead of which — well, just wait! I have a talent for appearing, as a ghost or anything else — I could make a decent income even in heaven. I'd take a job with the Spiritualists.

(The NURSE returns with DR. HALMSCHLAEGER and DR. TANN.)

Tann (young, carelessly dressed, his hat on the back of his head, an unlighted cigar in his mouth). Come now, Halmschlaeger, don't stay here so long this time.

Halmschlaeger (young, carefully dressed, wears glasses and a small blond beard). No, I'll be through in a few minutes.

Tann. If you're not, I'll go on ahead and wait for you at the café.

Halmschlaeger. I'll be through here in a few moments.

Florian. Good evening, doctor.

Halmschlaeger. Why aren't you in bed? Mrs. Paschanda —

Florian. I've had all the sleep I need, doctor, I'm feeling fine now. May I invite you to my first performance?

Halmschlaeger (amused at first, then turns away to hide his face). Yes, yes. (Goes to RADEMACHER.) Well, my dear Rademacher, how are we today? (FLORIAN motions to the NURSE to see if she has appreciated his imitation of the doctor.)

Rademacher. Pretty bad, doctor.

Halmschlaeger (reads the slate at the head of the bed while the NURSE holds the light.) 102.9 — well, we had 103.2 yesterday. This is an improvement. Good-night then. (He turns to go.)

Rademacher. Please, doctor —

Halmschlaeger. Do you want anything?

Rademacher. Please, doctor, how long will this last?

Halmschlaeger. You'll have to be patient for a little while yet.

Rademacher. That isn't what I mean, doctor. I mean when will it be — when will it be all over with me? (TANN sits down at the table, idly turning over the papers there.)

Halmschlaeger. What a way to talk! (To the NURSE.)
Has he had his medicine?

Nurse. I gave it to him at half-past seven, sir.

Rademacher. Doctor — please don't treat me just like — anybody — oh, I beg your pardon, sir!

Halmschlaeger (slightly impatient, but still amiable). Not so loud, please —

Rademacher. Just a word, doctor — I must know the truth — I must, for a particular reason.

Halmschlaeger. The truth? Why, I hope — of course we can't any of us see into the future, but I may say —

Rademacher. Doctor, suppose there was something I had to do, something very important — with the fate of others dependent on it — and my peace of mind — for my last hours —

Halmschlaeger (still friendly). Come, come — tell me more clearly what you want. But in as few words as possible, please. I have two more rooms to go through and if every patient took so much time — well, what is it?

Rademacher. There is someone I must speak to, doctor.

Halmschlaeger. You may write him if you want to. And you may see anyone you choose tomorrow afternoon from four to five. I have no objection.

Rademacher. That may be too late, doctor — I feel it will be too late — it may be all over by tomorrow morning — I must speak to him today.

Halmschlaeger. That's impossible. If you're so anxious about this matter why didn't you mention it yesterday?

Rademacher (insistently). You have been so good to me, doctor — I know it's an impertinence on my part — but you see, when you feel quite sure that tomorrow — or next day — the white-robed gentleman will come to carry you away — then you feel you can take liberties you wouldn't think of otherwise.

Tann. Well, Halmschlaeger, what's the trouble?

Halmschlaeger. Just a moment. (To RADEMACHER, slightly impatient). Well, then, what is it you want?

Rademacher. I must speak to a friend of mine, a Mr.
Weihgast, Alexander Weihgast.

Halmschlaeger. Alexander Weihgast? Do you mean the celebrated writer?

Rademacher. Yes.

Halmschlaeger. He is a friend of yours?

Rademacher. He was — in earlier days.

Halmschlaeger. Then write to him.

Rademacher. What good will that do me? He wouldn't find me here. I must speak to him today — at once — now.

Halmschlaeger (firmly). That is impossible, Mr. Rademacher, quite impossible. (More gently.) But to make you feel better, I will write to Mr. Weihgast, whom I happen to know personally, and ask him to come and see you tomorrow at any hour that suits him.

Rademacher. You know Weihgast, doctor? (Suddenly.)
Bring him here to me — bring him here.

Halmschlaeger. Oh, come now, Rademacher, this is just a little —

Rademacher (in great excitement). I know, doctor — I know it's asking a great deal — but you're so human, doctor — you understand things humanly. You're not like the others, who judge by rote and rule. And when you know, doctor — when you know that here's a dying man who has just one wish, one wish on which so much depends for him, and you know you can fulfil that wish — doctor, please, please go and fetch him, bring him here to me.

Halmschlaeger (undecided, looks at his watch). Why — but even if I should do it — how can I ask it of him? — at this hour? Really, you know it's an imposition — can't you see that yourself?

Rademacher. Oh, I know my friend Weihgast. If you tell him that his old friend Rademacher is dying in the public hospital and wants to see him — he'll not miss that. I beg of you, doctor — it means only a short drive for you. But for me — for me —

Halmschlaeger. Yes, that's just it. It's of no importance to me, of course. But for you — the excitement might do you great harm.

Rademacher. Oh, doctor, as one man to another — what does an hour more or less matter?

Halmschlaeger (soothingly). Come, come. (After a moment's pause.) Well, I'll go to him. (RADEMACHER attempts to thank him.) Of course, I can't guarantee that he'll come with me. But since you wish it so much — (RADEMACHER again attempts to speak.) Never mind, that's all right. (Turns away from him.)

Tann. Well — at last!

Halmschlaeger. My dear Tann, would you mind taking a look through the other two rooms? There's very little to do — two injections — the nurse will tell you —

Tann. What's up?

Halmschlaeger (aside to him). It's a queer story. This poor devil here has been begging me to fetch an old friend of his, he has something very important to say to him, evidently. And who do you suppose this friend is? Weihgast, the well-known writer.

Tann. And you're going after him? See here, are you an errand boy? These people are forever abusing your good nature.

Halmschlaeger. That depends on how you look at it, my dear boy. To me, such happenings are the most interesting side of our profession.

Tann. Hm! — That's one point of view.

Halmschlaeger. Then you'll take the other rooms?

Tann. Why, certainly. But there'll be no café for us this evening, I suppose.

Halmschlaeger. I may get there later. (He goes out into the larger room with TANN, the NURSE following them. When they have gone, FLORIAN slips in.)

Florian. Well, what did you have to talk to the doctor about all this time?

Rademacher (excited, almost cheerful). I'm expecting a visitor — I'm expecting a visitor.
Florian (interested). A visitor? At this time of night?

Rademacher. Yes, my dear Jackwerth, and now, keep your eyes open. There'll be something for you to study — in my visitor's face. You take a look at the gentleman's face when he comes in and again when he goes out. (More excited.) Oh, if I only live through it! — if I only live through it! Give me a glass of water, Jackwerth, please. (He drinks the water greedily.) Thanks — thanks. Yes, the old machine must hold together that much longer, if suddenly afraid.) Oh, if he'll only come — if he'll only come — if he'll only come!

Florian. Who are you talking about?

Rademacher. Write to him? What good would that do me? I must have him here — opposite me — face to face — eye to eye — ah! —

Florian (alarmed). Mr. Rademacher —

Rademacher. Don't be alarmed about me, there's no need for it. I feel so light at heart — on my soul — I believe I'm not even afraid to die now. I sha'n't mind it at all — after he has been here. Florian Jackwerth, what can I do for you?

Florian (astonished). What?

Rademacher. I want to show my gratitude. It was you gave me this idea — yes, you. You shall be my heir. The key of my desk is under my pillow. You don't expect much, eh? Who knows? You may be mistaken — there may be masterpieces hidden there. Why, I feel better and better. Perhaps I may even get well again.

Florian. Of course you will.

Rademacher. If I do get well — if ever I set foot outside of this hospital alive, I swear I'll begin all over again.

Florian. Begin what?
Rademacher. I'll begin the fight again — I won't give up yet — I'm not so old — only fifty-four. That's no age at all, when a man's well and strong. And I am Somebody, Florian Jackwerth, I am Somebody — you can believe it. But I've had hard luck. I'm as good as many another who rides the high horse, my dear sir. I can measure myself with many another who thinks he's greater than I, because he's been more fortunate. (Feverishly.) If he only comes — if he only comes — oh, Lord God, I pray You — even if You have let me shift for myself these fifty-four years — I pray You now — give me strength for this last half hour, strength to even up as well as I can. Let me see him sitting there before me — pale, crushed — as small before me now as he has felt himself superior all his life. Yes, my dear Jackwerth, the man I am waiting for is a friend of my youth. Twenty-five years ago — even twenty years ago — we were fond of each other, for we had begun at the same level. But we went different ways — he — higher and higher — and I — lower and lower. And today he is rich and famous and I'm a poor devil of a journalist dying in a public hospital. But what does that matter? — what does that matter — now that the moment has come when I can crush him? And I will crush him — if he only comes — if he only comes.

That was your sweetheart who came to see you this afternoon, Jackwerth — I know it. But what is all the ardor with which we wait for the coming of one we love — compared to the longing for someone we hate, someone we've hated all our lives — only we've forgotten to tell him so!

Florian. You mustn't let yourself get so excited, Mr. Rademacher. You're losing your voice.

Rademacher. Don't worry — once he is here I'll be able to talk.

Florian. Oh, you never can tell. Say, listen, Mr. Rademacher — I have a suggestion to make. Suppose we have a rehearsal? No, I'm not joking — I know — that's my business. Don't you see — it all depends on how you say things! What good will it do you if you say to him, "You're a rascal and I hate you?" that won't get over. He'll think to himself, "Let him scold, that's cheap, while he's here in bed with 103 degrees of fever and I'm walking about smoking a good cigar."

Rademacher. Oh, I'll have something more to say to him. No one minds being called a rascal nowadays. But if I tell him that he was ridiculous all his life, ridiculous in the eyes of those he loved most — he won't get over that so easily.

Florian. All right, talk it out — talk it out. Now imagine
I'm your friend. Here I stand, pockets full of money, head full of conceit. (Acting.) Well, here I am, old friend, you have something to say to me? Well? (In his natural voice.) There now, go on.

Rademacher (feverish, talking himself into angry excitement). Yes, I sent for you. But not to bid you farewell, in memory of our old friendship — no — I have something to tell you — before it is too late.

Florian (acting). Don't keep me in suspense, old man. What is it you want to tell me? (Change as before.) Well — go on — go on.

Rademacher. You think yourself better than I? My dear friend, you and I are not of the Great, and in the depths where we belong there is small difference — in hours like these. All your greatness is sham and pretense. Your fame? Merely a heap of newspaper notices that will be scattered to the winds the day after your death. Your friends? Flatterers who cringe to success; envious parasites who clench their fists at you when your back is turned; fools who find you just small enough for their admiration. But you are clever enough to realize all this yourself, at times. I didn't trouble you to come here just to tell you that. What I am going to tell you — it may be despicable of me — but it's astonishing how little we care whether we are despicable or not when we know we'll have no tomorrow to be ashamed of it in.... (Rises.) I've come near throwing it in your face a hundred times during the past few years — whenever we chanced to meet on the street and you were gracious enough to stop for a few words with me. My dear friend, not only do I know you as you are — and hundreds of others do, too — but your own belovéd wife knows you better than you dream. She realized what you were twenty years ago — in the prime of your youth and success. Yes, she realized it — and I knew that she did — for I was her lover two whole years. Many a time she came to me in disgust at your hollowness, your utter nothingness — came to me ready to run off with me. But I was poor and she was a coward — and so she stayed with you — and deceived you. It was easier that way, for all of us.

Florian (acting). Ha! Wretch! You lie!

Rademacher. I? (As if awakening.) Ah, yes — you take the key, Jackwerth. If he won't believe me, the letters are in my desk. You shall be my executor. There are many things in my desk — some treasures, perhaps. Who knows? It may be only necessary for me to die — to have them appreciated. Yes, then they'd make a fuss about me, especially when they know that I've died in poverty and misery — for I am dying in poverty and misery, as I have lived. Then there'll be speeches over my grave — you'll hear them talk about devotion to duty — great ability — a victim to his profession. Yes, that's true, Florian Jackwerth, as long as I've had any profession I've been its victim. Do you know what's killing me? No — not those Latin names on the board up there. Oh, no — what's killing me is the bitterness of having to bow to people I despise, having to toady to them for a job — it's disgust at having to write things I did not believe to keep myself from starving: it's anger at having to grind out stuff for infamous slavedrivers who had stolen and swindled a fortune for themselves, and I had to help them do it with my talent. But I can't complain. I've received my share of the general contempt and hatred for them — my share of that, if of nothing else. (The NURSE comes in again.)

Nurse. The doctor's coming back.

Rademacher (anxiously). Is he alone?

Nurse. No, there's a gentleman with him. (RADEMACHER sinks back in his chair with a sigh of gratitude.)

Florian. Pull yourself together now. Sorry I can't stay and see. (He slips out quickly as HALMSCHLAEGER and WEIHGAST come in.)

Halmschlaeger. The patient is in here.

Weihgast (he is a handsomely dressed, well-preserved man of about fifty-five. His beard is slightly gray.) In here? (Goes to RADEMACHER, speaks cordially.) Why, Rademacher — is it really you? And this is how we meet again? My dear old friend.

Rademacher. I thank you for coming.

Halmschlaeger (has motioned to NURSE to bring a chair for WEIHGAST). And now, Mr. Weihgast, may I, as physician in charge, ask you not to let this conversation last more than fifteen minutes? When the time is up, I will take the liberty of returning to lead you out.

Weihgast. Thank you, doctor, you are very kind.

Halmschlaeger. It is I who have to thank you. It required no slight sacrifice —

Weihgast. Oh, no, indeed. Don't mention it.

Halmschlaeger. And now, Mr. Rademacher, good-bye for a few moments. (Threatens him amiably as if warning him not to get excited, then speaks to the NURSE and goes out with her.)

Weihgast (he has given his hat, overcoat and cane to the NURSE, now sits down near RADEMACHER, speaks warmly, almost with sincerity). And now, my dear Rademacher, what an idea! Why did you let them bring you here to the public hospital?

Rademacher. I'm quite content, they take good care of me here.

Weihgast. Yes, yes, of course. I know you're in good hands.
Dr. Halmschlaeger is a very capable physician and what is more, he is a good man. If, indeed, one can separate the individual of himself from the individual in his professional capacity! But still — you'll pardon me — why didn't you send for me?

Rademacher. How could I think —

Weihgast. Even if you haven't thought of your old friend these many years — surely you know I would be very ready — under such circumstances —

Rademacher. Don't let's talk of that —

Weihgast. As you wish, it was well meant. And it's not too late yet. Dr. Halmschlaeger tells me that it's only a question of time and good nursing — you will be out of the hospital in a few weeks and then we can arrange for a rest in the country —

Rademacher. There's little use in discussing that now.

Weihgast. Yes, yes. Dr. Halmschlaeger told me you were depressed in spirits. (He does not like RADEMACHER'S steady glance but forces himself to endure it.) But you sent for me? You wanted to speak to me? Well, I am ready. Why do you smile? Oh, no, I see, it's only the reflection of the light. The light is rather poor here. Well, I am waiting. I shall have to tell Dr. Halmschlaeger that you made no use of the first five minutes. Well?

(RADEMACHER opens his lips several times as if to speak, but does not say anything. There is a pause.)

Weihgast. And how have things gone with you all this time? (Slightly embarrassed.) Hm, that was an awkward question, I know — but I confess I'm just a little embarrassed. To judge by appearances, it would seem as if my lot had been the happier of the two. Still — if we only look at things clearly — who suffers the greatest disappointment in life? Isn't it always the man who has apparently achieved the most?
That sounds like a paradox, but it is the truth. Ah — if I should tell you — my life has been nothing but care and struggle! I don't know whether you've been following the more recent movements in literature — they're falling on me like a pack of hungry wolves — the "younger generation," I mean.
And ten years ago I was counted among the younger generation myself. Now they are trying to dethrone me. These new reviews — it sickens me just to read them. They treat me with scorn, with mock condescension — it's outrageous! Here I've worked and striven, and given of the best that was in me — oh, you may be glad you're out of that sort of thing! If I could choose, if I could begin all over again —

Rademacher. Well?

Weihgast. I'd rather be a peasant tilling the soil, or a shepherd on the hills, or an Arctic explorer searching for the Pole — oh, anything except a literary worker. But it's not too late yet.

Rademacher (with a strange smile). Are you going in search of the Pole?

Weihgast. No — but early next season there'll be a new play of mine out. Then they'll see — they'll see — I'm not so easily conquered! Just wait — just wait! And if all goes well, old friend, you must be there, too. I promise to send you tickets, although I must say your paper has done very little for me.
They completely ignored my last two books — but you have nothing to do with that department, have you? What nonsense I am talking — now tell me, what is it you want to say to me? If it hurts you to talk loud I can move nearer. (There is a pause.) And what will my wife say when I tell her that our old friend Rademacher is ill in the Public Hospital? — it's nothing but your pride, Rademacher, your confounded pride — but we won't talk about that now. Anyway, my wife is not in Vienna just now, she's gone to Abbazia. She's not been well for some time.

Rademacher. Nothing serious, I hope.

Weihgast (pressing his hand). Thank God, no! Ah, my dear friend, then I should be indeed unfortunate. When I am with her, I find myself again. I find my belief in myself, which I had all but lost — I find courage to work, desire to live. And the longer I live the more I see that this is the only true companionship. For my children —!

Rademacher. What about them? How are they?

Weihgast. My daughter is married. Yes, I'm twice a grandfather, although I know I don't look it. And the boy — the little boy! — is serving his volunteer year — getting into debt — he's just had a duel with a young Baron Wallerskirch — about a woman. Ah, dear friend, it's the same old foolishness — we grow old — life goes on its way about us.

Rademacher. Yes — yes. (There is a pause.)

Weihgast. But our time is nearly up. I am still waiting — what did you want to say to me? I am ready to do whatever you ask. Shall I speak to the Concordia people? Or would you like me to inquire at the editorial office of the New Day — in case you recover soon? Or, perhaps — pardon me for mentioning such a thing — if you need money —

Rademacher. No — no, I don't need anything. I just wanted to see you again, old friend — that is all. (Holds out his hand.)

Weihgast. Indeed! I am deeply touched! And then, when you are well again — we must see each other — more often —

(There is an embarrassing pause. The ticking of the clock in the larger room can be heard plainly.)

Halmschlaeger (coming in). Here I am again. Not too punctual, I hope.

Weihgast (rises, evidently relieved). No. We have finished what we had to say.

Halmschlaeger. That's good. I hope our patient will be calmer now.

Rademacher. Thank you.

Weihgast. Good-bye for the moment then, old friend. If our doctor here will permit it, I'll look in again in a few days.

Halmschlaeger. Certainly. I will give orders to have you admitted at any hour.

Weihgast. Oh, please don't make an exception for me.

(HALMSCHLAEGER motions to the NURSE, who helps WEIHGAST into his overcoat.)

Weihgast (to RADEMACHER). Good-bye once more — and a speedy recovery! Don't lose heart! (He goes to the door with HALMSCHLAEGER.)

Florian (slips in through curtain). Good evening, doctor.

Halmschlaeger. See here — aren't you in bed yet?

Weihgast (aside to HALMSCHLAEGER). Who's that man?
He stares at me so queerly.

Halmschlaeger. He's a poor devil of an actor.

Weihgast. Indeed?

Halmschlaeger. — who doesn't suspect that he'll be in his grave in less than a week.

Weihgast. Ah, indeed? (His glance meets FLORIAN'S.)

Halmschlaeger. That's why I'm not more strict with him.
There's no sense in keeping rules for the dying.

Weihgast. You are quite right. I am really glad of this opportunity of knowing you better, of looking in on you at your work, as it were. It interests me greatly for several reasons.

Halmschlaeger. May I ask a question? Was it really something so important — what your friend had to say?

Weihgast. Not in the least. We knew each other well — many years ago, and he wanted to see me once more — that was all.
But I think my coming has quieted him. (The NURSE holds back the curtains and curtseys. WEIHGAST hands her a tip and goes out with HALMSCHLAEGER, followed by the NURSE.)

Florian (hurries to RADEMACHER). Well, what happened? That man must have tremendous self-control. I can read faces — but I didn't see anything in his. How did he take it?

Rademacher (does not heed him). How pitiful are they — who must keep on living.

Florian. Mr. Rademacher, what has happened? How about the key to your desk?

Rademacher (as if awakening). My desk? Oh, do what you like with it — burn it up if you want to.

Florian. And the treasures in it? The masterpieces?

Rademacher. Masterpieces? And even if they were — there is no posterity except for the living. (As if seeing a vision.) Now he's downstairs — he walks down the drive — he goes out through the gate — out into the streets — the lamps are lit, the wagons roll on — people come and go — come and go — (He rises very slowly.)

Florian (looking at him sharply), Mr. Rademacher! —

Rademacher. What have I to do with him? What can his happiness or his cares matter to me? What should we two have to say to one another? (He catches at FLORIAN'S hand.) What have people like you and I to do with those who will still be alive tomorrow?

Florian (frightened). What do you want of me? Mrs. Paschanda! (The NURSE hurries in with a light.)

Rademacher (drops FLORIAN'S hand). Put out that light — I shall not — need it — (He jails back in his chair.)

Florian (clinging with both hands to the curtain). But now — isn't he —?

CURTAIN

PART IV. LITERATURE

A COMEDY

CHARACTERS

MARGARET

BARON CLEMENS

GILBERT

LITERATURE

SCENE — MARGARET'S sitting room, the usual furnished room, neatly but simply furnished. A small fireplace to the right before which stands an armchair. A table, a small desk, a wardrobe and several chairs make up the furnishing of the room. There are two windows at back, and doors right and left. BARON CLEMENS is lounging in an armchair by the fire, smoking a cigarette and reading the paper. He wears a modish morning suit of dark gray.

MARGARET is standing by the window when the curtain rises. She wanders about the room, comes up behind CLEMENS and plays lightly with his hair. She seems nervous and uneasy.

Clemens (reaches back for her hand and kisses it while he continues to read the paper). Horner is sure of himself — or rather of me. Listen, Waterloo, five to one; Barometer, twenty to one; Kiss Me, seven to one; Attia, sixteen to one —

Margaret. Sixteen to one?

Clemens. Lord Byron, one and a half to one; that's us, my dear.

Margaret. I know.

Clemens. And it's six weeks yet before the race.

Margaret. Horner appears to think it a dead certainty.

Clemens. Bravo! How she has learned all these phrases already!

Margaret. I knew those phrases before I knew you, my dear. Is it settled that you are to ride Lord Byron yourself?

Clemens. What a question! It's the Ladies' Cup! Who should I let ride for me? The odds wouldn't be any one and a half to one, I can tell you — if Horner didn't know that I was to ride.

Margaret. I believe that. You do look beautiful on a horse, dearest, perfectly stunning! I shall never forget that day in Munich — the day I met you, too —

Clemens. Ugh! — don't remind me of that. That was my unlucky day. Windisch had ten lengths advantage of me at the start or he never would have won that race. But this one is my game all right. And then the very next day off we go, you and I.

Margaret. Evening?

Clemens. Yes, why?

Margaret. I'm taking for granted that we get married in the morning.

Clemens. Quite right, my love.

Margaret. I'm so happy! (Kisses him.) And where do we go?

Clemens. To the estate, of course. I thought that was settled.

Margaret. Oh, yes, for later. But can't we have a few days on the Riviera first?

Clemens. That depends on whether I win the Ladies' Cup or not.

Margaret. It's a dead certainty!

Clemens. And, besides, there's no style to the Riviera in April.

Margaret. What difference does that make?

Clemens. It makes considerable difference, my dear. You still have certain notions as to what is correct — do forgive me for saying it — but they remind me of the comic papers.

Margaret. Clemens!

Clemens. Well, we can talk it over later. (Takes up his paper.) The Clown, fifteen to one.

Margaret. The Clown? He's not to run.

Clemens. How do you know?

Margaret. Szigrati told me.

Clemens. And when, pray?

Margaret. This morning in Freudenau, when you were talking to Milner.

Clemens. Szigrati is not the proper company for you.

Margaret. Jealous?

Clemens. Hardly. But from now on I think I'd better introduce you everywhere as my fiancée. (MARGARET kisses him.) And what was Szigrati telling you?

Margaret. He told me he didn't intend to run the Clown in the Ladies' Cup.

Clemens. You don't want to believe everything Szigrati tells you. He may be starting that rumor to make the odds longer.

Margaret. Why, that's gambling!

Clemens. Did you think there was no gambling about a horse race? It's only another kind of business for most men.

A man like Szigrati doesn't care a tuppenny for sport. He might as well be speculating in stocks. But we can allow him a hundred to one on the Clown if he wants it.

Margaret. I don't know about that. I saw him this morning and he's a very handsome horse.

Clemens. You are coming on! Where did you see the Clown?

Margaret. This morning. Butters rode him round the paddock right behind Kiss Me.

Clemens. Butters doesn't ride for Szigrati, that must have been a stable boy. But the Clown is deceiving, he's all looks and no wind. You'll soon learn the difference, though, with your talent. It's incredible, really, how quickly you've worked your way into all these things. You exceed my wildest expectations.

Margaret. I don't see why. You know perfectly well that all these things are not so very new to me. People of position came often to my parents' house, Count Libowski, oh, and ever so many others. And then, when I was living with my husband —

Clemens. Yes, yes — of course. I have no objection, on principle, to the cotton industry —

Margaret. Even if my husband did own a cotton mill, what has that to do with my personal point of view? I went my own way mentally. But don't let's talk of those days, they're far enough off now, thank fortune.

Clemens. But there were other days, nearer to the present.

Margaret. Naturally. Well?

Clemens. I meant — you couldn't have heard much about sporting interests in the crowd you went with in Munich, as far as I can judge.

Margaret. Suppose you stop reproaching me for the company you found me in?

Clemens. It wasn't meant for a reproach. Only I never can and never will understand how you came to be with such people.

Margaret. You talk as if they were a gang of thieves.

Clemens. I give you my word some of them looked like it. What I can't understand is how you, with your predilection for — well, let's say for cleanliness and fine perfumes — could endure sitting at the same table with them.

Margaret (smiling). You sat there yourself.

Clemens. Near them — not with them. And it was for your sake — only for your sake, as you very well know. However, I don't deny that some of them improved on acquaintance, there were some really interesting people among them. You mustn't think for a moment that I look down on a man because his clothes are shabby or badly cut, that isn't it. But there was something in their manners, in their general behavior, that got on my nerves.

Margaret. I can't see why.

Clemens. Now don't be touchy, my dear. Haven't I said that some of them were really interesting? Still, I can't understand how a lady could feel at home in their company for any length of time.

Margaret. You forget, my dear Clemens, that in a certain sense I am — or was — one of them.

Clemens. Oh, come now!

Margaret. They were artists.

Clemens. Here we are, back to that subject again!

Margaret. Yes, it's my one constant grief that you can't keep up with me there.

Clemens. Can't keep up with you? Oh, come now. I'm not so stupid as all that. But you know what I object to in your writing — you know it's a purely personal objection.

Margaret. There are many women who might have done worse things, in my position, than to write poems.

Clemens. But such poems — such poems! That's just the point. (Takes a small book from the mantelpiece.) I give you my word, every time I see this book, every time I think of it even, I am ashamed that you should have written it.

Margaret. You can't understand. That's all. Don't be angry, dear. If you did understand, you would be quite perfect and I suppose that is not to be. But what is it that worries you so? You know I haven't experienced any of all that —

Clemens. I hope not.

Margaret. It is all pure imagination.

Clemens. That's just it. How can a lady imagine anything like this? (Reads.)

"Drunk as with wine I hang upon thy neck
And I would suck thy soul from out thy lips."

(With a shake of his head.) How can a lady write stuff like that? And have it printed? Why, every man that reads it will think of the authoress and of the neck and — well, all the rest of it.

Margaret. But when I tell you that there never was such a neck?

Clemens. I know there wasn't — that's my good fortune — and yours, too, Margaret. But how the deuce did you ever imagine such things? Your first husband can't have inspired all these glowing love poems — you say he never understood you.

Margaret. Never. That's why I left him. How could I exist with a creature who cared for nothing but eating and drinking and cotton?

Clemens. Yes, yes. But that's three years ago, and these poems have been written since.

Margaret. Well, consider my position.

Clemens. You weren't starving. Your husband was mighty decent to you in the matter of money, I must say. You didn't have to earn your living. And even if they gave you a hundred guldens for a poem — I don't suppose they pay more than that — there was no need for you to write such a book.

Margaret. Dearest Clem — when I speak of my position I don't mean merely in regard to money. I mean my state of mind. You have no idea what that was — when I met you it was much better, I had learned to find myself as it were — but at first! I was so helpless — so distracted — I tried everything I could think of — I painted, I even gave English lessons in the Pension where I lived. Just think of it — I was only twenty-two, a divorced wife, and I hadn't a single soul on whom —

Clemens. Why didn't you stay in Vienna?

Margaret. Because I had quarrelled with my family. None of them understood me. There wasn't one of them could realize that a woman might ask for something more in life than just a husband, and good clothes and a social position. Ah, if I had had a child, it might all have been easier to bear — perhaps — perhaps not, who knows? I am a complex nature. And, besides, why do you complain? What better could I have done than to go to Munich? Would I have met you if I hadn't?

Clemens. But that wasn't why you went there.

Margaret. I wanted to be free — mentally free. I wanted to see whether I had the ability to make my way of myself alone. And you can't deny that it looked as if I had that ability — I was well on the road to success and fame.

Clemens. Hm!

Margaret. But you were dearer to me than fame.

Clemens (good-naturedly). And more certain.

Margaret. I never thought of that. I loved you from the first. You were the sort of man I had longed for in my dreams. I knew that I could be really happy only with such a man. Birth, breeding — it's not an empty word after all — there's nothing like it. You know that's why I sometimes think —

Clemens. Well?

Margaret. I think sometimes there may be noble blood in my veins.

Clemens. How?

Margaret. It might be possible —

Clemens. I don't follow —

Margaret. I told you of the noblemen who came to my father's house —

Clemens. What has that to do with it?

Margaret. Who knows —?

Clemens. Margaret! How can you say such a thing?

Margaret. One can't say what one really thinks — to you.
That's your only fault. Otherwise, you're quite perfect. (She nestles up to him.) Oh, I love you so — so unbelievably! That very first evening when you came to the Café with Wangenhaim, I knew that you were the One Man for me. You came among us like a being from another world.

Clemens. I should hope so. And you didn't look as if you belonged there either. When I think of those people! That Russian girl, for instance, with her short hair, you know, the one that looked like a college student, only she didn't wear the cap.

Margaret. That was Miss Baranzewitch, a very talented painter.

Clemens. Yes, I know, you showed her to me one day at the Pinakothek, she was up on a ladder copying a picture.
And then the man with the Polish name —

Margaret (begins). Zrkd —

Clemens. Never mind, you don't have to say it now. He read something aloud one evening when I was there and didn't seem the least bit ashamed of it.

Margaret. He's remarkably talented.

Clemens. Oh, yes, they're all talented — in the Café. And then that fellow, that irritating —

Margaret. Who do you mean?

Clemens. You know who I mean — the man who used to make tactless remarks about the aristocracy.

Margaret. Oh, you mean Gilbert?

Clemens. Yes, that's the one. I don't want to defend all of my class, there are scoundrels everywhere, even among the poets, I've been told. But it's beastly bad manners, when one of us is present —

Margaret. That was just his way.

Clemens. I had to keep a tight rein on myself — or I should have said something —

Margaret. He was one of the most interesting, in spite of it. And then — you know he was jealous of you.

Clemens (dryly). Yes, I thought I noticed something of the kind. (There is a pause.)

Margaret. Oh, they were all jealous of you — you were so different. And then you know, they all made love to me more or less, just because I treated them all alike. You saw that, didn't you? What are you laughing at?

Clemens. It's funny, isn't it? If anyone had prophesied that I should marry an habitué of the Café Maximilian! I liked the two young painters best of all, they were like something out of a farce. You know, the two that looked so much alike and shared everything in common, even the Russian lady on the ladder, apparently.

Margaret. I never bothered about such things.

Clemens. You know, I think the two were Jews.

Margaret. Why?

Clemens. Well, the jokes they made — and their accent —

Margaret. You might, spare me these anti-semitic remarks.

Clemens. There — there! Don't be offended. I know you're half-breed yourself. But really I have no objection to Jews. I had a tutor once, crammed me in Greek for the exams. — He was a Jew and a fine fellow, too — yes, yes, one meets all sorts of people. I don't regret having met your crowd in Munich, it's all in the game. But I must have seemed like the prince come to rescue you.

Margaret. Yes, you did. (With her arms around his neck.)
Dearest Clem —

Clemens. What are you laughing at?

Margaret. A sudden thought.

Clemens. Let's have it.

Margaret. "Drunk as with wine I hang upon thy neck."

Clemens (irritated). Oh, please — why must you always spoil the illusion?

Margaret. Tell me, Clemens — then you really wouldn't be proud to have the woman you love — your wife — become a great and famous poetess?

Clemens. I've told you already — you may call me stupid and narrow-minded if you like — but I assure you solemnly that if you begin to write such poems again, and even if they are written to me — and you print them and tell all the world of our love — I tell you then that the marriage is off, and so am I and you will never see me again.

Margaret. And this is the man who has had at least a dozen affairs that were town talk!

Clemens. Oh, bosh! — Town talk! I never told when one of them hung drunk on my neck, and had it printed that anybody could buy it for a gulden and a half. That's the point. I know there are people who live by that sort of thing, but I call it indecent. I tell you, to me it's worse than for a woman to pose in tights as a Greek statue at Ronacher's — much worse. The Greek statue doesn't say Boo. But the things these poets say — it's outrageous!

Margaret (uneasy). Dearest, you forget that the poet does not always tell the truth.

Clemens. Does it make it any better when he lies about it?

Margaret. We don't call that lying, we call it "conventionalizing."

Clemens. H'm! That's another new word.

Margaret. Or we write of things we've never experienced, things we've dreamed or only invented.

Clemens. Please don't say we, Margaret. You're not one of them, thank the Lord.

Margaret. Who knows?

Clemens. What do you mean?

Margaret (tenderly). Dearest Clem — I must tell you —

Clemens. Tell me what?

Margaret. I am still one of them — I have not stopped writing —

Clemens. How is that?

Margaret. I am still writing, or rather I have just written something. The impulse to create is stronger than others can understand. I should have gone mad if I had not written —

Clemens. And what have you written now?

Margaret. A novel. There was so much that was tugging at my heart — it would have suffocated me. I said nothing to you thus far, but you must know finally. Kunigel is delighted with it.

Clemens. And who is Kunigel?

Margaret. My publisher.

Clemens. Then someone has read the novel?

Margaret. Of course, and many more will read it. You will be proud of me, Clemens.

Clemens. You are quite mistaken, my dear girl. I — I can't express what I think of your conduct. What's in the book?

Margaret. That's not so easy to state. My novel says about everything there is to be said about everything.

Clemens. Good Lord!

Margaret. And that's why I can promise you that I will never touch a pen again. It will not be necessary.

Clemens. Margaret, do you really love me?

Margaret. How can you ask it? I love you, only you. Whatever I may have seen or observed, my own experience has been very barren. I have waited for you —

Clemens. Then bring me your novel.

Margaret. I don't follow —

Clemens. You say you had to write it. Very well — but no one need read it. Bring it here and we'll throw it into the fire.

Margaret. Clem!

Clemens. I demand it of you — I have the right.

Margaret. But it isn't possible —

Clemens. And why not? If I wish it, if I make everything else dependent upon it — you understand? Maybe it will be possible then?

Margaret. But, Clemens, the novel is already printed.

Clemens. Printed!

Margaret. Yes, it will be on sale in a day or two.

Clemens. Margaret! And you never told me a word of all this?

Margaret. I couldn't, dearest. Wait till it comes out and then you'll forgive me — more than that, you will be proud of me.

Clemens. My dear girl, this is a serious matter.

Margaret. Clemens!

Clemens. Good-bye, Margaret!

Margaret. Clemens! You're going?

Clemens. It looks that way.'

Margaret. And when will you come back?

Clemens. I can't tell now. Good-bye.

Margaret (tries to hold him back). Clemens!

Clemens (shakes her off). Good-bye. (He goes out.)

Margaret. Clemens! Clemens! What does this mean? Has he left me? What shall I do? Clemens, is this the end? Oh, no, it cannot be — I must follow him. (She looks about wildly for her hat. The bell rings outside.) Ah! he's come back — he just wanted to frighten me. Oh, my Clemens! (She runs to the door, then starts back as she hears GILBERT'S voice.)

Gilbert (outside). I told you she was at home. (He enters.)
Good afternoon, Margaret.

Margaret (in utter surprise). You here!

Gilbert. Yes, even I, Amandus Gilbert.

Margaret. This is a surprise.

Gilbert. So I perceive. But without reason. I am passing through this town on my way to Italy. My real reason for coming here was to bring you — in memory of our former comradeship — a copy of my latest book. (He holds the volume towards her. When she does not take it, he lays it on the table.)

Margaret (mechanically). Thank you, you are very kind.

Gilbert. Don't mention it. You have a certain right to this book. (He looks about the room.) So this is where you're living now?

Margaret. Yes, but —

Gilbert. I know, merely temporary. Rather nice for a furnished room. But these family portraits on the walls would drive me crazy.

Margaret. My landlady is the widow of a General.

Gilbert. Don't bother to make excuses.

Margaret. Excuses? I had no such intention.

Gilbert. Strange, isn't it, to think that —

Margaret. To think what?

Gilbert. Why not? I was just thinking of your little room in the Steinsdorfer Strasse with the balcony over the Isar. Do you remember it, Margaret? (MARGARET turns away as if she had not heard. There is a pause.)

Gilbert (suddenly). Margaret, you behaved atrociously!

Margaret. What!

Gilbert. Or would you prefer a less definite expression? No other word fits the case. And it was all so unnecessary. An honest and open confession would have answered every purpose. But to run away, by night and fog —

Margaret. It was neither night nor fog. I left Munich on the eight-thirty express on a bright sunny morning.

Gilbert. Still, we might have said good-bye. (He sits down.)

Margaret. The Baron may return at any moment.

Gilbert. Well? You're hardly likely to have told him that you have lain in my arms and adored me. I am merely an old friend from Munich. I suppose your old friends may visit you?

Margaret. Any other — but not you.

Gilbert. Oh, you misunderstand. I come now, really, only as a good friend. All else is over and done with forever. (He points to the book.) You will see.

Margaret. What is that?

Gilbert. My latest novel.

Margaret. You write novels?

Gilbert. I do.

Margaret. And since when?

Gilbert. I do not catch your meaning.

Margaret. Why — I seem to remember that your special field was the Short sketch, the observing of everyday happenings —

Gilbert (excited). My field? The world is my field. I write what I please. I permit no limitations to my talent. I know of no reason why I should not write a novel —

Margaret. Oh, well — but it was the opinion of authoritative criticism that —

Gilbert. And what is authoritative criticism?

Margaret. I remember, for instance, one article by Neumann —

Gilbert (angry). Neumann is an idiot — I knocked him down.

Margaret. You did?

Gilbert. Mentally, I mean — mentally. You were as angry as I was about it at the time. We agreed absolutely that Neumann was an idiot. "How dare this nonenity," these were your very words, "how dare this nonenity venture to set a limit for your talent? How dare he attempt to strangle your next book before it has seen the light?" That was what you said, and now you quote this space-filling fool?

Margaret. Please don't scream so! My landlady —

Gilbert. I cannot stop to consider generals' widows when my nerves are all of a quiver.

Margaret. But what have I said to make you so angry? You are ridiculously sensitive.

Gilbert. Sensitive? You call me sensitive? You? The woman who went into hysterics if the youngest cub reporter in the tiniest sheet dared to say one word against her!

Margaret. I don't remember that there ever was a word said against me.

Gilbert. Oh, indeed! Well, you may be right. Even the press can be polite to pretty women.

Margaret. Polite? Do you mean to insinuate that I was praised from mere politeness? And your own opinion —

Gilbert. I don't take back anything I may have said. I would merely like to remind you that your few good poems were written during the time of our acquaintance.

Margaret. You take the credit to yourself then?

Gilbert. Would you have written them without me? Are they not written to me?

Margaret. No.

Gilbert. No? Incredible!

Margaret. They were not written to you.

Gilbert. I am dumbfounded. Shall I remind you of the situations in which your finest verses were created?

Margaret. My poems were written to an ideal — (GILBERT points to himself) — an ideal whose earthly incarnation you happened to be just then.

Gilbert. Excellent. Where did you get that? You know what the Frenchman says in such a case? "C'est de la littérature!"

Margaret (mocks his tone). Ce n'est pas de la littérature.
But it's the truth. Or did you really believe that I meant you when I sang of a slender youth with clustering curls? You were fat even then — and this was never curly.

(She passes her hand lightly over his hair, GILBERT catches her hand and kisses it.)

Margaret (gently). Nonsense.

Gilbert. You thought they were curls then. Or you called them curls — one can stretch a point considerably for the sake of sound and rhythm. Didn't I call you, in one of my own sonnets, "my clever maiden," and yet you were neither clever nor — no, I won't be unjust, you were clever, impertinently, disgustingly clever. And you won out. But why should I wonder at it — you were always something of a snob. Well, now you have your desire. You have landed him safely, your highborn youth with the well-kept hands and the neglected brain, the famous jockey and fencer, tennis player, dead shot, and supreme breaker of hearts — brrrrr! Marlitt herself could not have invented anything more inanely disgusting. Still, I venture to question whether all this will content you in the long run — you who have known something Higher. I can only say this, in my eyes you have become a Pariah of the Emotions.

Margaret. You thought that out on the train.

Gilbert. I didn't — it just occurred to be now.

Margaret. Better make a note of it. It's a good phrase.

Gilbert. I have another for you. Listen. Once you were the Woman, now you are only the Female. Yes, that is it. What can possibly attract you to that man, what, but the lowest, the most animal —

Margaret. You needn't talk.

Gilbert. My dear, I always had a soul as well.

Margaret. Yes, that was all — sometimes.

Gilbert. Don't attempt to degrade our love, you will not succeed. It will still remain the greatest thing in your life.

Margaret. And to think that I endured this sort of talk for a whole year!

Gilbert. Endured it? You revelled in it. Don't be ungrateful, I am not. However atrocious your behavior at the last may have been, I shall not let it spoil the memory for me. I will even say more — it was all a part of it.

Margaret. You don't say?

Gilbert. Yes, you have a right to know it now. Just as you began to turn from me, drawn by your longing for the warm stable— "la nostralgie de l'écurie," just at that time I was beginning to realize that I had done with you.

Margaret. Not really?

Gilbert. It was characteristic of you that you did not notice this fact. Yes, I was done with you, I no longer needed you. All that you could give me had been given, your mission was ended. You knew this in the depths of your soul, you knew it, unconsciously you were conscious of it —

Margaret. Oh, don't be so brilliant.

Gilbert (does not heed the interruption). Your time was over. Our love had served its purpose. I do not regret it.

Margaret. But I do.

Gilbert. Excellent! For the connoisseur this little remark covers all the deep-lying difference between the artist and the amateur. To you our love is now nothing more than the memory of a few wild nights, of a few deep talks in the shadows of the trees. I have made a work of art of it.

Margaret. And so have I.

Gilbert. What do you mean by that?

Margaret. I can do whatever you can. I have written a novel, too, a novel into which I have woven our relations. I have given our love, or what we called by that name, to immortality.

Gilbert. I wouldn't talk about immortality, if I were you, until the second edition is out.

Margaret. It is rather a different matter when I write a novel — or when you do it.

Gilbert. Rather.

Margaret. You are a free man. You do not need to steal the hours for your art. You do not risk your future by doing so.

Gilbert. And do you?

Margaret. Yes, I have done it. Clemens left me just now, because I told him I had written a novel.

Gilbert. He left you? For good?

Margaret. I do not know. It may be. He left me in anger and I haven't yet learned what to expect of him.

Gilbert. Then he forbids you to write? He does not want you to use your brain. Excellent! And this is what we call the Flower of the Nation! And you? Are you not ashamed to experience the same sensations for an idiot like this, as for —

Margaret. I forbid you to speak of him that way. You will never be able to understand him.

Gilbert. Hah!

Margaret. You don't understand why he objects to my writing. It is simply because of his love for me. He feels that when I write I am in a world he cannot enter. And then, too, he is ashamed for me that I should bare my inmost soul for all the world to see. He wants to keep me for himself — for himself alone. And this is the reason why he rushed away — no, not rushed — Clemens is not the sort of man to rush —

Gilbert. Well observed. But he is gone, we need not discuss the gait. And he has gone because he cannot endure that you should follow your impulse to create — that you should work.

Margaret. Ah, yes, if he could only understand. But it seems that cannot be. I could be the best, the truest wife in the world if only I could find the one perfect man.

Gilbert. Which means to say that he is not the perfect man either.

Margaret. I said nothing of the kind.

Gilbert. Can't you see he is enslaving you — that he's ruining you — that he is trying to crush out the best in you just from pure selfishness? Think of the woman you once were. Think of the freedom you enjoyed when you loved me — freedom to develop heart and brain. Think of the noble minds that were your daily companion: think of the ardent band of disciples who sat at my feet and included you in their worship. Don't you wish yourself back again? Don't you sometimes think of the little room with the balcony — and the Isar murmuring below. (He takes her hand and draws her close to him.)

Margaret. Ah, no — no.

Gilbert. It can all be again. It needn't be just the Isar — any river will do. Listen, Margaret, I have a suggestion to make.
If he returns, tell him you have some urgent affairs to settle in Munich and spend the time with me there. You are as beautiful as ever — we can be happy again, Margaret, happy as we once were. (Very near her.) Do you remember? "Drunk as with wine, I hang upon thy neck—"

Margaret (tears herself away). No — no — go away, please — leave me — I — I don't love you any more.

Gilbert. Ah! Then — I beg your pardon. (Pause.) Goodbye, Margaret.

Margaret. Good-bye.

Gilbert. Good-bye. (Turns back again.) Won't you give me a copy of your book as a parting gift? I gave you mine.

Margaret. It isn't out yet. I can't get a copy until next week.

Gilbert. May I ask what sort of a novel it is?

Margaret. It is the story of my life. But, of course, I have veiled the facts so that I can't be recognized.

Gilbert. How did you do that?

Margaret. Quite simply. The heroine is not a poetess, she is a painter.

Gilbert. Very clever.

Margaret. Her first husband is not a cotton manufacturer, but a stock broker. And then it is not a tenor with whom she deceives him.

Gilbert. Ha! ha! ha!

Margaret. What are you laughing at?

Gilbert. So you deceived him with a tenor? That's news to me.

Margaret. Who said I did?

Gilbert. You yourself, this very minute.

Margaret. Nonsense. I said the heroine of my novel deceived her husband with a baritone.

Gilbert. A bass would be more dramatic, a mezzosoprano more piquante.

Margaret. Then it is not to Munich she goes, but to Dresden. And there she has an affair with a sculptor.

Gilbert. Which is me, veiled?

Margaret. Very much veiled. The sculptor is young, handsome, and a genius. And yet she leaves him.

Gilbert. For whom?

Margaret. Guess?

Gilbert. For a jockey, presumably.

Margaret. Silly!

Gilbert. For a Count? A Prince?

Margaret. No, he is an Archduke.

Gilbert (bowing). You have indeed spared no expense.

Margaret. An Archduke who leaves the Court for her sake — marries her and takes her to the Canary Islands.

Gilbert. Canary Islands? Delicious. And then?

Margaret. That ends it.

Gilbert. It will certainly interest me — particularly the disguises.

Margaret. Even you would never recognize me if —

Gilbert. If what?

Margaret. If it weren't that one of the last chapters contains our entire correspondence.

Gilbert. What?

Margaret. Yes, all the letters I wrote you — and yours to me — are in the book.

Gilbert. Pardon me, but how did your get your letters to me? I have them.

Margaret. I made a draft of each before I wrote it out.

Gilbert. You did?

Margaret. Yes.

Gilbert. A draft of each — of these notes penned apparently in trembling haste! "Just a line, belovéd, before I go to rest — my eyes are closing—" And then when your eyes did close, you copied it out to send me!

Margaret. Why should you complain?

Gilbert. I might have known it! I ought to be thankful she didn't copy them from a "Letter Writer for Lovers." Oh, how my castle is falling — the past is but a loathsome heap of ruins — she made a draft of her letters!

Margaret. Cheer up! These letters of mine may be all that is known of you, some years hence.

Gilbert. And besides which, that puts us in a nice position.

Margaret. How?

Gilbert (touching his book). They're in here, too.

Margaret. What's in where?

Gilbert. Here in my novel.

Margaret. What is in your novel?

Gilbert. Our letters, yours and mine.

Margaret. And how did you get your own? I have them.
Ah ha! you made a draft, too.

Gilbert. Oh, no, I copied them for myself before I sent them off. They were too good to lose. There are some here that you never received. They were much too fine for you — you never would have understood them.

Margaret. Yes, but — for pity's sake, if that is so — (She turns the leaves of the book hastily.) Yes, here they are. Why — this is just — just as if we proclaimed aloud to the whole world that we two — Great Heavens! Is that letter here, too, the one you sent me, the morning after the first night —

Gilbert. Of course. That one was superb!

Margaret. Oh, this is dreadful — dreadful! It will be a European scandal. And Clemens! For God's sake, Clemens! I begin to hope he will not return. I am lost — and so are you. Wherever you may hide yourself he will find you and he will shoot you down like a mad dog.

Gilbert (putting his book in his pocket). What a hackneyed comparison.

Margaret. What ever put this crazy idea into your head?
To publish the letters of the woman you pretended to love?
It proves that you are no gentleman.

Gilbert. Delicious! you've done the very same thing yourself.

Margaret. I am a woman.

Gilbert. Ah, now you can remember that fact.

Margaret. Yes, it's true — I have nothing to reproach you with — we are worthy of one another. Clemens is right. We are worse than the women who show themselves in tights at Ronacher's. We lay bare our souls to the public gaze, we expose shamelessly all our most intimate happiness, all our secret griefs! oh, shame on us! Clemens will be quite right if he does turn me out. (Suddenly.) Come, Amandus.

Gilbert. What is it now?

Margaret. I accept your suggestion.

Gilbert. What suggestion?

Margaret. I will flee with you. (She runs about looking for her coat and hat.)

Gilbert. What an idea! What are you about now?

Margaret (pinning on her hat, scrambling into her coat in great excitement). It can all be as before — you said so yourself — it needn't be the Isar — any river will do. There! I'm ready now.

Gilbert. This is absolute madness. Where could we flee to?
Didn't you just say he would find me anywhere? If you're with me he'd find you, too. It would be much wiser for each of us to go alone.

Margaret. Wretch! Would you desert me now? And you were at my feet a moment ago — aren't you ashamed of yourself?

Gilbert. Why should I be? I am a nervous sick man, full of moods. (MARGARET has run to the window, now screams.) What's the matter now? What will the General's widow think of me?

Margaret. It's Clemens! He's coming here.

Gilbert. Then — perhaps — (He turns to the door.)

Margaret. You're going?

Gilbert. I did not come to call on the Baron.

Margaret. He will meet you on the stairs, that will be worse. You must stay. I will not be the only victim.

Gilbert. Don't be so idiotic. What are you afraid of? He can't possibly have read both books since he left here. Do come to your senses. Take off that hat — put your coat away. (He helps her out of her coat and hat.) If he sees you like this, he'd surely suspect something.

Margaret. I don't care. I want to get it over with, the sooner the better. I can't endure the suspense. I shall tell him everything.

Gilbert. Everything?

Margaret. Yes, and while you are here, too. If I confess all he may forgive me.

Gilbert. And how about me? I have something better to do than to stay here and be shot down like a mad dog by a jealous Baron. (Bell rings outside.)

Margaret. There he is — there he is.

Gilbert. You shall not say a word.

Margaret. I will — I will tell everything.

Gilbert. Very well, then, in that case I shall sell my life dearly.

Margaret. What will you do?

Gilbert. I will fling a few truths in his face — truths no Baron has ever heard before. (CLEMENS enters. When he sees them, he is constrained, very cool and polite.)

Clemens. Ah! Mr. Gilbert, is it not?

Gilbert. It is, Baron. I am on my way South and could not resist this opportunity to pay my respects to an old friend.

Clemens. I see. (There is a pause.) But I seem to have interrupted your conversation. I am sorry for that. Please don't let me disturb you.

Gilbert. Let me see, what were we talking about?

Clemens. Maybe I can help you there. In Munich, at least, it was usually your books we were talking about.

Gilbert. Ah, excellent — and I believe we were speaking of my latest novel just as you came in.

Clemens. Please continue. You can talk about literature to me now, can't he, Margaret? Is it a realistic novel? Or symbolic? Something from your own experience or merely conventionalized?

Gilbert. In a certain sense all that one writes must have been experienced.

Clemens. Indeed? That is most interesting.

Gilbert. To paint a Nero it is necessary that one should have fired Rome, mentally, at least.

Clemens. Of course.

Gilbert. And where should we find inspiration, if not within ourselves? Where find our models if not in the life around us?

(MARGARET grows more and more uneasy.)

Clemens. The trouble is that the models themselves are so seldom consulted about it. I must say, if I were a woman I'd protest against having everybody told that I — (Sharply.) In decent society we call that compromising a woman.

Gilbert. I don't know whether I may class myself as belonging to decent society, but I call it ennobling a woman.

Clemens. Oh!

Gilbert. The essential fact is that the thing must be well done. What can it matter, in the higher sense, if one does know that a woman has been happy in the arms of this man or that?

Clemens. Mr. Gilbert, I call your attention to the fact that you are speaking in the presence of a lady.

Gilbert. I am speaking in the presence of a good comrade, whose opinions on such matters are likely to coincide with my own.

Clemens. Indeed?

Margaret (runs to CLEMENS and jails at his feet). Clemens — Clemens!

Clemens (dumbfounded). Why, Margaret!

Margaret. Forgive me, Clemens!

Clemens. But, Margaret — (To GILBERT.) Mr. Gilbert, this is a most painful — Margaret, do stand up — it's all right. (MARGARET still on her knees, clasps her hands and gazes up at him.) Yes, yes, it's all right — do get up. (She rises.) It's all settled I tell you — you have only to telephone to Kunigel. I have made all arrangements. The plates will be destroyed — Is that right?

Gilbert. May I ask — is it the new novel that's to be destroyed?

Clemens. Then you know? I fear, Mr. Gilbert, you were somewhat mistaken as to that comradeship.

Gilbert. Yes. There's nothing more for me to do than to ask a general pardon. I am quite crushed.

Clemens. I regret that you should have been obliged to witness a scene so — I had almost said — so conjugal.

Gilbert. Oh, I shall not disturb you any longer. And before I go, Baron, may I take the liberty — as a slight token of my esteem and as a sign that all misunderstanding between us is now over, — may I hand you a copy of my latest novel?

Clemens. You are very kind. I must confess German novels are not in my line, but yours shall be the last I read — no, the last but one.
Margaret and Gilbert (together). The last but one?

Clemens. Yes.

Margaret. And the very last?

Clemens. Yours, my dear. (He takes a book from his pocket.) I asked for one copy to bring home to you, to both of us. (MARGARET and GILBERT exchange glances of consternation.)

Margaret. How good you are. (Takes the book.) Yes, this is it —

Clemens. We will read it together.

Margaret (with sudden decision). No, Clemens — no, I cannot accept such kindness. (With a fine gesture she throws the book into the fire.) There! All that part of my life is over and done with forever.

Gilbert (delighted). Margaret!

Clemens. Margaret! What have you done?

Margaret (stands before the fire until she sees that the book is burning, then she throws herself into his arms). Can you doubt now that I love you?

Gilbert (greatly pleased), I don't seem to be at all necessary here. (Bowing, as he goes toward the door.) Madame! — Baron! — (To himself, as he turns to go.) But oh! if I could have used that closing scene! (He goes out.)

CURTAIN

The Lonely Way (1904)

A DRAMA IN FIVE ACTS

Original German Title: 'Der einsame Weg'

Translated by Edwin Björkman, 1915

The premiere of the five-act play Der einsame Weg took place on 13 February 1904 in Berlin. The plot is set in contemporary Vienna, where, after many years, the painter Julian Fichtner reencounters his former lover Gabriele. In the past he had seduced and abandoned her to maintain his artistic freedom. She had married the academy professor Wegrath and now has two grown children, Felix and Johanna. No one suspects that Felix is in fact Julian's son. Gabriele, who is terminally ill and knows she has little time left to live, reveals the truth to the children. Julian hopes to be a father figure to his newfound son, but Felix remains loyal to Wegrath, the 'false' father and true human being. Johanna, meanwhile, resists the future her mother has planned for her — she refuses to become engaged to the young doctor Reumann, having fallen in love with Herr von Sala, an old family friend she has known since childhood. Sala, however, suffers from his own fatal illness...

The drama was written between 1900 and 1903 and underwent several major revisions. Early versions were titled Bachelors and Egoists; later, Schnitzler considered titles such as Lonely Paths and Paths into Darkness. The drama enjoyed a mixed reception from the public and critics. After the Berlin premiere, Schnitzler noted in his diary: "The reviews largely state a weak performance or a failure, but some are highly complimentary."

Schnitzler, close to the time of publication

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION
PERSONS
THE FIRST ACT
THE SECOND ACT
THE THIRD ACT
THE FOURTH ACT
THE FIFTH ACT

INTRODUCTION

HERMANN BAHR, THE noted playwright and critic, tried one day to explain the spirit of certain Viennese architecture to a German friend, who persisted in saying: "Yes, yes, but always there remains something that I find curiously foreign." At that moment an old-fashioned Spanish state carriage was coming along the street, probably on its way to or from the imperial palace. The German could hardly believe his eyes and expressed in strong terms his wonderment at finding such a relic surviving in an ultra-modern town like Vienna.

"You forget that our history is partly Spanish," Bahr retorted. "And nothing could serve better than that old carriage to explain what you cannot grasp in our art and poetry."

A similar idea has been charmingly expressed by Hugo von Hofmannsthal in the poem he wrote in 1892 — when he was still using the pseudonym of "Loris" — as introduction to "Anatol." I am now adding a translation of that poem to my own introduction, because I think it will be of help in reading the plays of this volume. The scene painted by Hofmannsthal might, on the whole, be used as a setting for "Countess Mizzie." For a more detailed version of that scene he refers us to "Canaletto's Vienna" — that is, to the group of thirteen Viennese views which were painted about 1760 by the Venetian Bernardo Belotto (who, like his more famous uncle and model, Antonio Canale, was generally called Canaletto), and which are now hanging in one of the galleries of the Kunsthistorische Hofmuseum at Vienna. The spirit of those pictures may be described, I am told, as one of stately grace. They are full of Latin joy in life and beauty. They speak of an existence constantly softened by concern for the amenities of life. It is just what survives of their atmosphere that frequently makes foreigners speak of Vienna with a tender devotion not even surpassed by that bestowed on Paris or Rome.

An attempt to understand the atmosphere and spirit of modern Vienna will carry us far toward a correct appreciation of Schnitzler's art. And it is not enough to say that Vienna is one of the oldest cities in Europe. It is not even enough to say that it preserves more of the past than Paris or London, for instance. What we must always bear in mind is its position as the meeting place not only of South and North but also of past and present. In some ways it is a melting-pot on a larger scale than New York even. Racially and lingually, it belongs to the North. Historically and psychologically, it belongs to the South. Economically and politically, it lives very much in the present. Socially and esthetically, it has always been strongly swayed by tradition. The anti-Semitic movement, which formed such a characteristic feature of Viennese life during the last few decades, must be regarded as the last stand of vanishing social traditions against a growing pressure of economical requirements.

Like all cities sharply divided within itself and living above a volcano of half-suppressed passions, Vienna tends to seek in abandoned gayety, in a frank surrender to the senses, that forgetfulness without which suicide would seem the only remaining alternative. Emotions kept constantly at the boiling-point must have an outlet, lest they burst their container. Add to this sub-conscious or unconscious craving for a neutral outlet, the traditional pressure of the Latin inheritance, and we have the greater part of the causes that explain Schnitzler's preoccupation with the themes of love and death. For Schnitzler is first of all Viennese.

Arthur Schnitzler was born at Vienna on May 15, 1862. His father was Professor Johann Schnitzler, a renowned Jewish throat specialist. I am told that Professor Bernhardi in the play of the same name must be regarded as a pretty faithful portrait of the elder Schnitzler, who, besides his large and important practice, had many other interests, including an extensive medical authorship and the editing of the Wiener klinische Rundschau. It is also to be noticed that Professor Bernhardi has among his assistants a son, who divides his time between medicine and the composition of waltz music.

The younger Schnitzler studied medicine at the Vienna University, as did also his brother, and obtained his M.D. in 1885. During the next two years he was attached to the resident staff of one of the big hospitals. It was also the period that saw the beginning of his authorship. While contributing medical reviews to his father's journal, he was also publishing poems and prose sketches in various literary periodicals. Most of his contributions from this time appeared in a publication named "An der schönen blauen Donau" (By the Beautiful Blue Danube), now long defunct.

He was also continuing his studies, which almost from the start seem to have turned toward the psychic side of the medical science. The new methods of hypnotism and suggestion interested him greatly, and in 1889 he published a monograph on "Functional Aphonia and its Treatment by Hypnotism and Suggestion." In 1888 he made a study trip to England, during which he wrote a series of "London Letters" on medical subjects for his father's journal. On his return he settled down as a practicing physician, but continued to act as his father's assistant. And as late as 1891-95 we find him named as his father's collaborator on a large medical work entitled "Clinical Atlas of Laryngology and Rhinology."

There are many signs to indicate uncertainty as to his true calling during those early years. The ensuing inner conflict was probably sharpened by some pressure exercised by his father, who seems to have been anxious that he should turn his energies undividedly to medicine. To a practical and outwardly successful man like the elder Schnitzler, his own profession must have appeared by far the more important and promising. While there is no reason to believe that his attitude in this matter was aggressive, it must have been keenly felt and, to some extent at least, resented by the son. One of the dominant notes of the latter's work is the mutual lack of understanding between successive generations, and this lack tends with significant frequency to assume the form of a father's opposition to a son's choice of profession.

This conflict cannot have lasted very long, however, for the younger Schnitzler proved quickly successful in his purely literary efforts. The "Anatol" sketches attracted a great deal of attention even while appearing separately in periodicals, and with their publication in book form, which occurred almost simultaneously with the first performance of "A Piece of Fiction" at a Viennese theater, their author was hailed as one of the most promising among the younger men. From that time he has been adding steadily to his output and his reputation. When his collected works were issued in 1912, these included four volumes of plays and three volumes of novels and stories. Since then he has finished another play and two volumes of prose sketches.

It is rare to find an author turning with such regularity from the epic to the dramatic form and back again. And it is still more rare to find him so thoroughly at home and successful in both fields. In Schnitzler's case these two parallel veins have mutually supported and developed each other. Time and again he has treated the same theme first in one form and then in another. And not infrequently he has introduced characters from his plays into his stories, and vice versa. A careful study of his other works would undoubtedly assist toward a better understanding of his plays, but I do not regard such a study essential for the purpose. It is my belief that Schnitzler has given himself most fully and most typically in his dramatic authorship, and it is to this side of his creative production I must confine myself here.

"Anatol" is nothing but seven sketches in dramatic form, each sketch picturing a new love affair of the kind supposed to be especially characteristic of Viennese life. The man remains the same in all these light adventures. The woman is always a different one. The story is of the kind always accompanying such circumstances — one of waxing or waning attraction, of suspicion and jealousy, of incrimination and recrimination, of intrigue and counter-intrigue. The atmosphere is realistic, but the actuality implied is sharply limited and largely superficial. There is little attempt at getting down to the roots of things. There is absolutely no tendency or thesis. The story is told for the sake of the story, and its chief redeeming quality lies in the grace and charm and verve with which it is told. These were qualities that immediately won the public's favor when "Anatol" first appeared. And to some extent it must be counted unfortunate that the impression made by those qualities was so deep and so lasting. There has been a strong tendency observable, both within and outside the author's native country, to regard him particularly as the creator of Anatol, and to question, if not to resent, his inevitable and unmistakable growth beyond that pleasing, but not very significant starting point.

And yet his next dramatic production, which was also his first serious effort as a playwright, ought to have proved sufficient warning that he was moved by something more than a desire to amuse. "A Piece of Fiction" (Das Märchen) must be counted a failure and, in some ways, a step backward. But its very failure is a promise of greater things to come. It lacks the grace and facility of "Anatol." Worse still, it lacks the good-humor and subtle irony of those first sketches. Instead it has purpose and a serious outlook on life. The "piece of fiction" refers to the "fallen" woman — to the alleged impossibility for any decent man to give his whole trust to a woman who has once strayed from the straight path. Fedor Denner denounces this attitude in the presence of a young girl who loves him and is loved by him, but who belongs to the category of women under discussion. When he learns her history, he struggles vainly to resist the feelings of distrust and jealousy which he had declared absurd a little while earlier. And the two are forced at last to walk their different ways. Unfortunately the dialogue is heavy and stilted. The play is a tract rather than a piece of art, and the tirades of Fedor are equally unconvincing when he speaks for or against that "fiction" which is killing both his own and the girl's hope of happiness in mutual love. Yet the play marks a step forward in outlook and spirit.

Schnitzler's interest in hypnotism, which had asserted itself in the first scene of "Anatol," appears again in the little verse-play, "Paracelsus," which followed. But this time he used it to more purpose. By the help of it, a woman's innermost soul is laid bare, and some very interesting light is shed on the workings of the human mind in general.

"Amours" (Liebelei) may be regarded as a cross, or a compromise, between "Anatol" and "A Piece of Fiction." The crudeness of speech marking the latter play has given room to a very incisive dialogue, that carries the action forward with unfailing precision. Some of the temporarily dropped charm has been recovered, and the gain in sincerity has been preserved. "Amours" seems to be the first one of a series of plays dealing with the reverse of the gay picture presented in "Anatol." A young man is having a love affair with two women at the same time, one of them married, the other one a young girl with scant knowledge of the world. Yet she knows enough to know what she is doing, and she has sufficient strength of mind to rise above a sense of guilt, though she is more prone to be the victim of fear. Then the married woman's husband challenges the young man, who is killed. And the girl takes her own life, not because her lover is dead, not because of anything she has done, but because his death for the sake of another woman renders her own faith in him meaningless.

"Outside the Game Laws" (Freiwild) is another step ahead — the first play, I think, where the real Arthur Schnitzler, the author of "The Lonely Way" and "Countess Mizzie," reveals himself. It has a thesis, but this is implied rather than obtruded. In style and character-drawing it is realistic in the best sense. It shows already the typical Schnitzlerian tendency of dealing with serious questions — with questions of life and death — in a casual fashion, as if they were but problems of which road to follow or which shop to enter. It has one fault that must appear as such everywhere, namely, a division of purpose. When the play starts, one imagines that those "outside the game laws" are the women of the stage, who are presented as the legitimate prey of any man caring to hunt them. As the play goes on, that starting point is almost lost sight of, and it becomes more and more plain that those "outside the game laws" are sensible, decent men who refuse to submit to the silly dictates of the dueling code. But what I have thus named a fault is mostly theoretical, and does not mar the effective appeal of the play. What must appear as a more serious shortcoming from an American viewpoint is the local nature of the evil attacked, which lessens the universal validity of the work.

"Change Partners!" (Reigen) was produced about the same time as "Outside the Game Laws," but was not printed until 1900, and then only privately. Yet those ten dialogues provoked from the first a storm which seriously threatened Schnitzler's growing reputation and popularity. When Vienna finds a work immoral, one may look for something dreadful. And the work in question attempts a degree of naturalism rarely equaled in France even. Yet those dialogues are anything but immoral in spirit. They introduce ten men and as many women. The man of one scene reappears with a new woman in the next, and then that woman figures as the partner of a new man in the third scene. The story is always the same (except in the final dialogue): desire, satisfaction, indifference. The idea underlying this "ring dance," as the title means literally, is the same one that recurs under a much more attractive aspect in "Countess Mizzie." It is the linking together of the entire social organism by man's natural cravings. And as a document bearing on the psychology of sex "Change Partners!" has not many equals.

In "The Legacy" (Das Vermächtnis) we meet with a forcible presentation and searching discussion of the world's attitude toward those ties that have been established without social sanction. A young man is brought home dying, having been thrown from his horse. He compels his parents to send for his mistress and their little boy, and he hands both over to the care of his family. That is his "legacy." The family tries hard to rise to this unexpected situation and fails miserably — largely, it must be confessed, thanks to the caddish attitude of a self-made physician who wants to marry the dead man's sister. The second act ends with the death of the little boy; the third, with the disappearance and probable suicide of his mother. The dead man's sister cries out: "Everything that was his is sacred to us, but the one living being who meant more to him than all of us is driven out of our home." The one ray of light offered is that the sister sees through the man who has been courting her and sends him packing. It is noticeable in this play, as in others written by Schnitzler, that the attitude of the women is more sensible and tolerant than that of the men.

The physician is one of the few members of that profession whom the author has painted in an unfavorable light. There is hardly one full-length play of his in which at least one representative of the medical profession does not appear. And almost invariably they seem destined to act as the particular mouthpieces of the author. In a play like "The Lonely Way," for instance, the life shown is the life lived by men and women observed by Schnitzler. The opinions expressed are the opinions of that sort of men and women under the given circumstances. The author neither approves nor disapproves when he makes each character speak in accordance with his own nature. But like most creative artists, he has felt the need of stating his own view of the surrounding throng. This he seems usually to do through the mouth of men like Dr. Reumann in the play just mentioned, or Dr. Mauer in "The Vast Country." And the attitude of those men shows a strange mingling of disapproval and forbearance, which undoubtedly comes very near being Schnitzler's own.

The little one-act play "The Life Partner" (Die Gefährtin) is significant mainly as a study for bigger canvases developing the same theme: the veil that hides the true life of man and woman alike from the partner. And the play should really be named "The Life Partner That Was Not." Another one-act play, "The Green Cockatoo," is laid at Paris. Its action takes place on the evening of July 14, 1789 — the fall of the Bastille and the birth of the Revolution. It presents a wonderful picture of social life at the time — of the average human being's unconsciousness of the great events taking place right under his nose.

"The Veil of Beatrice," a verse play in five acts, takes us to Bologna in the year 1500, when Cesare Borgia was preparing to invest the city in order to oust its tyrant, Giovanni Bentivoglio (named Lionardo in the play), and add it to the Papal possessions. All the acts take place in one night. The fundamental theme is one dear to Schnitzler — the flaming up of passion under the shadow of impending death. The whole city, with the duke leading, surrenders to this outburst, the spirit of which finds its symbol in a ravishingly beautiful girl, Beatrice Nardi, who seems fated to spread desire and death wherever she appears. With her own death at dawn, the city seems to wake as from a nightmare to face the enemy already at the gates. The play holds much that is beautiful and much that is disappointing. To me its chief importance lies in the fact that it marks a breaking-point between the period when Schnitzler was trying to write "with a purpose," and that later and greater period when he has learned how to treat life sincerely and seriously without other purpose than to present it as it is. That was his starting point in "Anatol," but then he was not yet ready for the realism that must be counted the highest of all: the realism that has no tendency and preaches no lesson, but from which we draw our own lessons as we draw them from life itself in moments of unusual lucidity.

"Hours of Life" (Lebendige Stunden), which has given its name to a volume of four one-act plays, may be described as a mental duel between two sharply opposed temperaments — the practical and the imaginative. An elderly woman, long an invalid, has just died, and a letter to the man who has loved and supported her during her final years reveals the fact that she has taken her own life because she feared that the thought of her was preventing her son, a poet, from working. The duel is between that son and the man who has befriended his mother. The play constitutes a scathing arraignment of the artistic temperament. Bernard Shaw himself has never penned a more bitter one. "Even if you were the world's greatest genius," the old man cries to the young one, "all your scribbling would be worthless in comparison with a single one of those hours of real life that saw your mother seated in that chair, talking to us, or merely listening, perhaps."

The most important of those four one-act plays, however, is "End of the Carnival" (Die letzten Masken). An old journalist, a might-have-been, dying in a hospital, sends for a life-long friend, a successful poet, whom he hates because of his success. All he thinks of is revenge, of getting even, and he means to achieve this end by disclosing to the poet the faithlessness of his wife. Once she had been the mistress of the dying man, and that seems to him his one triumph in life. But when the poet arrives and begins to talk of the commonplaces of daily life, of petty gossip, petty intrigues, and petty jealousies, then the dying man suddenly sees the futility of the whole thing. To him, who has one foot across the final threshold, it means nothing, and he lets his friend depart without having told him anything. There is a curious recurrence of the same basic idea in "Professor Bernhardi," where the central figure acquires a similar sense of our ordinary life's futility by spending two months in jail.

To what extent Schnitzler has studied and been impressed by Nietzsche I don't know, but the thought underlying "The Lady With the Dagger" is distinctly Nietzschean. It implies not only a sense of our having lived before, of having previously stood in the same relationship to the people now surrounding us, but of being compelled to repeat our past experience, even if a sudden flash of illumination out of the buried past should reveal to us its predestined fatal termination. This idea meets us again in the first act of "The Lonely Way." The fourth of those one-act plays, "Literature," is what Schnitzler has named it — a farce — but delightfully clever and satirical.

Those four plays, and the group of three others published under the common title of "Puppets"

(Marionetten), are, next to "Anatol," the best known works of Schnitzler's outside of Austria and Germany. They deserve their wide reputation, too, for there is nothing quite like them in the modern drama. Yet I think they have been over-estimated in comparison with the rest of Schnitzler's production. "The Puppet Player," "The Gallant Cassian" and "The Greatest Show of All" (Zum grossen Wurstel) have charm and brightness and wit. But in regard to actual significance they cannot compare with plays like "The Lonely Way," for instance.

The three plays comprised in the volume named "Puppets" constitute three more exemplifications of the artistic temperament, which again fares badly at the hands of their author. And yet he has more than one telling word to say in defense of that very temperament. That these plays, like "Hours of Life" and "Literature," are expressive of the inner conflict raging for years within the playwright's own soul, I take for granted. And they seem to reflect moments when Schnitzler felt that, in choosing poetry rather than medicine for his life work, he had sacrificed the better choice. And yet they do not show any regrets, but rather a slightly ironical self-pity. A note of irony runs through everything that Schnitzler has written, constituting one of the main attractions of his art, and it is the more acceptable because the point of it so often turns against the writer himself.

"The Puppet Player" is a poet who has ceased writing in order to use human beings for his material. He thinks that he is playing with their destinies as if they were so many puppets. And the little drama shows how his accidental interference has created fates stronger and happier than his own — fates lying wholly outside his power. The play suffers from a tendency to exaggerated subtlety which is one of Schnitzler's principal dangers, though it rarely asserts itself to such an extent that the enjoyment of his work is spoiled by it.

His self-irony reaches its climax in the one-act play which I have been forced to name "The Greatest Show of All" because the original title (Zum grossen Wurstel) becomes meaningless in English. There he proceeds with reckless abandon to ridicule his own work as well as the inflated importance of all imaginative creation. But to even up the score, he includes the public, as representative of ordinary humanity, among the objects of his sarcasms. And in the end all of us — poets, players, and spectators — are exposed as mere puppets. The same thought recurs to some extent in "The Gallant Cassian," which is otherwise a piece of sheer fun — the slightest of Schnitzler's dramatic productions, perhaps, but not without the accustomed Schnitzlerian sting.

When, after reading all the preceding plays, one reaches "The Lonely Way" (Der einsame Weg), it is hard to escape an impression of everything else having been nothing but a preparation. It is beyond all doubt Schnitzler's greatest and most powerful creation so far, representing a tremendous leap forward both in form and spirit. It has less passion than "The Call of Life," less subtlety than "Intermezzo," less tolerance than "Countess Mizzie." Instead it combines in perfect balance all the best qualities of those three plays — each dominant feature reduced a little to give the others scope as well. It is a wonderful specimen of what might be called the new realism — of that realism which is paying more attention to spiritual than to material actualities. Yet it is by no means lacking in the more superficial verisimilitude either. Its character-drawing and its whole atmosphere are startlingly faithful to life, even though the life portrayed may represent a clearly defined and limited phase of universal human existence.

The keynote of the play lies in Sala's words to Julian in the closing scene of the fourth act: "The process of aging must needs be a lonely one to our kind." That's the main theme — not a thesis to be proved. This loneliness to which Sala refers, is common to all people, but it is more particularly the share of those who, like himself and Julian, have treasured their "freedom" above everything else and who, for that reason, have eschewed the human ties which to a man like Wegrath represent life's greatest good and deepest meaning. Again we find the principal characters of the play typifying the artistic temperament, with its unhuman disregards of the relationships that have primary importance to other men. Its gross egoism, as exemplified by Julian, is the object of passionate derision. And yet it is a man of that kind, Sala, who recognizes and points out the truer path, when he say: "To love is to live for somebody else."

The play has no thesis, as I have already said. It is not poised on the point of a single idea. Numerous subordinate themes are woven into the main one, giving the texture of the whole a richness resembling that of life itself. Woman's craving for experience and self-determination is one such theme, which we shall find again in "Intermezzo," where it practically becomes the dominant one.

Another one is that fascinated stare at death which is so characteristic of Latin and Slav writers — of men like Zola, Maupassant, and Tolstoy — while it is significantly absent in the great Scandinavian and Anglo-Saxon poets. "Is there ever a blissful moment in any decent man's life, when he can think of anything but death in his innermost soul?" says Sala. The same thought is expressed in varying forms by one after another of Schnitzler's characters. "All sorrow is a lie as long as the open grave is not your own," cries the dying Catharine in "The Call of Life." It is in this connection particularly that we of the North must bear in mind Schnitzler's Viennese background and the Latin traditions forming such a conspicuous part of it. The Latin peoples have shown that they can die as bravely as the men of any other race or clime, but their attitude toward death in general is widely different from the attitude illustrated by Ibsen or Strindberg, for instance. A certain gloom, having kinship with death, seems ingrained in the Northern temperament, put there probably by the pressure of the Northern winter. The man of the sunlit South, on the other hand, seems always to retain the child's simple horror at the thought that darkness must follow light. We had better not regard it as cowardice under any circumstances, and cowardice it can certainly not be called in the characters of Schnitzler. But the resignation in which he finds his only antidote, and which seems to represent his nearest approach to a formulated philosophy, cannot be expected to satisfy us. One of his own countrymen, Hermann Bahr, has protested sharply against its insufficiency as a soul-sustaining faith, and in that protest I feel inclined to concur.

With "The Lonely Way" begins a series of plays representing not only Schnitzler's highest achievements so far, but a new note in the modern drama. To a greater extent than any other modern plays — not even excepting those of Ibsen — they must be defined as psychological. The dramas of Strindberg come nearest in this respect, but they, too, lag behind in soul-revealing quality. Plots are almost lacking in the Schnitzler productions during his later period. Things happen, to be sure, and these happenings are violent enough at times, but they do not constitute a sharply selected sequence of events leading up to a desired and foreshadowed end. In the further development of this period, even clearly defined themes are lost sight of, and the course of the play takes on an almost accidental aspect. This is puzzling, of course, and it must be especially provoking to those who expect each piece of art to have its narrow little lesson neatly tacked on in a spot where it cannot be missed. It implies a manner that exacts more alertness and greater insight on the part of the reader. But for that very reason these later plays of Schnitzler should prove stimulating to those who do not suffer from mental laziness or exhaustion.

"Intermezzo" (Zwischenspiel) might be interpreted as an attack on those new marital conventions which abolish the old-fashioned demand for mutual faithfulness and substitute mutual frankness. It would be more correct, however, to characterize it as a discussion of what constitutes true honesty in the ever delicate relationship between husband and wife. It shows, too, the growth of a woman's soul, once she has been forced to stand on her own feet. Viewed from this point, the play might very well be classified as feministic. It would be easy, for one thing, to read into it a plea for a single moral standard. But its ultimate bearing goes far beyond such a narrow construction. Here as elsewhere, Schnitzler shows himself more sympathetic toward the female than toward the male outlook on life, and the creator of Cecilia Adams-Ortenburg may well be proclaimed one of the foremost living painters of the woman soul.

The man who, in "Anatol," saw nothing but a rather weak-minded restlessness in woman's inconstancy, recognizes in "Intermezzo" woman's right to as complete a knowledge of life and its possibilities as any man may acquire. The same note is struck by Johanna in "The Lonely Way." "I want a time to come when I must shudder at myself — shudder as deeply as you can only when nothing has been left untried," she says to Sala in the fourth act. This note sounds much more clearly — one might say defiantly — through the last two acts of "Intermezzo." And when Amadeus, shrinking from its implications, cries to Cecilia that thereafter she will be guarded by his tenderness, she retorts impatiently: "But I don't want to be guarded! I shall no longer permit you to guard me!" In strict keeping with it is also that Schnitzler here realizes and accepts woman's capacity for and right to creative expression. It is from Cecilia's lips that the suggestion comes to seek a remedy for life's hurts in a passionate abandonment to work. In fact, the established attitudes of man and woman seem almost reversed in the cases of Amadeus and Cecilia.

Significant as this play is from any point viewed, I am inclined to treasure it most on account of the subtlety and delicacy of its dialogue. I don't think any dramatist of modern times has surpassed Schnitzler in his ability to find expression for the most refined nuances of thought and feeling. To me, at least, it is a constant joy to watch the iridescence of his sentences, which gives to each of them not merely one, but innumerable meanings. And through so much of this particular play runs a spirit that can only be called playful — a spirit which finds its most typical expression in the delightful figure of Albert Rhon, the poet who takes the place of the otherwise inevitable physician. I like to think of that figure as more or less embodying the author's conception of himself. All the wit and sparkle with which we commonly credit the Gallic mind seems to me abundantly present in the scenes between Albert and Amadeus.

The poise and quiet characterizing "The Lonely Way" and "Intermezzo" appear lost to some extent in "The Call of Life" (Der Ruf des Leben), which, on the other hand, is one of the intensest plays written by Schnitzler. The white heat of its passion sears the mind at times, so that the reader feels like raising a shield between himself and the words. "It was as if I heard life itself calling to me outside my door," Marie says in this play when trying to explain to Dr. Schindler why she had killed her father and gone to seek her lover. The play might as well have been named "The Will to Live," provided we remember that mere existence can hardly be called life. Its basic thought has much in common with that of Frank Wedekind's "Earth Spirit," but Schnitzler spiritualizes what the German playwright has vulgarized. There is a lot of modern heresy in that thought — a lot of revived and refined paganism that stands in sharp opposition to the spirit of Christianity as it has been interpreted hitherto. It might be summarized as a twentieth century version of Achilles' declaration that he would rather be a live dog than the ruler of all the shades in Hades. "What a creature can I be," cries Marie, "to emerge out of such an experience as out of a bad dream — awake — and living — and wanting to live?" And the kind, wise, Schnitzlerian doctor's answer is: "You are alive — and the rest has been...." Life itself is its own warrant and explanation. Unimpaired life — life with the power and will to go on living — is the greatest boon and best remedy of any that can be offered.

The weak point of "The Call to Life" is Marie's father, the old Moser — one of the most repulsive figures ever seen on the stage. It may have been made what it is in order that the girl's crime might not hopelessly prejudice the spectator at the start and thus render all the rest of the play futile. We must remember, too, that the monstrous egoism of Moser is not represented as a typical quality of that old age which feels itself robbed by the advance of triumphant youth. What Schnitzler shows is that egoism grows more repulsive as increasing age makes it less warranted. The middle act of the play, with its remarkable conversation between the Colonel and Max, brings us back to "Outside the Game Laws." That earlier play was in its time declared the best existing stage presentation of the spirit engendered by the military life. But it has a close second in "The Call of Life." To anyone having watched the manners of militarism in Europe, the words of the Colonel to Max will sound as an all-sufficient explanation: "No physicians have to spend thirty years at the side of beds containing puppets instead of human patients — no lawyers have to practice on criminals made out of pasteboard — and even the ministers are not infrequently preaching to people who actually believe in heaven and hell."

If "The Lonely Way" be Schnitzler's greatest play all around, and "Intermezzo" his subtlest, "Countess Mizzie" is the sweetest, the best tempered, the one that leaves the most agreeable taste in the mouth. It gives us a concrete embodiment of the tolerance toward all life that is merely suggested by the closing sentences of Dr. Schindler in the last act of "The Call of Life." It brings back the gay spirit of "Anatol," but with a rare maturity supporting it. The simple socio-biological philosophy of "Change Partners!" is restated without the needless naturalism of those early dialogues. The idea of "Countess Mizzie" is that, if we look deep enough, all social distinctions are lost in a universal human kinship. On the surface we appear like flowers neatly arranged in a bed, each kind in its separate and carefully labeled corner. Then Schnitzler begins to scrape off the screening earth, and underneath we find the roots of all those flowers intertwined and matted, so that it is impossible to tell which belong to the Count and which to Wasner, the coachman, which to Miss Lolo, the ballet-dancer, and which to the Countess.

"Young Medardus" is Schnitzler's most ambitious attempt at historical playwriting. It seems to indicate that he belongs too wholly in the present age to succeed in that direction. The play takes us back to 1809, when Napoleon appeared a second time outside the gates of Vienna. The central character, Medardus Klähr, is said to be historical. The re-created atmosphere of old Vienna is at once convincing and amusing. But the play is too sprawling, too scattered, to get firm hold on the reader. There are seventy-four specifically indicated characters, not to mention groups of dumb figures. And while the title page speaks of five acts and a prologue, there are in reality seventeen distinct scenes. Each scene may be dramatically valuable, but the constant passage from place to place, from one set of characters to another, has a confusing effect.

There is, too, a more deep-lying reason for the failure of the play as a whole, I think. The ironical outlook so dear to Schnitzler — or rather, so inseparable from his temperament — has betrayed him. Irony seems hopelessly out of place in a historical drama, where it tends to make us feel that the author does not believe in the actual existence of his own characters. I have a suspicion that "Young Medardus" takes the place within the production of Schnitzler that is held by "Peer Gynt" in the production of Ibsen — that Medardus Klähr is meant to satirize the Viennese character as Peer Gynt satirizes the Norwegian.

The keynote of the play may be found in the words of Etzelt, spoken as Medardus is about to be shot, after having refused to save his own life by a promise not to make any attempts against Napoleon's: "God wanted to make a hero of him, and the course of events turned him into a fool." The obvious interpretation is that the pettiness of Viennese conditions defeated the larger aspirations of the man, who would have proved true to his own possibilities in other surroundings. A more careful analysis of the plot shows, however, that what turns the ambitions of Medardus into dreams and words is his susceptibility to the charms of a woman. Once within the magic circle of her power, everything else — the danger of his country, the death of his sister, his duty to avenge the death of his father — becomes secondary to his passion. And each time he tries to rise above that passion, the reappearance of the woman is sufficient to deflect him from his purpose. It is as if Schnitzler wanted to suggest that the greatest weakness of the Viennese character lies in its sensuous concern with sex to the detriment of all other vital interests. To me it is a very remarkable thing to think that such a play was performed a large number of times at one of the foremost theaters in Vienna, and that, apparently, it received a very respectful hearing. I cannot but wonder what would happen here, if a play were put on the stage dealing in a similar spirit with the American character.

"The soul is a vast country, where many different things find place side by side," says Dr. Theodor Reik in his interesting volume named "Arthur Schnitzler als Psycholog" (Minden, 1913). Thus he explains the meaning of the title given to "The Vast Country" (Das Weite Land). And I don't think it is possible to get closer than that. Nowhere has Schnitzler been more casual in his use of what is commonly called plot. Nowhere has he scorned more completely to build his work around any particular "red thread." Event follows event with seeming haphazardness. The only thing that keeps the play from falling apart is the logical development of each character. It is, in fact, principally, if not exclusively, a series of soul-studies. What happens serves merely as an excuse to reveal the reaction of a certain character to certain external pressures or internal promptings. But viewed in this light, the play has tremendous power and significance.

Dr. Reik's book, to which I just referred, has been written to prove the direct connection between Schnitzler's art and the new psychology established by Dr. Sigmund Freud of Vienna. That the playwright must have studied the Freudian theories seems more than probable. That they may have influenced him seems also probable. And that this influence may have helped him to a clearer grasp of more than one mystery within the human soul, I am willing to grant also. What I want to protest against, is the attempt to make him out an exponent of any particular scientific theory. He is an observer of all life. He is what Amadeus in "Intermezzo" ironically charges Albert Rhon with being: "a student of the human soul." And he has undoubtedly availed himself of every new aid that might be offered for the analysis and interpretation of that soul. The importance of man's sub-conscious life seems to have been clear to him in the early days of "Anatol," and it seems to have grown on him as he matured. Another Freudian conception he has also made his own — that of the close connection between man's sexual life and vital phenomena not clearly designed for the expression of that life. But — to return to the point I have already tried to make — it would be dangerous and unjust to read any work of his as the dramatic effort of a scientific theorizer.

Schnitzler is of Jewish race. In Vienna that means a great deal more than in London, Stockholm or New York. It means an atmosphere of contempt, of suspicion, of hatred. It means frequently complete isolation, and always some isolation. It means a constant sense of conflict between oneself and one's surroundings. All these things are reflected in the works of Schnitzler — more particularly the sense of conflict and of isolation. Life itself is blamed for it most of the time, however, and it is only once in a great while that the specific and localized cause is referred to — as in "Literature," for instance. And even when Schnitzler undertakes, as he has done in his latest play, "Professor Bernhardi," to deal directly with the situation of the Jew within a community with strong anti-Semitic tendencies, he does not appear able to keep his mind fixed on that particular issue. He starts to discuss it, and does so with a clearness and fairness that have not been equaled since the days of Lessing — and then he drifts off in a new direction. The mutual opposition between Jews and Catholics becomes an opposition between the skeptical and the mystical temperaments. It is as if he wanted to say that all differences are unreal except those between individuals as such. And if that be his intention, he is right, I believe, and his play is the greater for bringing that thought home to us.

The play is a remarkable one in many respects. It deals largely with the internal affairs of a hospital. An overwhelming majority of the characters are physicians connected with the big hospital of which Professor Bernhardi is the head. They talk of nothing but what men of that profession in such a position would be likely to talk of. In other words, they are all the time "talking shop." This goes on through five acts. Throughout the entire play there is not the slightest suggestion of what the Broadway manager and the periodical editor call a “love interest.” And yet the play holds you from beginning to end, and the dramatic tension could not be greater if its main theme were the unrequited love of the professor’s son instead of his own right to place his duties as a physician above all other considerations. To one who has grown soul-weary of the “triangle” and all other combinations for the exploiting of illicit or legitimized love, “Professor Bernhardi” should come as a great relief and a bright promise.

These are the main outlines of Schnitzler’s work as a dramatist. They indicate a constant, steady growth, coupled with increased realization of his own possibilities and powers as well as of his limitations. In all but a very few of his plays, he has confined himself to the life immediately surrounding him — to the life of the Viennese middle class, and more particularly of the professional element to which he himself belongs. But on the basis of a wonderfully faithful portrayal of local characters and conditions, he has managed to rear a superstructure of emotional appeal and intellectual clarification that must render his work welcome to thinking men and women wherever it be introduced. And as he is still in the flower of his manhood, it seems reasonable to expect that still greater things may be forthcoming from his pen.

SCHNITZLER’S “ANATOL”

Spearhead fences, yew-tree hedges,
Coats of arms no more regilded,
Sphinxes gleaming through the thickets....
Creakingly the gates swing open.
With its tritons sunk in slumber,
And its fountains also sleeping,
Mildewed, lovely, and rococo,
Lo... Vienna, Canaletto’s,
Dated Seventeen and Sixty.
Quiet pools of green-brown waters,
Smooth and framed in snow-white marble,
Show between their mirrored statues
Gold and silver fishes playing.
Slender stems of oleander
Cast their prim array of shadows
On the primly close-cropped greensward.
Overhead, the arching branches
Meet and twine to sheltering niches,
Where are grouped in loving couples
Stiff-limbed heroines and heroes....
Dolphins three pour splashing streamlets
In three shell-shaped marble basins.
Chestnut blossoms, richly fragrant,
Fall like flames and flutter downward
To be drowned within the basins....
Music, made by clarinettes and
Violins behind the yew-trees,
Seems to come from graceful cupids
Playing on the balustrade, or

Weaving flowers into garlands,
While beside them other flowers
Gayly stream from marble vases:
Jasmin, marigold, and elder....
On the balustrade sit also
Sweet coquettes among the cupids,
And some messeigneurs in purple.
At their feet, on pillows resting,
Or reclining on the greensward,
May be seen abbés and gallants.
From perfumed sedans are lifted
Other ladies by their lovers....
Rays of light sift through the leafage,
Shed on golden curls their luster,
Break in flames on gaudy cushions,
Gleam alike on grass and gravel,
Sparkle on the simple structure
We have raised to serve the moment.
Vines and creepers clamber upward,
Covering the slender woodwork,
While between them are suspended
Gorgeous tapestries and curtains:
Scenes Arcadian boldly woven,
Charmingly designed by Watteau....
In the place of stage, an arbor;
Summer sun in place of footlights;
Thus we rear Thalia's temple
Where we play our private dramas,
Gentle, saddening, precocious....
Comedies that we have suffered;
Feelings drawn from past and present;
Evil masked in pretty phrases;
Soothing words and luring pictures;
Subtle stirrings, mere nuances,
Agonies, adventures, crises....
Some are listening, some are yawning,
Some are dreaming, some are laughing,
Some are sipping ices... others
Whisper longings soft and languid....
Nodding in the breeze, carnations,
Long-stemmed white carnations, image
Butterflies that swarm in sunlight,
While a black and long-haired spaniel
Barks astonished at a peacock....
Hugo von Hofmannsthal,
(Edwin Björkman.)

PERSONS

Professor Wegrat, President of the Academy of Plastic Arts
Gabrielle, His wife
Their children: Felix and Johanna
Johanna
Julian Fichtner
Stephan von Sala
Irene Herms
Dr. Franz Reumann, A physician
Fichtner's Valet
Sala's Valet
A Maid at the Wegrats'

THE FIRST ACT

The little garden attached to Professor Wegrat's house. It is almost surrounded by buildings, so that no outlook of any kind is to be had. At the right in the garden stands the small two-storied house with its woodwork veranda, to which lead three wooden steps. Entries are made from the veranda as well as from either side of the house. Near the middle of the stage is a green garden table with chairs to match, and also a more comfortable armchair. A small iron bench is placed against a tree at the left.
Johanna is walking back and forth in the garden when Felix enters, wearing the uniform of a uhlan.

JOHANNA (turning about)
Felix!

FELIX
Yes, it's me.

JOHANNA
How are you? — And how have you been able to get another furlough?

FELIX
Oh, it won't last long. — And how's mamma?

JOHANNA
Doing pretty well the last few days.

FELIX
Do you think she would be scared if I dropped in on her unexpectedly?

JOHANNA
No. But wait a little just the same. She's asleep now. I have just come from her room. — How long are you going to stay, Felix?

FELIX
To-morrow night I'm off again.

JOHANNA (staring into a fancied distance)
Off....

FELIX
Oh, it sounds big! But one doesn't get so very far off — not in any respect.

JOHANNA
And you have wanted it so badly.... (Pointing to his uniform) Now you've got it. And are you not satisfied?

FELIX
Well, at any rate it is the most sensible thing I have gone into so far. For now I feel at least that I might achieve something under certain circumstances.

JOHANNA
I believe you would make good in any profession.

FELIX
I have my doubts whether I could get anywhere as a lawyer or an engineer. And on the whole I feel a good deal better than ever before. Often it seems to me as if I hadn't been born at the right time. I think I should have come into the world while there was still so much of order left in it, that one could venture all sorts of things one couldn't possibly venture nowadays.

JOHANNA
Oh, but you are free — you've got place to move.

FELIX
Only within certain limits.

JOHANNA
They are a great deal wider than these at any rate.

FELIX (looking around with a smile)
Well, this is not a prison.... Really, the garden has turned out quite pretty. How bare it looked when we were children. — What's that? A row of peach trees? That doesn't look bad at all.

JOHANNA
One of Dr. Reumann's ideas.

FELIX
Yes, I should have guessed it.

JOHANNA
Why?

FELIX
Because I can't believe any member of our family capable of such a useful inspiration. What are his chances anyhow? — I mean in regard to that professorship at Gratz?

JOHANNA
I don't know anything about it. (She turns away)

FELIX
I suppose mamma is outdoors a good deal these fine days?

JOHANNA
Yes.

FELIX

Are you still reading to her? Do you try to divert her a little? To cheer her up?

JOHANNA
Just as if it were such an easy thing!

FELIX
But you have to put some spunk into it, Johanna.

JOHANNA
Yes, Felix, it's easy for you to talk.

FELIX
What do you mean?

JOHANNA (speaking as if to herself)

I don't know if you'll be able to understand me.

FELIX (smiling)
Why should it all at once be so hard for me to understand you?

JOHANNA (looking calmly at him)
Now when she is sick, I don't love her as much as before.

FELIX (startled)
What?

JOHANNA
No, it's impossible that you could quite understand. All the time she is getting farther away from us.... It is as if every day a new set of veils dropped down about her.

FELIX
And what is the meaning of it?

JOHANNA (continues to look at him in the same calm way)

FELIX
You think...?

JOHANNA
You know, Felix, that I never make any mistakes in things of that kind.

FELIX
I know, you say...?

JOHANNA
When poor little Lillie von Sala had to die, I was aware of it in advance — before the rest of you knew that she was sick even.

FELIX
Yes, you had had a dream — and you were nothing but a child.

JOHANNA
I didn't dream it. I knew it. (Brusquely) It's something I can't explain.

FELIX (after a pause)
And papa — has he resigned himself to it?

JOHANNA
Resigned himself? — Do you think he too can see those veils coming down?

FELIX (having first shaken his head slightly)
Nothing but imagination, Johanna — I am sure. — But now I want to.... (Turning toward the house) Papa hasn't come home yet?

JOHANNA
No. As a rule he's very late these days. He has an awful lot to do in the Academy.

FELIX
I'll try not to wake her up — I'll be careful. (He goes out by way of the veranda)
[While alone for a while, Johanna seats herself on the garden bench with her hands clasped across her knees. Sala enters. He is forty-five, but looks younger. Slender to the verge of leanness, and smooth-shaven. His brown hair, which has begun to turn gray at the temples, and which he wears rather long, is parted on the right side. His features are keen and energetic; his eyes, gray and clear.

SALA
Good evening, Miss Johanna.

JOHANNA
Good evening, Mr. von Sala.

SALA
They told me your mother was having a little nap, and so I permitted myself to come out here in the meantime.

JOHANNA
Felix just got here.

SALA
Well? Have they already granted him another furlough? In my days they were stricter in that regiment. However, we were then stationed near the border — somewhere in Galicia.

JOHANNA
I can never keep in mind that you have gone through that kind of thing too.

SALA

Yes, it's long ago now. And it didn't last more than a couple of years. But it was good fun as I look back at it now.

JOHANNA
Like almost everything else you have experienced.

SALA
Like much of it.

JOHANNA
Won't you sit down?

SALA
Thank you. (He seats himself on the support of the armchair) Am I permitted? (Johanna having nodded assent, he takes a cigarette from his case and lights it)

JOHANNA
Are you already settled in your new place, Mr. von Sala?

SALA
I move in to-morrow.

JOHANNA
And it gives you a great deal of pleasure, doesn't it?

SALA
That would be a little premature.

JOHANNA
Are you superstitious?

SALA
Well, for that matter — yes. — But that was not what I had in mind. I only take possession temporarily, not for good.

JOHANNA
Why not?

SALA
I'm going abroad — for a prolonged stay.

JOHANNA
Oh? You are to be envied. I wish I could do the same — go here and there in the world, and not bother myself about a single human being.

SALA
Still at it?

JOHANNA
Still at it.... What do you mean?

SALA
Oh, I recall how the same kind of schemes for traveling used to occupy your mind when you were nothing but a little girl. What was it you wanted to become? — A ballet dancer, I think. Wasn't that it? A very famous one, of course.

JOHANNA
Why do you say that as if it were nothing at all to be a ballet dancer? (Without looking at him) You, in particular, Mr. von Sala, should not be talking like that.

SALA
Why not I, in particular?

JOHANNA (glances up calmly at him)

SALA
I don't quite make out what you mean, Miss Johanna.... Unless I must.... (Simply) Johanna, did you know at the time that I was looking at you?

JOHANNA
When?

SALA
Last year, when you were in the country, and I came out once and stayed over night in your attic. It was bright moonlight, and I thought I could see a fairy gliding back and forth in the meadow.

JOHANNA (nods with a smile)

SALA
And it was for me?

JOHANNA
Oh, I saw you very well, where you stood behind the curtain.

SALA (after a brief pause)

I suppose you will never dance like that for other people?

JOHANNA
Why not? — I have already. And then, too, you were looking on. Of course, it was a good while ago. — It happened on one of the Greek islands. A large number of men stood in a circle around me... you were one of them... and I was a slave girl from Lydia.

SALA
A princess in captivity.

JOHANNA (earnestly)
Don't you believe in such things?

SALA
If you want me to — certainly.

JOHANNA (still very serious)
You should believe everything in which the rest cannot believe.

SALA
When the time comes for it, I suppose I shall.

JOHANNA
You see — I can rather believe anything than that I should now be in the world for the first time. And there are moments when I recall quite clearly all sorts of things.

SALA
And at that time you had such a moment?

JOHANNA
Yes, a year ago, when I was dancing for you in the meadow that moonlit summer night. I am sure it was not the first time, Mr. von Sala. (After a short pause, with a sudden change of tone) Where are you going anyhow?

SALA (falling into the same tone)
To Bactria, Miss Johanna.

JOHANNA
Where?

SALA
To Bactria. That's quite a remarkable country, and what's most remarkable about it is that it doesn't exist any longer. What it means is that I am joining an expedition which will start next November. You have read of it in the papers, haven't you?

JOHANNA
No.

SALA
The proposition is to make excavations where it is supposed the ancient Ecbatana stood once — some six thousand years ago. That goes even farther back than your Lydian period, you see.

JOHANNA
When did you get hold of this idea?

SALA
Only a few days ago. Conversationally, so to speak. Count Ronsky, who is at the head of the matter, inspired me with a great desire to go. That wasn't very hard, however. He stirred an old longing within me. (With more spirit) Think of it, Miss Johanna: to be watching with your own eyes the gradual rising of such a buried city out of the ground — house by house, stone by stone, century by century. No, it wasn't meant that I should pass away until I had had this wish of mine fulfilled.

JOHANNA
Why talk of dying then?

SALA
Is there ever a blissful moment in any decent man's life when he can think of anything else in his innermost soul?

JOHANNA
I don't suppose a single wish of yours was ever left unfulfilled.

SALA
Not a single one...?

JOHANNA
I know that you have also had many sad experiences. But frequently I believe you have longed for those too.

SALA
Longed for them...? You may be right, perhaps, in saying that I enjoyed them when they came.

JOHANNA
How perfectly I understand that! A life without sorrow would probably be as bare as a life without happiness. (Pause) How long ago is it now?

SALA
What are you thinking of?

JOHANNA
That Mrs. von Sala died?

SALA
It's seven years ago, almost to a day.

JOHANNA
And Lillie — the same year?

SALA
Yes, Lillie died a month later. Do you often think of Lillie, Miss Johanna?

JOHANNA
Quite often, Mr. von Sala. I have never had a girl friend since that time. (As if to herself) She too would have to be called "miss" now. She was very pretty. She had black hair with a bluish glint in it like your wife, and the same clear eyes that you have, Mr. von Sala. (As if to herself) "Then both of them walked hand in hand along the gloomy road that leads through sunlit land....”

SALA
What a memory you have, Johanna.

JOHANNA
Seven years ago that was.... Remarkable!

SALA
Why remarkable?

JOHANNA
You are building a house, and digging out submerged cities, and writing queer poetry — and human beings who once meant so much to you have been rotting in their graves these seven years — and you are still almost young. How incomprehensible the whole thing is!

SALA
“Thou that livest on, cease thou thy weeping,” says Omar Nameh, who was born at Bagdad in the year 412 of the Mohammedan era as the son of a cobbler. For that matter, I know a man who is only thirty-eight. He has buried two wives and seven children, not to speak of grandchildren. And now he is playing the piano in a shabby little Prater restaurant, while artists of both sexes show off their tights and their fluttering skirts on the platform. And recently, when the pitiful performance had come to an end and they were turning out the lights, he went right on, without apparent reason, and quite heedless of everything, playing away on that frightful old rattle-box of his. And then Ronsky and I asked him over to our table and had a chat with him. And then he told us that the piece he had just played was his own composition. Of course, we complimented him. And then his eyes lit up, and he asked us in a voice that shook: “Gentlemen, do you think my piece will make a hit?” He is thirty-eight years old, and his career has come to an end in a small restaurant where his public consists of nurse-girls and non-commissioned officers, and his one longing is — to get their applause!

REUMANN (enters)
Good evening, Miss Johanna. Good evening, Mr. von Sala. (Shakes hands with both of them at the same time) How are you?

SALA
Fine. You don’t suppose one must be your victim all the time because one has had the honor of consulting you once?

REUMANN
Oh, I had forgotten all about it. However, there are people who feel just that way. — I suppose your mother is having a little rest, Miss Johanna?

JOHANNA (who apparently has been startled by the few words exchanged between the physician and Sala, and who is looking intently at the latter) She is probably awake by this time. Felix is with her.

REUMANN
Felix...? You haven’t telegraphed for him, have you?

JOHANNA
Not that I know of. Who could have...?

REUMANN
I only wondered. Your father is inclined to get frightened.

JOHANNA
There they are now.

MRS. WEGRAT (enters from the veranda with Felix)
How are you, my dear Doctor? What do you think of the surprise I have just had?
[All the men shake hands.

MRS. WEGRAT
Good evening, Mr. von Sala.

SALA
I am delighted to see you looking so well, Mrs. Wegrat.

MRS. WEGRAT
Yes, I am doing a little better. If only the gloomy season were not so close at hand.

SALA
But now the finest time of the year is coming. When the woods sparkle with red and yellow, and a golden mist lies on the hills, and the sky grows pale and remote as if it were scared by its own infinity...!

MRS. WEGRAT
Yes, that ought to be worth seeing once more.

REUMANN (reproachfully)
Mrs. Wegrat....

MRS. WEGRAT
Pardon me — but thoughts of that kind will come. (Brightening up a little) If I only knew how much longer I might count on my dear doctor?

REUMANN
I can reassure you on that score, madam: I shall stay in Vienna.

MRS. WEGRAT
What? Has the matter been settled already?

REUMANN
Yes.

MRS. WEGRAT
So another man has actually been called to Gratz?

REUMANN
No, not that way. But the other man, who was practically sure of the place, has broken his neck climbing a mountain.

FELIX
But then your chances should be better than ever. Whom could they possibly consider besides you?

REUMANN
I suppose my chances wouldn't be bad. But I have preferred to forgo them.

MRS. WEGRAT
How?

REUMANN
I won't accept the call.

MRS. WEGRAT
Is that out of superstition?

FELIX
Or out of pride?

REUMANN
Neither. But the thought of having another man's misfortune to thank for my own advancement would be extremely painful to me. Half my life would be spoiled for me. That is neither superstition nor pride, you see, but just commonplace, small-minded vanity.

SALA
You're a subtle one, Doctor.

MRS. WEGRAT
Well, all I gather is that you are going to stay. Which shows how mean your thoughts grow when you are sick.

REUMANN (changing the subject on purpose)
Well, Felix, how do you find life in a garrison?

FELIX
Fine.

MRS. WEGRAT
So you are really satisfied, boy?

FELIX
I feel very thankful to all of you. Especially to you, mamma.

MRS. WEGRAT

Why to me especially? After all, the decision lay with your father in the last instance.

REUMANN
He would, of course, have preferred to see you choose a more peaceful calling.

SALA
Oh, but to-day there is none more peaceful.

FELIX
That's where you are right, Mr. von Sala. — By the by, I was to give you the regards of Lieutenant-Colonel Schrotting.

SALA
Thank you. Does he still remember me?

FELIX
Not he alone. We are constantly being reminded of you — at every meal, in fact. Yours is among the pictures of former officers that hang in the mess rooms.

WEGRAT (enters)
Good evening. — Why, Felix, are you here again? What a surprise!

FELIX
Good evening, papa. I have applied for a two-day furlough.

WEGRAT
Furlough... furlough? A real one? Or is it another one of those little brilliant tricks?

FELIX (cheerfully and without taking offence)

I am not in the habit of fibbing, papa, am I?

WEGRAT (in the same tone)

I meant no offense, my boy. Even if you had been guilty of deserting the flag, your longing to see your mother would be sufficient excuse for you.

MRS. WEGRAT
To see his parents, you mean.

WEGRAT
Of course — to see us all. But as you are a little under the weather, you come foremost just now. — Well, how are you getting along, Gabrielle? Better, are you not? (In a low voice, almost timidly) My love.... (He strokes her brow and hair) Love.... The air is so mild.

SALA
We are having a wonderful Autumn.

REUMANN
Have you just got away from the Academy, Professor?

WEGRAT
Yes. Now, when I am also the president of it, there is a whole lot to do — and all of it is not pleasant or grateful. But I seem to be made for it, as they have insisted. And I suppose it will have to go on this way. (With a smile) As somebody once called me — an art-official.

SALA
Don't be so unjust to yourself, Professor.

MRS. WEGRAT
You must have been walking all that long way home again?

WEGRAT
I even went out of my way some distance — to pass across the old Turkish fort. I am awfully fond of that road. On evenings like this the whole city lies beneath you as if bathed in a silvery mist. — By the by, Gabrielle, I have some greetings to deliver. I met Irene Herms.

MRS. WEGRAT
Is she in Vienna?

WEGRAT
Just passing through. She intends to call on you.

SALA
Has she still got an engagement at Hamburg?

WEGRAT
No, she has left the stage, she told me, and is now living in the country with her married sister.

JOHANNA
I saw her once in a play of yours, Mr. von Sala.

SALA
Then you must have been a very small girl indeed.

JOHANNA
She played a Spanish princess.

SALA
Unfortunately. For princesses were not at all in her line. She has never in her life been able to treat verse properly.

REUMANN
And you can still bear that in mind, Mr. von Sala — that some lady on some occasion happened to handle your verse badly?

SALA
Well, why shouldn't I, my dear Doctor? If you were living at the center of the earth, you would know that all things are of equal weight. And were you floating in the center of the universe, you would suspect that all things are of equal importance.

MRS. WEGRAT
How does she look anyhow?

WEGRAT
She is still very pretty.

SALA
Has she preserved her resemblance to that portrait of hers which is hanging in the Museum?

FELIX
What portrait is that?

JOHANNA
Is her portrait really in the Museum?

SALA
Oh, you know it. In the catalogue it is labeled "Actress" — just "Actress." A young woman in the costume of a harlequin, over which she has draped a Greek toga, while at her feet lie a confused heap of masks. With her staring glance turned toward the spectators, she stands there all alone on an empty, dusky stage, surrounded by odd pieces of misfit scenery — one wall of a room, a forest piece, part of an old dungeon....

FELIX
And the background shows a southern landscape with palms and plane trees...?

SALA
Yes, and it is partly raised so that still farther off you can see a pile of furniture, steps, goblets, chandeliers — all glittering in full daylight.

FELIX
But that's Julian Fichtner's picture?

SALA
Exactly.

FELIX
I had not the slightest idea that the figure of that woman was meant for Irene Herms.

WEGRAT
Twenty-five years have passed since he painted that picture. It caused a tremendous sensation at the time. It was his first big success. And to-day I suppose there are lots of people who no longer remember his name. — Come to think of it, I asked Irene Herms about him. But strange to say, not even his "perennial best girl" could tell where in this world he happens to be straying.

FELIX
I talked with him only a few days ago.

WEGRAT
What? You have seen Julian Fichtner? He was in Salzburg? — When?

FELIX
Only about three or four days ago. He looked me up, and we spent the evening together.
[Mrs. Wegrat throws a quick glance at Dr. Reumann.

WEGRAT
How is he doing? What did he tell you?

FELIX
He has turned rather gray, but otherwise he didn't seem to have changed at all.

WEGRAT
How long can it be now since he left Vienna? Two years, isn't it?

MRS. WEGRAT
A little more.

FELIX
He has traveled far and wide.

SALA
Yes, now and then I have had a postcard from him.

WEGRAT
So have we. But I thought you and he were corresponding regularly.

SALA
Regularly? Oh, no.

JOHANNA
Isn't he a friend of yours?

SALA
As a rule I have no friends. And if I have any, I repudiate them.

JOHANNA
But you used to be quite intimate with him.

SALA
He with me rather than I with him.

FELIX
What do you mean by that, Mr. von Sala?

JOHANNA
Oh, I can understand it. I suppose you have had the same experience with most people.

SALA
Something very much like it, at least.

JOHANNA
Yes, one can see it from what you write, too.

SALA
I hope so. Otherwise it might just as well have been written by somebody else.

WEGRAT
Did he say when he would be back in Vienna?

FELIX
Soon, I think. But he didn't say very definitely.

JOHANNA
I should like to see Mr. Fichtner again. I am fond of that kind of people.

WEGRAT
What do you mean by "that kind of people"?

JOHANNA
Who are always arriving from some far-off place.

WEGRAT
But as a rule he never arrived from far-off places when you knew him, Johanna.... He was living right here.

JOHANNA
What did it matter whether he was living here or elsewhere? — Even when he came to see us daily, it was always as if he had just arrived from some great distance.

WEGRAT
Oh, of course....

FELIX
I had often the same feeling.

WEGRAT
Well, it's strange how he has been knocking about in the world — these last few years at least.

SALA
Don't you think his restlessness goes farther back? Were you not students together in the Academy?

WEGRAT
Yes. And to know him properly, you must have known him then. There was something fascinating about him as a young man, something that dazzled. Never have I known anybody whom the term “of great promise” fitted so completely.

SALA
Well, he has kept a whole lot of it.

WEGRAT
But think of all he might have achieved!

REUMANN
I believe that what you might achieve you do achieve.

WEGRAT
Not always. Julian was undoubtedly destined for higher things. What he lacked was the capacity for concentration, the inward calm. He could never feel at home for good anywhere. And the misfortune has been that in his own works, too, he has lived only as a transient, so to speak.

FELIX
He showed me a couple of sketches he had made recently.

WEGRAT
Good?

FELIX
To me there was something gripping about them.

MRS. WEGRAT
Why gripping? What kind of pictures were they?

FELIX
Landscapes. And as a rule very pleasant ones at that.

JOHANNA
Once in a dream I saw a Spring landscape, very sunlit and soft, and yet it made me weep.

SALA
Yes, the sadness of certain things lies much deeper than we commonly suspect.

WEGRAT
So he’s working again? Then, perhaps, we may expect something out of the ordinary.

SALA
In the case of anybody who has been an artist once you are never safe against surprises.

WEGRAT
That’s it, Mr. von Sala. That’s where the great difference lies. In the case of an official you can feel perfectly safe on that score. (With cheerful self-contempt) Such a one paints every year his nice little picture for the exhibition, and couldn't possibly do anything else.

REUMANN
It is still open to question who do most for the advancement of life and art: officials like you, Professor, or — our so-called men of genius.

WEGRAT
Oh, I have not the least intention to play the modest one. But as to men of genius — we had better not talk of them at all. There you are dealing with a world by itself, lying outside of all discussion — as do the elements.

REUMANN
My opinion, I must confess, is utterly different.

WEGRAT
Oh, it's of no use discussing anybody but those who have distinct limitations. And what I have found is — that he who knows his own limitations best is the better man. And on this point I have pretty good reason for self-respect. — Do you feel chilly, Gabrielle?

MRS. WEGRAT
No.

WEGRAT
But you had better pull the shawl a little closer about you, and then we should have a little exercise — in so far as it's possible in here.

MRS. WEGRAT
All right. — Please, Doctor, give me your arm. You haven't paid the least attention to your patient yet.

REUMANN
At your service!
[The rest start ahead, Johanna walking with her brother, and Wegrat with Sala. Dr. Reumann and Mrs. Wegrat seem about to follow, when she suddenly stops.

MRS. WEGRAT
Did you notice his eyes light up — I mean, the eyes of Felix, when they were talking of him? It was most peculiar.

REUMANN
Men of Mr. Fichtner's type appear undoubtedly very interesting to young people. They seem to carry with them an odor of romance.

MRS. WEGRAT (shaking her head)
And he looked him up.... It is perfectly clear that he went to Salzburg just to see him again. I suppose he is beginning to feel a little deserted.

REUMANN
Why not pay a visit to a young friend when one happens to be near the place where he is living? I can see nothing peculiar in that.

MRS. WEGRAT
Perhaps you are right. Perhaps I might have looked at the matter in the same way not long ago. But now, in the face of.... No, Doctor, I am not going to be sentimental.

REUMANN
I don't object to sentiment, but to nonsense.

MRS. WEGRAT (smiling)
Thank you. — However, I have occasion to think of many different things. And it is no reason for taking it too seriously, my dear friend. You know, of course, that I told you everything merely that I might have a kind and sensible man with whom to discuss the past — and not at all to be absolved of any guilt.

REUMANN
To give happiness is more than being free of guilt. And as this has been granted you, it is clear that you have made full atonement — if you'll pardon the use of such a preposterously extravagant term.

MRS. WEGRAT
How can you talk like that?

REUMANN
Well, am I not right?

MRS. WEGRAT
Just as if I couldn't feel how all of us, deceivers and deceived, must seem equally contemptible to you in particular!

REUMANN
Why to me in particular...? What you call contempt, madam — supposing I did feel anything like it — would, after all, be nothing but disguised envy. Or do you think I lack the desire to conduct my life as I see most other people conducting theirs? I simply haven't the knack. If I am to be frank, madam — the deepest yearning of all within me is just to be a rogue: a fellow who can dissemble, seduce, sneer, make his way over dead bodies. But thanks to a certain shortcoming in my temperament, I am condemned to remain a decent man — and what is still more painful perhaps: to hear everybody say that I am one.

MRS. WEGRAT (who has been listening with a smile)

I wonder whether you have told the truth about what is keeping you here in Vienna?

REUMANN
Certainly. Indeed, I have no other reason. I have no right to have any other. Don't let us talk any more of it.

MRS. WEGRAT
Are we not such good friends that I can talk calmly with you of everything? I know what you have in mind. But I believe that it might be in your power to drive certain illusions and dreams out of the soul of a young girl. And it would be such a comfort to me if I could leave you for good among these people, all of whom are so near to me, and who yet know nothing whatever about each other — who are hardly aware of their mutual relationships even, and who seem fated to flitter away from each other to God knows where.

REUMANN
We'll talk of those things, madam, when it's time to do so.

MRS. WEGRAT
Of course, I regret nothing. I believe I have never regretted anything. But I have a feeling that something is out of order. Perhaps it's nothing but that strange glimmer in the eyes of Felix which has caused all this unrest within me. But isn't it peculiar — uncanny almost — to think that a man like him may go through the world with all his senses open and yet never know whom he has to thank for being in the world?

REUMANN
Don't let us indulge in generalities, Mrs. Wegrat. In that way you can set the most solid things shaking and swaying until the steadiest eyes begin to grow dizzy. My own conclusion is this: that a lie which has proved strong enough to sustain the peace of a household can be no less respectable than a truth which could do nothing but destroy the image of the past, fill the present with sorrow, and confuse the vision of the future. (He goes out with Mrs. Wegrat)

JOHANNA (entering with Sala)
In this way one always gets back to the same spot. I suppose your garden is bigger, Mr. von Sala?

SALA
My garden is the whole wide woods — that is, for people whose fancy is not restrained by a light fence.

JOHANNA
Your villa has grown very pretty.

SALA
Oh, you know it then?

JOHANNA
A little while ago I saw it again for the first time in three years.

SALA
But three years ago they hadn't put in the foundations yet.

JOHANNA
To me it was already standing there.

SALA
How mysterious....

JOHANNA
Not at all. If you will only remember. Once we made an excursion to Dornbach — my parents, and Felix, and I. There we met you and Mr. Fichtner, and it happened on the very spot where your house was to be built. And now everything looks just as you described it to us then.

SALA
But how did you happen to be in that vicinity?

JOHANNA
Since mamma was taken sick I have often had to take my walks alone....

SALA
And when was it you passed by my house?

JOHANNA
Not long ago — to-day.

SALA
To-day?

JOHANNA
Yes. I went all around it.

SALA
Oh? All around it? — Did you also notice the little gate that leads directly into the woods?

JOHANNA
Yes. — But from that spot the house is almost invisible. The leafage is very thick. — Where have you placed those busts of the Roman emperors?

SALA
They stand on columns at the opening of an avenue of trees. Right by is a small marble bench, and in front of the bench a little pool has been made.

JOHANNA (nodding)
Just as you told us that time.... And there is a greenish gray glitter on the water — and in the morning the shadow from the beech tree falls across it.... I know. (She looks up at him and smiles; both go out together)

CURTAIN

THE SECOND ACT

IN THE HOME of Julian Fichtner. A pleasant, rather distinguished room in a state of slight disorder. Books are piled on two chairs, while on another chair stands an open traveling bag. Julian is seated at a writing desk, from the drawers of which he is taking out papers. Some of these he destroys, while others are thrown into the waste-paper basket.

VALET (announcing)
Mr. von Sala. (He goes out)

SALA (enters. His custom to walk up and down while talking asserts itself strikingly during the following scene. Now and then he sits down for a moment, often only on the arm of a chair. At times he stops beside Julian, putting his hand on the latter's shoulder while speaking. Two or three times during the scene he puts his hand to the left side of his chest, in a manner suggesting discomfort of some kind. But this gesture is not sharply accentuated)

JULIAN
I am delighted. (They shake hands)

SALA
So you got back early this morning?

JULIAN
Yes.

SALA
And mean to stay...?

JULIAN
Haven't decided yet. Things are a little upset, as you see. And I fear they'll never be quite in shape again. I intend to give up this place.

SALA
Too bad. I have become so accustomed to it. In what direction are you going to move?

JULIAN
It's possible that I don't take any new quarters at all for a while, but just keep on moving about as I have been doing the last few years. I am even considering to have my things sold at auction.

SALA
That's a thought which gets no sympathy from me.

JULIAN
Really, I haven't got much sympathy for it myself. But the material side of the question has to be considered a little, too. I have been spending too much these last years, and it has to be evened up somehow. Probably I'll settle down again later on. Sometime one must get back to peace and work, I suppose. — Well, how goes it with you? What are our friends and acquaintances doing?

SALA
So you haven't seen anybody yet?

JULIAN
Not one. And you are the only one I have written about my being here.

SALA
And you have not yet called on the Wegrats?

JULIAN
No. I even hesitate to go there.

SALA
Why?

JULIAN
After a certain age it would perhaps be better never to put your foot in any place where your earlier years were spent. It is so rare to find things and people the same as when you left them. Isn't that so? — Mrs. Gabrielle is said to have changed considerably in the course of her sickness. That's what Felix told me at least. I should prefer not to see her again. Oh, you can understand that, Sala.

SALA (rather surprised)
Of course, I understand. How long is it you have had no news from Vienna?

JULIAN
I have constantly started ahead of my mail. Not a single letter has overtaken me during the last fortnight. (Alarmed) What has happened?

SALA
Mrs. Gabrielle died a week ago.

JULIAN
Oh! (He is deeply moved; for a while he walks back and forth; then he resumes his seat and says after a pause) Of course, it was to be expected, and yet....

SALA
Her death came easily.... You know how those left behind always pretend to know such things with certainty. Anyhow, she fell asleep quietly one night and never woke up again.

JULIAN (in low voice)
Poor Gabrielle! — Did you see anything of her toward the end?

SALA

Yes, I went there almost daily.

JULIAN
Oh, did you?

SALA
Johanna asked me. She was literally afraid of being alone with her mother.

JULIAN
Afraid?

SALA
The sick woman inspired her with a sort of horror. She has calmed down a little now.

JULIAN
What a strange creature.... And how does our friend, the professor, bear up under his loss? Resigned to the will of God, I suppose?

SALA
My dear Julian, the man has a position. I fear we cannot grasp that, we who are Gods by the grace of the moment — and also less than men at times.

JULIAN
Of course, Felix is not here?

SALA
I talked with him less than an hour ago, and informed him that you were here. It made him very happy to have you call on him in Salzburg.

JULIAN
It looked so to me. And he did me a lot of good. For that matter, I have really thought of settling down in Salzburg.

SALA
For ever?

JULIAN
For a while. On account of Felix, too. His unspoiled nature affects me very pleasantly — it makes me actually feel younger. Were he not my son, I might almost envy him — and not on account of his youth alone. (With a smile) Thus there is nothing left for me but to love him. I must say that I feel a little ashamed at having to do it incognito, so to speak.

SALA
Are not these feelings a little belated in their appearance?

JULIAN
Oh, I suppose they were there long before I knew. And, you know, I saw the youngster for the first time when he was ten or eleven years old, and it was only then I learned that he was my son.

SALA
It must have been a strange meeting between you and Mrs. Gabrielle, ten years after you had committed that piece of hideous perfidy — as our ancestors used to put it.

JULIAN
It wasn't strange even. It came about quite naturally. Shortly after my return from Paris I happened to meet Wegrat on the street. Of course, we had heard of each other from time to time, and we met as old friends. There are people who seem born to a fate of that kind.... And as for Gabrielle....

SALA
She had forgiven you, of course?

JULIAN
Forgiven...? It was more or less than that. Only once did we talk of the past — she without reproach, and I without regret: as if the whole story had happened to somebody else. And after that never again. I might have thought some miracle had wiped those earlier days out of her memory. In fact, as far as I am concerned, there seemed to be no real connection between that quiet matron and the creature I had once loved. And as for the youngster — well, you know — at first I didn't care more for him than I might have cared for any other pretty and gifted child. — Of course, ten years ago my life had a different aspect. I was still clinging to so many things which since then have slipped away from me. It was only in the course of time that I became more and more drawn to the house, until at last I began to feel at home there.

SALA
I hope you never took offense at my gradual discovery of the true state of affairs.

JULIAN
You, at any rate, didn't think me very sensible....

SALA
Why not? I too find that family life in itself is quite attractive. Only it ought, after all, to be experienced in one's own family.

JULIAN
You know very well that I have frequently felt something like actual shame at the incongruity of that relationship. It was in fact one of the things that drove me away. Of course, there were a lot of other things that pressed on me at the time. Especially that I couldn't make a real success out of my work.

SALA
But you hadn't been exhibiting anything for a long time.

JULIAN
It wasn't external success I had in mind. I could never get into the right mood any more, and I hoped that traveling would help me again, as it had done so often in earlier years.

SALA
And how did you fare? We have heard so little of you here. You might really have written me a little more frequently and fully. For you know, of course, that I care a great deal more for you than for most other people. We have such a knack of giving each other the right cue — don't you think? There are sentimental people who speak of such a relation as friendship. And it is not impossible that we used to address each other by our Christian names some time during the last century, or that you may even have wept your fill on my shoulder. I have missed you more than once during these two years — honestly! On my lonely walks I have quite frequently thought of our pleasant chats in the Dornbach park, where we were in the habit of disposing temporarily of (quoting) "what is most lofty and profound in this our world." — Well, Julian, from where do you come anyhow?

JULIAN
From the Tyrol? During the Summer I made long tours on foot. I have even turned mountain climber in my old days. I spent a whole week at one of those pasturing grounds in the Alps.... Yes, I have been up to all sorts of things. It's a wonder what you can do when you are all alone.

SALA
And you have really been all alone?

JULIAN
Yes.

SALA
All these last years?

JULIAN
If I don't count a few nonsensical interruptions — yes.

SALA
But there should have been no difficulty in that respect.

JULIAN
I know. But I cannot rest satisfied with what is still offered me of that kind of thing. I have been badly spoiled, Sala. Up to a certain period my life passed away in a constant orgy of tenderness and passion, and of power, you might say. And that is all over. Oh, Sala, what pitiful fictions I have had to steal, and beg, and buy, during these last years! It gives me nausea to look back at it, and it horrifies me to look ahead. And I ask myself: can there really be nothing left of all that glow with which I once embraced the world but a sort of silly wrath because it's all over — because I — I — am no less subject to human laws than anybody else?

SALA
Why all this bitterness, Julian? There is still a great deal to be had out of this world, even when some of the pleasures and enjoyments of our earlier years have begun to appear tasteless or unseemly. And how can you, of all people, miss that feeling, Julian?

JULIAN
Snatch his part from an actor and ask him if he can still take pleasure in the beautiful scenery surrounding him.

SALA
But you have begun to work again while you were traveling?

JULIAN
Hardly at all.

SALA
Felix told us that you had brought some sketches from your trunk in order to show him.

JULIAN
He spoke of them?

SALA
Yes, and nothing but good.

JULIAN
Really?

SALA
And as you showed those things to him, you must have thought rather well of them yourself.

JULIAN
That was not the reason why I let him see them. (Walking back and forth) I must tell you — at the risk of having you think me a perfect fool.

SALA
Oh, a little more or less won't count. Speak out.

JULIAN
I wanted him at least not to lose faith in me. Can you understand that? After all, he is nearer to me than the rest. Of course, I know — to everybody, even to you, I am one who has gone down, who is finished — one of those whose only talent was his youth. It doesn't bother me very much. But to Felix I want to be the man I was once — just as I still am that man. When he learns sometime that I am his father, he must be proud of it.

SALA
When he learns it...?

JULIAN
I have no intention to keep it hidden from him forever. Now, when his mother is dead, less than ever. Last time I talked to him, it became clear to me, not only that it would be right, but that it would almost be a duty, to tell him the truth. He has a mind for essentials. He will understand everything. And I shall have a human being who belongs to me, who knows that he belongs to me, and for whose sake it is worth while to keep on living in this world. I shall live near him, and be with him a good deal. Once more I shall have my existence put on a solid basis, so to speak, and not hung in mid-air, as it is now. And then I shall be able to work again — work as I did once — as when I was a young man. Work, that is what I am going to do — and all of you will turn out to have been wrong — all of you!

SALA
But to whom has it occurred to doubt you? If you could only have heard us talk of you a little while ago, Julian. Everybody expects that, sooner or later, you — will find yourself again completely.

JULIAN
Well, that's enough about me, more than enough. Pardon me. Let us hear something about yourself at last. I suppose you have already moved into your new house?

SALA
Yes.

JULIAN
And what plans have you for the immediate future?

SALA
I am thinking of going to Asia with Count Ronsky.

JULIAN
With Ronsky? Are you going to join that expedition about which so much has been written?

SALA
Yes. Some such undertaking has been tempting me for a long time. Are you perhaps familiar with the Rolston report on the Bactrian and Median excavations of 1892?

JULIAN
No.

SALA
Well, it is positively staggering. Think of it — they suspect that under the refuse and the dust lies a monster city, something like the present London in extent. At that time they made their way into a palace, where the most wonderful paintings were found. These were perfectly preserved in several rooms. And they dug out stairways — built of a marble that is nowhere to be found nowadays. Perhaps it was brought from some island which since then has sunk beneath the sea. Three hundred and twelve steps glittering like opals and leading down into unknown depths.... Unknown because they ceased digging after they had reached the three hundred and twelfth step — God only knows why! I don't think I can tell you how those steps pique my curiosity.

JULIAN
But it has always been asserted that the Rolston expedition was lost?

SALA
No, not quite as bad as that. Out of twenty-four Europeans, eight got back after three years in spite of all — and half a dozen of them had been lost before they ever got there. You have to pass through pretty bad fever belts. And at that time they had to face an attack of the Kurds, too, by which several were done for. But we shall be much better equipped. Furthermore, at the border we shall be joined by a Russian contingent which is traveling under military escort. And here, too, they think of putting a military aspect on the affair. As to the fever — that doesn't scare me — it can't do me any harm. As a young man I spent a number of particularly dangerous Summer nights in the thermae of Caracalla — you know, of course, what boggy ground that is — and remained well.

JULIAN
But that doesn't prove anything.

SALA
Oh yes, a little. There I came across a Roman girl whose home was right by the Appian Way. She caught the fever and died from it.... To be sure, I am not as young as I was then, but so far I have been perfectly well.

JULIAN (who has already smoked several cigarettes, offers one to Sala) Don't you smoke?

SALA
Thanks. Really, I shouldn't. Only yesterday Dr. Reumann told me I mustn't.... Nothing particular — my heart is a little restless, that's all. Well, a single one won't do any harm, I suppose.

VALET (enters)
Miss Herms, sir. She's asking whether she can see you.

JULIAN
Certainly. Ask her to come in.

VALET (goes out)

IRENE HERMS (enters. She is about forty-three, but doesn't look it. Her dress is simple and in perfect taste. Her movements are vivacious, and at times almost youthful in their swiftness. Her hair is deeply blonde in color and very heavy. Her eyes are merry, good-humored most of the time, and easily filled with tears. She comes in with a smile and nods in a friendly manner to Sala. To Julian, who has gone to meet her, she holds out her hand with an expression on her face that is almost happy) Good evening. Well? (She has the habit of pronouncing that "well" in a tone of sympathetic inquiry) So I did right after all in keeping my patience a couple of days more. Here I've got you back now. (To Sala) Can you guess the length of time we haven't seen each other?

JULIAN
More than three years.

IRENE (nods assent and permits him at last to withdraw his hand from hers) In all our lives that has never happened before. And your last letter is already two months old. I call it "letter" just to save my face. But it was only a view-card. Where in the world have you been anyhow?

JULIAN
Sit down, won't you? I'll tell you all about it. Won't you take off your hat? You'll stay a while, I hope?

IRENE

Of course. — And the way you look! (To Sala) Fine, don't you think? I've always known that a gray beard would make him look awfully interesting.

SALA (to Julian)
Now you'll have nothing but pleasantries to listen to. Unfortunately I shall have to be moving.

IRENE
You're not leaving on my account, I hope?

SALA
How can you imagine such a thing, Miss Herms?

IRENE
I suppose you are bound for the Wegrats'? — What do you think of it, Julian? Isn't it dreadful? (To Sala) Please give them my regards.

SALA
I'm not going there now. I'm going home.

IRENE
Home? And you say that in such a matter-of-fact way? I understand you are now living in a perfect palace.

SALA
No, anything but that. A modest country house. It would give me special pleasure, Miss Herms, if sometime you would make sure of it in person. My garden is really pretty.

IRENE
Have you fruit trees, too, and vegetables?

SALA
In this respect I can only offer you a stray cabbage and a wild cherry tree.

IRENE
Well, if my time permit, I shall make a point of coming out there to have a look at your villa.

JULIAN
Must you leave again so soon?

IRENE
Certainly. I have to get home again. Only this morning I had a letter from my little nephew — and he's longing for me. A little rascal of five, and he, too, is longing already. What do you think of that?

SALA
And you are also longing to get back, I suppose?

IRENE
It isn't that. But I'm beginning to get accustomed to Vienna again. As I'm going about the streets here, I run across memories at every corner. — Can you guess where I was yesterday, Julian? In the rooms where I used to live as a child. It wasn't easy by any means, as a lot of strangers are living there now. But I got into the rooms just the same.

SALA (with amicable irony)
How did you manage it, Miss Herms?

IRENE
I sneaked in under a pretext. I pretended to believe that there was a room to be let — for a single elderly lady. But at last I fell to weeping so that I could see the people thought me out of my mind. And then I told them the true reason for my coming there. A clerk in the post-office is living there now with his wife and two children. One of these was such a nice little chap. He was playing railroad with an engine that could be wound up, and that ran over one of my feet all the time.... But I can see that all this doesn't interest you very much, Mr. von Sala.

SALA
How can you interrupt yourself like that, Miss Herms, just when it is most exciting? I should have loved to hear more about it. But now I must really go, unfortunately. Good-by, Julian. — Then, Miss Herms, I may count on a visit from you. (He goes out)

IRENE
Thank God!

JULIAN (smiling)
Do you still have the same antipathy for him?

IRENE
Antipathy? — I hate him! Nothing but your incredible kindness of heart would let him come near you. For you have no worse enemy.

JULIAN
Where did you get that idea?

IRENE
My instinct tells me — you can feel such things.

JULIAN
I fear, however, that even now you cannot judge him quite objectively.

IRENE
Why not?

JULIAN
You can't forgive him that you failed in one of his plays ten years ago.

IRENE
Unfortunately it's already twelve years ago. And it wasn't my fault. For my opinion in regard to his so-called poetry is, that it's nonsense. And I am not the only one who thinks so, as you know. But you don't know him, of course. To appreciate that gentleman in all his glory, you must have enjoyed him at a rehearsal. (Imitating Sala) Oh, madam, that's verse — it's verse, dear madam.... Only when you have heard that kind of thing from him can you understand how limitless his arrogance is.... And everybody knows, by the way, that he killed his wife.

JULIAN (amused)
But, girl, who in the world put such horrible ideas into your head?

IRENE
Oh, people don't die willy-nilly like that, at twenty-five....

JULIAN
I hope, Irene, that you don't talk like this to other people?

IRENE
What would be the use? Everyone knows it but you. And I for my part have no reason to spare Mr. von Sala, who for twenty years has pursued me with his jeers.

JULIAN
And yet you are going to call on him?

IRENE
Of course. Beautiful villas interest me very much. And they tell me his is ravishing. If you were only to see people who....

JULIAN
Hadn't killed anybody....

IRENE
Really, we show him too much honor in talking so long about him. That ends it. — Well, Julian? How goes it? Why haven't you written me oftener? Is it possible you didn't dare?

JULIAN
Dare...?

IRENE
Were you forbidden, I mean?

JULIAN
I see. — Nobody can forbid me anything.

IRENE
Honestly? You live all by yourself?

JULIAN
Yes.

IRENE
I'm delighted. I can't help it, Julian, but I am delighted. Although it's sheer nonsense. This day, or the next, there'll be something new going on.

JULIAN
Those days are past.

IRENE
If it were only true! — Can I have a cup of tea?

JULIAN
Certainly. The samovar is right there.

IRENE
Where? — Oh, over there. And the tea? — Oh, I know! (She opens a small cupboard and brings out what she needs; during the next few minutes she is busy preparing the tea)

JULIAN
So you are really going to stay here only a couple of days more?

IRENE
Of course. I have done all my ordering. You understand, in my sister's house out there one doesn't need to dress up.

JULIAN
Tell me about it. How do you like it out there?

IRENE
Splendidly. Oh, it's bliss merely to hear nothing more about the theater.

JULIAN
And yet you'll return to it sometime.

IRENE
That's where you are completely mistaken. Why should I? You must remember that I have now reached the goal of all my desires: fresh air, and woods right by; horseback riding across meadows and fields; early morning seated in the big park, dressed in my kimono, and nobody daring to intrude. To put it plainly: no people, no manager, no public, no colleagues, no playwrights — though, of course, all are not as arrogant as your precious Sala. — Well, all this I have attained at last. I live in the country. I have a country house — almost a little palace, you might say. I have a park, and a horse, and a kimono — to use as much as I please. It isn't all mine, I admit — except the kimono, of course — but what does that matter? In the bargain, I live with the best people one could hope to find in this world. For my brother-in-law is, if possible, a finer fellow than Lora herself even.

JULIAN
Wasn't he rather making up to you once?

IRENE
I should say he was! He wanted to marry me at any cost. Of course! — It was always in me that they were at first — I mean that they always have been in love with me. But as a rule the clever ones have gone over to Lora. In fact, I have always felt a little distrustful toward you because you never fell in love with Lora. And how much she is ahead of me — well, you know, and it's no use talking of it. What all don't I owe to Lora!... If it hadn't been for her...! — Well, it's with them I have been living the last half year.

JULIAN
The question is only how long you are going to stand it.

IRENE
How long...? But, Julian, I must ask you what there could be to make me leave such a paradise and return to the morass where I (in a lowered voice) spent twenty-five years of my life. What could I possibly expect out of the theater anyhow? I am not made for elderly parts. The heroic mother, the shrewish dame and the funny old woman are equally little to my liking. I intend to die as "the young lady from the castle" — as an old maid, you might say — and if everything goes right, I shall appear to the grandchildren of my sister some hundred years from now as the Lady in White. In a word, I have the finest kind of a life ahead of me. — Why are you laughing?

JULIAN
It pleases me to see you so jolly again — so youthful.

IRENE
It's the country air, Julian. You should try it yourself for a good long while. It's glorious! In fact, I think I have missed my true calling. I'm sure the good Lord meant me for a milkmaid or farm girl of some kind. Or perhaps for a young shepherd. I have always looked particularly well in pants. — There now. Do you want me to pour a cup for you at once? (She pours the tea) Have you nothing to go with it?

JULIAN
I think there must still be a few crackers left in my bag. (He takes a small package out of his traveling bag)

IRENE
Thanks. That's fine.

JULIAN
This is quite a new fancy of yours, however.

IRENE
Crackers...?

JULIAN
No, nature.

IRENE
How can you say so? I have always had a boundless love for nature. Don't you recall the excursions we used to make? Don't you remember how once we fell asleep in the woods on a hot Summer afternoon? And don't you ever think of that shrine of the Holy Virgin, on the hill where we were caught by the storm?... Oh, mercy! Nature is no silly illusion. And still later — when I struck the bad days and wanted to kill myself for your sake, fool that I was... then nature simply proved my salvation. Indeed, Julian! I could still show you the place where I threw myself on the grass and wept. You have to walk ten minutes from the station, through an avenue of acacias, and then on to the brook. Yes, I threw myself on the grass and wept and wailed. It was one of those days, you know, when you had again sent me packing from your door. Well, and then, when I had been lying half an hour in the grass, and had wept my fill, then I got up again — and began to scamper all over the meadow. Just like a kid, all by myself. Then I wiped my eyes and felt quite right again. (Pause) Of course, next morning I was at your door again, setting up a howl, and then the story began all over again. [It is growing dark.

JULIAN
Why do you still think of all that?

IRENE
But you do it, too. And who has proved the more stupid of us two in the end? Who? Ask yourself, on your conscience. Who?... Have you been more happy with anybody else than with me? Has anybody else clung to you as I did? Has anybody else been so fond of you?... No, I am sure. And as to that foolish affair into which I stumbled during my engagement abroad — you might just as well have overlooked it. Really, there isn't as much to that kind of thing as you men want to make out — when it happens to one of us, that is to say. (Both drink of their tea)

JULIAN
Should I get some light?

IRENE
It's quite cosy in the twilight like this.

JULIAN
"Not much to it," you say. Perhaps you are right. But when it happens to anybody, he gets pretty mad as a rule. And if we had made up again — it would never have been as before. It's better as it is. When the worst was over, we became good friends once more, and so we have been ever since. And that is a pretty fine thing, too.

IRENE
Yes. And nowadays I'm quite satisfied. But at that time...! Oh, mercy, what a time that was! But you don't know anything about it, of course. It was afterward I began really to love you — after I had lost you through my own thoughtlessness. It was only then I learned how to be faithful in the true sense. For anything that has happened to me since then.... But it's asking too much that a man should understand that kind of thing.

JULIAN
I understand quite well, Irene. You may be sure.

IRENE
And besides I want to tell you something: it was nothing but a well-deserved punishment for both of us.

JULIAN
For both of us?

IRENE
Yes, that's what I have figured out long ago. A well-deserved punishment.

JULIAN
For both of us?

IRENE
Yes, for you, too.

JULIAN
But what do you mean by that?

IRENE
We had deserved no better.

JULIAN
We...? In what way?

IRENE (very seriously)
You are so very clever otherwise, Julian. Now what do you say — do you think it could have happened as it did — do you think I could have made a mistake like that — if we — had had a child? Ask yourself on your conscience, Julian — do you believe it? I don't, and you don't either. Everything would have happened in a different way. Everything. We had stayed together then. We had had more children. We had married. We might be living together now. I shouldn't have become an old-maidish "young lady from the castle," and you wouldn't have become....

JULIAN
An old bachelor.

IRENE
Well, if you say it yourself. And the main thing is this: we had a child. I had a child. (Pause)

JULIAN (walking back and forth)
What's the use, Irene? Why do you begin to talk of all those forgotten things again...?

IRENE
Forgotten?

JULIAN
... Things gone by.

IRENE
Yes, they are bygone, of course. But out there in the country you have plenty of time. All sorts of things keep passing through your head. And especially when you see other people's children — Lora has two boys, you know — then you get all sorts of notions. It almost amounted to a vision not long ago.

JULIAN
What?

IRENE
It was toward evening, and I had walked across the fields. I do it quite often, all by myself. Far and wide there was nobody to be seen. And the village down below was quite deserted, too. And I walked on and on, always in direction of the woods. And suddenly I was no longer alone. You were with me. And between us was the child. We were holding it by the hands — our little child. (Angrily, to keep herself from crying) It's too silly for anything! I know, of course, that our child would be a gawky youngster of twenty-three by now — that it might have turned into a scamp or a good-for-nothing girl. Or that it might be dead already. Or that it had drifted out into the wide world, so that we had nothing left of it — oh, yes, yes.... But we should have had it once, for all that — once there would have been a little child that seemed rather fond of us. And.... (She is unable to go on; silence follows)

JULIAN (softly)
You shouldn't talk yourself into such a state, Irene.

IRENE
I am not talking myself into anything.

JULIAN
Don't brood. Accept things as they are. There have been other things in your life — better things, perhaps. Your life has been much richer than that of a mere mother could ever have been.... You have been an artist.

IRENE (as if to herself)

I don't care that much for it.

JULIAN
A great, famous one — that means something after all. And your life has brought you many other exquisite experiences — since the one with me. I am sure of it.

IRENE
What have I got left of it? What does it amount to? A woman who has no child has never been a woman. But a woman who once might have had one — who should have had one, and who — (with a glance at him) — has never become a mother, she is nothing but — oh! But that's what a man cannot understand! It is what not one of them can understand! In this respect the very best one of the lot will always remain something of a cad. Is there one of you who knows how many of his own offspring have been set adrift in the world? I know at least that there are none of mine. Can you say as much?

JULIAN
And if I did know....

IRENE

How? Have you got one really? — Oh, speak, please! You can tell me, Julian, can't you? Where is it? How old is it? A boy? Or a girl?

JULIAN
Don't question me.... Even if I had a child, it wouldn't belong to you anyhow.

IRENE
He has a child! He has a child! (Pause) Why do you permit it to be drifting around in the world then?

JULIAN
You yourself have given the explanation: in this respect the very best of us remains always something of a cad. And I am not the best one at that.

IRENE
Why don't you go and get it?

JULIAN
How could it be any of my concern? How could I dare to make it my concern? Oh, that's enough.... (Pause) Do you want another cup of tea?

IRENE
No, thanks. No more now. (Pause; it is growing darker) He has a child, and I have never known it! (Protracted silence)

VALET (enters)

JULIAN
What is it?

VALET
Lieutenant Wegrat asks if you are at home, sir?

JULIAN
Certainly. Ask him in.

VALET (goes out after having turned on the light)

IRENE
Young Wegrat? — I thought he had already left again. — The poor chap! He seemed utterly stunned.

JULIAN
I can imagine.

IRENE
You visited him at Salzburg?

JULIAN
Yes, I happened to be there a couple of days last August.

FELIX (enters, dressed as a civilian)
Good evening. — Good evening, Miss Herms.

IRENE
Good evening, Lieutenant.

JULIAN
My dear Felix — I was going to call on you — this very evening. It’s extremely nice of you to take the trouble.

FELIX
I have to be off again the day after to-morrow, and so I wasn’t sure whether I could find any chance at all to see you.

JULIAN
Won’t you take off your coat? — Think of it, I didn’t have the slightest idea.... It was Sala who told me — less than an hour ago.
[Irene is looking from one to the other.

FELIX
We didn’t dream of this when we took that walk in the Mirabell Gardens last summer.

JULIAN
Was it very sudden?

FELIX
Yes. And I, who couldn’t be with her.... Late that evening I had to leave, and she died during the night.

IRENE
Say rather that she didn’t wake up again next morning.

FELIX
We owe a lot of thanks to you, Miss Herms.

IRENE
Oh, please...!

FELIX
It always gave my mother so much pleasure to have you with her, chatting, or playing the piano to her.

IRENE
Oh, don’t mention my playing...!
[A clock strikes.

IRENE
Is it that late? Then I have to go.

JULIAN
What's the hurry, Miss Herms?

IRENE
I'm going to the opera. I have to make good use of the few days I shall still be here.

FELIX
Shall we see you at our house again, Miss Herms?

IRENE
Certainly. — You'll have to leave before me, won't you?

FELIX
Yes, my furlough will be up....

IRENE (as if en passant)
How long have you been an officer anyhow, Felix?

FELIX
For three years really — but I didn't apply for a commission until this year — a little too late, perhaps.

IRENE
Too late? Why? — How old are you, Felix?

FELIX
Twenty-three.

IRENE
Oh! (Pause) But when I saw you four years ago as a volunteer, I thought at once you would stay in the service. — Do you remember, Julian, I told you so at the time?

JULIAN
Yes....

FELIX
That must have been in the summer, the last time you called on us.

IRENE
I think so....

FELIX
Many things have changed since then.

IRENE
Indeed! Those were still happy days. — Don't you think so, Julian? For we haven't met either since we spent those beautiful summer evenings in the garden of the Wegrats.

JULIAN (nods assent)

IRENE (stands again looking now at Julian and now at Felix; brief pause) Oh, but now it's high time for me to be gone. — Good-by. Remember me at home, Lieutenant. — Good-by, Julian. (She goes out, accompanied to the door by Julian)

FELIX
Haven't you made some changes here?

JULIAN
Not to my knowledge. And how could you know anyhow? You have only been here two or three times.

FELIX
Yes. But the last time at one of the most important moments in my life. I came here to get your advice.

JULIAN
Well, everything has turned out in accordance with your wish. Even your father has resigned himself to it.

FELIX
Yes, he has resigned himself. Of course, he would have preferred to see me continue my technical studies. But now he has seen that it is quite possible to lead a sensible life in uniform too — without any debts or duels. In fact, my life is almost too smooth. However, there is at least more to anticipate for one of us than for most people. And that's always something.

JULIAN
And how are things at home?

FELIX
At home.... Really, it's almost as if that word had lost its meaning.

JULIAN
Has your father resumed his duties again?

FELIX
Of course. Two days later he was back in his studio. He is wonderful. But I can't quite understand it.... Am I disturbing you, Mr. Fichtner? You were putting your papers in order, I think.

JULIAN
Oh, there's no hurry about that. They're easily put in order. Most of them I burn.

FELIX
Why?

JULIAN
It's more sensible, don't you think, to destroy things one hardly cares to look at any more?

FELIX
But doesn't it make you rather sad to clean out your past like that?

JULIAN
Sad?... No, it's entirely too natural a process for that.

FELIX
I can't see it that way. Look here. To burn a letter, or a picture, or something of that kind, immediately after you have got it — that seems quite natural to me. But something at all worthy of being kept as a remembrance of some poignant joy or equally poignant sorrow would seem incapable of ever losing its significance again. And especially in the case of a life like yours, that has been so rich and so active.... It would seem to me that at times you must feel something like — awe in the face of your own past.

JULIAN
Where do you get such thoughts — you, who are so young?

FELIX
They just came into my head this minute.

JULIAN
You are not so very much mistaken, perhaps. But there is something else besides, that makes me want to clean house. I am about to become homeless, so to speak.

FELIX
Why?

JULIAN
I'm giving up my rooms here, and don't know yet what my next step will be. And so I think it's more pleasant to let these things come to a decent end rather than to put them in a box and leave them to molder away in a cellar.

FELIX
But don't you feel sorry about a lot of it?

JULIAN
Oh, I don't know.

FELIX
And then you must have mementoes that mean something to other people besides yourself. Sketches of all kinds, for instance, which I think you have saved to some extent.

JULIAN
Are you thinking of those little things I showed you in Salzburg?

FELIX
Yes, of those too, of course.

JULIAN
They are still wrapped up. Would you like to have them?

FELIX
Indeed, I should feel very thankful. They seemed to have a particular charm for me. (Pause) But there's something else I wanted to ask of you. A great favor. If you will let me....

JULIAN
Tell me, please.

FELIX
I thought you might still have left a picture of my mother as a young girl. A small picture in water colors painted by yourself.

JULIAN
Yes, I did paint such a picture.

FELIX
And you have still got it?

JULIAN
I guess it can be found.

FELIX
I should like to see it.

JULIAN
Did your mother remember this picture...?

FELIX
Yes, she mentioned it to me the last evening I ever saw her — the evening before she died. At the time I didn't imagine, of course, that the end was so near — and I don't think she could guess it either. To-day it seems rather peculiar to me that, on that very evening, she had to talk so much of days long gone by.

JULIAN
And of this little picture, too?

FELIX
It's a very good one, I understand.

JULIAN (as if trying to remember)
Where did I put it? Wait now.... (He goes to a book case, the lower part of which has solid doors; these he opens, disclosing several shelves piled with portfolios) I painted it in the country — in the little house where your grandparents used to live.

FELIX
I know.

JULIAN
You can hardly recall the old people, I suppose?

FELIX
Very vaguely. They were quite humble people, were they not?

JULIAN
Yes. (He has taken a big portfolio from one of the shelves) It ought to be in this portfolio. (He puts it on the writing desk and opens it; then he sits down in front of it)

FELIX (stands behind him, looking over his shoulder)

JULIAN
Here is the house in which they lived — your grandparents and your mother. (He goes through the sketches, one by one) And here is a view of the valley seen from the cemetery.

FELIX
In Summer....

JULIAN
Yes. — And here is the little inn at which your father and I used to stop.... And here.... (He looks in silence at the sketch; both remain silent for a long while)

FELIX (picking up the sketch)
How old was my mother at the time?

JULIAN (who remains seated)
Eighteen.

FELIX (going a few steps away and leaning against the bookcase in order to get better light on the picture)

A year before she was married, then.

JULIAN
It was done that very year. (Pause)

FELIX
What a strange look that meets me out of those eyes.... There's a smile on her lips.... It's almost as if she were talking to me....

JULIAN
What was it your mother told you — that last evening?

FELIX
Not very much. But I feel as if I knew more than she had told me. What a queer thought it is, that as she is now looking at me out of this picture, so she must have been looking at you once. It seems as if there was a certain timidity in that look. Something like fear almost.... In such a way you look at people out of another world, for which you long, and of which you are afraid nevertheless.

JULIAN

At that time your mother had rarely been outside the village.

FELIX
She must have been different from all other women you have met, wasn't she? — Why don't you say anything? I am not one of those men who cannot understand — who won't understand that their mothers and sisters are women after all. I can easily understand that it must have been a dangerous time for her — and for somebody else as well. (Very simply) You must have loved my mother very much?

JULIAN
You have a curious way of asking questions. — Yes, I did love her.

FELIX
And those moments must have been very happy ones, when you sat in that little garden with its overgrown fence, holding this canvas on your knees, and out there on the bright meadow, among all those red and white flowers, stood this young girl with anxiously smiling eyes, holding her straw hat in one hand.

JULIAN
Your mother talked of those moments that last evening?

FELIX
Yes. — It is childish perhaps, but since then it has seemed impossible to me that any other human being could ever have meant so much to you as this one?

JULIAN (more and more deeply moved, but speaking very quietly) I shall not answer you. — In the end I should instinctively be tempted to make myself appear better than I am. You know very well how I have lived my life — that it has not followed a regulated and direct course like the lives of most other people. I suppose that the gift of bestowing happiness of the kind that lasts, or of accepting it, has never been mine.

FELIX
That's what I feel. It is what I have always felt. Often with something like regret — or sorrow almost. But just people like you, who are destined by their very nature to have many and varied experiences — just such people should, I think, cling more faithfully and more gratefully to memories of a tender, peaceful sort, like this — rather than to more passionate and saddening memories. — Am I not right?

JULIAN
Maybe you are.

FELIX
My mother had never before mentioned this picture to me. Isn't it strange?... That last night she did it for the first time. — We were left alone on the veranda. The rest had already bid me good-by.... And all of a sudden she began to talk about those summer days of long, long ago. Her words had an undercurrent of meanings which she probably did not realize. I believe that her own youth, which she had almost ceased to understand, was unconsciously taking mine into its confidence. It moved me more deeply than I can tell you. — Much as she cared for me, she had never before talked to me like that. And I believe that she had never been quite so dear to me as in those last moments. — And when finally I had to leave, I felt that she had still much more to tell me. — Now you'll understand why I had such a longing to see this picture. — I have almost the feeling that it might go on talking to me as my mother would have done — if I had only dared to ask her one more question!

JULIAN
Ask it now.... Do ask it, Felix.

FELIX (who becomes aware of the emotion betrayed in the voice of Julian, looks up from the picture)

JULIAN
I believe that it can still tell you a great many things.

FELIX
What is the matter?

JULIAN
Do you want to keep that picture?

FELIX
Why...?

JULIAN
Well... take it. I don't give it to you. As soon as I have settled down again, I shall want it back. But you shall have a look at it whenever you want. And I hope matters will be so arranged that you won't have far to go either.

FELIX (with his eyes on the picture)
It grows more alive every second.... And that look was directed at you.... That look...? Can it be possible that I read it right?

JULIAN
Mothers have their adventures, too, like other women.

FELIX
Yes, indeed, I believe it has nothing more to hide from me.
[He puts down the picture. Then a long pause follows. At last Felix puts on his coat.

JULIAN
Are you not going to take it along?

FELIX
Not just now. It belongs to you much more than I could guess.

JULIAN
And to you...

FELIX
No, I don't want it until this new thing has become fully revealed to me. (He looks Julian firmly in the eyes) I don’t quite know where I am. In reality, of course, there has been no change whatever. None — except that I know now what I...

JULIAN
Felix!

FELIX
No, that was something I could never have guessed. (Looks long at Julian with an expression of mingled tenderness and curiosity) Farewell.

JULIAN
Are you going?

FELIX
I need badly to be by myself for a while. — Until to-morrow.

JULIAN
Yes, and no longer, Felix. To-morrow I shall come to your — I’ll call on you, Felix.

FELIX
I shall be waiting for you. (He goes out)

JULIAN (stands quite still for a moment; then he goes to the writing desk and stops beside it, lost in contemplation of the picture)

CURTAIN

THE THIRD ACT

A ROOM AT the Wegrats' adjoining the veranda. The outlook is, of course, determined by the location.

JOHANNA (is seated on a stool with her hands folded in her lap)

SALA (enters)
Good morning, Johanna.

JOHANNA (rises, goes to meet him, and draws him close to herself) Are you coming for the last time?

SALA
For the last time? What an idea! There has not been the slightest change in our arrangements. To-day is the seventh of October, and the ship will leave Genoa on the twenty-sixth of November.

JOHANNA
Some day you will suddenly have disappeared. And I shall be standing by the garden door, and nobody will come to open it.

SALA
But that sort of thing is not needed between us two.

JOHANNA
No, indeed — bear that in mind.

FELIX (enters)
Oh, is that you, Mr. von Sala? (They shake hands) Well, how far have you got with your preparations?

SALA
There are hardly any needed. I shall pack my trunk, pull down the shades, lock the doors — and be off for the mysteries of far-away. There is something I want to ask you apropos of that, Felix. Would you care to come along?

FELIX (startled)
If I care.... Are you asking seriously, Mr. von Sala?

SALA
There is just so much seriousness in my question as you wish to put into it.

FELIX
What does it mean anyhow? If I want to go along to Asia? What use could they have for me in a venture of that kind?

SALA
Oh, that's pretty plain.

FELIX
Is the expedition not going to be one of purely scientific character?

SALA
Yes, that's what it is meant for, I suppose. But it is quite possible that various things may happen that would make the presence of some young men like you very desirable.

FELIX
Men like me...?

SALA
When Rolston went out there seven years ago, a lot of things happened which were not provided for in the original program. And they had to fight a regular battle, on a small scale, in the Kara-Kum district, not far from the river Amu-Daria.

REUMANN (who has entered while Sala was speaking)
To those who had to stay behind forever the scale of your battle was probably large enough. (All greet each other and shake hands without letting the conversation be interrupted)

SALA
In that respect you are probably right, Doctor.

FELIX
Pardon me, Mr. von Sala, but does this come from you alone? Is it just a sudden notion — or something more?

SALA
I have received no direct request from anybody to speak of this. But after the conference which took place at the Foreign Department yesterday, and which I attended, I feel entitled to add a little more. — Oh, no secrets at all! — You have probably read, Felix, that a member of the General Staff as well as several artillery and engineering officers are being sent with us in what might be termed a semi-official capacity. On account of the latest news from Asia — which, however, does not seem very reliable to me, as it has come by way of England — it has been decided to secure the additional cooperation of some young line officers, and all arrangements of this kind must be left to private initiative.

FELIX
And there might be a possibility for me...?

SALA
Will you permit me to speak to Count Ronsky?

FELIX
Have you already mentioned my name to him?

SALA
I have received permission to ask whether you could be prepared to board the ship with the rest at Genoa on the twenty-sixth of November.

REUMANN
Do you mean to leave Vienna as soon as that?

SALA (sarcastically)
Yes. Why did you look at me like that, Doctor? That glance of yours was a little indiscreet.

REUMANN
In what respect?

SALA
It seemed to say: Yes, you can start, of course, but if you ever come back, that's more than doubtful.

REUMANN
Let me tell you, Mr. von Sala, that in the face of a venture like yours one might well express such doubts quite openly. But are you at all interested in whether you get back or not, Mr. von Sala? I don't suppose you belong to the kind of people who care to put their affairs in order.

SALA
No, indeed. Especially not as, in cases of that kind, it is generally the affairs of others which give you needless trouble. If I were to be interested at all in my own chances, it would be for much more selfish reasons.

JOHANNA
What reasons?

SALA
I don't want to be cheated out of the consciousness that certain moments are my final ones.

REUMANN
There are not many people who share your attitude in that respect.

SALA
At any rate, Doctor, you would have to tell me the absolute truth if I ever asked you for it. I hold that one has the right to drain one's own life to the last drop, with all the horrors and delights that may lie hidden at the bottom of it. Just as it is our evident duty every day to commit every good deed and every rascality lying within our capacity.... No, I won't let you rob me of my death moments by any kind of hocus-pocus. It would imply a small-minded attitude, worthy neither of yourself nor of me. — Well, Felix, the twenty-sixth of November then! That's still seven weeks off. In regard to any formalities that may be required, you need have no worry at all.

FELIX
How long a time have I got to make up my mind?

SALA
There's no reason to be precipitate. When does your furlough end?

FELIX
To-morrow night.

SALA
Of course, you are going to talk it over with your father?

FELIX
With my father.... Yes, of course. — At any rate I'll bring you the answer early to-morrow morning, Mr. von Sala.

SALA
Fine. It would please me very much. But you must bear in mind: it will be no picnic. I expect to see you soon, then. Good-by, Miss Johanna. Farewell, Doctor.
[He goes out. A brief pause. Those left behind show signs of emotion.

JOHANNA (rising)
I'm going to my room. Good-by, Doctor. (She goes out)

REUMANN
Have you made up your mind, Felix?

FELIX
Almost.

REUMANN
You'll come across much that is new to you.

FELIX
And my own self among it, I hope — which would be about time.... (Quoting) "The mysteries of far-away..." And will it really come true? Oh, the thrill of it!

REUMANN
And yet you ask time to consider?

FELIX
I hardly know why. And yet... The thought of leaving people behind and perhaps never seeing them again — and certainly not as they were when you left them; the thought, too, that perhaps your going will hurt them...

REUMANN
If nothing else makes you hesitate, then every moment of uncertainty is wasted. Nothing is more sure to estrange you from those dear to you than the knowledge that duty condemns you to stay near them. You must seize this unique opportunity. You must go to see Genoa, Asia Minor, Thibet, Bactria.... Oh, it must be splendid! And my best wishes will go with you. (He gives his hand to Felix)

FELIX
Thank you. But there will be plenty of time for wishes of that kind. Whatever may be decided, we shall meet more than once before I leave.

REUMANN
I hope so. Oh, of course!

FELIX (looking hard at him)
Doctor... it seems to me there was a final farewell in that pressure of your hand.

REUMANN (with a smile)
Is it ever possible to tell whether you will meet again?

FELIX
Tell me, Doctor — did Mr. von Sala interpret your glance correctly?

REUMANN
That has nothing to do with your case anyhow.

FELIX
Will he not be able to go with us?

REUMANN (with hesitation)
That's very hard to predict.

FELIX
You have never learned to lie, Doctor.

REUMANN
As the matter stands now, I think you can bring it to a successful conclusion without further assistance.

FELIX
Mr. von Sala called on you a few days ago?

REUMANN
Yes, it was only a while ago. (Pause) Well, you can see for yourself that he is not well, can't you? — So God be with you, Felix.

FELIX
Will you continue to befriend this house when I am gone?

REUMANN
Why do you ask questions like that, Felix?

FELIX
You don't mean to come here again? — But why?

REUMANN
I assure you...

FELIX
I understand...

REUMANN (embarrassed)
What can there be to understand...?

FELIX
My dear Doctor... I know now... why you don't want to come to this house any more.... It's another case of somebody else breaking his neck.... Dear friend...

REUMANN
Good luck to you... Felix...

FELIX
And if anybody should call you back...

REUMANN
Nobody will.... But if I should be needed, I can always be found...

JOHANNA (comes into the room again)

REUMANN
Good-by... Good-by, Miss Johanna...

JOHANNA
Are you going already, Doctor?

REUMANN
Yes.... Give my regards to your father. Good-by.... (He shakes her hand)

JOHANNA (calmly)
Did he tell you that Sala is doomed?

FELIX (hesitates about what to say)

JOHANNA
I knew it. (With an odd gesture of deprecation as Felix wants to say something) And you are going — with or without him?

FELIX
Yes. (Pause) There won't be much doing in this place after this.

JOHANNA (remains unmoved)

FELIX
And how are you going to live, Johanna?... I mean, how are the two of you going to live — you and father?

JOHANNA (gives him a look as if his question surprised her)

FELIX
He is going to be lonely. I think he would feel very grateful if you took a little more interest in him — if you went for a walk for him when there is time for it. And you, too...

JOHANNA (brusquely)
How could that help me or him? What can he be to me or I to him? I was not made to assist people in days of trial. I can't help it, but that's the way I am. I seem to be stirred by a sort of hostility against people who appeal to my pity. I felt it like that all the time mother was sick.

FELIX
No, you were not made for that.... But what were you made for then?

JOHANNA (shrugs her shoulders and sits down as before, with hands folded in her lap and her eyes staring straight ahead)

FELIX
Johanna, why do you never talk to me any more as you used to? Have you, then, nothing to tell me? Don't you remember how we used to tell each other everything?

JOHANNA
That was long ago. We were children then.

FELIX
Why can't you talk to me any longer as you did then? Have you forgotten how well we two used to understand each other? How we used to confide all our secrets to each other? What good chums we used to be?... How we wanted to go out into the wide world together?

JOHANNA
Into the wide world.... Oh, yes, I remember. But there is nothing left now of all those words of wonder and romance.

FELIX
Perhaps it depends on ourselves only.

JOHANNA
No, those words have no longer the same meaning as before.

FELIX
What do you mean?

JOHANNA
Into the wide world...

FELIX
What is the matter, Johanna?

JOHANNA
Once, when we were in the museum together, I saw a picture of which I often think. It has a meadow with knights and ladies in it — and a forest, a vineyard, an inn, and young men and women dancing, and a big city with churches and towers and bridges. And soldiers are marching across the bridges, and a ship is gliding down the river. And farther back there is a hill, and on that hill a castle, and lofty mountains in the extreme distance. And clouds are floating above the mountains, and there is mist on the meadow, and a flood of sunlight is pouring down on the city, and a storm is raging over the castle, and there is ice and snow on the mountains. — And when anybody spoke of "the wide world," or I read that term anywhere, I used always to think of that picture. And it used to be the same with so many other big-sounding words. Fear was a tiger with cavernous mouth — love was a page with long light curls kneeling at the feet of a lady — death was a beautiful young man with black wings and a sword in his hand — and fame was blaring bugles, men with bent backs, and a road strewn with flowers. In those days it was possible to talk of all sorts of things, Felix. But to-day everything has a different look — fame, and death, and love, and the wide world.

FELIX (hesitatingly)

I feel a little scared on your behalf, Johanna.

JOHANNA
Why, Felix?

FELIX
Johanna! — I wish you wouldn't do anything to worry father.

JOHANNA
Does that depend on me alone?

FELIX
I know in what direction your dreams are going, Johanna. — What is to come out of that?

JOHANNA
Is it necessary that something comes out of everything? — I think, Felix, that many people are destined to mean nothing to each other but a common memory.

FELIX
You have said it yourself, Johanna — that you are not made to see other people suffer.

JOHANNA (shrinks slightly at those words)

FELIX
Suffer... and...

JULIAN (enters)
How are you? (He shakes hands with Felix)

JOHANNA (who has risen)
Mr. Fichtner. (She holds out her hand to him)

JULIAN
I could hardly recognize you, Johanna. You have grown into a young lady now. — Has your father not come home yet?

JOHANNA
He hasn't gone out yet. He has nothing to do at the Academy until twelve.

JULIAN
I suppose he's in his studio?

JOHANNA
I'll call him.
[Julian looks around. As Johanna is about to leave the room, Wegrat enters, carrying his hat and stick.

WEGRAT (giving his hand to Julian)
I'm delighted, my dear fellow.

JULIAN
I heard of it only after my arrival here yesterday — through Sala. I don't need to tell you...

WEGRAT
Thank you very much for your sympathy. I thank you with all my heart. — But sit down, please.

JULIAN
You were going out?

WEGRAT
Oh, it's no hurry. I have nothing to do in the Academy until twelve. Johanna, will you please get a carriage for me, just to be on the safe side?
[Johanna goes out. Wegrat seats himself, as does Julian. Felix stands leaning against the glazed oven.

WEGRAT
Well, you stayed away quite a while this time.

JULIAN
More than two years.

WEGRAT
If you had only got here ten days earlier, you could have had a last look at her. It came so very suddenly — although it wasn't unexpected.

JULIAN
So I have heard.

WEGRAT
And now you are going to stay right here, I suppose?

JULIAN
A little while. How long I am not yet able to tell.

WEGRAT
Of course not. The making of schedules has never been your line.

JULIAN
No, I have a certain disinclination for that kind of thing. (Pause)

WEGRAT
Oh, mercy, my dear fellow... how often have I not been thinking of you recently!

JULIAN
And I....

WEGRAT
No, you haven't had much chance for it.... But I.... As I enter the building where I now hold office and authority, I remember often how we two young chaps used to sit side by side in the model class, full of a thousand plans and hopes.

JULIAN
Why do you say that in such a melancholy tone? A lot of those things have come true, haven't they?

WEGRAT
Some — yes.... And yet one can't help wanting to be young again, even at the risk of similar sorrows and struggles....

JULIAN
And even at the risk of also having to live through a lot of nice things over again.

WEGRAT
Indeed, those are the hardest things to bear, once they have turned into memories. — You have been in Italy again?

JULIAN
Yes, in Italy too.

WEGRAT
It's a long time now since I was there. Since we made that walk together through the Ampezzo Valley, with the pack on our backs — to Pieve, and then right on to Venice. Can you remember? The sun has never again shone as brightly as it did then.

JULIAN
That must have been almost thirty years ago.

WEGRAT
No, not quite. You were already pretty well known at the time. You had just finished your splendid picture of Irene Herms. It was the year before I married.

JULIAN

Yes, yes. (Pause)

WEGRAT
Do you still recall the summer morning when you went with me to Kirchau for the first time?

JULIAN
Of course.

WEGRAT
How the light buggy carried us through the wide, sun-steeped valley? And do you remember the little garden at Hügelhang, where you became acquainted with Gabrielle and her parents?

FELIX (with suppressed emotion)
Father, is the house in which mother used to live still standing?

WEGRAT
No, it's gone long ago. They have built a villa on the spot. Five or six years ago, you know, we went there for the last time to visit the graves of your grandparents. Everything has been changed, except the cemetery.... (To Julian) Can you still remember that cool, cloudy afternoon, Julian, when we sat on the lower wall of the cemetery and had such a remarkable talk about the future?

JULIAN
I remember the day very clearly. But I have entirely forgotten what we were talking about.

WEGRAT
Just what we said has passed out of my mind, too, but I can still remember what an extraordinary talk it was.... In some way the world seemed to open up more widely. And I felt something like envy toward you, as I often did in those days. There rose within me a feeling that I, too, could do anything — if I only wanted. There was so much to be seen and experienced — and the flow of life was irresistible. Nothing would be needed but a little more nerve, a little more self-assurance, and then to plunge in.... Yes, that was what I felt while you were talking.... And then Gabrielle came toward us along the narrow road from the village, between the acacias. She carried her straw hat in her hand, and she nodded to me. And all my dreams of the future centered in her after that, and once more the whole world seemed fitted into a frame, and yet it was big and beautiful enough.... Why does the color all of a sudden come back into those things? It was practically forgotten, all of it, and now, when she is dead, it comes to life again with a glow that almost scares me.... Oh, it were better not to think of it at all. What's the use? What's the use? (Pause; he goes to one of the windows)

JULIAN
(struggling to overcome his embarrassment) It is both wise and brave of you to resume your regular activities so promptly.

WEGRAT
Oh, once you have made up your mind to go on living.... There is nothing but work that can help you through this sense of being alone — of being left alone.

JULIAN

It seems to me that your grief makes you a little unjust toward — much that is still yours.

WEGRAT
Unjust...? Oh, I didn't mean to. I hope you don't feel hurt, children...! Felix, you understand me fully, don't you? There is so much, from the very beginning, that draws — that lures — that tears the young ones away from us. We have to struggle to keep our children almost from the very moment they arrive — and the struggle is a pretty hopeless one at that. But that's the way of life: they cannot possibly belong to us. And as far as other people are concerned.... Even our friends come into our lives only as guests who rise from the table when they have eaten, and walk out. Like us, they have their own streets, their own affairs. And it's quite natural it should be so.... Which doesn't prevent us from feeling pleased, Julian — sincerely pleased, when one of them finds his way back to us. Especially if it be one on whom we have put great store throughout life. You may be sure of that, Julian. (They shake hands) And as long as you remain in Vienna, I shall see you here quite often, I trust. It will give me genuine pleasure.

JULIAN
I'll be sure to come.

MAID (enters)
The carriage is here, Professor. (She goes out)

WEGRAT
I'm coming. (To Julian) You must have a lot to tell me. You were as good as lost. You understand it will interest me to hear all you have done — and still more what you intend to do. Felix told us the other day about some very interesting sketches you had showed him.

JULIAN
I'll go with you, if you care to have me.

WEGRAT
Thanks. But it would be still nicer of you to stay right here and take dinner with us.

JULIAN
Well...

WEGRAT
I'll be through very quickly. To-day I have nothing but a few business matters to dispose of — nothing but signing a few documents. I'll be back in three-quarters of an hour. In the meantime the children will keep you company as they used to in the old days.... Won't you, children? — So you're staying, are you not? Good-by for a little while then. (He goes out)
[Long pause.

FELIX
Why didn't you go with him?

JULIAN
Your mother was without blame. If any there be, it falls on me alone. I'll tell you all about it.

FELIX (nods)

JULIAN
It had been arranged that we were to go away together. Everything was ready. We meant to leave the place secretly because, quite naturally, your mother shrank from any kind of statement or explanation. Our intention was to write and explain after we had been gone a few days. The hour of our start had already been settled. He... who later became her husband, had just gone to Vienna for a couple of days in order to get certain documents. The wedding was to take place in a week. (Pause) Our plans were all made. We had agreed on everything. The carriage that was to pick us up a little ways off had already been hired. In the evening we bade each other good-night, fully convinced that we should meet next morning, never to part again. — It turned out differently. — You mustn't keep in mind that it was your mother. You must listen to me as if my story dealt with perfect strangers.... Then you can understand everything.

FELIX
I am listening.

JULIAN
I had come to Kirchau in June, one beautiful Summer morning — with him.... You know about that, don't you? I meant to stay only a few days. But I stayed on and on. More than once I tried to get away while it was still time. But I stayed. (Smiling) And with fated inevitability we slipped into sin, happiness, doom, betrayal — and dreams. Yes, indeed, there was more of those than of anything else. And after that last farewell, meant to be for a night only — as I got back to the little inn and started to make things ready for our journey — only then did I for the first time become really conscious of what had happened and was about to happen. Actually, it was almost as if I had just waked up. Only then, in the stillness of that night, as I was standing at the open window, did it grow clear to me that next morning an hour would come by which my whole future must be determined. And then I began to feel... as if faint shiverings had been streaming down my body. Below me I could see the stretch of road along which I had just come. It ran on and on through the country, climbing the hills that cut off the view, and losing itself in the open, the limitless.... It led to thousands of unknown and invisible roads, all of which at that moment remained at my disposal. It seemed to me as if my future, radiant with glory and adventure, lay waiting for me behind those hills — but for me alone. Life was mine — but only this one life. And in order to seize it and enjoy it fully — in order to live it as it had been shaped for me by fate — I needed the carelessness and freedom I had enjoyed until then. And I marveled almost at my own readiness to give away the recklessness of my youth and the fullness of my existence.... And to what purpose? — For the sake of a passion which, after all, despite its ardor and its transports, had begun like many others, and would be destined to end like all of them.

FELIX
Destined to end...? Must come to an end?

JULIAN
Yes. Must. The moment I foresaw the end, I had in a measure reached it. To wait for something that must come, means to go through it a thousand times — to go through it helplessly and needlessly and resentfully. This I felt acutely at that moment. And it frightened me. At the same time I felt clearly that I was about to act like a brute and a traitor toward a human being who had given herself to me in full confidence. — But everything seemed more desirable — not only for me, but for her also — than a slow, miserable, unworthy decline. And all my scruples were submerged in a monstrous longing to go on with my life as before, without duties or ties. There wasn't much time left for consideration. And I was glad of it. I had made up my mind. I didn't wait for the morning. Before the stars had set, I was off.

FELIX
You ran away....

JULIAN
Call it anything you please. — Yes, it was a flight, just as good and just as bad, just as precipitate and just as cowardly as any other — with all the horrors of being pursued and all the joys of escaping. I am hiding nothing from you, Felix. You are still young, and it is even possible that you may understand it better than I can understand it myself to-day. Nothing pulled me back. No remorse stirred within me. The sense of being free filled me with intoxication.... At the end of the first day I was already far away — much farther than any number of milestones could indicate. On that first day her image began to fade away already — the image of her who had waked up to meet painful disillusionment, or worse maybe. The ring of her voice was passing out of my memory.... She was becoming a shadow like others that had been left floating much farther behind me in the past.

FELIX
Oh, it isn't true! So quickly could she not be forgotten. So remorselessly could you not go out in the world. All this is meant as a sort of expiation. You make yourself appear what you are not.

JULIAN
I am not telling you these things to accuse or defend myself. I am simply telling you the truth. And you must hear it. It was your mother, and I am the man who deserted her. And there is something more I am compelled to tell you. On the very time that followed my flight I must look back as the brightest and richest of any I have ever experienced. Never before or after have I reveled to such an extent in the splendid consciousness of my youth and my freedom from restraint. Never have I been so wholly master of my gifts and of my life.... Never have I been a happier man than I was at that very time.

FELIX (calmly)
And if she had killed herself?

JULIAN
I believe I should have thought myself worth it — in those days.

FELIX
And so you were, perhaps, at that time. — And she thought of doing it, I am sure. She wanted to put an end to the lies and the qualms, just as hundreds of thousands of girls have done before. But millions fail to do it, and they are the most sensible ones. And I am sure she also thought of telling the truth to him she took to husband. But, of course, the way through life is easier when you don't have to carry a burden of reproach or, what is worse, of forgiveness.

JULIAN

And if she had spoken....

FELIX
Oh, I understand why she didn't. It had been of no use to anybody. And so she kept silent: silent when she got back from the wedding — silent when her child was born — silent when, ten years later, the lover came to her husband's house again — silent to the very last.... Fates of that kind are to be found everywhere, and it isn't even necessary to be — depraved, in order to suffer them or invoke them.

JULIAN
And there are mighty few whom it behooves to judge — or to condemn.

FELIX
I don't presume to do so. And it doesn't even occur to me that I am now to behold deceivers and deceived where, a few hours ago, I could only see people who were dear to me and whose relationships to each other were perfectly pure. And it is absolutely impossible for me to feel myself another man than I have deemed myself until to-day. There is no power in all this truth.... A vivid dream would be more compelling than this story out of bygone days, which you have just told me. Nothing has changed — nothing whatever. The thought of my mother is as sacred to me as ever. And the man in whose house I was born and raised, who surrounded my childhood and youth with care tenderness, and whom my mother — loved.... He means just as much to me now as he ever meant — and perhaps a little more.

JULIAN
And yet, Felix, however powerless this truth may seem to you — there is one thing you can take hold of in this moment of doubt: it was as my son your mother gave birth to you....

FELIX
At a time when you had run away from her.

JULIAN
And as my son she brought you up.

FELIX
In hatred of you.

JULIAN
At first. Later in forgiveness, and finally — don't forget it — in friendship toward me.... And what was in her mind that last night? — Of what did she talk to you? — Of those days when she experienced the greatest happiness that can fall to the share of any woman.

FELIX
As well as the greatest misery.

JULIAN
Do you think it was mere chance which brought those very days back to her mind that last evening?... Don't you think she knew that you would go to me and ask for that picture?... And do you think your wish to see it could have any other meaning than of a final greeting to me from your mother?... Can't you understand that,

Felix?... And in this moment — don't try to resist — you have it before your eyes — that picture you held in your hand yesterday: and your mother is looking at you. — And the glance resting on you, Felix, is the same one that rested on me that passionate and sacred day when she fell into my arms and you were conceived. — And whatever you may feel of doubt or confusion, the truth has now been revealed to you once for all. Thus your mother willed it, and it is no longer possible for you to forget that you are my son.

FELIX
Your son.... That's nothing but a word. And it's cried in a desert. — Although I am looking at you now, and although I know that I am your son, I can't grasp it.

JULIAN
Felix...!

FELIX
Since I learned of this, you have become a stranger to me. (He turns away)

CURTAIN

THE FOURTH ACT

The garden belonging to Mr. von Sala's house. At the left is seen the white, one-storied building, fronted by a broad terrace, from which six stone steps lead down into the garden. A wide door with panes of glass leads from the terrace into the drawing-room. A small pool appears in the foreground, surrounded by a semi-circle of young trees. From that spot an avenue of trees runs diagonally across the stage toward the right. At the opening of the avenue, near the pool, stand two columns on which are placed the marble busts of two Roman emperors. A semi-circular stone seat with back support stands under the trees to the right of the pool. Farther back glimpses of the glittering fence are caught through the scanty leafage. Back of the fence, the woods on a gently rising hillside are turning red. The autumnal sky is pale blue. Everything is quiet. The stage remains empty for a few moments.
Sala and Johanna enter by way of the terrace. She is in black. He has on a gray suit and carries a dark overcoat across his shoulders. They descend the steps slowly.

SALA
I think you'll find it rather cool. (He goes back into the room, picks up a cape lying there, and puts it around Johanna's shoulders; little by little they reach the garden)

JOHANNA
Do you know what I imagine?... That this day is our own — that it belongs to us alone. We have summoned it, and if we wanted, we could make it stay.... All other people live only as guests in the world to-day. Isn't that so?... The reason is, I suppose, that once I heard you speak of this day.

SALA
Of this...?

JOHANNA
Yes — while mother was still living.... And now it has really come. The leaves are red. The golden mist is lying over the woods. The sky is pale and remote — and the day is even more beautiful, and sadder, than I could ever have imagined. And I am spending it in your garden, and your pool is my mirror. (She stands looking down into the pool) And yet we can no more make it stay, this golden day, than the water here can hold my image after I have gone away.

SALA
It seems strange that this clear, mild air should be tinged with a suggestion of winter and snow.

JOHANNA
Why should it trouble you? When that suggestion has become reality here, you are already in the midst of another Spring.

SALA
What do you mean by that?

JOHANNA

Oh, I suppose that where you go they have no winter like ours.

SALA (pensively)
No, not like ours. (Pause) And you?

JOHANNA
I...?

SALA
What are you going to do, I mean, when I am gone?

JOHANNA
When you are gone...? (She looks at him, and he stands staring into the distance) Haven't you gone long ago? And at bottom, are you not far away from me even now?

SALA
What are you saying? I am here with you.... What are you going to do, Johanna?

JOHANNA
I have already told you. Go away — just like you.

SALA (shakes his head)

JOHANNA
As soon as possible. I have still the courage left. Who knows what may become of me later, if I stay here alone.

SALA
As long as you are young, all doors stand open, and the world begins outside every one of them.

JOHANNA
But the world is wide and the sky infinite only as long as you are not clinging to anybody. And for that reason I want to go away.

SALA
Away — that's so easily said. But preparations are needed for that purpose, and some sort of a scheme. You use the word as if you merely had to put on wings and fly off into the distance.

JOHANNA
To be determined is — the same as having wings.

SALA
Are you not at all afraid, Johanna?

JOHANNA
A longing free from fear would be too cheap to be worth while.

SALA

Where will it lead you?

JOHANNA
I shall find my way.

SALA
You can choose your way, but not the people that you meet.

JOHANNA
Do you think me ignorant of the fact that I cannot expect only beautiful experiences? What is ugly and mean must also be waiting for me.

SALA
And how are you going to stand it? — Will you be able to stand it at all?

JOHANNA
Of course, I am not going to tell the truth always as I have done to you. I shall have to lie — and I think of it with pleasure. I shall not always be in good spirits, nor always sensible. I shall make mistakes and suffer. That's the way it has to be, I suppose.

SALA
Of all this you are aware in advance, and yet...?

JOHANNA
Yes.

SALA
And why?... Why are you going away, Johanna?

JOHANNA
Why am I going away?... I want a time to come when I must shudder at myself. Shudder as deeply as you can only when nothing has been left untried. Just as you have had to do when you looked back upon your life. Or have you not?

SALA
Oh, many times. But just in such moments of shuddering there is nothing left behind at all — everything is once more present. And the present is the past. (He sits down on the stone seat)

JOHANNA
What do you mean by that?

SALA (covers his eyes with his hand and sits silent)

JOHANNA
What is the matter? Where are you anyhow?
[A light wind stirs the leaves and makes many of them drop to the ground.

SALA

I am a child, riding my pony across the fields. My father is behind and calls to me. At that window waits my mother. She has thrown a gray satin shawl over her dark hair and is waving her hand at me.... And I am a young lieutenant in maneuvers, standing on a hillock and reporting to my colonel that hostile infantry is ambushed behind that wooded piece of ground, ready to charge, and down below us I can see the midday sun glittering on bayonets and buttons.... And I am lying alone in my boat adrift, looking up into the deep-blue Summer sky, while words of incomprehensible beauty are shaping themselves in my mind — words more beautiful than I have ever been able to put on paper.... And I am resting on a bench in the cool park at the lake of Lugano, with Helen sitting beside me; she holds a book with red cover in her hand; over there by the magnolia, Lillie is playing with the light-haired English boy, and I can hear them prattling and laughing.... And I am walking slowly back and forth with Julian on a bed of rustling leaves, and we are talking of a picture which we saw yesterday. And I see the picture: two old sailors with worn-out faces, who are seated on an overturned skiff, their sad eyes directed toward the boundless sea. And I feel their misery more deeply than the artist who painted them; more deeply than they could have felt it themselves, had they been alive.... All this — all of it is there — if I only close my eyes. It is nearer to me than you, Johanna, when I don't see you and you keep quiet.

JOHANNA (stands looking at him with wistful sympathy)

SALA

The present — what does it mean anyhow? Are we then locked breast to breast with the moment as with a friend whom we embrace — or an enemy who is pressing us? Has not the word that just rings out turned to memory already? Is not the note that starts a melody reduced to memory before the song is ended? Is your coming to this garden anything but a memory, Johanna? Are not your steps across that meadow as much a matter of the past as are the steps of creatures dead these many years?

JOHANNA

No, it mustn't be like that. It makes me sad.

SALA (with a return to present things)

Why?... It shouldn't, Johanna. It is in hours like those we know, that we have lost nothing, and that in reality we cannot lose anything.

JOHANNA

Oh, I wish you had lost and forgotten everything, so that I might be everything to you!

SALA (somewhat astonished)

Johanna....

JOHANNA (passionately)

I love you. (Pause)

SALA

In a few days I shall be gone, Johanna. You know it — you have known it right along.

JOHANNA
I know. Why do you repeat it? Do you think, perhaps, that all at once I may begin to clutch at you like a love-sick thing, dreaming of eternities? — No, that isn't my way — oh, no!... But I want to tell you once at least that I am fond of you. May I not for once? — Do you hear? I love you. And I wish that sometime later on you may hear it just as I am saying it now — at some other moment no less beautiful than this — when we two shall no longer be aware of each other.

SALA
Indeed, Johanna, of one thing you may be sure: that the sound of your voice shall never leave me. — But why should we talk of parting forever? Perhaps we shall meet again sooner or later... in three years... or in five.... (With a smile) Then you have become a princess perhaps, and I may be the ruler of some buried city.... Why don't you speak?

JOHANNA (pulls the cape more closely about her)

SALA
Do you feel cold?

JOHANNA
Not at all. — But now I must go.

SALA
Are you in such a hurry?

JOHANNA
It is getting late. I must be back before my father gets home.

SALA
How strange! To-day you are hurrying home, fearful of being too late, lest your father get worried. And in a couple of days....

JOHANNA
Then he will no longer be waiting for me. Farewell, Stephan.

SALA
Until to-morrow, then.

JOHANNA
Yes, until to-morrow.

SALA
You'll come through the garden gate, of course?

JOHANNA
Wasn't that a carriage that stopped before the house?

SALA

The doors are locked. Nobody can get out into the garden.

JOHANNA
Good-by, then.

SALA
Until to-morrow.

JOHANNA
Yes. (She is about to go)

SALA
Listen, Johanna. — If I should say to you now: stay!

JOHANNA
No, I must go now.

SALA
That was not what I meant.

JOHANNA
What then?

SALA
I mean, if I should beg you to stay — for — a long time?

JOHANNA
You have a peculiar way of jesting.

SALA
I am not jesting.

JOHANNA
Do you forget, then, that you — are going away?

SALA
I am not bound in any respect. There is nothing to prevent me from staying at home if I don’t feel like going away.

JOHANNA
For my sake?

SALA
I didn’t say so. Maybe for my own sake.

JOHANNA
No, you mustn’t give it up. You would never forgive me if I took that away from you.

SALA
Oh, you think so? (Watching her closely) And if both of us were to go?

JOHANNA
What?

SALA
If you should risk going along with me? Well, it takes a little courage to do it, of course. But you would probably not be the only woman. The Baroness Golobin is also going along, I hear.

JOHANNA
Are you talking seriously?

SALA
Quite seriously. I ask if you care to go with me on that journey... as my wife, of course, seeing that we have to consider externals like that, too.

JOHANNA
I should...?

SALA
Why does that move you so deeply?

JOHANNA
With you? — With you...?

SALA
Don't misunderstand me, Johanna. That's no reason why you should be tied to me for all time. When we get back, we can bid each other good-by — without the least ado. It is a very simple matter. For all your dreams cannot be fulfilled by me — I know that very well.... You need not give me an answer at once. Hours like these turn too easily into words that are not true the next day. And I hope I may never hear you speak one word of that kind.

JOHANNA (who has been looking at Sala as if she wanted to drink up every one of his words) No, I am not saying anything — I am not saying anything.

SALA (looking long at her)
You are going to think it over, and you'll let me know to-morrow morning?

JOHANNA
Yes. (She looks long at him)

SALA
What is the matter?

JOHANNA
Nothing. — Until to-morrow. Farewell. (He accompanies her to the garden gate, through which she disappears)

SALA (comes back and stands looking into the pool)
Just as if I wanted to find her image in it.... What could it be that moved her so deeply?... Happiness?... No, it wasn't happiness.... Why did she look at me like that? Why did she seem to shrink? There was something in her glance like a farewell forever. (He makes a sudden movement as of fright) Has it come to that with me?... But how can she know?... Then others must know it too...! (He stands staring into space; then he ascends the terrace slowly and goes into the drawing-room, from which he returns a few moments later accompanied by Julian)

JULIAN
And you want to leave all these splendors so soon?

SALA
They'll be here when I come back, I hope.

JULIAN
I hope you will, for the sake of both of us.

SALA
You say that rather distrustingly....

JULIAN
Well, yes — I am thinking of that remarkable article in the Daily Post.

SALA
Concerning what?

JULIAN
What is going on at the Caspian Sea.

SALA
Oh, are the local papers also taking that up?

JULIAN
The conditions in certain regions through which you have to pass seem really to be extremely dangerous.

SALA
Exaggerations. We have better information than that. According to my opinion there is nothing back of those articles but the petty jealousy of English scientists. What you read had been translated from the Daily News. And it's fully three weeks since it appeared there. — Have you seen Felix, by the way?

JULIAN
He was at my house only last night. And this morning I called on the Wegrats. He wanted to have a look at that picture of his mother which I painted twenty-three years ago. — And one thing and another led to my telling him everything.

SALA
Oh, you did? (Thoughtfully) And how did he take it?

JULIAN
It stirred him rather more than I had thought possible.

SALA
Well, I hope you didn't expect him to fall into your arms as the recovered son does in the play.

JULIAN
No, of course not. — I told him everything, without any attempt at sparing myself. And for that reason he seemed to feel the wrong done to his mother's husband more strongly than anything else. But that won't last very long. He'll soon understand that, in the higher sense, no wrong has been done at all. People of Wegrat's type are not made to hold actual possession of anything — whether it be wives or children. They mean a refuge, a dwelling place — but never a real home. Can you understand what I mean by that? It is their mission to take into their arms creatures who have been worn out or broken to pieces by some kind of passion. But they never guess whence such creatures come. And while it is granted them to attract and befriend, they never understand whither those creatures go. They exist for the purpose of sacrificing themselves unconsciously, and in such sacrifices they find a happiness that might seem a pretty poor one to others.... You are not saying a word?

SALA
I am listening.

JULIAN
And have no reply to make?

SALA
Oh, well — it is possible to grind out scales quite smoothly even when the fiddle has got a crack....
[It is growing darker. Felix appears on the terrace.

SALA
Who is that?

FELIX (on the terrace)
It's me. The servant told me...

SALA
Oh, Felix! Glad you came.

FELIX (coming down into the garden)
Good evening, Mr. von Sala. — Good evening, Mr. Fichtner.

JULIAN
Good evening, Felix.

SALA

I am delighted to see you.

FELIX
What magnificent old trees!

SALA
Yes, a piece of real woods — all you have to do is to forget the fence. — What brought you anyhow? I didn't expect you until to-morrow morning. Have you really made up your mind already?

JULIAN
Am I in the way?

FELIX
Oh, no. There is nothing secret about it. — I accept your offer, Mr. von Sala, and ask if you would be kind enough to speak to Count Ronsky.

SALA (shaking Felix by the hand)

I am glad of it.... (To Julian) It has to do with our Asiatic venture.

JULIAN
What? — You intend to join the expedition?

FELIX
Yes.

SALA
Have you already talked it over with your father?

FELIX
I shall do so to-night. — But that's a mere formality. I am determined, provided no other obstacles appear....

SALA
I shall speak to the Count this very day.

FELIX
I don't know how to thank you.

SALA
There is no reason at all. In fact, I don't have to say another word. The Count knows everything he needs to know about you.

VALET (appearing on the terrace)
There is a lady asking if you are at home, sir.

SALA
Didn't she give her name? — You'll have to excuse me a moment, gentlemen. (He goes toward the valet, and both disappear into the house)

JULIAN
You are going away?

FELIX
Yes. And I am very happy this occasion has offered itself.

JULIAN
Have you also informed yourself concerning the real nature of this undertaking?

FELIX
It means at any rate genuine activity and the opening of wider worlds.

JULIAN
And couldn't those things be found in connection with more hopeful prospects?

FELIX
That's possible. But I don't care to wait.
[Sala and Irene enter.

IRENE (still on the terrace, talking to Sala)

I couldn't leave Vienna without keeping my promise.

SALA
And I thank you for it, Miss Herms.

IRENE (descending into the garden with Sala)
You have a wonderful place here. — How do you do, Julian? Good evening, Lieutenant.

SALA
You should have come earlier, Miss Herms, so that you could have seen it in full sunlight.

IRENE
Why, I was here two hours ago. But it was like an enchanted castle. It was impossible to get in. The bell didn't ring at all.

SALA
Oh, of course! I hope you pardon. If I had had the slightest idea....

IRENE
Well, it doesn't matter. I have made good use of my time. I went on through the woods as far as Neustift and Salmansdorf. And then I got out and followed a road that I remembered since many years ago. (She looks at Julian) I rested on a bench where I sat once many, many years ago, with a close friend. (Smilingly) Can you guess, Mr. Fichtner? The outlook is wonderful. Beyond the fields you have a perfect view of the whole city as far as the Danube.

SALA (pointing to the stone seat)

Won’t you sit down here for a while, Miss Herms?

IRENE
Thanks. (She raises her lorgnette to study the busts of the two emperors) It makes one feel quite Roman.... But I hope, gentlemen, I haven’t interrupted any conference.

SALA
Not at all.

IRENE
I have that feeling, however. All of you look so serious. — I think I’ll rather leave.

SALA
Oh, you mustn’t, Miss Herms. — Is there anything more you want to ask me about that affair of ours, Felix?

FELIX
If Miss Herms would pardon me for a minute....

IRENE
Oh, certainly — please!

SALA
You’ll excuse me, Miss Herms....

FELIX
It is a question of what I should do in regard to my present commission. — (He is still speaking as he goes out with Sala)

IRENE
What kind of secrets have those two together? What’s going on here anyhow?

JULIAN
Nothing that can be called a secret. That young fellow is also going to join the expedition, I hear. And so they have a lot of things to talk over, of course.

IRENE (who has been following Felix and Sala with her eyes) Julian — it’s he.

JULIAN (remains silent)

IRENE
You don’t need to answer me. The matter has been in my mind all the time.... The only thing I can’t understand is why I haven’t discovered it before. It is he. — And he is twenty-three. — And I who actually thought when you drove me away: if only he doesn’t kill himself!... And there goes his son.

JULIAN
What does that help me? He doesn’t belong to me.

IRENE

But look at him! He is there — he's alive, and young, and handsome. Isn't that enough? (She rises) And I who was ruined by it!

JULIAN
How?

IRENE
Do you understand? Ruined....

JULIAN
I have never suspected it.

IRENE
Well, you couldn't have helped me anyhow. (Pause) Good-by. Make an excuse for me, please. Tell them anything you want. I am going away, and I don't want to know anything more.

JULIAN
What's the matter with you? Nothing has changed.

IRENE
You think so? — To me it is as if all these twenty-three years had suddenly undergone a complete change. — Good-by.

JULIAN
Good-by — for a while.

IRENE
For a while? Do you care? — Really? — Do you feel sad, Julian? — Now I am sorry for you again. (Shaking her head) Of course, that's the way you are. So what is there to do about it?

JULIAN
Please control yourself. Here they are coming.

SALA (returns with Felix)
Now we're all done.

FELIX
Thank you very much. I shall have to leave now.

IRENE
And to-morrow you are already going away again?

FELIX
Yes, Miss Herms.

IRENE
You're also going toward the city now, Lieutenant, are you not? If you don't object, I'll take you along.

FELIX
That's awfully kind of you.

SALA
What, Miss Herms...? This is a short visit indeed.

IRENE
Yes, I have still a few errands to do. For to-morrow I must return to the wilderness. And probably it will be some time before I get to Vienna again. — Well, Lieutenant?

FELIX
Good-by, Mr. Fichtner. And if I shouldn't happen to see you again....

JULIAN
Oh, we'll meet again.

IRENE
Now the people will say: look at the lieutenant with his mamma in tow. (She gives a last glance to Julian)

SALA (accompanies Irene and Felix up the steps to the terrace)

JULIAN (remains behind, walking back and forth; after a while he is joined by Sala) Have you no doubt that your appeal to Count Ronsky will be effective?

SALA
I have already received definite assurances from him, or I should never have aroused any hopes in Felix.

JULIAN
What caused you to do this, Sala?

SALA
My sympathy for Felix, I should say, and the fact that I like to travel in pleasant company.

JULIAN
And did it never occur to you, that the thought of losing him might be very painful to me?

SALA
What's the use of that, Julian? It is only possible to lose what you possess. And you cannot possess a thing to which you have not acquired any right. You know that as well as I do.

JULIAN
Does not, in the last instance, the fact that you need somebody give you a certain claim on him? — Can't you understand, Sala, that he represents my last hope?... That actually I haven't got anything or anybody left but him?... That wherever I turn, I find nothing but emptiness?... That I am horrified by the loneliness awaiting me?

SALA

And what could it help you if he stayed? And even if he felt something like filial tenderness toward you, how could that help you?... How can he or anybody else help you?... You say that loneliness horrifies you?... And if you had a wife by your side to-day, wouldn't you be lonely just the same?... Wouldn't you be lonely even if you were surrounded by children and grandchildren?... Suppose you had kept your money, your fame and your genius — don't you think you would be lonely for all that?... Suppose we were always attended by a train of bacchantes — nevertheless we should have to tread the downward path alone — we, who have never belonged to anybody ourselves. The process of aging must needs be a lonely one for our kind, and he is nothing but a fool who doesn't in time prepare himself against having to rely on any human being.

JULIAN
And do you imagine, Sala, that you need no human being?

SALA
In the manner I have used them they will always be at my disposal. I have always been in favor of keeping at a certain distance. It is not my fault that other people haven't realized it.

JULIAN
In that respect you are right, Sala. For you have never really loved anybody in this world.

SALA
Perhaps not. And how about you? No more than I, Julian.... To love means to live for the sake of somebody else. I don't say that it is a more desirable form of existence, but I do think, at any rate, that you and I have been pretty far removed from it. What has that which one like us brings into the world got to do with love? Though it include all sorts of funny, hypocritical, tender, unworthy, passionate things that pose as love — it isn't love for all that.... Have we ever made a sacrifice by which our sensuality or our vanity didn't profit?... Have we ever hesitated to betray or blackguard decent people, if by doing so we could gain an hour of happiness or of mere lust?... Have we ever risked our peace or our lives — not out of whim or recklessness — but to promote the welfare of someone who had given all to us?... Have we ever denied ourselves an enjoyment unless from such denial we could at least derive some comfort?... And do you think that we could dare to turn to any human being, man or woman, with a demand that any gift of ours be returned? I am not thinking of pearls now, or annuities, or cheap wisdom, but of some piece of our real selves, some hour of our own existence, which we have surrendered to such a being without at once exacting payment for it in some sort of coin. My dear Julian, we have kept our doors open, and have allowed our treasures to be viewed — but prodigal with them we have never been. You no more than I. We may just as well join hands, Julian. I am a little less prone to complain than you are — that's the whole difference.... But I am not telling you anything new. All this you know as well as I do. It is simply impossible for us not to know ourselves. Of course, we try at times conscientiously to deceive ourselves, but it never works. Our follies and rascalities may remain hidden to others — but never to ourselves. In our innermost souls we always know what to think of ourselves. — It's getting cold, Julian. Let's go indoors.
(They begin to ascend the steps to the terrace)

JULIAN
All that may be true, Sala. But this much you have to grant me. If there be anybody in the world who has no right to make us pay for the mistakes of our lives, it is a person who has us to thank for his own life.

SALA

There is no question of payment in this. Your son has a mind for essentials, Julian. You have said so yourself. And he feels that to have done nothing for a man but to put him into the world, is to have done very little indeed.

JULIAN

Then, at least, everything must become as it was before he knew anything at all. Once more I shall become to him a human being like anybody else. Then he will not dare to leave me.... I cannot bear it. How have I deserved that he should run away from me?... And even if all that I have held for good and true within myself — even if, in the end, my very fondness for this young man, who is my son — should prove nothing but self-delusion — yet I love him now.... Do you understand me, Sala? I love him, and all I ask is that he may believe it before I must lose him forever....

[It grows dark. The two men pass across the terrace and enter the drawing-room. The stage stands empty a little while. In the meantime the wind has risen somewhat. Johanna enters by the avenue of trees from the right and goes past the pool toward the terrace. The windows of the drawing-room are illumined. Sala has seated himself at a table. The valet enters the room and serves him a glass of wine. Johanna stops. She is apparently much excited. Then she ascends two of the steps to the terrace. Sala seems to hear a noise and turns his head slightly. When she sees this, Johanna hurries down again and stops beside the pool. There she stands looking down into the water.

CURTAIN

THE FIFTH ACT

THE GARDEN AT the Wegrats'.

REUMANN (sits at a small table and writes something in his notebook)

JULIAN (enters quickly by way of the veranda)
Is it true, Doctor?

REUMANN (rising)
Yes, it's true.

JULIAN
She has disappeared?

REUMANN
Yes, she has disappeared. She has been gone since yesterday afternoon. She has left no word behind, and she has taken nothing at all with her — she has simply gone away and never returned.

JULIAN
But what can have happened to her?

REUMANN
We have not been able to guess even. Perhaps she has lost her way and will come back. Or she has suddenly made up her mind — if we only knew to what!

JULIAN
Where are the others?

REUMANN
We agreed to meet here again at ten. I visited the various hospitals and other places where it might be possible to find some trace.... I suppose the professor has made a report to the police by this time.

FELIX (enters quickly)
Nothing new?

REUMANN
Nothing.

JULIAN (shakes hands with Felix)

REUMANN
From where do you come?

FELIX

I went to see Mr. von Sala.

REUMANN
Why?

FELIX
I thought it rather possible that he might have a suspicion, or be able to give us some kind of direction. But he knows nothing at all. That was perfectly clear. And if he had known anything — had known anything definite — he would have told me. I am sure of that. He was still in bed when I called on him. I suppose he thought I had come about my own matter. When he heard that Johanna had disappeared, he turned very pale.... But he doesn't know anything.

WEGRAT (enters)
Anything?
[All the others shake their heads. Julian presses his hand.

WEGRAT (sitting down)
They asked me to give more details, something more tangible to go by. But what is there to give?... I have nothing.... The whole thing is a riddle to me. (Turning to Julian) In the afternoon she went out for a short walk as usual.... (To Felix) Was there anything about her that attracted attention?... It seems quite impossible to me that she could have had anything in mind when she left the house — that she could know already — that she was going away forever.

FELIX
Perhaps though....

WEGRAT
Of course, she was very reserved — especially of late, since the death of her mother.... I wonder if it could be that?... Would you think that possible, Doctor?

REUMANN (shrugs his shoulders)

FELIX
Did any one of us really know her? And who takes a real interest in another person anyhow?

REUMANN
It is apparently fortunate that such is the case. Otherwise we should all go mad from pity or loathing or anxiety. (Pause) Now I must get around to my patients. There are a few calls that cannot be postponed. I shall be back by dinner-time. Good-by for a while. (He goes out)

WEGRAT
To think that you can watch a young creature like her grow up — can see the child turn into girl, and then into a young lady — can speak hundreds of thousands of words to her.... And one day she rises from the table, puts on hat and coat, and goes... and you have no idea as to whether she has slipped away — if into nothingness or into a new life.

FELIX
But whatever may have happened, father — she wanted to get away from us. And in that fact, I think, we should find a certain consolation.

WEGRAT (shakes his head in perplexity)
Everything is fluttering away — willingly or unwillingly — but away it goes.

FELIX
Father, we can't tell what may have happened. It's conceivable, at least, that Johanna may have formed some decision which she does not carry out. Perhaps she will come back in a few hours, or days.

WEGRAT
You believe... you think it possible, do you?

FELIX
Possible — yes. But if she shouldn't come — of course, father, I shall give up the plan of which I told you yesterday. Under circumstances like these I couldn't think of going so far away from you for such a long time.

WEGRAT (to Julian)
And now he's going to sacrifice himself for my sake!

FELIX
Perhaps I could arrange to have myself transferred here.

WEGRAT
No, Felix, you know very well that I couldn't accept such a thing.

FELIX
But it's no sacrifice. I assure you, father, that I stay with you only because I can't go away from you now.

WEGRAT
Oh, yes, Felix, you can — you will be able. And you are not to stay here for my sake — you mustn't. I could never be sure that it would prove of any help to me to have you give up a plan which you have taken hold of with such enthusiasm. I think it would be inexcusable of you to draw back, and wicked of me to permit it. You must be happy at having found a way at last, by which you may reach all you have longed for. It makes me happy, too, Felix. If you missed this opportunity, you would regret it all your life.

FELIX
But so much may have changed since yesterday — such a tremendous lot — for you and for me.

WEGRAT
For me, perhaps.... But never mind. I won't stand it — I will not accept such a sacrifice. Of course, I might accept it, if I could find it of any special advantage to myself. But I shouldn't have you any more than if you were gone away... less... not at all. This fate that has descended on us must not add to its inherent power what is still worse — that it makes us do in our confusion what is against our own natures. Sometime we always get over every disaster, no matter how frightful it be. But whatever we do in violation of our innermost selves can never be undone. (Turning to Julian) Isn't that true, Julian?

JULIAN
You are absolutely right.

FELIX
Thanks, father. I feel grateful that you make it so easy for me to agree with you.

WEGRAT
That's good, Felix.... During the weeks you will remain in Europe we shall be able to talk over a lot of things — more perhaps than in the years gone by. Indeed, how little people know about each other!... But I am getting tired. We stayed awake all night.

FELIX
Won't you rest a while, father?

WEGRAT
Rest.... You'll stay at home, Felix, won't you?

FELIX
Yes, I shall wait right here. What else is there to do?

WEGRAT
I'm racking my brain until it's near bursting.... Why didn't she say anything to me? Why have I known so little about her? Why have I kept so far away from her? (He goes out)

FELIX
How that man has been belied — all his life long — by all of us.

JULIAN
There is in this world no sin, no crime, no deception, that cannot be atoned. Only for what has happened here, there should be no expiation and no forgetfulness, you think?

FELIX
Can it be possible that you don't understand?... Here a lie has been eternalized. There is no getting away from it. And she who did it was my mother — and it was you who made her do it — and the lie am I, and such I must remain as long as I am passing for that which I am not.

JULIAN
Let us proclaim the truth then, Felix. — I shall face any judge that you may choose, and submit to any verdict passed on me. — Must I alone remain condemned forever? Should I alone, among all that have erred, never dare to say: "It is atoned"?

FELIX
It is too late. Guilt can be wiped out by confession only while the guilty one is still able to make restitution. You ought to know yourself, that this respite expired long ago.

SALA (enters)

FELIX
Mr. von Sala! — Have you anything to tell us?

SALA
Yes. — Good morning, Julian. — No, stay, Julian. I am glad to have a witness. (To Felix) Are you determined to join the expedition?

FELIX
I am.

SALA
So am I. But it is possible that one of us must change his mind.

FELIX
Mr. von Sala...?

SALA
It would be a bad thing to risk finding out that you have started on a journey of such scope with one whom you would prefer to shoot dead if you knew him completely.

FELIX
Where is my sister, Mr. von Sala?

SALA
I don’t know. Where she is at this moment, I don’t know. But last evening, just before you arrived, she had left me for the last time.

FELIX
Mr. von Sala....

SALA
Her farewell words to me were: Until to-morrow. You can see that I had every reason to be surprised this morning, when you appeared at my house. Permit me furthermore to tell you, that yesterday, of all days, I asked Johanna to become my wife — which seemed to agitate her very much. In telling you this, I have by no means the intention of smoothing over things. For my question implied no desire on my part to make good any wrong I might have done. It was apparently nothing but a whim — like so much else. There is here no question of anything but to let you know the truth. This means that I am at your disposal in any manner you may choose. — I thought it absolutely necessary to say all this before we were brought to the point of having to descend into the depths of the earth together, or, perhaps, to sleep in the same tent.

FELIX (after a long pause)
Mr. von Sala... we shall not have to sleep in the same tent.

SALA
Why not?

FELIX
Your journey will not last that long.
[A very long pause ensues.

SALA
Oh... I understand. And are you sure of that?

FELIX
Perfectly. (Pause}

SALA
And did Johanna know it?

FELIX
Yes.

SALA
I thank you. — Oh, you can safely take my hand. The matter has been settled in the most chivalrous manner possible. — Well?... It is not customary to refuse one's hand to him who is already down.

FELIX (gives his hand to Sala; then he says)
And where can she be?

SALA
I don't know.

FELIX
Didn't she give you any hint at all?

SALA
None whatever.

FELIX
But have you no conjecture? Has she perhaps established any connections — abroad? Had she any friends at all, of which I don't know?

SALA
Not to my knowledge.

FELIX
Do you think that she is still alive?

SALA
I can't tell.

FELIX
Are you not willing to say anything more, Mr. von Sala?

SALA
I am not able to say anything more. I have nothing left to say. Farewell, and good luck on your trip. Give my regards to Count Ronsky.

FELIX
But we are not seeing each other for the last time?

SALA
Who can tell?

FELIX (holding out his hand to Sala)

I must hurry to my father. I think it my duty to let him know what I have just learned from you.

SALA (nods)

FELIX (to Julian)
Good-by. (He goes out)
[Julian and Sala start to leave together.

JULIAN (as Sala suddenly stops)
Why do you tarry? Let's get away.

SALA
It is a strange thing to know. A veil seems to spread in front of everything.... "Away with you!" — But I don't care to submit to it as long as I am still here — if it be only for another hour....

JULIAN
Do you believe it then?

SALA (looking long at Julian)
Do I believe it...? He behaved rather nicely, that son of yours.... "We shall not have to sleep in the same tent."... Not bad! I might have said it myself....

JULIAN
But why don't you come? Have you perhaps something more to tell after all?

SALA
That's the question I must put to you, Julian.

JULIAN
Sala?

SALA
Because I didn't say anything about a peculiar hallucination I experienced just before coming here. I imagine it was....

JULIAN

Please, speak out!

SALA
What do you think of it? Before I left my house — just after Felix had gone — I went down into my garden — that is to say, I ran through it — in a remarkable state of excitement, as you may understand. And as I passed by the pool, it was exactly as if I had seen on the bottom of it....

JULIAN
Sala!

SALA
There is a blue-greenish glitter on the water, and besides, the shadow of the beech tree falls right across it early in the morning. And by a strange coincidence Johanna said yesterday: “The water can no more hold my image....” That was, in a way, like challenging fate.... And as I passed by the pool, it was as if... the water had retained her image just the same.

JULIAN
Is that true?

SALA
True... or untrue... what is that to me? It could be of interest to me only if I were to remain in this world another year — or another hour at least.

JULIAN
You mean to...?

SALA
Of course, I do. Would you expect me to wait for it? That would be rather painful, I think. (To Julian, with a smile) From whom are you now going to get your cues, my dear friend? Yes, it’s all over now.... And what has become of it?... Where are the thermæ of Caracalla? Where is the park at Lugano?... Where is my nice little house?... No nearer to me, and no farther away, than those marble steps leading down to mysterious depths.... Veils in front of everything.... Perhaps your son will discover if the three-hundred and twelfth be the last one — and if not, it won’t give him much concern anyhow.... Don’t you think he has been acting rather nicely?... I have somehow the impression that a better generation is growing up — with more poise and less brilliancy. — Send your regards to heaven, Julian.

JULIAN (makes a movement to accompany him)

SALA (gently but firmly)
You stay here, Julian. This is the end of our dialogue. Farewell. (He goes out quickly)

FELIX (entering rapidly)
Is Mr. von Sala gone? My father wanted to talk to him. — And you are still here?... Why did Mr. von Sala go? What did he tell you? — Johanna...! Johanna...?

JULIAN

She is dead... she has drowned herself in the pool.

FELIX (with a cry of dismay)
Where did he go?

JULIAN
I don't think you can find him.

FELIX
What is he doing?

JULIAN
He is paying... while it's time....

WEGRAT (enters from the veranda)

FELIX (runs to meet him)
Father....

WEGRAT
Felix! What has happened?

FELIX
We must go to Sala's house, father.

WEGRAT
Dead...?

FELIX
Father! (He takes hold of Wegrat's hand and kisses it) My father!

JULIAN (has left the room slowly in the meantime)

WEGRAT
Must things of this kind happen to make that word sound as if I had heard it for the first time...?

CURTAIN

Intermezzo (1904)

A COMEDY IN THREE ACTS

Original German Title: 'Zwischenspiel'

Translated by Edwin Björkman, 1915

CONTENTS

PERSONS
THE FIRST ACT
THE SECOND ACT
THE THIRD ACT

PERSONS

Amadeus Adams, A musical conductor
Cecilia Adams-Ortenburg, His wife, an opera singer
Peter, Their child, five years old
Albert Rhon
Marie, His wife
Sigismund, Prince Maradas-Lohsenstein
Countess Frederique Mooshei, An opera singer
Governess (At the Adamses)
Chambermaid (At the Adamses)

The scene is laid in Vienna at the present day.

THE FIRST ACT

THE STUDY OF Amadeus. The walls are painted in dark gray, with a very simple frieze. A door in the background leads to a veranda. On either side of this door is a window. Through the door one sees the garden, to which three steps lead down from the veranda. A cabinet stands between the door and the window at the right; a music-stand holds a corresponding position to the left of the door. Antique has-reliefs are hung above the cabinet as well as the stand. The main entrance is on the right side in the foreground. Farther back at the right is a door leading to Cecilia's room. A door finished like the rest of the wall leads to the room of Amadeus at the left. A tall book case, with a bust of Verrochio on top of it, stands against the right wall. In the corner back of it are several columns with tall vases full of flowers. A fireplace occupies the foreground at the left. Above it is a large mirror. On the mantelshelf stands a French clock of simple design. A table surrounded by chairs is placed in front of the fireplace. Farther back along the same wall are shelves piled with sheet music, and above them engravings of Schumann, Brahms, Mozart, and other composers. A bust of Beethoven occupies the farthermost corner at the left. Halfway down the stage, nearer the left wall, stands a piano with a piano stool in front of it. An armchair has been moved up close to the piano on the side toward the public. A writing desk holds a similar position at the right. Back of it are an easy-chair and a couch, the latter having been moved close to the table.

AMADEUS (thirty years old, slender, with dark, smooth hair; his movements are quick, with a suggestion of restlessness; he wears a gray business suit of elegant cut, but not well cared for; he has a trick of taking hold of the lapel of his sack coat with his left hand and turning it back; he is seated at the piano, accompanying Frederique)

FREDERIQUE (twenty-eight, is dressed in a bright gray tailor-made suit and a red satin waist; wears a broad-brimmed straw hat, very fashionable; her hair is blonde, of a reddish tint; her whole appearance is very dainty; she is singing an aria from the opera "Mignon") "Ha-ha-ha! Is 't true, really true?" (While singing she is all the time making a motion as if she were beating the dust out of her riding suit with a crop)

AMADEUS (accompanying himself as he gives her the cue) "Yes, you may laugh. I am a fool to ruin my horse..."

FREDERIQUE
"Maybe you would like..."

AMADEUS (nervously)
Oh, wait!... You don't know yet why I have ruined my horse.... "To ruin my horse for a quicker sight of you..."

FREDERIQUE (with the same gesture as before)
"Maybe you would like me to weep?"

AMADEUS
"Oh, I regret already that I came."

FREDERIQUE (as before)
"Well, why...."

AMADEUS
G sharp!

FREDERIQUE (as before)
"Well, why don't you go back? Soon enough I shall see you again."

AMADEUS
You should say that ironically, not tenderly. "Soon enough I shall see you again...."

FREDERIQUE (as before)
"Soon enough I shall see you again...."

AMADEUS
Not angrily, Countess, but ironically.

FREDERIQUE
Call me Frederique, and not Countess, when you are working with me.

AMADEUS
Now, that's the tone Philine should use. Hold on to it.... And that's the right look, too.... If you could do that on the stage, you might almost be an artist.

FREDERIQUE
Oh, mercy, I have sung Philine more than twenty times already.

AMADEUS
But not here, Freder... Countess. And not when Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg was singing the part of Mignon. (He leans forward so that he can look out into the garden)

FREDERIQUE
No, she isn't coming yet. (With a smile) Perhaps the rehearsal isn't over.

AMADEUS (rising)
Perhaps not.

FREDERIQUE
Is it true that Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg has been requested to sing in Berlin next Fall?

AMADEUS
Nothing has been settled yet. (He goes to the window at the right) If you'll permit.... (Opens the window)

FREDERIQUE
What a splendid day! And how fragrant the roses are. It is almost like....

AMADEUS

Almost like Tremezzo — yes, I know.

FREDERIQUE
How can you — as you have never been there?

AMADEUS
But you have told me enough about it. A villa standing at the edge of the water — radiantly white — with marble steps leading straight down to the blue sea.

FREDERIQUE
Yes. And sometimes, on very hot nights, I sleep in the park, right on the sward, under a plane tree.

AMADEUS
That plane tree is famous. — But time is flying. It would be better to go on with the singing. (He seats himself at the piano again) The polonaise — if you please, Countess. (He begins the accompaniment)

FREDERIQUE (singing)
"Titania, airiest queen of fairies,
Has descended from her blue cloud throne,
And her way across the world is wending
More quickly than the bird or lightning flash..."

AMADEUS (interrupts his playing and lets his head sink forward) No, no — it's no use!... Please tell the director that he will have to look after your part himself. As for me, I have certain regards even for people who go to the opera in Summer. They should not be forced to accept anything. Tell the director, please, that I send him my regards and that — there are more important things to occupy my time. (He closes the score)

FREDERIQUE (quite amicably)

I believe it. How's your opera getting along?

AMADEUS
For the Lord's sake, please don't pretend to be interested in things of that kind! Why, nobody expects it of you.

FREDERIQUE
Will it soon be finished?

AMADEUS
Finished...? How could it be, do you think? I have to conduct two nights a week at least, and there are rehearsals in the morning, not to mention singers that have to be coached.... Do you think a man can sit down after an hour like this and invite his muse?

FREDERIQUE
After an hour like this...? I don't think you feel quite at your ease with me, Amadeus.

AMADEUS

Not at my ease? I? With you? — I don't think you have imagined in your most reckless moments, Countess, that my wife might have anything to fear from you.

FREDERIQUE
You are determined to misunderstand me. (She has gone to the fireplace and turns now to face Amadeus) You know perfectly well why you pretend to be cross with me. Because you are in love with me.

AMADEUS (looks straight ahead and goes on playing)

FREDERIQUE
And that chord proves nothing to the contrary.

AMADEUS
That chord.... Tell me rather what kind of chord it is. (He repeats it in a fury)

FREDERIQUE
A flat major.

AMADEUS (in a tone of boredom)

G major — of course.

FREDERIQUE (close by him, with a smile)
Don't let that semi-tone spoil our happiness.

AMADEUS (rises, goes toward the background and looks out into the garden)

FREDERIQUE
Is it your wife?

AMADEUS
No, my little boy is playing out there. (He stands at the window, waving his hand at somebody outside; pause)

FREDERIQUE
You take life too hard, Amadeus.

AMADEUS (still at the window, but turning toward Frederique) I can't lie — and I don't want to. Which is not the same as taking life hard.

FREDERIQUE
Can't lie...? And yet you have been away from your wife for months at a time — haven't you? And your wife came here while you were still conducting somewhere abroad, didn't she?... So that....

AMADEUS
Those are matters which you don't quite comprehend, Countess. (He looks again toward the main entrance)

FREDERIQUE

No, your wife can’t be here yet. She won’t give up her walk on a wonderful day like this.

AMADEUS
What you have in mind now is pretty mean, Frederique.

FREDERIQUE
Why so? Of course, I know she takes a walk with you, too, now and then.

AMADEUS
Yes, when my time permits. And often she goes out with Sigismund. To-day she’s probably with him — and that’s what you wanted to bring home to me, of course.

FREDERIQUE
Why should I? You know it, don’t you? And I assure you, it has never occurred to me to see anything wrong in it. He’s a friend of yours.

AMADEUS
More than that — or less. He used to be my pupil.

FREDERIQUE
I didn’t know that.

AMADEUS
Ten years ago, while still a mere youngster, I used to live in his father’s palace. It’s hard to tell where I might have been to-day, had it not been for old Prince Lohsenstein. You see, we men have generally another kind of youth to look back at than you...

FREDERIQUE
... women artists.

AMADEUS
No, countesses, I meant to say. For three years I spent every summer in the palace at Krumau. And there — for the first time in my life — I could work in peace, all by myself, with nothing more to do than to instruct Sigismund.

FREDERIQUE
Did he want to become a pianist?

AMADEUS
Not exactly. He wanted to join some monastic order.

FREDERIQUE
No? Is that really true? — Oh, it’s queer how people change!

AMADEUS
They don’t as much as you think. He has remained a man of serious mind.

FREDERIQUE
And yet he plays dance music so charmingly...?

AMADEUS
Why shouldn't he? A good waltz and a good hymn are just as acceptable to the powers above.

FREDERIQUE
How delightful those evenings in your house used to be! No farther back than last winter.... The Count and I frequently talk of them. — Have you ceased to invite Prince Sigismund, as you have me?

AMADEUS
He was here only a fortnight ago, my dear Countess — and spent the whole evening with us. We had supper in the summer-house, and then we came in here and sat chatting for a long while, and finally he improvised some variations on the Cagliostro Waltzes before he left. — And what my wife and he say to each other during their walk, when I am not with them, will no more be hidden from me than I would hide from her what you and I have been talking of here. That's how my wife and I feel toward each other — if you'll please understand, Frederique!

FREDERIQUE
But there are things one simply can't say to each other.

AMADEUS
There can be no secrets between people like my wife and myself.

FREDERIQUE
Oh, of course... but then... what you have been saying to me will be only a small part of what you must tell your wife to-day, Amadeus. Good-by.... (She holds out her hand to him)

AMADEUS
What's in your mind now, Frederique?

FREDERIQUE
Why resist your fate? Is it so very repulsive after all? What you are to me, nobody else has ever been!

AMADEUS
And you want me to believe that?

FREDERIQUE
I shall not insist on it. But it is true nevertheless. Good-by now. Until to-morrow, Amadeus. Life is really much easier than you think.... It might be so very pleasant — and so it shall be! (She goes out)

AMADEUS (seats himself at the piano again and strikes a few notes) It is getting serious... or amusing perhaps...? (He shakes his head)

ALBERT RHON (enters; he is of medium height; his black hair, slightly streaked with gray, is worn long; he is rather carelessly dressed)

AMADEUS
Oh, is that you, Albert? How are you?

ALBERT
I have come to ask how you are getting along with our opera, Amadeus. Have you done anything?

AMADEUS
No.

ALBERT
Again nothing?

AMADEUS
I doubt whether I can get a chance here. We'll have to wait until the season is over. I have too much to do. We are now putting on "Mignon" with new people in some of the parts....

ALBERT
If I'm not very much mistaken, I saw Philine float by — with a rather intoxicated look in her eyes.... Oh, have I put my foot into it again? I beg your pardon!

AMADEUS (turning away from him)
That's right. She was here. Oh, that damned business of private rehearsals! But I hope it won't last much longer. The coming Winter is going to decide my future once for all. I have already got my leave of absence.

ALBERT
So you have made up your mind about that tour?

AMADEUS
Yes, I shall be gone for two months this time.

ALBERT
Within Germany only?

AMADEUS
I'll probably take in a few Italian cities also. Yes, my dear fellow, they know more about me abroad than here. I shall conduct my Third Symphony, and perhaps also my Fourth.

ALBERT
Have you got that far already?

AMADEUS
No. But I have hopes of the Summer. Once more I mean to do some real work.

ALBERT
Well, it's about time. — I have made out the schedule for our walking tour, by the by. And I brought along the map. Look here. We start from Niederdorf, and then by way of Plätzwiesen to Schluderbach; then to Cortina; then through the Giau Pass to Caprile; then by way of the Fedaja....

AMADEUS
I leave all that to you. I rely entirely on you.

ALBERT
Then it's settled that we'll don knapsack and alpenstock once more, to wander through the country as we used to do when we were young...?

AMADEUS
Yes, and I am looking forward to it with a great deal of pleasure.

ALBERT
You need simply to pull yourself together — a few weeks of mountain air and quiet will get you out of this.

AMADEUS
Oh, I haven't got into anything in particular. I am a little nervous. That's all.

ALBERT
Can't you see, Amadeus, how you have to force yourself in order to use this evasion toward me, who, of course, has no right whatever to demand any frankness? Can't you see how you are wasting a part of your mental energy, so to speak, on this slight disingenuousness? No, dissimulation is utterly foreign to your nature, as I have always told you. If you should ever get to the point where you had to deceive one who was near and dear to you, that would be the end of you.

AMADEUS
Your worry is quite superfluous! Haven't you known us long enough — me and Cecilia — to know that our marriage is based, above all else, on absolute frankness?

ALBERT
Many have good intentions, but their courage often deserts them at the critical moment.

AMADEUS
We have never yet kept anything hidden from each other.

ALBERT
Because so far you have had nothing to confess.

AMADEUS
Oh, a great deal, perhaps, which other people keep to themselves. Our common life has not been without its complications. We have had to be parted from each other for months at a time. I have had to rehearse in private with other singers than Philine, and (with an air of superiority) other men than Prince Sigismund must have discovered that Cecilia is pretty.

ALBERT
I haven't said a word about Cecilia.

AMADEUS
And besides, it would be quite hopeless for Cecilia or me to keep any secrets. We know each other too well

— I don’t think two people ever existed who understood each other so completely as we do.

ALBERT
I can imagine a point where the understanding would have to end, and everything else with it.

AMADEUS
Everything else maybe — but not the understanding.

ALBERT
Oh, well! If nothing is left but the understanding, that means the beginning of the end.

AMADEUS
Those are — chances that every human being must resign himself to take.

ALBERT
You don’t talk like one who has resigned himself, however, but like one who has made up his mind.

AMADEUS
Who can be perfectly sure of himself or of anybody else? We two, at any rate, are not challenging fate by feeling too secure.

ALBERT
Oh, when it comes to that, my dear fellow — fate always regards itself challenged — by doubt no less than by confidence.

AMADEUS
To be safe against any surprise brings a certain sense of tranquillity anyhow.

ALBERT
A little more tranquillity would produce a decision to avoid anything that might endanger an assured happiness.

AMADEUS
Do you think anything is to be won by that kind of avoidance? Don’t you feel rather, that the worst and most dangerous of all falsehoods is to resist temptation with a soul full of longing for it? And that it is easier to go unscathed through adventures than through desires?

ALBERT
Adventures...! Is it actually necessary, then, to live through them? A painter who has risen above pot-boiling, and who has left the follies of youth behind him, can be satisfied with a single model for all the figures that are created out of his dreams — and one who knows how to live may have all the adventures he could ever desire within the peaceful precincts of his own home. He can experience them just as fully as anybody else, but without waste of time, without unpleasantness, without danger. And if he only possess a little imagination, his wife may bear him nothing but illegitimate children without being at all aware of it.

AMADEUS
It’s an open question whether you have the right to force such a part on anybody whom you respect.

ALBERT
It is not wise to let people know what they mean to you. I have put this thought into an aphorism:
If you grasp me, you rasp me;
If I know you, I own you.

MARIE (entering from the garden with little Peter)
Peter wants me absolutely to come in. I wanted to wait for Cecilia in the garden.

AMADEUS
How are you, Marie?

MARIE
I'm not disturbing you, I hope?

GOVERNESS (comes from the garden with the intention of taking the boy away) Peter!

PETER
No, I want to stay with the grown-ups.

AMADEUS
Yes, let him be with us for a while.

GOVERNESS (returns to the veranda, where she remains visible)

MARIE
Well, have you been working a lot?

AMADEUS
Oh, we have just been talking.

ALBERT
Do you know why she asks? Because she is in love with Mr. von Rabagas.

AMADEUS
With whom?

ALBERT
Don't you remember him? He's that interesting young chap who appears in the first act as one of the King's attendants. She used, at least, to fall in love only with the heroes of my plays, but nowadays she can't even resist the subordinate characters.

AMADEUS
That should make you proud.

ALBERT
Proud, you say? But at times you can't help regretting that you must put all the beauties and virtues of the world into the figures you create, so that you have nothing but your wee bit of talent left to get along with personally.

CECILIA (enters from the right)

PETER
There's mamma!

CECILIA
Good afternoon. (She shakes hands with everybody) How are you, Marie? This is awfully nice. If I had only known.... I went for a short walk. It's such a wonderful day. — Well, Peter (kissing him), have you had your meal yet?

PETER
Yes.

GOVERNESS (entering from the veranda)
Good afternoon, Madame. Peter hasn't had his nap yet.

MARIE
Does he still have to sleep in the daytime? Our two children have quit entirely.

ALBERT
Instead they play a most exciting game every afternoon — one invented by themselves. They call it "drums and bugles."

MARIE
You must come and see us soon, Peter, so that you can learn to play that game.

PETER
I've got a music-box, and I'll take it along so we can make more noise.

CECILIA
Now you have to go. But first you must say good-by nicely.

PETER
I'll say "adieu." Good-by is so common.
[Everybody laughs. Peter goes out with the Governess. Marie and Cecilia move slowly toward the fireplace and sit down in front of it.

MARIE
Of course, I have come to ask for something.

CECILIA
Well, go on.

MARIE
There's to be a concert at which they want you to assist.

CECILIA
This season?

MARIE
Yes. But it will be in the country, not in the city... for a charitable purpose, of course. The committee would be so happy if you would sing two or three songs.

CECILIA
I think I can.

MARIE
And I shall feel very grateful, too.

CECILIA
Don't you find undertakings of that kind a lot of trouble?

MARIE
Well, you must have something to do. If I had any gifts like the rest of you, I am sure I should never bother with "people's kitchens" or "charitable teas" — and then, I suppose, I should feel more indifferent about people, too.

CECILIA (with a smile)
About people, too?

MARIE
Oh, I didn't mean it that way.

ALBERT
You see, Marie, there is something like the charm of meadows and fields in your sweet prattle, and you should never desert it for the thickets of psychological speculations. — Come on, child. These people want their dinner.

CECILIA
No, we won't eat for an hour yet.

AMADEUS
We generally work a little before we eat. To-day we might run through the songs for that concert, for instance.

CECILIA
That would suit me perfectly.

MARIE
Oh, I feel so thankful to you, Cecilia!

CECILIA
And when shall we see each other again?

ALBERT
Oh, that reminds me! We have just been talking about the Summer. Amadeus and I mean to go on a walking tour. How would it be if you two were to go somewhere with the children — some place in the Tirol, say — and wait for us there?

MARIE
Oh, that would be fine!

CECILIA
Did you hear that, Amadeus?

AMADEUS (who has been standing a little way off)
Certainly. It would be very nice.... You can wait for us in the Tirol.

CECILIA
Could you come and see me to-morrow afternoon, Marie? Then we might settle the matter.

MARIE
Yes, indeed. I am always glad when you can spare me a little of your time. — Until to-morrow, then!

ALBERT
Good-by. (He and Marie go out)

AMADEUS (is walking to and fro)

CECILIA (who is sitting on the couch, follows him with her eyes)

AMADEUS (after a turn to the window and back, speaking in a peculiarly dry tone) Well, how did it go? Have you got the finale into shape at last?

CECILIA
Oh, in a manner.

AMADEUS
The day before yesterday it had not yet been brought up to the proper level. I find, for one thing, that they don't let you assert yourself sufficiently. Your voice should be floating above the rest, instead of being submerged in the crowd.

CECILIA
Won't you come to the rehearsal to-morrow — just once more — if you can spare the time?

AMADEUS
Would it please you...?

CECILIA
I always feel more certain of myself when you are within reach. You know that, don't you?

AMADEUS

Yes — I'll come. I'll call off my appointments with Neumann and the Countess.

CECILIA
If it isn't too great a sacrifice....

AMADEUS (with assumed brusqueness)
Oh, I can make her come in the afternoon.

CECILIA
But then there will be no time left for your own work. No, better let it be.

AMADEUS
What had we better let be?

CECILIA
Don't come to the rehearsal to-morrow.

AMADEUS
Just as you say, Cecilia. I won't intrude, of course. But a moment ago you said that you felt more certain of yourself when I was within reach. And as far as my work is concerned, I don't think — Albert and I were just talking of it — nothing will come of it until the season is over.

CECILIA
That's what I suspected.

AMADEUS
But during the summer I'll complete my Fourth. I must have something new to conduct this year. And it's only a question of the final passages, for that matter. All the rest is as good as finished — in my mind at least.

CECILIA
It's a long time since you let me hear anything of it.

AMADEUS
It hasn't quite reached the point where it can be played. But, of course, you know the principal themes... the Allegro... and then the Intermezzo.... (He goes to the piano and strikes a few notes)

CECILIA
So you are going next November?

AMADEUS
Yes, for three months.

CECILIA
And during October I shall be in Berlin.

AMADEUS
Oh... is there any news in that matter?

CECILIA
Yes, I have practically closed. Reichenbach came to see me at the opera-house. I'm to appear in three parts. As Carmen under all circumstances. The other two are left to my own choice.

AMADEUS
And what do you...?

CECILIA
Tatyana, I suppose. I have heard that they have such a splendid Onyegin.

AMADEUS
Yes, Wedius. I know him. He was in Dresden when I was there. — Carmen, then, and Tatyana, and...?

CECILIA
I am still considering.... Perhaps we might talk it over?

AMADEUS
Of course. (Pause)

CECILIA
It's going to be a busy Winter.

AMADEUS
Rather. We won't see much of each other.

CECILIA
We'll have to correspond.

AMADEUS
As we have done before.

CECILIA
We're used to it.

AMADEUS
Yes. (Pause) Tell me by the way: do you actually want to assist at that charity concert?

CECILIA
Why not? I couldn't say no to Marie. Have you any objection?

AMADEUS
No — why should I? But we might use the half hour that's left to go over something. (He goes to the music-stand) What do you want to sing?

CECILIA
Oh, something of yours, for one thing...

AMADEUS

Oh, no, no.

CECILIA
Why not?

AMADEUS
There's nothing within yourself that prompts you to sing it anyhow.

CECILIA
Just as you say, Amadeus. — I don't want to intrude either.

AMADEUS (bending forward and searching among the music) How would Schumann be— "The Snow-drop?" Or... "Old Melodies"... and "Love Betrayed"....

CECILIA
Yes. And perhaps von Wolf's "Concealment," and something by Brahms. "No more to meet you, was my firm decision...."

AMADEUS
Yes, I was just holding it in my hand. (As if casually, and very dryly) So you went for a walk with Sigismund after all?

CECILIA
Yes. He sent his regards to you.

AMADEUS (smiling)
Did he? (As he brings the music sheets to the piano) Why doesn't he come here instead?

CECILIA
One of the things I like about him is that he won't.

AMADEUS
Is that so? — Oh, well! — I'll send him my regards, too. But it's really too bad that he won't come here any more. It was very nice to hear him play his waltzes — those evenings were really very pleasant.... I just happened to mention them to the Countess this afternoon.

CECELIA
Oh, you did? — And I have just seen her picture.

AMADEUS
Her picture?

CECILIA
I went with Sigismund to the Art Gallery.

AMADEUS
Oh. — They tell me it's a great success.

CECILIA
It would be a wonder if it were not. The artist spent six months on it, they say....

AMADEUS
Is that too much for a good picture?

CECELIA
No, but for the Countess. — She will probably sing Philine pretty well, by the way.

AMADEUS
You think so? I fear you are mistaken.... (Pause) Well, Cecilia, what were you talking of to-day — you and Sigismund?

CECILIA
What were we talking of...? (Pause) It's so hard to recall the words.... (As she goes slowly to the fireplace) And they have such a different sound when recalled in that way.

AMADEUS
True indeed. (Coming nearer to her) And I don't suppose it's the words that matter.... Well, Cecilia, can it be possible that you have nothing more to tell me?

CECILIA
Nothing more...? (Hesitatingly) Don't you think, Amadeus, that many things actually change character when you try to put them into words?

AMADEUS
Not for people like us.

CECILIA
That may have been true once. But... you know as well as I do... that things are no longer as they used to be.

AMADEUS
Not quite, perhaps. I know. But this shouldn't be a reason for either one of us to refuse telling the other one. Scruples of that kind would be unworthy of ourselves. This is we, Cecilia — you and me! So you may tell me fearlessly what you have to tell.

CECILIA (rising)
Don't try to encourage me, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
Well...?

CECILIA (remains silent)

AMADEUS
Do you love him?

CECILIA
Do I love him...?

AMADEUS (urgently)
Cecilia...!

CECILIA
Am I to tell you more than I think is true? Wouldn't that be a lie, too — as good or as bad as any other one?... No, I don't think I love him. It is nothing like it was when I became acquainted with you, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
That time is long past. — And you have probably forgotten what it was like. On the whole, it must be the same thing, I suppose. Only you have grown a little older since then, and you have been living with me for seven years.... No matter how far apart we may have been, you have been living with me — and we have a child....

CECILIA
Well, perhaps that's what makes the difference — but there is a difference.

AMADEUS
What really matters is nothing new, however. You feel attracted to him, don't you?

CECILIA (speaking with genuine feeling and almost tenderly)
But perhaps there is still something that holds back — that could hold me back, if it only wanted.

AMADEUS (after a pause, brusquely)
But it doesn't want to... it doesn't dare to want it. What sense could there be in it? Perhaps I might prove the stronger to-day — and the next time, perhaps — but sooner or later the day must come nevertheless, when I should suffer defeat.

CECILIA
Why?... It ought not to be necessary!

AMADEUS
And then, even if I remained victorious every time — could that be called happiness for which I must fight repeatedly and tremble all the time? Could that be called happiness in our case, who have known what is so much better?... No, Cecilia, our love should not be permitted to end in mutual distrust. I don't hold you, Cecilia, if you are attracted elsewhere — and you have known all the time that I would never hold you.

CECILIA
Maybe you are right, Amadeus. But is it pride alone that makes you let me slip away so easily?

AMADEUS
Is it love alone that brings you back when almost gone? (Pause; he goes to the window)

CECILIA
Why should we spoil these hours with bitterness, Amadeus? After all, we have nothing to reproach each other for. We have promised to be honest with each other, and my word has been kept so far.

AMADEUS
And so has mine. If you want it, I can tell you exactly what I and the Countess talked of to-day, as I have always done. And for me, Cecilia, it will even be possible to recall the very words.

CECILIA (looking long at him)

I know enough. (Pause)

AMADEUS (walking to and fro until he stops some distance away from her) And what next?

CECILIA
What next...? Perhaps it's just as well that our vacations are soon to begin. Then we may consider in peace, each one by himself, what is to come next.

AMADEUS
It seems almost as if both of us should have expected this very thing. We have made no common plans for the summer, although we have always done so before.

CECILIA
The best thing for me is probably to go with the boy to some quiet place in the Tirol... as you and Albert suggested.

AMADEUS
Yes.

CECILIA
And you...?

AMADEUS
I...? I shall make that walking tour with Albert. I want to be scrambling about in the mountains once more.

CECILIA
And finally descend into some beautiful valley — is that what you mean?

AMADEUS
That — might happen.

CECILIA (dryly)
But first — we should have to bid each other definite good-by, as there is no return from that place.

AMADEUS
Of course, there isn't! No more than from your place.

CECILIA
From mine...?

AMADEUS
Oh, it might happen that you felt inclined to... change your plans... and instead of staying with Marie... prefer the undisturbed...

CECILIA
I won't change my plans. And you had better not change yours.

AMADEUS
If that be your wish....

CECILIA
It is my wish. (Pause)

AMADEUS
Can it be possible that now, all at once, the moment should have come?

CECILIA
What moment?

AMADEUS
Well — the one we used to foresee in our happiest days even — the one we have expected as something almost inevitable.

CECILIA
Yes, it has come. We know now that everything is over.

AMADEUS
Over...?

CECILIA
That's what we have been talking of all the time, I suppose.

AMADEUS
Yes, you are right. At bottom it is better that we put it into plain words at last. Our moods have been rather too precarious lately.

CECILIA
Everything will be improved now.

AMADEUS
Improved...? Why?... Oh, of course... perhaps you are right. I feel almost as if things had already begun to improve. It's strange, but... one... seems to breathe more freely.

CECILIA
Yes, Amadeus, now we are reaping the reward of always having been honest. Think how exhausted most people would be in a moment like this — by all sorts of painful evasions, labored truces, and pitifully sentimental reconciliations. Think of the hostile spirit in which they would be facing each other during their moment of belated candor. We two, Amadeus — we shall at least be able to part as friends. (Pause)

AMADEUS
And our boy?

CECILIA
Is he your sole worry?

AMADEUS
No, there are many things. How is it going to be arranged anyhow?

CECILIA
That's what we shall have to discuss carefully during the next few days — before we go away. Until then everything must remain as before. It can perfectly well remain as it has been during the last year. That involves no wrong to anybody. (Pause)

AMADEUS (seats himself at the piano; the ensuing pause is laden with apprehension; then he begins to play the same theme — a Capriccio — which was heard earlier during the scene)

CECILIA (who has been approaching the door to the veranda, turns about to listen)

AMADEUS (stops abruptly)

CECILIA
Why don't you go on?

AMADEUS (laughs quickly, nervously)

CECILIA
Wasn't that the Intermezzo?

AMADEUS (nods)

CECILIA (still at some distance from him)
Have you made up your mind what you are going to call it? Is it to be Capriccio?

AMADEUS
Perhaps Capriccio doloroso. It is peculiar how one often fails to understand one's own ideas to begin with. The hidden sadness of that theme has been revealed to me by you.

CECILIA
Oh, you would have discovered it yourself, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
Maybe. (Pause) And whom will you get for the studying of your parts next year?

CECILIA
Oh, I'll always find somebody. Those numbers for the concert — you'll help me with those just the same, won’t you? And I hope you’ll be kind enough to give me the accompaniment at the concert too.

AMADEUS
That’s a foregone conclusion. — But I should really like to know who is to assist you with your studies after this.

CECILIA
Do you regard that as the most important problem to be solved?

AMADEUS
No, of course not. The less so, as I don’t quite see why I shouldn’t go on helping you as before.

CECILIA (with a smile)
Oh, you think...? But then we should have to agree on hours and conditions.

AMADEUS
That was not meant as a joke, Cecilia. Seeing that we are parting in a spirit of perfect understanding, why shouldn’t such an arrangement be considered tentatively at least?

CECILIA
Those things will probably settle themselves later on.... That we... that you play my accompaniment at a concert... or help me to study a part....

AMADEUS
Why later on?... (He rises and stands leaning against the piano) There can be no reasonable ground for changing our musical relationships. I think both of us would suffer equally from doing so. Without overestimating myself, I don’t think it likely that you can find a better coach than I am. And as for my compositions, I don’t know of anybody who could understand them better — with whom I would rather discuss them than with you.

CECILIA
And yet that’s what you will have to come to.

AMADEUS
I can’t see it. After all, we have nobody else to consider — at least, I have not.

CECILIA
Nor have I. I shall know how to preserve my freedom.

AMADEUS
Well, then...?!

CECILIA
Nevertheless, Amadeus.... That we must meet and talk is made necessary by our positions, of course.... But even in regard to our work things cannot possibly remain as hitherto. I’m sure you must realize that.

AMADEUS

I can't see it. And — leaving our artistic relations entirely aside — there is much else to be considered — things of more importance. Our boy, Cecilia. Why should the youngster all at once be made fatherless, so to speak?

CECILIA
That's entirely out of the question. We must come to an understanding, of course.

AMADEUS
An understanding, you say. But why make difficulties that could be avoided by a little good-will? The boy is mine as much as yours. Why shouldn't we continue to bring him up together?

CECILIA
You suggest things that simply can't be done.

AMADEUS
I don't feel like you about that. — On the contrary! The more I consider our situation calmly, the more irrational it seems to me that we should part ways like any ordinary divorced couple... that we should give up the beautiful home we have in common....

CECILIA
Now you are dreaming again, Amadeus!

AMADEUS
We have been such good chums besides. And so we might remain, I think.

CECILIA
Oh, of course, we shall.

AMADEUS
Well, then! The things that bind us together are so compelling, after all, that any new experiences brought by our freedom must seem absolutely unessential in comparison. Don't you realize that as I do? And we shouldn't have to consider what people may say. I think we have the right to place ourselves on a somewhat higher level. In the last instance, we must always belong together, even if a single tie should be severed among the hundreds that unite us. Or are we all of a sudden to forget what we have been to each other — as well as what we may and should be to each other hereafter? One thing remains certain: that no one else will ever understand you as I do, and no one me as you do.... And that's what counts in the end! So why shouldn't we....

CECILIA
No, it's impossible! Not because of the people. They concern me as little as they do you. But for our own sake.

AMADEUS
For our own sake...?

CECILIA

You see, there is one thing you forget: that, beginning with to-day, we shall have secrets to keep from each other. Who knows how many — or how heavy they may prove?... But even the least of them must come between us like a veil.

AMADEUS
Secrets...?

CECILIA
Yes, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
No, Cecilia.

CECILIA
What do you mean?

AMADEUS
That's exactly what must not happen.

CECILIA
But — Amadeus!

AMADEUS
There must never be any secrets between us two. Everything depends on that — you are right to that extent. But why should there be any secrets between us? Remember that after to-day we shall no longer be man and wife, but chums — just chums, who can hide nothing from each other — who must not hide anything. Or is that more than you dare?

CECILIA
More than I dare...? Of course not.

AMADEUS
All right. We'll discuss everything frankly, just as we have been doing — nay, we shall have more things than ever to discuss. Truth becomes now the natural basis of our continued relationship — truth without any reservation whatsoever. And that should prove highly profitable, not only to our mutual relationship, but to each one of us individually. Because... you don't think, do you, that either one of us could find a better chum than the other one?... Now we shall bring our joys and sorrows to each other. We shall be as good friends as ever, if not better still. And our hands shall be joined, even if chasms open between us. And thus we shall keep all that we have had in common hitherto: our work, our child, our home — all that we must continue to have in common if it is to retain its full value to both of us. And we shall gain many new things for which both of us have longed — things in which I could take no pleasure, by the way, if I had to lose you.

CECILIA (drops him a curtsey)

AMADEUS
That's how you feel, too, Cecilia. I am sure of it. We simply cannot live without each other. I certainly cannot live without you. — And how about you?

CECILIA
It’s quite likely I should find it a little difficult.

AMADEUS
Then we agree, Cecilia!

CECILIA
You think so...?!

AMADEUS
Cecilia! (He suddenly draws her closer to himself)

CECILIA (with new hope lighting her glance)
What are you doing?

AMADEUS (putting his arms about her)

I now bid good-by to my beloved.

CECILIA
Forever.

AMADEUS
Forever. (Pressing her hand) And now I am welcoming my friend.

CECILIA
For all time to come — nothing but your friend.

AMADEUS
For all time...? Of course!

CECILIA (draws a deep breath)

AMADEUS
Yes, Cecilia, don’t you feel much easier all at once?

CECILIA
The whole thing seems very strange to me — like a dream almost.

AMADEUS
There is nothing strange about it. Nothing could possibly be simpler or more sensible. Life goes right on... and all is well.... Come on, Cecilia — let us run through those songs.

CECILIA
What songs...?

AMADEUS
Don’t you care?

CECILIA
Oh, why not? — With pleasure....

AMADEUS (seating himself at the piano)
Really, I can’t tell you how happy this makes me! There has practically been no change whatever. The uneasiness alone is gone... that uneasiness of the last few weeks.... I have not had a very happy time lately. The sky has seemed so black above our house — and not only above ours. Now the clouds are vanishing. The whole world has actually grown light again. And I am going to write a symphony — oh, a symphony...!

CECILIA
Everything in due time.... Just now let us have one of those songs at least.... Oh, that one...?

AMADEUS
Don’t you want it?

CECILIA
Oh, as it’s there already....

AMADEUS
Now, then — I start. (He strikes the first chord) Please don’t put a lot of sentimentality into the opening words. They should be reserved and ponderous.

CECILIA (singing)
“No more to meet you was my firm....”

AMADEUS
Very fine.

CECILIA
O Amadeus!

AMADEUS
What is it?

CECILIA
I am afraid you will become too lenient now.

AMADEUS
Lenient...? You know perfectly well that, as artist considered, you have no rival in my eyes, and will never have one.

CECILIA
Really, Amadeus, you shouldn’t be flirting with all your pupils.

AMADEUS
I have the greatest respect for you. — Now let's go in!

CECILIA
"No more to meet...."

AMADEUS
What's the matter?

CECILIA
Nothing. I haven't tried to sing anything like this for a long time. Go right on!

AMADEUS (begins playing again)

CECILIA
"No more to meet you was my firm and sworn decision, and yet when evening comes, I...."

CURTAIN

THE SECOND ACT

THE SAME ROOM as in the previous act. It is an evening in October. The stage is dark. Marie and the chambermaid enter together. The maid turns on the light.

MARIE
Thank you. — But if your mistress is tired, please tell her she mustn't let me disturb her.

CHAMBERMAID
She hasn't arrived yet. She's not expected until this evening.

AMADEUS (enters from the right, with hat and overcoat on) Who is it?... Oh, is it you, Marie! Glad to see you. Have you been here long?

MARIE
No, I just got here. I meant to call on Cecilia, but I hear....

AMADEUS
Then you can keep me company waiting for her. (Handing overcoat and hat to the maid) Please take these.

CHAMBERMAID (goes out)

AMADEUS
I have also just got home. I had to do a lot of errands. I start the day after to-morrow.

MARIE
So soon! — That'll be a short reunion.

AMADEUS
Yes. — Won't you sit down, please? (Looking at his watch) Cecilia should be here in an hour.

MARIE
She has had a tremendous success again.

AMADEUS
I should say so! Look here — the telegram I got this morning. (He takes it from the writing desk and hands it to Marie) It refers to her final appearance last night.

MARIE
Oh.... Twenty-seven curtain calls...!

AMADEUS
What?... Naw! That flourish belongs to the preceding word. Seven only! Otherwise she wouldn't be coming to-day.

MARIE (reading again)
“Have new offer on brilliant terms.”

AMADEUS
On brilliant terms!

MARIE
Then I suppose she’ll do it at last?

AMADEUS
Do what?

MARIE
Settle down in Berlin for good.

AMADEUS
Oh, it isn’t certain. “Have offer,” she says, and not “have accepted offer.” No, we’ll have to talk it over first.

MARIE
Really?

AMADEUS
Of course. We consult each other about everything, my dear Marie — just as we used to do. And in a much more impersonal spirit than before. As far as I am concerned, I shall be quite free next year, and have no more reason to live in Vienna than in Berlin or in America.

MARIE
But it will be dreadful for me if Cecilia goes away.

AMADEUS
Well, these successes abroad may possibly force the people here to understand what they have in Cecilia, and to act accordingly.

MARIE
I hope so. — Besides, I think really that Cecilia has developed a great deal lately. To me her voice seems fuller and richer — with more soul to it, I might say.

AMADEUS
Yes, don’t you think so? That’s my feeling, too.

MARIE
But how she does work! It had never occurred to me that a finished artist might be so industrious.

AMADEUS
Might, you say? Must, you should say.

MARIE

Last summer, when I came out mornings in the garden to play with my children, she would be practicing already — just like a young student. With absolute regularity, from nine until a quarter of ten. Then again before lunch, from twelve to half past. And finally another half hour in the evening.... If the weather was good or bad; if she was in good spirits or....

AMADEUS
Or...?

MARIE
She was always in good spirits for that matter. I don't think anything in the world could have kept her from practicing those runs and trills.

AMADEUS
Yes, that's her way. Nothing in the world could keep her from.... But then, what could there be to keep her from it last Summer? In that rustic retreat of yours, where you didn't see anybody... or hardly anybody....

MARIE
Nobody at all.

AMADEUS
Well, you received a call now and then — or Cecilia did, at least.

MARIE
Oh, I see. You mean — Prince Sigismund. He could hardly be said to call.

AMADEUS (smilingly, with an appearance of unconcern)
Why not?

MARIE
He merely whisked by on his wheel.

AMADEUS (as before)
Oh, he must at least have stopped to lean against a tree for a few moments. He must even have taken time enough — and I am mighty glad he did — to photograph the little house in which you were living. (He takes from the desk a small framed photograph and hands it to Marie, who is seated on the couch)

MARIE (surprised)
And you have that standing on your writing desk?

AMADEUS (slightly puzzled)
Why shouldn't I?

MARIE (studying the photograph)
Just as it was — Cecilia and I sitting on the bench there — yes. And there's the hazel by the garden fence.... How it does bring back the memory of that beautiful, warm Summer day...

AMADEUS (bending over the desk to look at the picture)

I can make out you and Cecilia, but those three boys puzzle me hopelessly.

MARIE
In what way...? That's little Peter, who is doing like this... (She blinks)

AMADEUS
Oh, is that it?

MARIE
And that's Max — and he with the hoop is Mauritz.

AMADEUS
So that's a hoop?... I took it for one of those cabins used by the watchmen along the railroad. The background comes out much better. The landscape actually looks as if steeped in Summer and stillness.... (Brief pause)

MARIE
It was really nice. The deep shadows of the woods right back of the house, and that view of the mountain peaks — oh, marvelous! And then the seclusion.... It's too bad that you never had a look at that darling place. We thought... Cecilia did expect you after all....

AMADEUS (has risen and is walking to and fro)

I don't believe it.... And it didn't prove feasible, for that matter. The pull of the South was still on me.

MARIE (smiling)
You call that the South?

AMADEUS (smiling also)
Oh, Marie!

MARIE (a little embarrassed)

I hope you're not offended?

AMADEUS
Why should I be? I didn't make a secret of my whereabouts to anybody.

MARIE (confidentially)
Albert told me about the villa, and the park, and the marble steps....

AMADEUS
So he gave you all those details? And yet he wasn't there more than an hour.

MARIE
I think he intends to use the park for his last act.

AMADEUS
Is that so? If he would only bring it to me... I mean the last act. I want to take it with me on my tour.

MARIE
Do you think you'll find time to work?

AMADEUS
Why not? I am always working. And I have never in my life been more eager about it. I, too, am having a brilliant period. For years I have not been doing better. And I am no less industrious than Cecilia. With the difference that regular hours are not in my line — nine to nine-forty-five, twelve to twelve-thirty, and so on. But you ask Albert! When he threw himself on the bed exhausted, in that inn at the Fedaja Pass, I sat down and finished the instrumentation for the Capriccio in my Fourth.

CHAMBERMAID (enters with a couple of letters and goes out again)

AMADEUS
You'll pardon me, my dear Marie?

MARIE
Please don't mind me. (She rises)

AMADEUS
A letter from Cecilia, written yesterday, before the performance. I have had letters like this every day.

MARIE
Go right on and read it, please.

AMADEUS (having opened the letter)
Oh, there's plenty of time. In another hour Cecilia will be telling me all that's in it.... (He opens the other letter, runs through it, and flings it away) How stupid people are... how stupid!... Ugh! And mean! (He glances through Cecilia's letter once more) Cecilia writes me about a reception at the house of the Director.... Sigismund was there, too. Yes, you know, of course, that Sigismund has been in Berlin?

MARIE (embarrassed)

I... I thought... Or rather, I knew...

AMADEUS (with an air of superiority)
Well, well — there is no cause for embarrassment in that. Don't you consider the Prince an uncommonly sympathetic person?

MARIE
Yes, he's very pleasant. But I can assure you, Amadeus, that he came only once to our place in the Pustertal, and he didn't stay more than two hours.

AMADEUS (laughing)
And what if he had stayed a week...? Really, Marie, you're very funny!

MARIE (shyly)
May I tell you something?

AMADEUS
Anything you want, Marie.

MARIE
I'm convinced that you two will find each other again in spite of all.

AMADEUS
Find each other...? Who should? Cecilia and I? (He rises) Find each other? (He walks to and fro, but stops finally near Marie) A sensible woman like you, Marie — you ought to understand that Cecilia and I have never lost each other in any way. I think it's very singular.... (He strolls back and forth again) Oh, you must understand that the relationship between her and me is so beautiful — that now only it has become such that we couldn't imagine anything more satisfactory. We don't have to find each other again! Look here now — here are her letters. She has been writing me from eight to twelve pages every day — frank, exhaustive letters, as you can only write them to a friend — or rather, only to your very best friend. It is simply impossible to imagine a finer relationship.

ALBERT (entering from the right)
Good evening.

AMADEUS
You're rather late in getting here.

ALBERT
Good evening, Marie. (He pats her patronizingly on the cheek)

AMADEUS
There will hardly be time for work now. Cecilia will be here very soon.

ALBERT
Oh, we can always put in half an hour. I have brought along some notes for the third act.

MARIE
I think I shall go home, as the boys will be expecting me soon.

ALBERT
All right, child, you go on home.

AMADEUS
Why don't you stay instead? I am sure Cecilia will be glad to see you. And then Albert can take you home. You might get Peter to entertain you in the meantime.... Or would you prefer to stay here and listen?

ALBERT
No, child, you had better go in to Peter. Especially as Mr. von Rabagas doesn't appear in the third act — so you won't be losing much.

MARIE
I'll leave you alone. Bye-bye! (She goes out)

ALBERT
Now let's fall to! (He brings out some notes from one of his pockets and begins to read) "The stage shows an open stretch of rolling ground that slopes gradually toward the footlights. In the background stands a villa, with marble steps leading up to it. Still farther back, the sea can be felt rather than seen." (Bowing to Amadeus) "A tall plane tree in full leaf stands in the center of the stage."

AMADEUS (laughing)
So you have got it there?

ALBERT
It's meant as a compliment to you.

AMADEUS
Many thanks.

ALBERT (after a pause)
Tell me, Amadeus, is it actually true that the Count has become reconciled with the Countess after his duel with the painter?

AMADEUS
I don't know. For a good long while I haven't seen the Countess except at the opera. (He rises and begins walking to and fro again)

ALBERT (shaking his head)
There's something uncanny about that affair.

AMADEUS
Why? I think it's quite commonplace. A husband who has discovered his wife's (sarcastically) "disloyalty"....

ALBERT
That wasn't the point. But that he discovers it only six months too late, when his wife is already deceiving him with another man. — There would have been nothing peculiar about the Count having a fight with you. But the case is much more complicated. Here we have a young man all but killed because of an affair that is long past. And in the meantime you are left perfectly unmolested — or have been so far, at least.

AMADEUS (walking as before)

ALBERT
Do you know, what I almost regret — looking at it from a higher viewpoint? That the painter is not a man of genius... and that the Count hasn't really killed him. That would have put something tremendously tragi-comical into the situation. And that's what would have happened, if... he up there had a little more wit....

AMADEUS
How? What do you mean by that?

ALBERT

I mean, if I had been writing the play....

AMADEUS (makes a movement as if hearing some noise outside)

ALBERT
What is it?

AMADEUS
I thought I heard a carriage, but it was nothing. (He looks at his watch) And it wouldn't be possible yet.... You read on, please. (Once more he begins walking back and forth)

ALBERT
You're very preoccupied. I'll rather come back to-morrow morning.

AMADEUS
No, go on. I am not at all....

ALBERT (rising)
Let me tell you something, Amadeus. If it would please you — and it would be all one to me, you know — I could go with you.

AMADEUS
Where?... What do you mean?

ALBERT
On your tour. For a week, at least, or a fortnight, I should be very glad to stay by you... (affectionately) until you have got over the worst.

AMADEUS
But...! Good gracious, do you think it's because of the Countess...? Why, that story is over long ago.

ALBERT
Which I know. And I know, too, that you are now trying other means of making yourself insensible. But I see perfectly well that, under the circumstances, you can't succeed all at once.

AMADEUS
What circumstances are you talking of anyhow?

ALBERT
My dear fellow, I should never have dreamt of forcing myself into your confidence, but as the matter has already got into the papers....

AMADEUS
What has got into the papers?

ALBERT
Haven't you read that thing in the New Journal to-night?

AMADEUS
What thing?

ALBERT
That Cecilia and Prince Sigismund.... But, of course, you are familiar with the main facts?

AMADEUS
I'm familiar with nothing. What is in the New Journal?

ALBERT
Just a brief notice — without any names, but not to be mistaken.... It reads something like this: "One of our foremost artists, who has just been celebrating triumphs in the metropolis of an adjoining state... until now the wife of a gifted musician"... or perhaps it was "highly gifted"... and so on... and so on... "and a well-known Austrian gentleman, belonging to our oldest nobility, intend, we are told..." and so on....

AMADEUS
Cecilia and the Prince...?!

ALBERT
Yes... and then a hint that, in such a case, it would not prove very difficult to obtain a dispensation from the Pope....

AMADEUS
Has everybody gone crazy?... I can assure you that not a word of it is true!... You won't believe me?... I hope you don't think I would deny it, if.... Or do you actually mean that Cecilia might have... from me.... Oh, dear, and you are supposed to be a friend of ours, a student of the human soul, and a poet!

ALBERT
I beg your pardon, but after what has happened it would not seem improbable....

AMADEUS
Not improbable...? It is simply impossible! Cecilia has never thought of it!

ALBERT
However, it ought not to surprise you that such a rumor has been started.

AMADEUS
Nothing surprises me. But I feel as if the relationship between Cecilia and myself were being profaned by tittle-tattle of that kind.

ALBERT
Pioneers like yourself must scorn the judgment of the world. Else they are in danger of being proved mere braggarts.

AMADEUS
Oh, I am no pioneer. The whole thing is a private arrangement between me and Cecilia, which gives us both the greatest possible comfort. Be kind enough, at least, to tell the people who ask you, that we are not going to be divorced — but that, on the other hand, we are not deceiving each other, as it is asserted in these scrawls with which I have been bombarded for some time. (He indicates the letter which arrived at the same time as Cecilia's)

ALBERT (picks up the letter, glances through it, and puts it away again) An anonymous letter...? Well, that's part of it....

AMADEUS
Explain to them, please, that there can be no talk of deceit where no lies have been told. Tell them that Cecilia's and my way of keeping faith with each other is probably a much better one than that practiced in so many other marriages, where both go their own ways all day long and have nothing in common but the night. You are a poet, are you not — and a student of the human soul? Well, why don't you make all this clear to the people who refuse to understand?

ALBERT
To convey all that would prove a rather complicated process. But if it means so much to you, I could make a play out of it. Then they would have no trouble in comprehending this new kind of marriage — at least between the hours of eight-thirty and ten.

AMADEUS
Are you so sure of that?

ALBERT
Absolutely. In a play I can make the case much clearer than it is presented by reality — without any of those superfluous, incidental side issues, which are so confusing in life. The main advantage is, however, that no spectators attend the entr'acts, so that I can do just what I please with you during those periods. And besides, I shall make you offer an analogy illuminating the whole case.

AMADEUS
An analogy, you say...?

ALBERT
Yes, analogies always have a very soothing effect. You will remark to a friend — or whoever may prove handy — something like this: "What do you want me to do anyhow? Suppose that Cecilia and I were living in a nice house, where we felt perfectly comfortable, and which had a splendid view that pleased us very much, and a wonderful garden where we liked to take walks together. And suppose that one of us should feel a desire sometime to pick strawberries in the woods beyond the fence. Should that be a reason for the other one to raise a cry all at once about faithlessness, or disgrace, or betrayal? Should that force us to sell the house and garden, or make us imagine that we could never more look out of the window together, or walk under our splendid trees? Merely because our strawberries happened to be growing on the other side of the fence..."

AMADEUS
And you would make me say that?

ALBERT
Do you fear it's too brilliant for you? — Oh, that wouldn't occur to anybody. Trust me to fix it. In such a play

I can do nothing whatever with your musical talent. You see, I can't let you conduct your symphony for the benefit of the public. And so I get both myself and you out of it by putting into your character a little more sense and energy and consistency....

AMADEUS
Than God has given me originally.

ALBERT
Well, it's not very hard to compete with Him!

AMADEUS
I shall certainly be curious about one thing: how you mean to end that play.

ALBERT (after a brief pause)
Not very happily, my dear fellow.

AMADEUS (a little staggered)
Why?

ALBERT
It is characteristic of all transitional periods, that a conflict which might not exist to a later generation, must end tragically the moment a fairly decent person becomes involved in it.

AMADEUS
But there is no conflict.

ALBERT
I shall not shirk the duty of inventing one.

AMADEUS
Suppose you wait a little while yet...? Perhaps life itself might....

ALBERT
My dear chap, I am not at all interested in what may be done with us by this ridiculous reality which has to get along without stage manager or prompter — this reality which frequently never gets to the fifth act, merely because the hero happens to be struck on the head by a brick in the second. I make the curtain rise when the plot takes a diverting turn, and I drop it the moment I have proved myself in the right.

AMADEUS
Please, my dear fellow, don't forget when writing your play, to introduce a figure on which reality in this case has lavished much more care than on the hero — I mean, the fool.

ALBERT
You can't insult me in that way. I have always regarded myself as closely akin to him.
[Marie enters with little Peter and the Governess.

PETER

Mamma is coming!

MARIE
The carriage has just stopped outside.

GOVERNESS
It was impossible to make the boy stay in bed.

ALBERT
And look at the fine flowers he has got!

PETER
That's for mamma!

AMADEUS (takes a flower out of the bunch)

I hope you permit, sonny...

CECILIA (enters followed by the Chambermaid)
Good evening! — Oh, are you here, too? That's awfully nice!

PETER
Mamma! — Flowers!

CECILIA (picks him up and kisses him)
My boy! My boy! (Then she shakes hands with the rest)

AMADEUS (handing her the single flower)
Peter let me have one, too.

CECILIA
Thanks. (She shakes hands with him; then to the chambermaid) Get my things out of the carriage, please. The coachman will help you. He has been paid already.

CHAMBERMAID (goes out)

CECILIA (taking off her hat)
Well, Marie?... (To the other two) Can it be possible that you have been working?

ALBERT
We have tried.

CECILIA (to the governess)
Has he behaved like a little man?

PETER
Indeed I have! Have you brought anything for me?

CECILIA
Of course. But you won't get it until to-morrow morning.

PETER
Why not?

CECILIA
Because I am too tired to unpack. To-morrow, when you wake up, you'll find it on your little table.

PETER
What is it?

CECILIA
You'll see by and by....

PETER
Is my little table big enough for it?

CECILIA
We'll hope so.

AMADEUS (who is leaning against the piano, keeps looking at her all the time)

CECILIA (pretends not to notice him)

ALBERT
You're looking splendid.

CECILIA
I'm a little bit worn out.

AMADEUS
You must be hungry.

CECILIA
Not at all. We had something to eat in the dining car. Almost everybody did. But I do want a cup of tea. (To the governess) Will you see to it, please?

AMADEUS
Let me have a cup, too, and please see that I get a few slices of cold meat.

GOVERNESS
I have given orders for it already. (She goes out)

CECILIA
Have you really been waiting for me with the supper?

AMADEUS

No... I haven't been waiting. I... simply never thought of it.

CECILIA (to Albert and Marie)
Why don't you sit down?

ALBERT
No, we are going, my dear Cecilia. Let me congratulate you with all my heart — that will be enough for to-day.

MARIE
You have celebrated regular triumphs, they say?

CECILIA
Well, it wasn't bad. (To Amadeus) Did you get my telegram?

AMADEUS
Yes, it pleased me tremendously.

CECILIA
Think of it, children! After the performance I was commanded to appear in the box of His Majesty!

ALBERT
Commanded...? Invited, I hope you mean! Neither emperor nor king has the right to command you.

CECILIA
You old anarchist! But what does it matter? One goes to the box nevertheless. And you would have done that, too.

ALBERT
Why not? One must, if possible, study every form of existence at close quarters.

AMADEUS
And what did the Emperor have to say?

CECILIA
He was very complimentary. Had never seen a better Carmen.

ALBERT
The very next thing he'll order an opera for you from some Spaniard.

GOVERNESS (enters)
The tea will be here in a moment.

AMADEUS
Now you must get back to bed, Peter. It's late.

GOVERNESS (wants to take the boy away)

PETER
No, mamma must take me to bed as when I was a little baby.

CECILIA
Come on then! — Mercy me, how heavy you have grown. (Goes out with Peter and the governess)

MARIE
My, but she is pretty!

AMADEUS
Haven't you discovered that before?

ALBERT
Well, good-by then!

AMADEUS
Until to-morrow. I shall be expecting you early — between nine and ten.

MARIE (to Amadeus as she is going out)
Don't you regret having to leave her again at once?

AMADEUS
Duty, my dear Marie....

CECILIA (returning)
Oh, are you really going? — Good-by then — for a little while!
[Albert and Marie go out.

CECILIA (going to the fireplace)
Home again! (She sits down)

AMADEUS (near the door and speaking rather shyly)
It's a question whether it can please you as much as it does me.

CECILIA (holds out her hand to him)

AMADEUS (takes her hand and kisses it; then he seats himself) Tell me all about it.

CECILIA
What am I to tell? I haven't left anything untold — or hardly anything.

AMADEUS
Well....

CECILIA
Getting home every night — and it was quite late at times, as you know — I sat down and wrote to you. I wish you had been equally explicit.

AMADEUS
But I have written you every day, too.

CECILIA
Nevertheless, my dear, it seems to me you must have lots to add. (With a laugh) To many things you have referred in a strikingly casual fashion.

AMADEUS
I might say the same to you.

CECILIA
No, you can't. My letters have practically been diaries. And that's more than could be said of yours. — Well, Amadeus...? Without frankness the whole situation becomes meaningless, I should say.

AMADEUS
What is there to be cleared up?

CECILIA
Is it really all over with Philine?

AMADEUS
That was all over — (rising) before you left. And you know it. I really don't think it's necessary to discuss bygone matters.

CECILIA
Will she be able to stay in the company, by the way — after this scandal in connection with your — pardon me! — predecessor?

AMADEUS
Everything has been arranged, I hear. And she has even made up with her husband again.

CECILIA
Is that so? — That's rather unpleasant, don't you think? At bottom, it matters very little then to have the story all over. In the case of a man who has the disconcerting habit of not finding out certain things until months afterward....

AMADEUS
It is better not to think of such things.

CECILIA
Has she any letters of yours?

AMADEUS (having thought for a moment)
Only the one in which I bade her farewell.

CECILIA
That might be enough. Why haven't you demanded it back?

AMADEUS
How could I?

CECILIA
How frivolous you are! Yes, frivolous is just the word. (Putting her hand on his shoulder) Now it's possible to talk of a thing like this, Amadeus. Formerly you might have misunderstood such a remark — taking it for jealousy, or something like that.... But, really, I do hope you don't get mixed up in any more affairs of that kind. I don't like to be scared to death all the time on behalf of my best friend. There is nothing in the world I begrudge you — of that you may be sure. But getting killed for the sake of somebody else — that's carrying the joke a little too far!

AMADEUS
I promise you, that you'll no longer have to be scared to death on my behalf.

CECILIA
I hope so. Otherwise I must leave you to take care of yourself. — And seriously speaking, Amadeus, I hope you don't forget that your life has been preserved for more sensible and more important things — that you have a lot more to do in this world.

AMADEUS
Yes, that's what I feel. I don't think I have ever felt it so strongly in all my life. (Radiantly) My symphony...

CECILIA (eagerly)
... is done?

AMADEUS
It is, Cecilia. And... I didn't mean to tell you about it to-day, but it leaves me no peace....

CECILIA
Well, what is it?

AMADEUS
The chorus in the final passage — you know the principal theme of it already — it is led and dominated by a soprano solo. And that solo has been written for you.

CECILIA
My revered Master! How proud your trust in me makes me!

AMADEUS
Don't make fun of it, Cecilia, I beg you. There is nobody in the world who can sing that solo like you.... That solo is yours — and only yours. While writing it, the ring of your voice was in my mind. Next February, as soon as I get back, I shall have the symphony put on, and then you must sing that solo.

CECILIA
Next Feb...? With pleasure, my dear Amadeus — provided I am still here.

AMADEUS

Why?

CECILIA
Oh, you haven't heard everything yet. After the performance last night the Director had a talk with me.

AMADEUS (disturbed)
Well?! — There was a hint in the telegram about brilliant conditions.... But, of course, they could only refer to the next season?

CECILIA
If I can break away from here, they want me in Berlin from the beginning of the year.

AMADEUS
But you can't break away!

CECILIA
Oh, if I really want to. The Director does not care to enforce the contract.

AMADEUS
But you don't want to, Cecilia!

CECILIA
That's a matter for careful consideration. I shall be doing a great deal better there.

AMADEUS
Beginning next Fall, I shall — probably be free. You might wait that long, I should think. Then we could make the move together. But....

CECILIA
It doesn't have to be settled to-day, Amadeus. To-morrow we shall have time to discuss the whole matter thoroughly. Really, I am not in a condition to do so to-night.

AMADEUS
You are tired...?

CECILIA
Of course, you must understand that. In fact, I should very much prefer.... (She looks in direction of the door leading to her own room)

CHAMBERMAID (brings in the tea tray and puts it on a small table)

CECILIA
Oh, that's right! — May I pour you a cup, too?

AMADEUS
If you please.

CECILIA (pours the tea; to the chambermaid)

Open one of the windows a little, will you. There's such a lot of cigarette smoke in here.

CHAMBERMAID (opens the window at the right)

AMADEUS
Won't it be too cold for you?

CECILIA
Cold? It has turned very warm again.

AMADEUS
And how did last night's performance go otherwise?

CECILIA
Very well. Wedius in particular proved himself inimitable again.

AMADEUS
You have mentioned him several times in your letters.

CECILIA
You know him since your Dresden period, don't you?

AMADEUS
Yes. He has great gifts.

CECILIA
He thinks a great deal of you, too.

AMADEUS
I'm pleased to hear it.

CHAMBERMAID (goes out)

AMADEUS (helping himself to the cold meat)
Can I help you to some?

CECILIA
No, thanks. I have had all I want.

AMADEUS
Yes, you have had your supper already — all of you, or "everybody," as you put it a while ago.

CECILIA (ingenuously)

I had my supper with Sigismund.

AMADEUS
Was he in Berlin all the time?

CECILIA
He got there two days after me, as I told you in my letters.

AMADEUS
Of course — you have told me everything. Once he accompanied you to the National Gallery.

CECILIA
He also took me to see the Pergamene marbles.

AMADEUS (facetiously)
You're doing a lot for his general education, I must say. — But I should like to know by what fraud Sigismund got himself into that reception of the Director's.

CECILIA
By what fraud?

AMADEUS
Well, you wrote me that he created a regular sensation with those waltzes of his.

CECILIA
So he did. But he didn't have to use fraud to get in. Being a nephew of the Baroness, there was no reason why he should resort to such methods.

AMADEUS
Oh, yes, I didn't remember that.

CECILIA
And by the way, the Director asked very eagerly about you.

AMADEUS
He thinks a great deal of me....

CECILIA (with a smile)
Yes, he really does. The moment your new opera is ready....

AMADEUS
And so on! (He goes on eating) It surprises me, however, that he should ask you about me.

CECILIA
Why does that surprise you?

AMADEUS (as if meaning no offense)
Well, it rather surprises me that he should connect our respective personalities to that extent. Hasn't Berlin heard yet that we are going to be divorced?

CECILIA
Why... what does that mean?

AMADEUS (laughing)
Rumors to that effect are afloat.

CECILIA
What? Well, I declare!

AMADEUS
Yes, it's incredible what the popular gossip can invent. It's even in the newspapers. His Highness the Prince Sigismund Maradas-Lohsenstein is going to lead you to the altar. The necessary dispensation will be furnished by the Pope. Idiotic — isn't it?

CECILIA
Yes. — But, my dear, you say nothing about what is still more idiotic.

AMADEUS
And what can that be?

CECILIA
That you are on the verge of believing this piece of idiocy.

AMADEUS
I...? How can you.... Oh, no!

CECILIA
You haven't considered, for instance, that I am three years older than he.

AMADEUS (startled)
Well, if it's nothing but those three years of difference in....

CECILIA
No, it isn't that. No, indeed! Even if I were younger than he, I should never think of it.

AMADEUS
But if his devotion should prove more deeply rooted than you have supposed so far?

CECILIA
Not even then.

AMADEUS
Why?

CECILIA
Why...? I know that it couldn't last forever anyhow.

AMADEUS
Have you the end in mind already?

CECILIA

I am not saying that I have it in mind.... But I don't doubt it must come, as it always comes.

AMADEUS
And then...?

CECILIA (shrugs her shoulders)

AMADEUS
And then?

CECILIA
How could I know, Amadeus? There are prospects of so many kinds.

AMADEUS (cowering a moment before those words)
Yes, that's true. Life is full of prospects. Everywhere, wherever you turn, there are temptations and promises — when you have determined to be free, and to take life lightly, as we have done.... That's what you meant, was it not?

CECILIA
Yes, precisely.

AMADEUS
Tell me, Cecilia.... (He draws closer to her) There is one thing I should like to know — whether Sigismund has any idea that your mind is harboring such thoughts — which, after all, would appear rather weird to the other party concerned.

CECILIA
Sigismund...? How can you imagine?! Such things you admit only to your friends. (She gives her hand to him)

AMADEUS (in the same friendly manner)
But if he should notice anything... although I think it very improbable that he is the kind of man who would.... But let us suppose that he concluded from various signs that some such thoughts were passing through your head — would you deny them, if he asked you?

CECILIA
I believe myself capable of it.

AMADEUS (with a shrinking)
Oh.... Let me tell you, Cecilia.... You are having something definite in mind.... Yes, I am sure of it.... It's a question of some definite prospect.

CECILIA (smiling)
That might be possible.

AMADEUS
What has happened, Cecilia?

CECILIA
Nothing.

AMADEUS
Then there is danger in the air.

CECILIA
Danger...? What could that mean to us? To him who has no obligations there can be no cause for fear.

AMADEUS (taking her lightly by the arm)
Stop playing with words! I can see through the whole thing just the same. — I know! It has been brought home to me by a number of passages in your letters — although they ceased long ago to have the frankness due to our friendship. That new prospect is Wedius!

CECILIA
In what respect did my letters fail to be frank? Didn't I write you immediately after the "Onyegin" performance, that there was something fascinating about his personality?

AMADEUS
So you have said before, of many people. But there was never any such prospect implied in it.

CECILIA
Everything begins to take on new meanings when you are free.

AMADEUS
You are not telling me everything.... What has happened?

CECILIA
Nothing has happened, but (with sudden decision) if I had stayed... who knows....

AMADEUS (seems to shrink back again; then he walks to and fro; finally he remains standing in the background, near one of the windows) Poor Sigismund!

CECILIA
Why pity him? He knows nothing about it.

AMADEUS (resuming his superior tone)
Is that what draws you to Berlin?

CECILIA
No!... Indeed, no! The spell has been broken... it seems....

AMADEUS
And yet you talk of going about New Year....

CECILIA (rising)
My dear Amadeus, I am really too tired to discuss that matter to-day. Now I shall say good-night to you. It is quite late. (She holds out her hand to him)

AMADEUS (faltering)
Good-night, Cecilia!... (He clings to her hand) You have been gone three weeks. I shall leave early the day after to-morrow — and when I return, you will be gone, I suppose.... There can't be so very much to your friendship, if you won't stay and talk a while with me under such circumstances.

CECILIA
What's the use of being sentimental? Leave-takings are familiar things to us.

AMADEUS
That's true. But nevertheless this will be a new kind of leave-taking, and a new kind of home-coming also.

CECILIA
Well, seeing that it had to turn out this way....

AMADEUS
But neither of us ever imagined that it would turn out this way.

CECILIA
Oh?

AMADEUS
No, Cecilia, we did not imagine it. The remarkable thing has been that we retained our faith in each other in the midst of all doubts, and that, even when away from each other, we used to feel calm and confident far beyond what was safe, I suppose. But it was splendid. Separation itself used to have a sort of charm of its own — formerly.

CECILIA
Naturally. It isn't possible to love in that undisturbed fashion except when you are miles apart.

AMADEUS
You may be able to make fun of it to-day, Cecilia, but there will never again be anything like it — neither for you nor for me. You can be sure of that.

CECILIA
I know that as well as you do. — But why should you all at once begin to talk as if, somehow, everything would be over between us two, and as if the best part of our life had been irretrievably lost? That's not the case, after all. It cannot possibly be the case. Both of us know that we remain the same as before — don't we — and that everything else that has happened to us, or may happen to us, can be of no particular importance.... And even if it should become important, we shall always be able to join hands, no matter what chasms open between us.

AMADEUS
You speak very sensibly, as usual.

CECILIA

If you seduce ladies by the dozen, and if gentlemen shoot each other dead for my sake — as they do for the sake of Countess Philine — what has that to do with our friendship?

AMADEUS
That's beyond contradiction. Nevertheless, I hadn't expected — in fact, I think it nothing less than admirable — your ability to adjust yourself to everything — your way of remaining perfectly calm in the midst of any new experiences or expectations.

CECILIA
Calm...? Here I am... by our fireplace... taking tea in your company. Here I can and shall always be calm. That's the significance of our whole life in common. Whatever may be my destiny in the world at large will slip off me when I enter here. All the storms are on the outside.

AMADEUS
That's more than you can be sure of, Cecilia. Things might happen that would weigh more heavily on you than you can imagine at this moment.

CECILIA
I shall always have the strength to throw off things according to my will before I come to you. And if that strength should ever fail me, I shall come to the door and no farther.

AMADEUS
Oh, no, you mustn't! That would not be in keeping with our agreement. It is just when life grows heavy that I'll be here to help you bear it.

CECILIA
Who knows whether you will always be ready to do so?

AMADEUS
Always — on my oath! No matter what befall you, whether it be sad or wretched, you can always find refuge and sympathy with me. But with all my heart I wish you may be spared most of those things.

CECILIA
That I be spared...? No, Amadeus, a wish like that I can't accept. Hitherto — I have lived so little hitherto. And I am longing for it. I long for all that's sad and sweet in life, for all that's beautiful and all that's pitiful. I long for storms, for perils — for worse than that, perhaps.

AMADEUS
No, Cecilia, that's nothing but imagination!

CECILIA
Oh, no!

AMADEUS
Certainly, Cecilia. You don't know very much as yet, and you imagine many things simpler and cleaner than they are. But there are things you couldn't stand, and others of which you are not capable. — I know you,

Cecilia.

CECILIA
You know me? — You know only what I have been to you — what I have been as your beloved and your wife. And as you used to mean the whole world to me — as all my longing, all my tenderness, was bounded by you — we could never guess in those days what might prove my destiny when the real world was thrown open to me. — Even to-day, Amadeus, I am no longer the same as before.... Or perhaps I have always been the same as I am now, but didn't know it merely. And something has fallen away, that used to cover me up in the past.... Yes, that's it: for now I can feel all those desires that used to pass me by as if deflected by a cuirass of insensibility.... Now I can feel how they touch my body and my soul, filling me with qualms and passions. The earth seems full of adventure. The sky seems radiant with flames. And it is as if I could see myself stand waiting with wide-open arms.

AMADEUS (as if calling to somebody in flight)
Cecilia!

CECILIA
What is the matter?

AMADEUS
Nothing.... The words you speak cannot estrange me after all that I have learned already. But there is a new ring in your voice that I have never heard until to-day. Nor have I ever seen that light in your eyes until to-day.

CECILIA
That's what you imagine, Amadeus. If that were really the case, then I should feel the same in regard to you. But I can see no difference in you at all. And I can't imagine how you possibly could come to seem different. To other women you may appear a mischiefmaker — or a silly youth — which has probably happened many times: but to me you will always remain the same as ever. And I have a feeling that, in the last instance, nothing can ever happen to the Amadeus I am thinking of.

AMADEUS
If I could only feel the same — in regard to you! But such assurance is not mine. The recklessness and greed with which you make your way into an unknown world are filling me with outright fear on your behalf. The idea that there are people who know as little of you as you of them at this moment, and to whom you are going to belong...

CECILIA
I shall belong to nobody... now, that I am free...

AMADEUS
... who are part of your destiny already, as you of theirs... it seems to me uncanny. And you are no more the Cecilia I used to love — no! You resemble closely one who was very dear to me, and yet you are not at all the same as she. No, you are not the woman that was my wife for years. I could feel it the moment you entered the place.... The connection between the young girl who sank into my arms one evening seven years ago and the woman who has just returned from abroad to dwell for a brief while in this house seems quite mysterious. For seven years I have been living with another woman — with a quiet, kindly woman — with a sort of angel perhaps, who has now disappeared. She who came to-day has a voice that I have never heard, a look that I am foreign to, a beauty that is strange to me — a beauty not surpassing what the other had, except in being more cruel possibly — and yet a beauty that should confer much greater happiness, I think.

CECILIA
Don't look at me like that!... Don't talk to me like that!... That's not the way to talk to a friend! Don't forget I am no more the one I used to be. When you talk to me like that, Amadeus, it is as if here, too, I should be fanned by those cajoling breaths that nowadays so often touch me like caresses — breaths that make life seem incredibly light, and that make you feel ready for so much that formerly would have appeared incomprehensible.

AMADEUS
If you could guess, Cecilia, how your words hurt me and excite me at the same time!

CECILIA (brusquely)
You must not talk like that, Amadeus. I don't want it. Be sensible, for my sake as well as your own. Good-night.

AMADEUS
Are you going, Cecilia?

CECILIA
Yes. And bear in mind that we are friends and want to remain such.

AMADEUS
Bear in mind that we have always wanted to be honest. And it is not honest — either for you or me — to say that we stand face to face as friends in this moment.... Cecilia — the one thing I can feel at this moment is that you are beautiful... beautiful as you have never been before!

CECILIA
Amadeus, Amadeus, are you forgetting all that has happened?

AMADEUS
I could forget it — and so could you.

CECILIA
Oh, I remember — I remember! (She wants to leave)

AMADEUS
Stay, Cecilia, stay! The day after to-morrow I shall be gone — stay!

CECILIA
Please don't speak to me like that! I am no longer what I used to be — no longer proud, or calm, or good. Who knows how little might be needed to make me the victim of a certain unscrupulous seducer!

AMADEUS
Cecilia!

CECILIA
Have you so many friends to lose? One is all I have. — Good-night. (She tries to get away)

AMADEUS (seizing her by the hand)
Cecilia, we have long ago bidden each other good-by as man and wife — but we have also made up our minds to take life lightly, to be free, and to lay hold of every happiness that comes within our reach. Should we be mad enough, or cowardly enough, to shrink from the highest happiness ever offered us...?

CECILIA
And what would it lead to... my friend?

AMADEUS
Don't call me that! I love you and I hate you, but in this moment I am not your friend. What you have been to me — wife, comrade... what do I care! To-day I want to be — your lover!

CECILIA
You mustn't...! You can't... no....

AMADEUS
Not your lover then... but what is both worse and better... the man who takes you away from another one — the one with whom you are betraying someone else — the one who means to you both bliss and sin at once!

CECILIA
Let me loose, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
No more beautiful adventure will ever blossom by the wayside for either one of us, Cecilia, as long as we may live!

CECILIA
And none more dangerous, Amadeus!

AMADEUS
Wasn't that what you were longing for...?

CECILIA
Good-night, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
Cecilia! (He holds her fast and draws her closer to himself)

CURTAIN

THE THIRD ACT

THE SAME ROOM. It is the morning of the following day. The stage is empty at first. Then Amadeus enters from his room at the left. He wears a dressing-gown, but is otherwise fully dressed. He passes slowly and pensively across the room to the writing desk, from which he picks up the waiting pile of letters. Then he puts the letters down again. He feels chilly, looks around, notices that a window is open, and goes to close it. Then he stands listening for a while at the door to Cecilia's room. Finally he returns to the writing desk and begins to pull out manuscripts from its drawers.

AMADEUS
Let's get things in order.... I wonder how this is going to turn out? — I'll write her from some place along my route. I shall never come back here any more.... I couldn't stand it... no, I couldn't! (Holding a manuscript in his hand) The Solo — her Solo! Well, I shall not be present to hear her sing it.

CHAMBERMAID (entering)
The men are here to take away the trunk. Here's the check from the expressman.

AMADEUS
All right. Tell them to use the back stairs in taking out the things.

CHAMBERMAID (goes out)

AMADEUS
... When I say good-by to-morrow, she won't guess it is forever.... And the boy... the boy...? (He walks back and forth)... But it has to be. (Abruptly) I'll leave this very evening — not to-morrow. Yes, this very evening. (He begins to pile up sheet music) I'll have a talk with the Director. If he says no, I'll simply break away. I won't come back here. (He goes to Cecilia's door again) I suppose she's still asleep. (He comes forward and sits down on the couch, leaning his head in his hands) We have to take lunch together, and she won't guess that it is for the last time.... She won't guess.... And why not? Let her find out... right now... I am going to have it out with her. Yes, indeed. (Rising) One can't write a thing of that kind. I'll tell her everything. I'll tell her that I can't bear it — that it drives me crazy to think of the other fellow. And she'll understand. And even if she should plead with me to forgive her... even if she... oh! (He goes to her door) I must tell her at once.... Oh, I feel like choking her!... Cecilia! (He knocks at her door, but gets no answer) What does that mean? (He goes into her room) She's gone! (He stays away for about half a minute and comes back by way of the door leading to the garden; then he rings) Where can she....

CHAMBERMAID (enters)

AMADEUS (with pretended unconcern)
Has my wife gone out?

CHAMBERMAID
Yes, sir — quite a while ago.

AMADEUS
Oh...?

CHAMBERMAID
It must be nearly two hours now. She said she would be back about one o'clock.

AMADEUS
All right. Thank you.

CHAMBERMAID
Can I bring in your breakfast now, sir?

AMADEUS
Oh, yes — I had almost forgotten. And a cup of tea, please.

CHAMBERMAID (goes out)

AMADEUS (alone)
Gone!... Well, there is nothing peculiar in that.... Probably to the opera.... But why didn't she tell me...? (He cowers suddenly) To him...? No, that couldn't be possible! Oh, no!... And why not?... A woman like her.... There is nothing to keep her from going to him.... (With a threatening gesture) If I only had him here!... (With sudden inspiration) But that's what I might... that would be.... To confront him — that's it! To stand face to face with him!... Thus more than one thing might be straightened out.... No, she is not with him.... Where did I get that idea?... That's all over!... But that's what I'll do!... Either I or he!... Many things might then... everything might then be set right.... He or I!... But to live on like this, while he... I'll go to Albert. It must be done this very day! (He disappears into his own room)

ALBERT (enters)

CHAMBERMAID (follows him, carrying the breakfast tray) I'll tell the Master at once, sir. (She puts the tray on a small table and goes out to the left)

ALBERT (picks up a moon-shaped roll from the tray and begins to nibble at one of its tips)

AMADEUS (enters, having changed his dressing-gown for a coat)

CHAMBERMAID (follows him, passes quickly across the room and goes out)

AMADEUS
Oh, there you are!

ALBERT
Yes. I'm not too early, I hope? Are you ready? I want to read you the third act. (He takes some papers from his overcoat pocket) You know the setting, of course — the park, the villa, the plane tree. But first of all I must tell you something. Do you remember Mr. von Rabagas, with whom my wife fell in love? I have retouched him slightly. He's going to be cross-eyed. And now I am curious to see what Marie's attitude will be toward him.

AMADEUS (nervously)
All right — later. For the moment there are more important things.

ALBERT
More important...?

AMADEUS
Yes, I want you to do me a great service... a service that will brook no delay. You have to act as my second.

ALBERT (rising)
Your...? Twaddle! You'll simply refuse the challenge! You're not going to let yourself be killed for the sake of Madame Philine — oh, no!

AMADEUS
It is not a question of Philine. And I have not been challenged. I shall issue the challenge. And for that reason I want you to look up our friend Winter at once, and then I must trouble both of you to call on Prince Sigismund, and tell him....

ALBERT (interrupting him and breaking into laughter)
Oh, Prince Sigismund! — Thank you ever so much!

AMADEUS (surprised)
What's the matter with you?

ALBERT
How obliging! You mean to present me with an ending for the play we concocted yesterday. Thanks. But it's too banal for me — nobody would take any stock in it. I have thought of something much better. You are to be poisoned — yes, sir. And can you guess by whom? — By a brand-new character — one of the secret lovers of your wife.

AMADEUS (furiously)
It doesn't interest me in the least. Stop it, please! I'm not making up endings for your fool comedies! This is real life... we are right in the midst of it!

ALBERT
You don't mean...?! Well, if I have to stand this unseemly and ridiculous interruption... what do you want of me anyhow?

AMADEUS
Haven't you understood? The two of you are to challenge Prince Sigismund on my behalf.

ALBERT
Prince Sigismund... on your behalf.... (He bursts into laughter)

AMADEUS
You seem to think it very funny, but I assure you....

ALBERT
The point is not that you seem funny to me. It's probably balanced by the fact that a lot of people who have thought you funny until now, will all of a sudden think you very sensible... though they ought to ask themselves, if they had a little logic: why should Mr. Amadeus Adams become jealous on this particular day?... Up to the twenty-third of October he was not, and all at once, on the twenty-third, he is....

AMADEUS
A lot of things have changed since yesterday.

ALBERT
Have changed...? Since yesterday...? Well, I declare!

AMADEUS (after a pause)
So that you didn't believe it either?

ALBERT
To confess the truth — no.

AMADEUS
Which means that I am living among a lot of people who....

ALBERT
Will be in the right ultimately. Why should that arouse your indignation? If we were to live long enough, every lie that's floating about would probably become true. Listen to those who belie you, and you will know the truth about yourself. Gossip knows very rarely what we are doing, but almost always whither we are drifting.

AMADEUS
We didn't know we were drifting this way — that much you will admit, I hope.

ALBERT
And yet it had to come. Friendship between two people of different sexes is always dangerous — even when they are married. If there is too much mutual understanding between our souls, many things are swept along that we would rather keep back; and when our senses are attracted mutually, the suction affects much more of our souls than we would care to have involved. That's a universal law, my dear chap, for which the profound uncertainty of all earthly relations between man and woman must be held responsible. And only he who doesn't know it, will trust himself or anybody else. — If you don't mind? (He begins to butter one of the rolls)

AMADEUS
So you think you understand...?

ALBERT
Of course! That's my specialty, don't you know?

AMADEUS

Well, if you understand what has happened, and understand it must have happened — then you will also understand that I must face the logical consequences.

ALBERT
Logical consequences...? Here I am talking wisdom, and you clamor for nonsense. And that's what you call logical consequences?... My opinion is rather, that you are about to behave like a perfect fool. Anybody else might do what you now propose: you are the only one who mustn't. For when you propose such a thing, it becomes illogical, ungenerous, not to say dishonest. You want to call a man to account for something which, as he sees it, has been declared explicitly permissible.... In his place I should laugh in your face. If anybody has the right to be indignant here, and to demand an account, it is the Prince himself, and nobody else — as he has not deceived you, but you him.

AMADEUS
Well, that's all one, as he undoubtedly will demand an account.

ALBERT
To do so, he must know.

AMADEUS
I'll see to that.

ALBERT
You mean to tell him?

AMADEUS
If you hold it the shortest road to what I have in mind...?

ALBERT
There's a man of honor for you! And is that the discretion you owe the woman you love, do you think?

AMADEUS
Call me illogical, ungenerous, indiscreet — anything you please! I can't help myself! I love Cecilia — do you hear? And I want to go on living with her. But I can't do so until some sort of amends have been made for the past — in my own eyes, in hers, and — I confess it — in the eyes of the world. Sigismund and I must meet, man to man — nothing else can end my trouble.

ALBERT
And how can it make the slightest difference that you two shoot off your guns in the air?

AMADEUS
One of us must out of the way, Albert!... Won't you understand at last?

ALBERT
Now, my dear chap, that's carrying it a little too far! All the time I have thought you were talking of a duel — and now I find that you are after his life!

AMADEUS

Later on you may feel sorry that you could not refrain from inept jesting in a moment like this even. The case is urgent, Albert. Please make up your mind.

ALBERT
And suppose he should refuse?

AMADEUS
He is a nobleman.

ALBERT
He is religious. His father is one of the leaders of the Clerical Party in the Upper House and a vice-president of the Society for the Prevention of Dueling.

AMADEUS
Well, such things are not inherited. And if he won't, I shall know how to make him. There's no other way out of it. There can be no other alternative, if I am to go on living — with or without her. That will set everything right, but nothing else will. It's the one thing that can clear the air about us. Until it is over, we dare not belong to each other again or — be happy.

ALBERT
I hope Cecilia won't insist on killing off Philine and a few others. That would be just as sensible, but would complicate the situation a great deal.

AMADEUS
Won't you go, please!

ALBERT
Yes, I am going.... And how about our opera?

AMADEUS
Oh, we'll have plenty of time to talk of that. However, just to reassure you — all that is finished lies here in the second drawer, everything properly arranged.

ALBERT
And who is to compose the third act?

AMADEUS
It can be given as a fragment, with some kind of ballet as a filler.

ALBERT
Right you are! Something like "Harlequin as Electrician," or "Forget-me-not." (He goes out)

AMADEUS (remains alone for a while; at first he seems to ponder on something; then he returns to the writing desk and falls to work on his papers; a knock is heard at the door leading to the garden) What is it?

PETER (outside)
It's me, papa. Can I come in?

AMADEUS
Certainly, Peter. Come on.

GOVERNESS (entering with Peter)
Good morning.

AMADEUS
Good morning. (He kisses Peter) Is it not a little too cold for him out there?

GOVERNESS
He's very warmly dressed, and besides the sun is shining beautifully.

PETER
Papa, have you seen what mamma brought me?

AMADEUS
What is it?

PETER
A theater — a big theater!

AMADEUS
Is that so? And you have got it already?

PETER
Of course. It's over there in the summer-house. Would you care to look at it?

AMADEUS (glances inquiringly at the governess)

GOVERNESS
Madame brought it to our room quite early, while Peter was still asleep.

AMADEUS
I see.

PETER
I can play theater already. There is a king, and a peasant, and a bride, and a devil — one that's all red — almost as red as the king himself. And in the back there is a mill, and a sky, and a forest, and a hunter.... Won't you come and look at it, papa?

AMADEUS (seated on the couch, with the boy standing between his knees; speaking absentmindedly) Of course I must come and look at it.

CHAMBERMAID (entering)
Sir....

AMADEUS
What is it?

CHAMBERMAID
His Highness asks if you'll see him.

AMADEUS
What highness?

CHAMBERMAID
His Highness, the Prince Lohsenstein.

AMADEUS (rising)
What?

GOVERNESS
Come, Peter — we'll go back and play in the summer-house. (She goes out with Peter)

AMADEUS (with dignity)
Tell the Prince.... (Turning away from her) One moment, please. (To himself) What can that mean...? (Abruptly) Ask him to come in.

CHAMBERMAID (goes out)

AMADEUS (walks quickly to and fro, but stops at some distance from the door when Sigismund enters)

SIGISMUND (is slender, blonde, twenty-six, elegantly dressed, but appears in no respect foppish; he bows to Amadeus) Good-morning.

AMADEUS (takes a few steps forward to meet him and nods politely)

SIGISMUND (looks around a little shyly, but wholly free from any ridiculous embarrassment; his manner is in every respect dignified; there is a slight smile on his face) We have not seen each other for some time, and you'll probably assume that my visit to-day has a special reason.

AMADEUS
Naturally. (Pointing to a chair) Please.

SIGISMUND
Thank you. (He comes nearer, but remains standing) I have decided to take this step — which has not come easy to me, I can assure you — because I find the situation in which we... in which all of us have been placed, untenable and, in a certain sense, ridiculous... and because I think that, in one way or another, it should be brought to an end. The sole object of my visit is to put before you a proposition.

AMADEUS
I'm listening.

SIGISMUND
I don't want to waste any words. My proposition is that you get a divorce from your wife.

AMADEUS (shrinks back for a moment, staring at Sigismund; then, after a pause he says calmly) You wish to marry Cecilia?

SIGISMUND
There is nothing I wish more eagerly.

AMADEUS
And what is the attitude of Cecilia toward your intentions?

SIGISMUND
Not encouraging so far.

AMADEUS (puzzled)
Cecilia is absolutely in a position to decide for herself. And of course, she would also have the right to leave me — whenever and howsoever it might please her to do so. For that reason you must pardon me if I find the object of your visit incomprehensible, to say the least.

SIGISMUND
You'll soon find it comprehensible, I think. The discouraging attitude of Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg proves nothing at all in this connection, I must say. As long as Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg has not been set free by you — even if that be done against her own will — she is, in a sense, bound to you. To get this matter fully cleared up, it seems to me necessary that you yourself, my dear Master, insist on a divorce. Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg will not be in a position to choose freely until she has been divorced from you. Until then the struggle between us two will not be on equal terms — as, I trust, you would like to have it.

AMADEUS
There can be no talk of any struggle here. You misunderstand the actual state of affairs in a manner that seems to me incomprehensible. For I have no right to suppose that Cecilia has made any secret of the more deep-lying reasons that have so far prevented us from considering a dissolution of our marriage.

SIGISMUND
Certainly, I am aware of those reasons, but to me they don't by any means seem sufficiently pressing — not even from your own viewpoint — to exclude all thought of a divorce. And I am anxious to assure you that, under all circumstances, I shall feel bound to treat those reasons with the most profound respect.

AMADEUS
What do you mean?

SIGISMUND
You know, my dear Master, that the reverence I have for your art, even if I am not always capable of grasping it, equals the admiration I feel for the singing of Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg. I know how much you two mutually owe to each other, and how you — if I may say so — complement each other musically. And it would never occur to me to put any difficulties whatsoever in the way of your continued artistic relationship. I am equally aware of the tenderness with which you regard your child — for whom, by the way, as you probably know, I have a great deal of devotion — and I can give you my word that the doors leading to the quarters of little Peter will always stand open to you.

AMADEUS
In other words, you would have no objection to seeing the former husband of your — of the wife — of the Princess Lohsenstein, admitted to your house as a friend?

SIGISMUND
Any such objection would be regarded by me as an insult to your — to my — to Mrs. Cecilia Adams-Ortenburg, as well as to you, my dear Master. With those provisions made, the new arrangement, which I am taking the liberty to suggest, would be more sensible and — if you'll allow me a frank expression — more decent than the one to which all of us now have to submit. I am convinced, my dear Master, that, when you have had chance to consider the matter calmly, you will not only agree with me, but you will be surprised that this simple solution of an unbearable situation has not occurred to yourself long ago. As for me, I want to add that, to me personally, this solution seems the only possible one. Yes, I don't hesitate to say that I would leave the city, without hope of ever seeing Mrs. Cecilia again, rather than keep on compromising her in a manner that must be equally painful to all of us.

AMADEUS
Oh, has it come to that all at once? Well, if the matter doesn't trouble Cecilia or me, I think you might well regard it with indifference. I hope you know that we have arranged our life to suit ourselves, without the least regard for popular gossip, and that I don't care at all whether or no Cecilia be compromised — as you call it.

SIGISMUND
I know you don't. But I feel differently. A lady to whom I'm so devoted, and whom I respect so highly that I would lead her to the altar, must appear spotless to God and man alike.

AMADEUS
You might have kept that in mind before. Your previous behavior has given no indication of such a view. You have been waiting for my wife in the immediate vicinity of the opera; you have been walking with her for hours at a time; you have visited her in the country; you have followed her to Berlin and come back here in her company....

SIGISMUND (surprised)
But it was in your power to stop all those things, if they didn't suit you....

AMADEUS
Stop them... because they didn't suit...? What has that to do with what I am talking of? — I am not the person who has found this situation unbearable and compromising.

SIGISMUND
Oh, I understand. Considering, however, that you have placed such emphasis on your indifference to popular gossip, I must say that your tone sounds pretty excited. But permit me to assure you that this impresses me rather pleasantly. Bear in mind that I am merely human. What young man in my place would have refrained from meeting the adored one, when everything was rendered so easy for him? And nevertheless I didn't visit the Pustertal or make the tour to Berlin without an inward struggle — in fact, I have often had to struggle with myself while waiting for her near the opera. And I cannot tell you how I have suffered under the searching glances directed at Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg and myself when we were having supper together after one of the Berlin performances, for instance, or when we went for an afternoon drive in the Tiergarten. Not to speak of the painful impression my aunt's remarks made on me when I called to bid her good-by! Really, I can't find words to express it.

AMADEUS
How much longer do you mean to keep up this remarkable comedy, my dear Prince?

SIGISMUND (drawing back)
Do you mean....

AMADEUS
What in the world makes you appear before me in a part which I don't know whether to call tasteless or foolhardy?

SIGISMUND
Sir!... Oh...! You think.... I see now.... And you imagine that I would have crossed your threshold again under such circumstances?

AMADEUS
Why should that particular thing not be imagined?

SIGISMUND
Later on we shall get back to what you think of me. But a third person is concerned in this matter, and I am not going to stand....

AMADEUS
May I ask whether you have been equally angry with everyone who has dared to question the virtue of Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg?

SIGISMUND
You are at least the first one who has dared to question it to my face, and the last one who may dare to do so unpunished.

AMADEUS
Do you think the punishment threatening the impertinent one in your mind will be apt to restore the reputation of Cecilia? Do you think it would put an end to the gossip if you, of all people, tried to champion the honor of Mrs. Adams-Ortenburg?

SIGISMUND
Who could, if not I?

AMADEUS
If it is not a comedy you are now playing, then you haven't the right even!

SIGISMUND
Do you mean to say that Cecilia is the only woman in the world who must stand unprotected against any slander?

AMADEUS
If you are telling the truth, Prince Sigismund, then there is only one person in the world who has the right to protect Cecilia, and that person am I.

SIGISMUND
Considering what has happened, I have excellent reason to think that you will neither avail yourself of that right nor fulfill that duty.

AMADEUS
You are mistaken. And if you will take the trouble of returning home, you will soon be convinced of your mistake.

SIGISMUND
What do you mean?

AMADEUS
I mean simply that two of my friends are now on their way to your house on my behalf....

SIGISMUND
Well...?

AMADEUS
To demand reparation for what... (looking Sigismund straight in the eye) I believed you guilty of.

SIGISMUND (takes a step back; a pause ensues during which they stare hard at each other) You have challenged.... (Reaching out his hand) That's fine!

AMADEUS (does not accept the proffered hand)

SIGISMUND
But it's splendid! I can assure you that the whole matter now assumes quite a different aspect. And, of course, I shall be at your disposal just the same, if you insist.

AMADEUS (draws a deep breath, looks long at Sigismund, and shakes his head at last) No, I won't any longer. (He shakes hands with him, and then begins walking to and fro, muttering to himself) Cecilia.... Cecilia...! (Returning to Sigismund and addressing him in a totally different tone) Won't you please be seated, Sigismund?

SIGISMUND
No, thank you.

AMADEUS (feeling repelled and suspicious again)
Just as you please.

SIGISMUND
Don't misunderstand me, please. But I suppose this ends our conference, my dear Master. (Looking around) And yet I must admit that your rude treatment has made me feel a great deal more at ease. Isn't that strange?

And in spite of the fact that, after this unexpected turn, my hopes must be held practically — I beg your pardon! — completely disposed of.... In spite of this I feel actually in much better spirits than I have done for a long time. Even if I am not to have the happiness of which I have foolishly dared to dream so long....

AMADEUS
Was it so very foolish?

SIGISMUND (good-humoredly)
Oh, yes. But this is at least an acceptable conclusion. (Shaking his head) It seems queer! If I hadn't come here at this very moment, you might never have learned — you might never have believed — might have believed that Cecilia.... And one of us might perhaps — must perhaps have.... (He makes a gesture to complete the sentence)

AMADEUS
It was indeed a strange coincidence that made you choose this particular moment....

SIGISMUND
Coincidence, you say? Oh, no, there are no coincidences — as you will discover sooner or later. (Pause) Well, good-by then, and give my regards to Mrs.... Adams...

AMADEUS
You can safely call her Cecilia.

SIGISMUND
... and tell her, please, that she mustn't be angry with me for having taken such a step without her knowledge. Of course, my going away won't surprise her. When leaving her yesterday, I told her that I couldn't continue this kind of existence.

AMADEUS
And she...? What did she say?

SIGISMUND (hesitatingly)
She....

AMADEUS (excited again)
She tried to keep you here...?

SIGISMUND
Yes.

AMADEUS
So that after all...!

SIGISMUND
Now she won't try any longer, my dear Master. (With a wistful smile) I have served my purpose.

AMADEUS

What do you mean?

SIGISMUND
Oh, I can see now why she needed me — of course, you were not at all aware of it!

AMADEUS
Why did she need you?

SIGISMUND
Simply and solely as a means of winning you back.

AMADEUS
What makes you think...?

SIGISMUND
What...? That she has succeeded.

AMADEUS
No, Sigismund — she hadn't lost me — in spite of all that had happened. In fact, I feel as if I had rather lost her than she — me.

SIGISMUND
That's awfully kind of you. But now — God be with you!

AMADEUS (with something like emotion)
And when shall we see you again?

SIGISMUND
I don't know. Perhaps never. — Please don't imagine that I might take my own life. I shall get over it, being still young. — Oh, my dear Master, if things could only become what they used to be, so that I could sit here at the fireplace while Cecilia was singing — or hammer away at the piano after supper...!

AMADEUS
Don't be quite so modest, please! The fame of your piano playing has reached Berlin even, I hear.

SIGISMUND
So she has told you that, too?! — But you see, dear Master, all that can never come back — we could no longer feel at ease with each other.... So — never to meet again!

AMADEUS
Never.... Why? Perhaps I shall see you very soon alone. I am also — going away.

SIGISMUND
I know. We were talking of it yesterday, in the dining car. You are to conduct your — number-which-one is it now?

AMADEUS

The fourth.

SIGISMUND
So you have got that far already? — And where are you going anyhow?

AMADEUS
To the Rhine district first of all; then by way of Munich to Italy — Venice, Milan, Rome.

SIGISMUND
Rome...? There we may possibly meet. But you'll have to pardon me for not coming to your concerts. So far I have not been able to understand your symphonies.... But I am sure I shall sometime! One does grow more and more clever, and sorrow and experiences in particular have a maturing influence.... "Now he's making fun of it," I suppose you are thinking. But, really, I am not in a very humorous mood. Farewell, my dear Master — and my most respectful compliments to your wife. (He goes out)

AMADEUS (walks back and forth; takes a few deep breaths, as if relieved; goes out into the garden; returns; sits down at the piano and plays a few improvisations; gets up and goes to the writing desk, where he begins to look for something among the papers) Where's that Solo?... She's going to sing it, and I shall be present...! (He seats himself at the piano again, apparently in a very happy mood) Cecilia!... Cecilia!

CECILIA (enters)

AMADEUS (rising)
Ah, there you are at last, Cecilia!

CECELIA (very calmly)
Good-morning, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
A little late.

CECILIA (smiling)
Yes. (She takes off her hat and goes to the mirror to arrange her hair)

AMADEUS
What made you get out so early?

CECILIA
Various things I had to attend to.

AMADEUS
And may one ask...?

CECILIA
One may. — Look here, what I have got for you. (She takes a letter from a small bag)

AMADEUS

What's that? (He takes it) What...? My letter to Philine...! Did you go to her, Cecilia?

CECILIA
Well, I felt a little nervous about it. Now I think it was rather silly of me.

AMADEUS
And how...?

CECILIA
Oh, the simplest thing in the world! I asked her for it, and she gave it to me. It was lying in an open drawer in her writing desk — with others. I think you can call yourself lucky.

AMADEUS
Cecilia! (He tears the letter to pieces and throws these into the fireplace)

CECILIA
Well, you would never have made up your mind to demand it of her, and that would have kept me in a state of irritation. I can't have anything like that on my mind when I want to work. — And now that's settled. (She turns away) Then I went to the opera, too. I have had a talk with the Director. He's going to indorse my request to be set free.

AMADEUS
Your request to be set free...?

CECILIA
Yes, I shall go to Berlin on the first of January.

AMADEUS
But, Cecilia, we haven't talked it over yet....

CECILIA
What's the use of postponing a thing that's already settled in my own mind? — You know I never like to do that.

AMADEUS
But it means a whole year of separation!

CECILIA
To start with. But I think it might be just as well to prepare ourselves for a still longer period.

AMADEUS
Do you mean to leave me, Cecilia?!

CECILIA
What else can I do, Amadeus? That ought to be as clear to you as it is to me.

AMADEUS

So it would have been a little while ago, Cecilia. But I have come to see our future in a different light.... Cecilia... Sigismund has been here!

CECILIA
Sigismund?!... You have talked with him?... What did he want?

AMADEUS
What did he want...? Your hand.

CECILIA
And you refused...?

AMADEUS
He is sending you his farewell greetings through me, Cecilia.

CECILIA
So that's what has put you in such a good humor all at once! (Pause) And if he hadn't come here?

AMADEUS
If he hadn't come here....

CECILIA
Speak out, please!

AMADEUS (remains silent)

CECILIA
You didn't mean to... to fight him?

AMADEUS
I did. Albert was on his way to him at the time.

CECILIA
What vanity, Amadeus!

AMADEUS
No, not vanity, Cecilia. I love you.

CECILIA (remains wholly unresponsive)

AMADEUS
You can't guess, of course, what took place within me while his words were gradually bringing home the truth to me! Once more the doors of heaven have been thrown open to me!

CECILIA
The only thing you forget is that they must remain closed to me forever.

AMADEUS

Don’t say that, Cecilia. What has happened to me in the past seems so very insignificant, after all.

CECILIA
Insignificant, you say? — And if it had happened to me, it would have been so significant that people should have had to kill or be killed on that account? How can you think then, that I might get over it so easily?

AMADEUS
How can I...? Because you have proved it already. You knew just what had happened, and yet you became mine again.... You knew that I had been faithless, while you had kept your faith, and yet....

CECILIA
You say that I have kept my faith? — No, I haven’t! And even if I should seem faithful to you, I have long ago ceased to be so in my own mind. I know the desires that have burned within me.... I know how often my body has trembled and yearned in the presence of some man.... And what I told you last night — that I am waiting with wide-open arms, full of longings and expectations — that’s true, Amadeus — no less true than it is that I am standing face to face with you now.

AMADEUS
If that be true, what has kept you from satisfying all your longings — you, who have been as free as I have?

CECILIA
I am a woman, Amadeus. And we seem to be like that. Something makes us hesitate even when we have already made up our minds.

AMADEUS
And because you seemed guilty in your own mind, you remained silent?... And for no other reason have you left me — me, whose sufferings you might have relieved by a single word — to believe you as guilty as myself?

CECILIA
Perhaps....

AMADEUS
And how long did you mean to let me go on believing that?

CECILIA
Until it became true, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
But there has been enough of it now, Cecilia. It will never become true... never after this.

CECILIA
Where do you get that idea, Amadeus? It is going to be true. Do you think, perhaps, that all this was meant as a kind of ordeal for you? Do you think I was playing a childish comedy in order to punish you, and that now, when you have discovered the truth prematurely, I shall sink into your arms and declare everything right again? Have you really imagined that everything could now be forgotten, and that we might resume our marriage relations at the exact point where they were interrupted? How can you possibly have wished that such might be the case — so that our marriage would be like thousands of others, where both deceive each other, and become reconciled, and deceive each other again — just as the moment's whim happens to move them?

AMADEUS
We have neither deceived each other, nor become reconciled — we have been free, and have merely found each other again.

CECILIA
Each other, you say?... As if that were possible! What is it then, that has made me seem so desirable to you all at once? Not the fact that I am Cecilia — oh, no! But the fact that I seem to have come back another woman. And have I really become yours again? Not at all! Not unless you have grown so modest all at once that you can be satisfied with a happiness that might have fallen to somebody else perhaps, if he had merely chanced to be on hand at that particular moment.

AMADEUS (shrinking back)
But even if last night be sacrificed to this fixed idea of yours, Cecilia — it is daylight now — we are awake — and in this moment of clear light you must feel, no less than I, that we love each other, Cecilia — love as we have never loved before.

CECILIA
This moment might prove deceptive — and I am sure it would. No other moment would be more apt to prove such. Do you think those many moments in which we felt our tenderness gradually ebbing away — those many moments when we felt the lure of other loves — do you think them less worthy of consideration than this one? The only thing urging us together now is our fear of the final leave-taking. And our feelings at this moment make a pretty poor sample upon which to base an eternity. I don't trust them. What has happened once, may... nay, must repeat itself — to-morrow — or two years from now — or five... in a more indiscreet manner, perhaps, or in a manner more tragical — but certainly in a manner to be much more regretted.

AMADEUS
Oh, no — never again! Now — after what I have felt and experienced lately, I can vouch for myself.

CECILIA
I don't feel equally certain of myself, Amadeus.

AMADEUS
That doesn't scare me, Cecilia, for now I'm prepared to fight for you — now I'm worthy and capable of fighting for you. Hereafter you shall never more be left unprotected as you were in the past — my tenderness will guard you.

CECILIA
But I don't want to be guarded! I shall no longer permit you to guard me! And I can no more give you any promises than I care to accept yours.

AMADEUS

And if I should forgo them myself — if I should risk it on a mere uncertainty?

CECILIA
That's more than I dare — whether the risk concern you or myself... more than I would risk even with certainty in mind. (She turns away from him)

AMADEUS
Then I cannot possibly understand you, Cecilia. What is it you want to make us pay for so dearly — yes, both of us? Is it our guilt or our happiness?

CECILIA
Why should either one of them be paid for? What's the use of such a word between us? Neither one of us has done anything that requires atonement. Neither one of us has any right to reproach the other one. Both of us have been free, and each one has used his freedom in accordance with his own desire and ability. I think nothing has happened but what must happen. We have trusted each other too much — or too little. We were neither made to love each other faithfully forever nor to maintain a pure friendship. Others have become resigned — I can't — and you mustn't allow yourself, Amadeus. Our experiment has failed. Let us admit our disillusionment. That can be borne. But I have no curiosity to find how it tastes when everything comes to an end in sheer loathing.

AMADEUS
Comes to an end, you say? — But that can't be possible, Cecilia! It can't be possible that we should really leave each other — part from each other like strangers! We are still face to face — each of us can feel the closeness of the other one — and that's why you cannot yet realize what it would mean. Consider all the things that might come into your life as well as into mine during a separation of that kind — so prolonged and so void of responsibility — things that now have no place in your imagination even, and for which there could be no reparation.

CECILIA
Could they be worse than what has already befallen me? Faithfulness to each other in the ordinary sense matters least of all, I should think. And we could probably more easily find our way back to each other sometime from almost any other experience than that adventure of last night, or from a moment of self-deception like this one.

AMADEUS
Find our way back, you say...?

CECILIA
It's also possible that, after a couple of years, we won't care to do so — that everything may be over between us to such an extent that we cannot imagine it now. That's possible, I say. But if we stayed together now, everything would be over within the next few seconds. For then we should be no better than all those we have despised hitherto — the one difference being that we had arranged ourselves more comfortably than the rest.

ALBERT (entering)

I beg your pardon for coming in unannounced like this, but....

CECILIA (withdraws toward the background)

AMADEUS (going to meet Albert)
Yes, I know — you didn't find the Prince — he has been here himself.

ALBERT
What does that mean?

AMADEUS
That there was no reason why I should want to kill him.

ALBERT
I see. — Well, I'll be hanged if I haven't suspected something of the kind myself! — Then I suppose everything is once more in perfect order in this house?

AMADEUS
Yes, in perfect order. When I return, Cecilia will be in Berlin, and I shall not follow her.

ALBERT
What? Then you are going to ask for a separation after all?

CECILIA (approaching them)
No, we are not going to ask for a separation. We'll just separate.

ALBERT
What?... (He looks from one to the other; pause) Really I like that. Indeed, I do. I think both of you are splendid — but especially you, Cecilia — and, of course, there is nothing else left for you to do now.

PETER (enters, carrying some of his puppets)
Papa! Mamma! I can play theater beautifully. Won't you come and look? Oh, please come!

CECILIA (strokes his hair)

AMADEUS (remains standing at some distance from them)

ALBERT
Well, isn't this just like life — the life you are always talking of! This should be the moment when you had to fall into each others' arms with absolute certainty, if you had had the luck to be imaginatively created — that is, not by me, of course.

CECILIA
No, the boy means too much to both of us to make that possible — don't you think so, Amadeus?

AMADEUS (losing control of himself after a glance at Peter) All at once to be alone in the world again — it's a thought I can hardly face!

CECILIA
But we shall be somewhere in that world, you know — your child, and the mother of your child. We are not parting as enemies, after all.... (With a smile) I am even ready to come here and sing that Solo of yours — although we shall not be able to study it together.

AMADEUS
It's more than I can bear...!

CECILIA
It will have to be borne. We must work — both of us.

ALBERT (to Amadeus)
Yes, and it remains to be seen what effect a real sorrow like this may have on you. It's just what you have lacked so far. I expect you'll get a lot out of it. In a sense, I might almost envy you.

PETER
What's the matter?... Look here, mamma, how they jump about! That's the king, and this is the devil.

ALBERT
Come on, sonny, and play your piece to me. But I insist that the hero must either marry in the end, or be carried off by the devil. In either case you can go home quite satisfied when the curtain drops. (He goes out with Peter)

CECILIA (after a glance at Amadeus, starts to follow them)

AMADEUS
Cecilia!

CECILIA (turns back)

AMADEUS (passionately)
Why didn't you show me the door, Cecilia, when you knew...?

CECILIA
Well, did I know?... I have loved you, Amadeus. And all I wanted, perhaps, was that the inevitable end should be worthy of our love — that we should part after a final moment of bliss, and with a pang.

AMADEUS
With a pang, you say...? Do you really feel anything like that?

CECILIA (coming close to him and speaking very gently)
Why don't you try to understand me, Amadeus? I feel it just as keenly as you do. But there is another thing I feel more strongly than you, and it is well for us both that I do. It is this, Amadeus, that we have been so much to each other that we must keep the memory of it pure. If that was nothing but an adventure last night, then we have never been worthy of our past happiness.... If it was a farewell, then we may expect new happiness in the future... perhaps.... (She starts toward the garden)

AMADEUS
And that's our reward, then, for having always been honest to each other!

CECILIA (turning toward him again)
Honest, you call it...? Have we always been that?

AMADEUS
Cecilia!

CECILIA
No, I can't think so any longer. Let everything else have been honest — but that both of us should have resigned ourselves so promptly when you told me of your passion for the Countess and I confessed my affection for Sigismund — that was not honest. If each of us had then flung his scorn, his bitterness, his despair into the face of the other one, instead of trying to appear self-controlled and superior — then we should have been honest — which, as it was, we were not. (She walks across the veranda outside and disappears into the garden)

AMADEUS (to himself)
All right — then we were not honest. (After a pause) And suppose we had been?! (For a moment he seems to consider; then he goes to the writing desk and puts the manuscript music lying there into the little handbag; after a glance into the garden, he goes into his own room, returning at once with his hat and overcoat; then he opens the handbag again and picks out a manuscript, which he places on the piano; then he goes out rapidly, taking hat, overcoat and handbag with him; a brief pause follows)

CECILIA (enters and notices that the handbag is gone; she goes quickly into Amadeus' room, but returns immediately; she crosses the room to the main entrance and remains standing there, opening her arms widely at first, and then letting them sink down again; going to the piano, she catches sight of the manuscript lying there and picks it up; while looking at it, she sinks down on the piano stool)

PETER (appears on the veranda with Albert and calls from there) Mother!

CECILIA (does not hear him)

ALBERT (observing that Cecilia is alone and sunk in grief, takes Peter with him into the garden again)

CECILIA (begins to weep softly and lets her head sink down on the piano)

CURTAIN

Countess Mizzi (1907)

OR, THE FAMILY REUNION

A COMEDY IN ONE ACT

Original German Title: 'Komtesse Mizzi oder Der Familientag'

Translated by Edwin Björkman, 1915

CONTENTS

PERSONS
COUNTESS MIZZIE

Volkstheater, Vienna, 1928 — where this play received its premier in 1907

PERSONS

Count Arpad Pazmandy
Mizzie, His daughter
Prince Egon Ravenstein
Lolo Langhuber
Philip
Professor Windhofer
Wasner
The Gardener
The Valet

COUNTESS MIZZIE

THE GARDEN OF Count Arpad. In the background, tall iron fence. Near the middle of this, but a little more to the right, there is a gate. In the foreground, at the left, appears the façade of the two-storied villa, which used to be an imperial hunting lodge about 180 years ago and was remodeled about thirty years ago. A narrow terrace runs along the main floor, which is raised above the ground. Three wide stairs lead from the terrace down to the garden. French doors, which are standing open, lead from the terrace into the drawing-room. The windows of the upper floor are of ordinary design. Above that floor appears a small balcony, to which access is had through a dormer window. This balcony holds a profusion of flowering plants. A garden seat, a small table and an armchair stand under a tree at the right, in the foreground.

COUNT (enters from the right; he is an elderly man with gray mustaches, but must still be counted decidedly good-looking; his bearing and manners indicate the retired officer; he wears a riding suit and carries a crop)

VALET (entering behind the Count)
At what time does Your Grace desire to have dinner to-day?

COUNT (who speaks with the laconism affected by his former colleagues, and who, at that particular moment, is engaged in lighting a huge cigar) At two.

VALET
And when is the carriage to be ready, Your Grace?

MIZZIE (appearing on the balcony with a palette and a bunch of brushes in one hand, calls down to her father) Good morning, papa.

COUNT
Morning, Mizzie.

MIZZIE
You left me all alone for breakfast again, papa. Where have you been anyhow?

COUNT
Most everywhere. Rode out by way of Mauer and Rodaun. Perfectly splendid day. And what are you doing? At work already? Is there anything new to be seen soon?

MIZZIE
Yes, indeed, papa. Nothing but flowers though, as usual.

COUNT
Isn’t the professor coming to see you to-day?

MIZZIE
Yes, but not until one.

COUNT
Well, don’t let me interrupt you.

MIZZIE (throws a kiss to him and disappears from the balcony)

COUNT (to the valet)
What are you waiting for? Oh, the carriage. I’m not going out again to-day. Joseph can take a holiday. Or wait a moment. (He calls up to the balcony) Say, Mizzie....

MIZZIE (reappears on the balcony)

COUNT
Sorry to disturb you again. Do you think you’ll want the carriage to-day?

MIZZIE
No, thank you, papa. I can think of nothing.... No, thanks. (She disappears again)

COUNT
So Joseph can do what he pleases this afternoon. That’s — oh, see that Franz gives the nag a good rubbing down. We got a little excited this morning — both of us.

VALET (goes out)

COUNT (sits down on the garden seat, picks up a newspaper from the table and begins to read)

GARDENER (enters)
Good morning, Your Grace.

COUNT
Morning, Peter. What’s up?

GARDENER
With Your Grace’s permission, I have just cut the tea roses.

COUNT
Why all that lot?

GARDENER
The bush is full up. It ain’t wise, Your Grace, to leave ’em on the stem much longer. If maybe Your Grace could find some use....

COUNT
Haven’t got any. Why do you stand there looking at me? I’m not going to the city. I won’t need any flowers. Why don’t you put them in some of those vases and things that are standing about in there? Quite the fashion nowadays, isn’t it? (He takes the bunch of flowers from the gardener and inhales their fragrance while he seems to be pondering something) Wasn’t that a carriage that stopped here?

GARDENER

That's His Highness' pair of blacks. I know 'em by their step.

COUNT
Thanks very much then. (He hands back the roses)

PRINCE (comes in by the gate)

COUNT (goes to meet him)

GARDENER
Good morning, Your Highness.

PRINCE
Hello, Peter.

GARDENER (goes out toward the right)

PRINCE (wears a light-colored Summer suit; is fifty-five, but doesn't look it; tall and slender; his manner of speech suggests the diplomat, who is as much at home in French as in his native tongue)

COUNT
Delighted, old chap. How goes it?

PRINCE
Thanks. Splendid day.

COUNT (offers him one of his gigantic cigars)

PRINCE
No, thank you, not before lunch. Only one of my own cigarettes, if you permit. (He takes a cigarette from his case and lights it)

COUNT
So you've found time to drop in at last. Do you know how long you haven't been here? Three weeks.

PRINCE (glancing toward the balcony)
Really that long?

COUNT
What is it that makes you so scarce?

PRINCE
You mustn't mind. But you are right, of course. And even to-day I come only to say good-by.

COUNT
What — good-by?

PRINCE

I shall be off to-morrow.

COUNT
You're going away? Where?

PRINCE
The sea shore. And you — have you made any plans yet?

COUNT
I haven't given a thought to it yet — this year.

PRINCE
Well, of course, it's wonderful right here — with your enormous park. But you have to go somewhere later in the Summer?

COUNT
Don't know yet. But it's all one.

PRINCE
What's wrong now?

COUNT
Oh, my dear old friend, it's going downhill.

PRINCE
How? That's a funny way of talking, Arpad. What do you mean by downhill?

COUNT
One grows old, Egon.

PRINCE
Yes, and gets accustomed to it.

COUNT
What do you know about it — you who are five years younger?

PRINCE
Six almost. But at fifty-five the springtime of life is pretty well over. Well — one gets resigned to it.

COUNT
You have always been something of a philosopher, old chap.

PRINCE
Anyhow, I can't see what's the matter with you. You look fine. (Seats himself; frequently during this scene he glances up at the balcony; pause)

COUNT (with sudden decision)
Have you heard the latest? She's going to marry.

PRINCE
Who's going to marry?

COUNT
Do you have to ask? Can't you guess?

PRINCE
Oh, I see. Thought it might be Mizzie. And that would also.... So Lolo is going to marry.

COUNT
She is.

PRINCE
But that's hardly the "latest."

COUNT
Why not?

PRINCE
It's what she has promised, or threatened, or whatever you choose to call it, these last three years.

COUNT
Three, you say? May just as well say ten. Or eighteen. Yes, indeed. In fact, since the very start of this affair between her and me. It has always been a fixed idea with her. "If ever a decent man asks me to marry him, I'll get off the stage stante pede." It was almost the first thing she told me. You have heard it yourself a couple of times. And now he's come — the one she has been waiting for — and she's to get married.

PRINCE
Hope he's decent at least.

COUNT
Yes, you're very witty! But is that your only way of showing sympathy in a serious moment like this?

PRINCE
Now! (He puts his hand on the Count's arm)

COUNT
Well, I assure you, it's a serious moment. It's no small matter when you have lived twenty years with somebody — in a near-marital state; when you have been spending your best years with her, and really shared her joys and sorrows — until you have come to think at last, that it's never going to end — and then she comes to you one fine day and says: "God bless you, dear, but I'm going to get wedded on the sixteenth...." Oh, damn the whole story! (He gets up and begins to walk about) And I can't blame her even. Because I understand perfectly. So what can you do about it?

PRINCE
You've always been much too kind, Arpad.

COUNT
Nothing kind about it. Why shouldn't I understand? The clock has struck thirty-eight for her. And she has said adieu to her profession. So that anybody can sympathize with her feeling that there is no fun to go on as a ballet dancer retired on half pay and mistress on active service to Count Pazmandy, who'll be nothing but an old fool either, as time runs along. Of course, I have been prepared for it. And I haven't blamed her a bit— 'pon my soul!

PRINCE
So you have parted as perfect friends?

COUNT
Certainly. In fact, our leave-taking was quite jolly. 'Pon my soul, I never suspected at first how tough it would prove. It's only by degrees it has come home to me. And that's quite a remarkable story, I must say....

PRINCE
What's remarkable about it?

COUNT
I suppose I had better tell you all about it. On my way home that last time — one night last week — I had a feeling all of a sudden — I don't know how to express it... tremendously relieved, that's what I felt. Now you are a free man, I said to myself. Don't have to drive to Mayerhof Street every night God grants you, merely to dine and chatter with Lolo, or just sit there listening to her. Had come to be pretty boresome at times, you know. And then the drive home in the middle of the night, and, on top of it, to be called to account when you happened to be dining with a friend in the Casino or taking your daughter to the opera or a theater. To cut it short — I was in high feather going home that night. My head was full of plans already.... No, nothing of the kind you have in mind! But plans for traveling, as I have long wanted to do — to Africa, or India, like a free man.... That is, I should have brought my little girl along, of course.... Yes, you may well laugh at my calling her a little girl still.

PRINCE
Nothing of the kind. Mizzie looks exactly like a young girl. Like quite a young one. Especially in that Florentine straw hat she was wearing a while ago.

COUNT
Like a young girl, you say! And yet she's exactly of an age with Lolo. You know, of course! Yes, we're growing old, Egon. Every one of us. Oh, yes.... And lonely. But really, I didn't notice it to begin with. It was only by degrees it got hold of me. The first days after that farewell feast were not so very bad. But the day before yesterday, and yesterday, as the time approached when I used to start for Mayerhof Street.... And when Peter brought in those roses a moment ago — for Lolo, of course — why, then it seemed pretty plain to me that I had become a widower for the second time in my life. Yes, my dear fellow. And this time forever. Now comes the loneliness. It has come already.

PRINCE
But that's nonsense — loneliness!

COUNT
Pardon me, but you can't understand. Your way of living has been so different from mine. You have not let yourself be dragged into anything new since your poor wife died ten years ago. Into nothing of a serious nature, I mean. And besides, you have a profession, in a sense.

PRINCE
Have I?

COUNT
Well, as a member of the Upper House.

PRINCE
Oh, I see.

COUNT
And twice you have almost been put into the cabinet.

PRINCE
Yes, almost....

COUNT
Who knows? Perhaps you will break in some time. And I'm all done. Had myself retired three years ago in the bargain — like a fool.

PRINCE (with a smile)
That's why you are a free man now. Perfectly free. With the world open before you.

COUNT
And no desire to do a thing, old man. That's the whole story. Since that time I haven't gone to the Casino even. Do you know what I have been doing the last few nights? I have sat under that tree with Mizzie — playing domino.

PRINCE
Well, don't you see? That's not to be lonely. When you have a daughter, and particularly such a sensible one, with whom you have always got on so well.... What does she say about your staying at home nights anyhow?

COUNT
Nothing. Besides, it has happened before, quite frequently. She says nothing at all. And what could she say? It seems to me she has never noticed anything. Do you think she can have known about Lolo?

PRINCE (laughing)
Man alive!

COUNT
Of course. Yes, I know. Of course, she must have known. But then, I was still almost a young man when her mother died. I hope it hasn't hurt her feelings.

PRINCE
No, that wouldn't. (Casually) But being left so much alone may have troubled her at times, I should think.

COUNT
Has she complained of me? There's no reason why you shouldn't tell me.

PRINCE
I am not in her confidence. She has never complained to me. And, heavens, it may never have troubled her at all. She has so long been accustomed to this quiet, retired life.

COUNT
Yes, and she seems to have a taste for it, too. And then she used to go out a good deal until a few years ago. Between you and me, Egon, as late as three years ago — no, two years ago — I still thought she might make the plunge after all.

PRINCE
What plunge? Oh, I see....

COUNT
If you could only guess what kind of men have been paying attention to her quite recently....

PRINCE
That's only natural.

COUNT
But she won't. She absolutely won't. What I mean is, that she can't be feeling so very lonely... otherwise she would... as she has had plenty of opportunity....

PRINCE
Certainly. It's her own choice. And then Mizzie has an additional resource in her painting. It's a case like that of my blessed aunt, the late Fanny Hohenstein, who went on writing books to a venerable old age and never wanted to hear a word about marriage.

COUNT
It may have some connection with her artistic aspirations. At times I'm inclined to look for some psychological connection between all these morbid tendencies.

PRINCE
Morbid, you say? But you can't possibly call Mizzie morbid.

COUNT
Oh, it's all over now. But there was a time....

PRINCE
I have always found Mizzie very sensible and very well balanced. After all, painting roses and violets doesn't prove a person morbid by any means.

COUNT
You don't think me such a fool that her violets and roses could make me believe.... But if you remember when she was still a young girl....

PRINCE
What then?

COUNT
Oh, that story at the time Fedor Wangenheim wanted to marry her.

PRINCE
O Lord, are you still thinking of that? Besides, there was no truth in it. And that was eighteen or twenty years ago almost.

COUNT
Her wanting to join the Ursuline Sisters rather than marry that nice young fellow, to whom she was as good as engaged already — and then up and away from home all at once — you might call that morbid, don't you think?

PRINCE
What has put you in mind of that ancient story to-day?

COUNT
Ancient, you say? I feel as if it happened last year only. It was at the very time when my own affair with Lolo had just begun. Ah, harking back like that...! And if anybody had foretold me at the time...! You know, it really began like any ordinary adventure. In the same reckless, crazy way. Yes, crazy — that's it. Not that I want to make myself out worse than I am, but it was lucky for all of us that my poor wife had already been dead a couple of years. Lolo seemed... my fate. Mistress and wife at the same time. Because she's such a wonderful cook, you know. And the way she makes you comfortable. And always in good humor — never a cross word.... Well, it's all over. Don't let us talk of it.... (Pause) Tell me, won't you stay for lunch? And I must call Mizzie.

PRINCE (checking him)
Wait — I have something to tell you. (Casually, almost facetiously) I want you to be prepared.

COUNT
Why? For what?

PRINCE
There is a young man coming here to be introduced.

COUNT (astonished)
What? A young man?

PRINCE
If you have no objection.

COUNT
Why should I object? But who is he?

PRINCE
Dear Arpad — he's my son.

COUNT (greatly surprised)
What?

PRINCE
Yes, my son. You see, I didn't want — as I'm going away....

COUNT
Your son? You've got a son?

PRINCE
I have.

COUNT
Well, did you ever...! You have got a young man who is your son — or rather, you have got a son who is a young man. How old?

PRINCE
Seventeen.

COUNT
Seventeen! And you haven't told me before! No, Egon... Egon! And tell me... seventeen...? My dear chap, then your wife was still alive....

PRINCE
Yes, my wife was still alive at the time. You see, Arpad, one gets mixed up in all sorts of strange affairs.

COUNT
'Pon my soul, so it seems!

PRINCE
And thus, one fine day, you find yourself having a son of seventeen with whom you go traveling.

COUNT
So it's with him you are going away?

PRINCE
I am taking that liberty.

COUNT
No, I couldn't possibly tell you.... Why, he has got a son of seventeen!... (Suddenly he grasps the hand of the Prince, and then puts his arms about him) And if I may ask... the mother of that young gentleman, your son... how it happens... as you have started telling me....

PRINCE
She's dead long ago. Died a couple of weeks after he was born. A mere slip of a girl.

COUNT
Of the common people?

PRINCE
Oh, of course. But a charming creature. I may as well tell you everything about it. That is, as far as I can recall it myself. The whole story seems like a dream. And if it were not for the boy....

COUNT
And all that you tell me only now! To-day only — just before the boy is coming here!

PRINCE
You never can tell how a thing like that may be received.

COUNT
Tut, tut! Received, you say...? Did you believe perhaps... I'm something of a philosopher myself, after all.... And you call yourself a friend of mine!

PRINCE
Not a soul has known it — not a single soul in the whole world.

COUNT
But you might have told me. Really, I don't see how you could.... Come now, it wasn't quite nice.

PRINCE
I wanted to wait and see how the boy developed. You never can tell....

COUNT
Of course, with a mixed pedigree like that.... But you seem reassured now?

PRINCE
Oh, yes, he's a fine fellow.

COUNT (embracing him again)
And where has he been living until now?

PRINCE
His earliest years were spent a good way from Vienna — in the Tirol.

COUNT
With peasants?

PRINCE
No, with a small landowner. Then he went to school for some time at Innsbruck. And during the last few years I have been sending him to the preparatory school at Krems.

COUNT
And you have seen him frequently?

PRINCE
Of course.

COUNT
And what's his idea of it anyhow?

PRINCE
Up to a few days ago he thought that he had lost both his parents — his father as well — and that I was a friend of his dead father.

MIZZIE (appearing on the balcony)
Good morning, Prince Egon.

PRINCE
Good morning, Mizzie.

COUNT
Well, won't you come down a while?

MIZZIE
Oh, if I am not in the way.... (She disappears)

COUNT
And what are we going to say to Mizzie?

PRINCE
I prefer to leave that to you, of course. But as I am adopting the boy anyhow, and as a special decree by His Majesty will probably enable him to assume my name in a few days...

COUNT (surprised)
What?

PRINCE
... I think it would be wiser to tell Mizzie the truth at once.

COUNT
Certainly, certainly — and why shouldn't we? Seeing that you are adopting him.... It's really funny — but, you see, a daughter, even when she gets to be an old maid, is nothing but a little girl to her father.

MIZZIE (appears; she is thirty-seven, but still very attractive; wears a Florentine straw hat and a white dress; she gives the Count a kiss before holding out her hand to the Prince) Well, how do you do, Prince Egon? We don't see much of you these days.

PRINCE
Thank you. — Have you been very industrious?

MIZZIE
Painting a few flowers.

COUNT
Why so modest, Mizzie? (To the Prince) Professor Windhofer told her recently that she could safely exhibit. Won't have to fear comparison with Mrs. Wisinger-Florian herself.

MIZZIE
That's so, perhaps. But I have no ambition of that kind.

PRINCE
I'm rather against exhibiting, too. It puts you at the mercy of any newspaper scribbler.

MIZZIE
Well, how about the members of the Upper House — at least when they make speeches?

COUNT
And how about all of us? Is there anything into which they don't poke their noses?

PRINCE
Yes, thanks to prevailing tendencies, there are people who would blackguard your pictures merely because you happen to be a countess, Mizzie.

COUNT
Yes, you're right indeed.

VALET (entering)
Your Grace is wanted on the telephone.

COUNT
Who is it? What is it about?

VALET
There is somebody who wishes to speak to Your Grace personally.

COUNT
You'll have to excuse me a moment. (To the Prince, in a lowered voice) Tell her now — while I am away. I prefer it. (He goes out followed by the valet)

MIZZIE
Somebody on the telephone — do you think papa can have fallen into new bondage already? (She seats herself)

PRINCE

Into new bondage, you say?

MIZZIE
Lolo used always to telephone about this time. But it's all over with her now. You know it, don't you?

PRINCE
I just heard it.

MIZZIE
And what do you think of it, Prince Egon. I am rather sorry, to tell the truth. If he tries anything new now, I'm sure he'll burn his fingers. And I do fear there is something in the air. You see, he's still too young for his years.

PRINCE
Yes, that's so.

MIZZIE (turning so that she faces the Prince)
And by the way, you haven't been here for ever so long.

PRINCE
You haven't missed me very much... I fear.... Your art... and heaven knows what else....

MIZZIE (without affectation)
Nevertheless....

PRINCE
Awfully kind of you.... (Pause)

MIZZIE
What makes you speechless to-day? Tell me something. Isn't there anything new in the world at all?

PRINCE (as if he had thought of it only that moment)
Our son has just passed his examinations for the university.

MIZZIE (slightly perturbed)

I hope you have more interesting news to relate.

PRINCE
More interesting....

MIZZIE
Or news, at least, that concerns me more closely than the career of a strange young man.

PRINCE
I have felt obliged, however, to keep you informed about the more important stages in the career of this young man. When he was about to be confirmed, I took the liberty to report the fact to you. But, of course, we don't have to talk any more about it.

MIZZIE
He pulled through, I hope?

PRINCE
With honors.

MIZZIE
The stock seems to be improving.

PRINCE
Let us hope so.

MIZZIE
And now the great moment is approaching, I suppose.

PRINCE
What moment?

MIZZIE
Have you forgotten already? As soon as he had passed his examinations, you meant to reveal yourself as his father.

PRINCE
So I have done already.

MIZZIE
You — have told him already?

PRINCE
I have.

MIZZIE (after a pause, without looking at him)
And his mother — is dead...?

PRINCE
She is — so far.

MIZZIE
And forever. (Rising)

PRINCE
As you please.
[The Count enters, followed by the valet.

VALET
But it was Your Grace who said that Joseph could be free.

COUNT

Yes, yes, it's all right.

VALET (goes out)

MIZZIE
What's the matter, papa?

COUNT
Nothing, my girl, nothing. I wanted to get somewhere quick — and that infernal Joseph.... If you don't mind, Mizzie, I want to have a few words with Egon.... (To the Prince) Do you know, she has been trying to get me before. I mean Lolo. But she couldn't get the number. And now Laura telephones — oh, well, that's her maid, you know — that she has just started on her way here.

PRINCE
Here? To see you?

COUNT
Yes.

PRINCE
But why?

COUNT
Oh, I think I can guess. You see, she has never put her foot in this place, of course, and I have been promising her all the time that she could come here once to have a look at the house and the park before she married. Her standing grievance has always been that I couldn't receive her here. On account of Mizzie, you know. Which she has understood perfectly well. And to sneak her in here some time when Mizzie was not at home — well, for that kind of thing I have never had any taste. And so she sends me a telephone message, that the marriage is set for the day after to-morrow, and that she is on her way here now.

PRINCE
Well, what of it? She is not coming here as your mistress, and so I can't see that you have any reason for embarrassment.

COUNT
But to-day of all days — and with your son due at any moment.

PRINCE
You can leave him to me.

COUNT
But I don't want it. I'm going to meet the carriage and see if I can stop her. It makes me nervous. You'll have to ask your son to excuse me for a little while. Good-by, Mizzie. I'll be back right away. (He goes out)

PRINCE
Miss Lolo has sent word that she's coming to call, and your papa doesn't like it.

MIZZIE
What’s that? Has Lolo sent word? Is she coming here?

PRINCE
Your father has been promising her a chance to look over the place before she was married. And now he has gone to meet the carriage in order to steer her off.

MIZZIE
How childish! And how pathetic, when you come to think of it! I should really like to make her acquaintance. Don’t you think it’s too silly? There is my father, spending half his lifetime with a person who is probably very attractive — and I don’t get a chance — don’t have the right — to shake hands with her even. Why does he object to it anyhow? He ought to understand that I know all about it.

PRINCE
Oh, heavens, that’s the way he is made. And perhaps he might not have minded so much, if he were not expecting another visit at this very moment....

MIZZIE
Another visit, you say?

PRINCE
For which I took the liberty to prepare him.

MIZZIE
Who is it?

PRINCE
Our son.

MIZZIE
Are you... bringing your son here?

PRINCE
He’ll be here in half an hour at the most.

MIZZIE
I say, Prince... this is not a joke you’re trying to spring on me?

PRINCE
By no means. On a departed... what an idea!

MIZZIE
Is it really true? He’s coming here?

PRINCE
Yes.

MIZZIE
Apparently you still think that nothing but a whim keeps me from having anything to do with the boy?

PRINCE
A whim...? No. Seeing how consistent you have been in this matter, it would hardly be safe for me to call it that. And when I bear in mind how you have had the strength all these years not even to ask any questions about him....

MIZZIE
There has been nothing admirable about that. I have had the strength to do what was worse... when I had to let him be taken away... a week after he was born....

PRINCE
Yes, what else could you — could we have done at the time? The arrangements made by me at the time, and approved by you in the end, represented absolutely the most expedient thing we could do under the circumstances.

MIZZIE
I have never questioned their expediency.

PRINCE
It was more than expedient, Mizzie. More than our own fate was at stake. Others might have come to grief if the truth had been revealed at the time. My wife, with her weak heart, had probably never survived.

MIZZIE
Oh, that weak heart....

PRINCE
And your father, Mizzie.... Think of your father!

MIZZIE
You may be sure he would have accepted the inevitable. That was the very time when he began his affair with Lolo. Otherwise everything might not have come off so smoothly. Otherwise he might have been more concerned about me. I could never have stayed away several months if he hadn't found it very convenient at that particular moment. And there was only one danger connected with the whole story — that you might be shot dead by Fedor Wangenheim, my dear Prince.

PRINCE
Why I by him? It might have taken another turn. You are not a believer in judgment by ordeal, are you? And the outcome might have proved questionable from such a point of view even. You see, we poor mortals can never be sure how things of that kind are regarded up above.

MIZZIE
You would never talk like that in the Upper House — supposing you ever opened your mouth during one of its sessions.

PRINCE
Possibly not. But the fundamental thing remains, that no amount of honesty or daring could have availed in the least at the time. It would have been nothing but useless cruelty toward those nearest to us. It's doubtful whether a dispensation could have been obtained — and besides, the Princess would never have agreed to a divorce — which you know as well as I do.

MIZZIE
Just as if I had cared in the least for the ceremony...!

PRINCE
Oh....

MIZZIE
Not in the least. Is that new to you? Didn't I tell you so at the time? Oh, you'll never guess what might... (her words emphasized by her glance) what I... of what I might have been capable at that time. I would have followed you anywhere — everywhere — even as your mistress. I and the child. To Switzerland, to America. After all, we could have lived wherever it happened to suit us. And perhaps, if you had gone away, they might never even have noticed your absence in the Upper House.

PRINCE
Yes, of course, we might have run away and settled down somewhere abroad.... But do you still believe that a situation like that would have proved agreeable in the long run, or even bearable?

MIZZIE
No, I don't nowadays. Because, you see, I know you now. But at that time I was in love with you. And it is possible that I — might have gone on loving you for a long time, had you not proved too cowardly to assume the responsibility for what had happened.... Yes, too much of a coward, Prince Egon.

PRINCE
Whether that be the proper word....

MIZZIE
Well, I don't know of any other. There was no hesitation on my part. I was ready to face everything — with joy and pride. I was ready to be a mother, and to confess myself the mother of our child. And you knew it, Egon. I told you so seventeen years ago, in that little house in the woods where you kept me hidden. But half-measures have never appealed to me. I wanted to be a mother in every respect or not at all. The day I had to let the boy be taken away from me, I made up my mind never more to trouble myself about him. And for that reason I find it ridiculous of you to bring him here all of a sudden. If you'll allow me to give you a piece of good advice, you'll go and meet him, as papa has gone to meet Lolo — and take him back home again.

PRINCE
I wouldn't dream of doing so. After what I have just had to hear from you again, it seems settled that his mother must remain dead. And that means that I must take still better care of him. He is my son in the eyes of the world too. I have adopted him.

MIZZIE

Have you...?

PRINCE
To-morrow he will probably be able to assume my name. I shall introduce him wherever it suits me. And of course, first of all to my old friend — your father. If you should find the sight of him disagreeable, there will be nothing left for you but to stay in your room while he is here.

MIZZIE
If you believe that I think your tone very appropriate....

PRINCE
Oh, just as appropriate as your bad temper.

MIZZIE
My bad temper...? Do I look it? Really, if you please... I have simply permitted myself to find this fancy of yours in rather poor taste. Otherwise my temper is just as good as ever.

PRINCE
I have no doubt of your good humor under ordinary circumstances.... I am perfectly aware, for that matter, that you have managed to become reconciled to your fate. I, too, have managed to submit to a fate which, in its own way, has been no less painful than yours.

MIZZIE
In what way? To what fate have you had to submit...? Everybody can't become a cabinet minister. Oh, I see... that remark must refer to the fact that His Highness did me the honor ten years ago, after the blissful departure of his noble spouse, to apply for my hand.

PRINCE
And again seven years ago, if you'll be kind enough to remember.

MIZZIE
Oh, yes, I do remember. Nor have I ever given you any cause to question my good memory.

PRINCE
And I hope you have never ascribed my proposals to anything like a desire to expiate some kind of guilt. I asked you to become my wife simply because of my conviction that true happiness was to be found only by your side.

MIZZIE
True happiness!... Oh, what a mistake!

PRINCE
Yes, I do believe that it was a mistake at that moment. Ten years ago it was probably still too early. And so it was, perhaps, seven years ago. But not to-day.

MIZZIE
Yes, to-day too, my dear Prince. Your fate has been never to know me, never to understand me at all — no more when I loved you than when I hated you, and not even during the long time when I have been completely indifferent toward you.

PRINCE
I have always known you, Mizzie. I know more about you than you seem able to guess. Thus, for instance, I am not unfamiliar with the fact that you have spent the last seventeen years in more profitable pursuits than weeping over a man who, in all likelihood, was not worthy of you at the time in question. I am even aware that you have chosen to expose yourself to several disillusionments subsequent to the one suffered at my hands.

MIZZIE
Disillusionments, you say? Well, for your consolation, my dear Prince, I can assure you that some of them proved very enjoyable.

PRINCE
I know that, too. Otherwise I should hardly have dared to call myself familiar with the history of your life.

MIZZIE
And do you think that I am not familiar with yours? Do you want me to present you with a list of your mistresses? From the wife of the Bulgarian attaché in 1887 down to Mademoiselle Therese Grédun — if that be her real name — who retained the honors of her office up to last Spring at least. It seems likely that I know more than you even, for I can give you a practically complete list of those with whom she has deceived you.

PRINCE
Oh, don't, if you please. There is no real pleasure in knowledge of that kind when you don't uncover it yourself.
[A carriage is heard stopping in front of the house.

PRINCE
That's he. Do you want to disappear before he comes out here? I can detain him that long.

MIZZIE
Don't trouble yourself, please. I prefer to stay. But don't imagine that there is anything astir within me.... This is nothing but a young man coming to call on my father. There he is now.... As to blood being thicker than water — I think it's nothing but a fairy tale. I can't feel anything at all, my dear Prince.

PHILIP (comes quickly through the main entrance; he is seventeen, slender, handsome, elegant, but not foppish; shows a charming, though somewhat boyish, forwardness, not quite free from embarrassment) Good morning. (He bows to Mizzie)

PRINCE
Good morning, Philip. — Countess, will you permit me to introduce my son? This is Countess Mizzie, daughter of the old friend of mine in whose house you are now.

PHILIP (kisses the hand offered him by Mizzie; brief pause)

MIZZIE
Won't you be seated, please?

PHILIP
Thank you. Countess. (All remain standing)

PRINCE
You came in the carriage? Might just as well send it back, as mine is here already.

PHILIP
Won't you come back with me instead, papa? You see, I think Wasner does a great deal better than your Franz with his team of ancients.

MIZZIE
So Wasner has been driving you?

PHILIP
Yes.

MIZZIE
The old man himself? Do you know that's a great honor? Wasner won't take the box for everybody. Up to about two years ago he used to drive my father.

PHILIP
Oh....

PRINCE
You're a little late, by the way, Philip.

PHILIP
Yes, I have to beg your pardon. Overslept, you know. (To Mizzie) I was out with some of my colleagues last night. You may have heard that I passed my examinations a couple of weeks ago, Countess. That's why we rather made a night of it.

MIZZIE
You seem to have caught on to our Viennese ways pretty quickly, Mister....

PRINCE
Oh, dear Mizzie, call him Philip, please.

MIZZIE
But I think we must sit down first of all, Philip. (With a glance at the Prince) Papa should be here any moment now. (She and the Prince sit down)

PHILIP (still standing)
If you permit me to say so — I think the park is magnificent. It is much finer than ours.

MIZZIE
You are familiar with the Ravenstein park?

PHILIP
Certainly, Countess. I have been living at Ravenstein House three days already.

MIZZIE
Is that so?

PRINCE
Of course, gardens cannot do as well in the city as out here. Ours was probably a great deal more beautiful a hundred years ago. But then our place was still practically outside the city.

PHILIP
It's a pity that all sorts of people have been allowed to run up houses around our place like that.

MIZZIE
We are better off in that respect. And we shall hardly live to see the town overtake us.

PHILIP (affably)
But why not, Countess?

MIZZIE
A hundred years ago these grounds were still used for hunting. The place adjoins the Tiergarten, you know. Look over that wall there, Philip. And our villa was a hunting lodge once, belonging to the Empress Maria Theresa. The stone figure over there goes back to that period.

PHILIP
And how old is our place, papa?

PRINCE (smiling)
Our place, sonny, dates back to the seventeenth century. Didn't I show you the room in which Emperor Leopold spent a night?

PHILIP
Emperor Leopold, 1648 to 1705.

MIZZIE (laughs)

PHILIP
Oh, that's an echo of the examinations. When I get old enough.... (He interrupts himself) I beg your pardon! What I meant to say was simply — all that stuff will be out of my head in a year. And, of course, when I learned those dates, I didn't know Emperor Leopold had been such a good friend of my own people.

MIZZIE
You seem to think your discovery enormously funny, Philip?

PHILIP
Discovery, you say.... Well, frankly speaking, it could hardly be called that. (He looks at the Prince)

PRINCE
Go on, go on!

PHILIP
Well, you see, Countess, I have always had the feeling that I was no Philip Radeiner by birth.

MIZZIE
Radeiner? (To the Prince) Oh, that was the name...?

PRINCE
Yes.

PHILIP
And, of course, it was very pleasant to find my suspicions confirmed — but I have really known it all the time. I can put two and two together. And some of the other boys had also figured out — that I.... Really, Countess, that story about Prince Ravenstein coming to Krems merely to see how the son of his late friend was getting along — don't you think it smacked a little too much of story book... Home and Family Library, and that sort of thing? All the clever ones felt pretty sure that I was of noble blood, and as I was one of the cleverest....

MIZZIE
So it seems.... And what are your plans for the future, Philip?

PHILIP
Next October I shall begin my year as volunteer with the Sixth Dragoons, which is the regiment in which we Ravensteins always serve. And what's going to happen after that — whether I stay in the army or become an archbishop — in due time, of course....

MIZZIE
That would probably be the best thing. The Ravensteins have always been strong in the faith.

PHILIP
Yes, it's mentioned in the Universal History even. They were Catholic at first; then they turned Protestant in the Thirty Years War; and finally they became Catholic again — but they always remained strong in their faith. It was only the faith that changed.

PRINCE
Philip, Philip!

MIZZIE
That's the spirit of the time, Prince Egon.

PRINCE
And an inheritance from his mother.

MIZZIE
You have been working hard, your father tells me, and have passed your examinations with honors.

PHILIP
Well, that wasn't difficult, Countess. I seem to get hold of things quickly. That's probably another result of the common blood in me. And I had time to spare for things not in the school curriculum — such as horseback riding and...

MIZZIE
And what?

PHILIP
Playing the clarinet.

MIZZIE (laughing)
Why did you hesitate to tell about that?

PHILIP
Because.... Well, because everybody laughs when I say that I play the clarinet. And so did you, too, Countess. Isn't that queer? Did anybody ever laugh because you told him that you were painting for a diversion?

MIZZIE
So you have already heard about that?

PHILIP
Yes, indeed, Countess — papa told me. And besides, there is a floral piece in my bedroom — a Chinese vase, you know, with a laburnum branch and something purplish in color.

MIZZIE
That purplish stuff must be lilacs.

PHILIP
Oh, lilacs, of course. I saw that at once. But I couldn't recall the name just now.

VALET (entering)
There is a lady who wishes to see the Count. I have showed her into the drawing-room.

MIZZIE
A lady...? You'll have to excuse me for a moment, gentlemen. (She goes out)

PHILIP
That's all right, papa — if it's up to me, I have no objection.

PRINCE
To what? Of what are you talking?

PHILIP

I have no objection to your choice.

PRINCE
Have you lost your senses, boy?

PHILIP
But really, papa, do you think you can hide anything from me? That common blood in me, you know....

PRINCE
What put such an idea into your head?

PHILIP
Now look here, papa! You have been telling me how anxious you were to introduce me to your old friend, the Count. And then the Count has a daughter — which I have known all the time, by the way.... The one thing I feared a little was that she might be too young.

PRINCE (offended, and yet unable to keep serious)
Too young, you say....

PHILIP
It was perfectly plain that you had a certain weakness for that daughter.... Why, you used to be quite embarrassed when talking of her. And then you have been telling me all sorts of things about her that you would never have cared to tell otherwise. What interest could I have in the pictures of a Countess X-divided-by-anything, for instance — supposing even that you could tell her lilacs from her laburnums by their color? And, as I said, my one fear was that she might be too young — as my mother, that is, and not as your wife. Of course, there is not yet anybody too young or beautiful for you. But now I can tell you, papa, that she suits me absolutely as she is.

PRINCE
Well, if you are not the most impudent rogue I ever came across...! Do you really think I would ask you, if I should ever....

PHILIP
Not exactly ask, papa... but a happy family life requires that all the members affect each other sympathetically... don't you think so?
[Mizzie and Lolo Langhuber enter.

MIZZIE
You must look around, please. I am sure my father would be very sorry to miss you. (She starts to make the usual introductions) Permit me to....

LOLO
Oh, Your Highness.

PRINCE
Well, Miss Pallestri....

LOLO
Langhuber, if you please. I have come to thank the Count for the magnificent flowers he sent me at my farewell performance.

PRINCE (introducing)
My son Philip. And this is Miss...

LOLO
Charlotta Langhuber.

PRINCE (to Philip)
Better known as Miss Pallestri.

PHILIP
Oh, Miss Pallestri! Then I have already had the pleasure....

PRINCE
What?

PHILIP
You see, I have Miss Pallestri in my collection.

PRINCE
What... what sort of collection is that?

LOLO
There must be some kind of mistake here, Your Highness. I can not recall....

PHILIP
Of course, you can't, for I don't suppose you could feel that I was cutting out your picture from a newspaper at Krems?

LOLO
No, thank heaven!

PHILIP
It was one of our amusements at school, you know. There was one who cut out all the crimes and disasters he could get hold of.

LOLO
What a dreadful fellow that must have been!

PHILIP
And there was one who went in for historical personalities, like North Pole explorers and composers and that kind of people. And I used to collect theatrical ladies. Ever so much more pleasant to look at, you know. I have got two hundred and thirteen — which I'll show you sometime, papa. Quite interesting, you know. With a musical comedy star from Australia among the rest.

LOLO
I didn't know Your Highness had a son — and such a big one at that.

PHILIP
Yes, I have been hiding my light under a bushel so far.

PRINCE
And now you are trying to make up for it, I should say.

LOLO
Oh, please let him, Your Highness. I prefer young people like him to be a little vif.

PHILIP
So you are going to retire to private life, Miss Pallestri? That's too bad. Just when I might have the pleasure at last of seeing you on those boards that signify the world....

LOLO
That's awfully kind of Your Highness, but unfortunately one hasn't time to wait for the youth that's still growing. And the more mature ones are beginning to find my vintage a little out of date, I fear.

PRINCE
They say that you are about to be married.

LOLO
Yes, I am about to enter the holy state of matrimony.

PHILIP
And who is the happy man, if I may ask?

LOLO
Who is he? Why, he is waiting outside now — with that carriage.

MIZZIE
Why — a coachman?

LOLO
But, Countess — a coachman, you say?! Only in the same manner as when your papa himself — beg your pardon! — happens to be taking the bay out for a spin at times. Cab owner, that's what my fiancé is — and house owner, and a burgess of Vienna, who gets on the box himself only when it pleases him and when there is somebody of whom he thinks a whole lot. Now he is driving for a certain Baron Radeiner — whom he has just brought out here to see your father, Countess. And I am having my doubts about that Baron Radeiner.

PHILIP
Permit me to introduce myself — Baron Radeiner.

LOLO
So that's you, Your Highness?

PHILIP
I have let nobody but Wasner drive me since I came here.

LOLO
And under an assumed name at that, Your Highness? Well, we are finding out a lot of nice things about you!

COUNT (appears, very hot)
Well, here I am. (Taking in the situation) Ah!

LOLO
Your humble servant, Count! I have taken the liberty — I wanted to thank you for the magnificent flowers.

COUNT
Oh, please — it was a great pleasure....

PRINCE
And here, old friend, is my son Philip.

PHILIP
I regard myself as greatly honored, Count.

COUNT (giving his hand to Philip)

I bid you welcome to my house. Please consider yourself at home here. — I don't think any further introductions are required.

MIZZIE
No, papa.

COUNT (slightly embarrassed)
It's very charming of you, my dear lady. Of course, you know better than anybody that I have always been one of your admirers.... But tell me, please, how in the world did you get out here? I have just been taking a walk along the main road, where every carriage has to pass, and I didn't see you.

LOLO
What do you take me for, Count? My cab days are past now. I came by the train, which is the proper thing for me.

COUNT
I see.... But I hear that your fiancé himself....

LOLO
Oh, he has more pretentious customers to look after.

PHILIP
Yes, I have just had the pleasure of being conducted here by the fiancé of Miss Pallestri.

COUNT

Is Wasner driving for you? Well, that settles it — of course — clear psychological connection! (Offers his cigar case) Want a smoke?

PHILIP (accepting)
Thank you.

PRINCE
But, Philip...! A monster like that before lunch!

COUNT
Excellent. Nothing better for the health. And I like you. Suppose we sit down.
[The Count, the Prince and Philip seat themselves, while Mizzie and Lolo remain standing close to them.

COUNT
So you'll be off with your father to-morrow?

PHILIP
Yes, Count. And I'm tremendously pleased to think of it.

COUNT
Will you be gone long?

PRINCE
That depends on several circumstances.

PHILIP
I have to report myself at the regiment on the first of October.

PRINCE
And it's possible that I may go farther south after that.

COUNT
Well, that's news. Where?

PRINCE (with a glance at Mizzie)
Egypt, and the Sudan maybe — for a little hunting.

MIZZIE (to Lolo)
Let me show you the park.

LOLO
It's a marvel. Ours isn't a patch on it, of course. (She and Mizzie come forward)

MIZZIE
Have you a garden at your place, too?

LOLO
Certainly. As well as an ancestral palace — at Ottakring. The great-grandfather of Wasner was in the cab business in his days already. — My, but that's beautiful! The way those flowers are hanging down. I must have something just like it.

COUNT (disturbed)
Why are the ladies leaving us?

MIZZIE
Never mind, papa, I'm merely explaining the architecture of our façade.

PHILIP
Do you often get visits of theatrical ladies, Count?

COUNT
No, this is merely an accident.
[The men stroll off toward those parts of the garden that are not visible.

MIZZIE
It seems strange that I have never before had a chance of meeting you. I am very glad to see you.

LOLO (with a grateful glance)
And so I am. Of course, I have known you by sight these many years. Often and often have I looked up at your box.

MIZZIE
But not at me.

LOLO
Oh, that's all over now.

MIZZIE
Do you know, I really feel a little offended — on his behalf.

LOLO
Offended, you say...?

MIZZIE
It will be a hard blow for him. Nobody knows better than I how deeply he has been attached to you. Although he has never said a word to me about it.

LOLO
Do you think it's so very easy for me either, Countess? But tell me. Countess, what else could I do? I am no longer a spring chicken, you know. And one can't help hankering for something more settled. As long as I had a profession of my own, I could allow myself — what do they call it now? — to entertain liberal ideas. It goes in a way with the position I have held. But how would that look now, when I am retiring to private life?

MIZZIE
Oh, I can see that perfectly. But what is he going to do now?

LOLO
Why shouldn't he marry, too? I assure you, Countess, that there are many who would give all their five fingers.... Don't you realize, Countess, that I, too, have found it a hard step to take?

MIZZIE
Do you know what I have been wondering often? Whether he never thought of making you his wife?

LOLO
Oh, yes, that's just what he wanted.

MIZZIE
Why...?!

LOLO
Do you know when he asked me the last time, Countess? Less than a month ago.

MIZZIE
And you said no?

LOLO
I did. It would have done no good. Me a Countess! Can you imagine it? I being your stepmother, Countess...! Then we could not have been chatting nicely as we are doing now.

MIZZIE
If you only knew how sympathetically you affect me....

LOLO
But I don't want to appear better than I am. And who knows what I might....

MIZZIE
What might you?

LOLO
Well, this is the truth of it. I have gone clear off my head about Wasner. Which I hope won't make you think the worse of me. In all these eighteen years I have had nothing to blame myself with, as far as your dear papa is concerned. But you can't wonder if my feelings began to cool off a little as the years passed along. And rather than to make your dear papa — oh, no, no, Countess... I owe him too much gratitude for that.... Lord!

MIZZIE
What is it?

LOLO
There he is now, looking right at me.

MIZZIE (looks in the direction indicated)

WASNER (who has appeared at the entrance, raises his tall hat in salute)

LOLO
Don’t you think me an awful fool, Countess? Every time I catch sight of him suddenly, my heart starts beating like everything. Yes, there’s no fool like an old one.

MIZZIE
Old...? Do you call yourself old? Why, there can’t be much difference between us.

LOLO
Oh, mercy.... (With a glance at Mizzie)

MIZZIE
I am thirty-seven. — No, don’t look at me with any pity. There is no cause for that. None whatever.

LOLO (apparently relieved)

I have heard some whispers. Countess — of course, I didn’t believe anything. But I thank heaven it was true. (They shake hands)

MIZZIE
I should like to congratulate your fiancé right now, if you’ll permit me.

LOLO
That’s too sweet of you — but what about the Count — perhaps he wouldn’t like...?

MIZZIE
My dear, I have always been accustomed to do as I pleased. (They go together toward the entrance)

WASNER
You’re too kind, Countess....
[The Count, the Prince and Philip have reappeared in the meantime.

COUNT
Look at that, will you!

WASNER
Good morning, Count. Good morning, Highness.

PRINCE
I say, Wasner, you may just as well take your bride home in that trap of yours. My son is coming with me.

WASNER
Your son...?

PHILIP
Why haven’t you told me that you were engaged, Wasner?

WASNER
Well, there are things you haven’t told either... Mr. von Radeiner!

COUNT (to Lolo)
Thank you very much for your friendly visit, and please accept my very best wishes.

LOLO
The same to you, Count. And I must say, that when one has such a daughter....

MIZZIE
It's too bad I haven't come to know you before.

LOLO
Oh, really, Countess....

MIZZIE
Once more, my dear Miss Lolo, good luck to you! (Mizzie embraces Lolo)

COUNT (looks on with surprise and some genuine emotion)

LOLO
I thank you for the kind reception, Count — and good-by!

COUNT
Good-by, Miss Langhuber. I trust you'll be happy... indeed I do, Lolo.

LOLO (gets into the carriage which has driven up to the gate in the meantime)

WASNER (is on the box, hat in hand; they drive off)

MIZZIE (waves her hand at them as they disappear)

PHILIP (who has been standing in the foreground with the Prince) Oh, my dear papa, I can see through the whole story.

PRINCE
You can?

PHILIP
This Miss Lolo must be the natural daughter of the Count, and a sister of the Countess — her foster-sister, as they say.

PRINCE
No, you would call that a step-sister. But go on, Mr. Diplomat.

PHILIP
And of course, both are in love with you — both the Countess and the ballet dancer. And this marriage between the dancer and Wasner is your work.

PRINCE
Go on.

PHILIP
You know — there's something I never thought of until just now!

PRINCE
What?

PHILIP
I don't know if I dare?

PRINCE
Why so timid all at once?

PHILIP
Supposing my mother was not dead....

PRINCE
H'm....

PHILIP
And, through a remarkable combination of circumstances, she should now be going back to the city in the very carriage that brought me out here...? And suppose it should be my own mother, whose picture I cut out of that newspaper...?

PRINCE
My lad, you'll certainly end as a cabinet minister — Secretary of Agriculture, if nothing better. — But now it's time for us to say good-by.
[The Count and Mizzie are coming forward again.

PRINCE
Well, my dear friend, this must be our farewell call, I am sorry to say.

COUNT
But why don't you stay.... That would be delightful... if you could take lunch with us....

PRINCE
Unfortunately, it isn't possible. We have an appointment at Sacher's.

COUNT
That's really too bad. And shall I not see you at all during the Summer?

PRINCE
Oh, we shall not be entirely out of touch.

COUNT
And are you starting to-morrow already?

PRINCE

Yes.

COUNT
Where are you going?

PRINCE
To the sea shore — Ostend.

COUNT
Oh, you are bound for Ostend. I have long wanted to go there.

PRINCE
But that would be fine....

COUNT
What do you think, Mizzie? Let's be fashionable. Let's go to Ostend, too.

MIZZIE
I can't answer yet. But there's no reason why you shouldn't go, papa.

PHILIP
That would be delightful, Countess. It would please me awfully.

MIZZIE (smiling)
That's very kind of you, Philip. (She holds out her hand to him)

PHILIP (kisses her hand)

COUNT (to the Prince)
The children seem to get along beautifully.

PRINCE
Yes, that's what I have been thinking. Good-by then. Good-by, my dear Mizzie. And good-by to you, my dear old fellow. I hope at least to see you again at Ostend.

COUNT
Oh, she'll come along. Won't you, Mizzie? After all, you can get studios by the sea shore, too. Or how about it, Mizzie?

MIZZIE (remains silent)

PRINCE
Well, until we meet again! (He shakes hands with the Count and Mizzie)

PHILIP (kisses the hand of Mizzie once more)

COUNT (giving his hand to Philip)
It has been a great pleasure.

[The Prince and Philip go out through the gate and step into the carriage which has been driving up in the meantime, and which now carries them off. The Count and Mizzie come forward again and seat themselves at the table under the tree. Pause.

COUNT
Hasn't this been a queer day?

MIZZIE
All life is queer — only we forget it most of the time.

COUNT
I suppose you're right. (Pause)

MIZZIE
You know, papa, you might just as well have brought us together a little earlier.

COUNT
Who? Oh, you and....

MIZZIE
Me and Miss Lolo. She's a dear.

COUNT
So you like her? Well, if it were only possible to know in advance.... But what's the use? Now it's all over.

MIZZIE (takes hold of his hand)

COUNT (rises and kisses her on the forehead; strolls about aimlessly for a few seconds) Tell me, Mizzie, what you think.... How do you like the boy?

MIZZIE
Philip? Oh, rather fresh.

COUNT
Fresh, perhaps, but smart. I hope he'll stay in the army. That's a much more sensible career than the diplomatic service. Slow, but sure. All you need is to live long enough in order to become a general. But a political career.... Now look at Egon... three times he has almost become a minister.... And suppose he had succeeded? (Walking back and forth) Yes, yes... we shall be rather lonely this Summer.

MIZZIE
But why shouldn't you go to Ostend, papa?

COUNT
Yes, why not...? Really, won't you come along? It would be rather... without you, you know.... It's no use looking at me like that. I know! I haven't paid as much attention to you in the past as I should have....

MIZZIE (taking his hand again)

Oh, papa, you're not going to apologize, are you? I understand perfectly.

COUNT
Oh, well. But, you see, I shall not get much joy out of that trip without you. And what would you be doing here, all by yourself? You can't paint all day long.

MIZZIE
The only trouble is... the Prince has asked me to marry him.

COUNT
What? Is it possible? No, you don't mean.... And... and you said no?

MIZZIE
Practically.

COUNT
You did...? Oh, well.... After all, I have never tried to persuade you. It must be as you.... But I can't understand why. I have noticed for a long time, that he.... As far as age is concerned, you wouldn't be badly matched. And as for the rest... sixty millions are not to be despised exactly. But just as you say.

MIZZIE (remains silent)

COUNT
Or could it possibly be on account of the boy? That would be to exaggerate the matter, I assure you. Things of that kind occur in the very best families. And particularly when you consider that his heart always remained with his wife.... All of a sudden you get dragged into an affair of that kind without exactly knowing how.

MIZZIE
And some poor girl of the people is thrown aside and allowed to go to the dogs.

COUNT
Oh, please, that's only in the books. And how could he help it? That kind of women seem always to die off early. And who knows what he might have done, if she hadn't died.... I really think that his action in regard to the boy has been pretty decent. That took courage, you know. I could tell you more than one case.... But don't let us talk of it. If that should be the only thing against him, however.... And besides, our being together at Ostend wouldn't commit you in any way.

MIZZIE
No, that's true.

COUNT
Well, then... I tell you what. You make the trip with me. And if the place suits you, you can stay. If not, you can go on to London for a visit with Aunt Lora. I mean simply, that there is no sense in your letting me go away alone.

MIZZIE
All right.

COUNT
What do you mean?

MIZZIE
I'll go with you. But without any obligation — absolutely free.

COUNT
You'll come with me, you say?

MIZZIE
I will, papa.

COUNT
Oh, I'm so glad. Thank you, Mizzie.

MIZZIE
Why should you thank me? It's a pleasure to me.

COUNT
You can't imagine, of course... without you, Mizzie.... There would be so much to remember — this time in particular.... You know, of course, that I took Lolo to Normandy last year?

MIZZIE
Of course, I know....

COUNT
And as far as Egon is concerned... not that I want to persuade you by any means... but in a strange place like that you often get more acquainted with a person in a couple of days than during many years at home.

MIZZIE
It's settled now that I go with you, papa. And as for the rest, don't let us talk of it — for the time being.

COUNT
Then, you know, I'm going to telephone to the ticket office at once and reserve sleeping car compartments for the day after to-morrow — or for to-morrow.

MIZZIE
Are you in such a hurry?

COUNT
What's the use of sitting about here, once we have made up our minds? So I'll telephone.... Does that suit you?

MIZZIE
Yes.

COUNT (puts his arms about her)

PROFESSOR WINDHOFER (appears at the garden gate)

COUNT
Why, there's the professor. Have you a lesson to-day?

MIZZIE
I had forgotten it, too.

PROFESSOR (handsome; about thirty-five; his beard is blond and trimmed to a point; he is very carefully dressed, and wears a gray overcoat; he takes off his hat as he enters the garden and comes forward)
Good morning, Countess. How do you do, Count?

COUNT
Good morning, my dear Professor, and how are you? You have to pardon me. I was just about to go to the telephone — we are going away, you know.

PROFESSOR
Oh, are you going away? Please, don't let me detain you.

COUNT
I suppose I shall see you later, Professor. (He goes into the house)

PROFESSOR
So you are going away, Countess?

MIZZIE
Yes, to Ostend.

PROFESSOR
That's rather a sudden decision.

MIZZIE
Yes, rather. But that's my way.

PROFESSOR
That means an end to the lessons for the present, I suppose? Too bad.

MIZZIE
I don't think I shall be able to-day even... I am feeling a little upset.

PROFESSOR
Do you? — Well, you look rather pale, Maria.

MIZZIE
Oh, you think so?

PROFESSOR
And how long will you be gone?

MIZZIE
Until the Fall probably — perhaps until very late in the Fall even.

PROFESSOR
Then we can resume our lessons next November at the earliest, I suppose?

MIZZIE (smiling)

I don't think we shall....

PROFESSOR
Oh, you don't think so? (They look hard at each other)

MIZZIE
No, I don't.

PROFESSOR
Which means, Maria — that I am discharged.

MIZZIE
How can you put it that way, Rudolph? That is not quite fair.

PROFESSOR
Pardon me. But it really came a little more suddenly than I had expected.

MIZZIE
Better that than have it come too slow. Don't you think so?

PROFESSOR
Well, girl, I have no intention whatever to make any reproaches.

MIZZIE
Well, you have no reason. And it wouldn't be nice either. (She holds out her hand to him)

PROFESSOR (takes her hand and kisses it)
Will you please excuse me to the Count?

MIZZIE
Are you going already...?

PROFESSOR (unconcernedly)
Isn't that better?

MIZZIE (after a pause, during which she looks straight into his eyes) Yes, I think so. (They shake hands)

PROFESSOR
Good luck, Maria.

MIZZIE
Same to you.... And remember me to your wife and the children.

PROFESSOR
I won't forget, Countess. (He goes out)

MIZZIE (remains on the same spot for a little while, following him with her eyes)

COUNT (on the terrace)
Everything is ready. We'll leave at nine-thirty to-morrow night. — But what has become of the professor?

MIZZIE
I sent him away.

COUNT
Oh, you did? — And can you guess who has the compartment between yours and mine?... Egon and his young gentleman. Won't they be surprised though?

MIZZIE
Yes... won't they? (She goes into the house)

CURTAIN

The Vast Domain (1911)

Original German Title: 'Das weite Land'

Translated by Edward Woticky and Alexander Caro, 1923

This tragicomedy in five acts premiered on 2 November 1910 at the Novy Dramaticheskiy Theatre in Saint Petersburg. The German version was first performed a year later, simultaneously at several theaters: the Lessing Theatre (Berlin), the Lobe Theatre in Breslau, the Residenz Theatre in Munich, the German State Theatre in Prague, the Old City Theatre in Leipzig, the Schauburg Theatre in Hanover, the Bochum City Theatre, and the Burgtheater in Vienna. The text was published by S. Fischer in Berlin shortly after the German premieres.

The plot concerns a Viennese light bulb manufacturer, Friedrich Hofreiter, who repeatedly commits adultery. As the story opens, Hofreiter has ended an affair with Adele, the wife of his banker, Natter. His chief reason for ending the affair is Natter's spreading of a rumor that the world-famous Russian pianist Korsakov killed himself out of unrequited love for Hofreiter's wife, Genia. Adele Natter accuses Hofreiter of flirting outrageously with the 20-year-old Miss Erna Wahl. Meanwhile, Dr. Franz Mauer, whom Hofreiter calls his "only friend", proposes to Erna, but does not receive the acceptance he hoped for. Genia is confused why her husband unexpectedly wants to leave with friends for an extended mountain hike. Hofreiter replies that he can't bear to be with a woman whose virtue drove Korsakov to his death. Previously, Genia had shown her husband a letter from Korsakov professing her marital fidelity.

Whilst away, Hofreiter begins an affair with Erna in the Dolomites and subsequently proposes marriage. Although Erna has been in love with the factory owner since childhood, she wishes to remain single. However, due to the ensuing extra-marital complications, the drama inevitably leads to tragic consequence and thrilling duels…

When eventually asked about why they commit adultery, the husbands in the play are baffled by their actions. They cheat on their wives and are cheated on and still they persist. When asked why, the only answer they can come up with is that man is a "complicated subject" and his soul is "a vast domain" — explaining the title of the drama.

Schnitzler was inspired in writing this play by a salon he and his friends frequented at the St. Genois-Schlössl in Baden, near Vienna, which was run by Friedrich Eckstein and his wife Bertha Helene Diener. In his diary, Schnitzler cites Theodor Christomannos as the model for the hotelier and mountaineer "Dr. von Aigner" (January 31, 1911). Eckstein appears in Act III as "Gustl Wahl," with whom one discusses Buddhism.

Although the author presents Hofreiter as the villain of the play, he at least displays a sense of guilt for his crimes to his lovers. Erna wants to follow Hofreiter unconditionally, though he states that he "belongs to no one in the world... Nor does he want to." When his son Percy arrives from England, Hofreiter becomes painfully aware of what he has lost. Schnitzler carefully arranges the structure of the drama. He employs rumours, messenger reports and small and large gaps in time between the acts as his devices, prompting the viewer to reflect on the events behind the scenes. The use of indirect communication in Das weite Land, where little is explicitly stated, yet everything becomes clear to the viewer, even though they are occasionally led astray, reveals the mature mastery of his playwriting at this stage of his career.

Villa Aichelburg at Baden — the true-life inspiration for the drama's setting

CONTENTS

CHARACTERS

ACT I

ACT II

ACT III

ACT IV

ACT V

CHARACTERS

FRIEDRICH HOFREITER, MANUFACTURER

GENIA, his wife

ANNA MEINHOLD-AIGNER, an actress

OTTO, her son, an ensign of marines

DOCTOR VON AIGNER, divorced husband of Mrs. Meinhold

MRS. WAHL

HER CHILDREN: GUSTAV & ERNA

NATTER, a banker

ADELE, his wife

DOCTOR FRANZ MAUER, a physician

DEMETER STANZIDES, a lieutenant

PAUL KREINDL

ALBERTUS RHON, a writer

MARIE, his wife

SERENITZ

DOCTOR MEYER

FIRST TOURIST

SECOND TOURIST

ROSENSTOCK, porter in the Vols Lake Hotel

AN ENGLISHWOMAN

A FRENCHWOMAN

A SPANISH LADY

PENN, a guide

Two children of MRS. NATTER

MISS, an English governess

CHAMBERMAID, at Hofreiters'

Tourists, Hotel Guests, Waiters, Boys, etc.

Place, Baden, near Vienna; in the third act only, the Vols Lake Hotel.

ACT I

VERANDA AND GARDEN of the Hofreiter Villa. At the right the veranda, spacious, with balustrade which continues along either side of the six steps leading into the garden. Double door, leading from the veranda to the drawing room, stands open. In front of the veranda, a lawn with roses in bloom. A rather high wooden fence, painted green, encloses the garden, curving round at the rear right corner, and running onward behind the house. Without, along the fence, a foot-path. A high-road parallel to the foot-path. Inside the fence, shrubbery running along it. At the left the garden gate, facing the veranda, stands open. Benches stand round about the lawn: one in front facing the auditorium, another facing the gate, a third within the lawn, with its back to the auditorium. On the veranda a longish table with six armchairs. In the rear corner a potted oleander. The veranda is covered with an awning, striped red and white. On the table an electric lamp. To the right of the door a wall bracket with incandescent bulb. Tea dishes on the table. Late afternoon, after a thundershower. Meadows and leaves moist. The long shadows of the fence rails fall in the garden.

GENIA, 31, clad simply, but with distinction; dark-gray skirt, blouse of violet silk. She is seated at the veranda table, on the narrow side of the porch which is turned toward the spectators. She is just putting down her teacup. Staring before her a moment, she rises pushes back her chair, glances rearward over the balustrade into the garden, then goes down the steps to the garden, her hands clasped behind her, as is her habit.

CHAMBERMAID enters from the drawing-room carrying a large cup; about to remove the tea things, hesitates.

GENIA (Still on the stair, turning round toward her). Just clear away the things. Mr. Hofreiter has most likely had his tea in town. (After a brief pause during which she glances skyward) And you might draw up the awning.

Chambermaid (Laying down the tray and raising the awning). May I not bring you something to put around you? It has become cool.

Genia. Yes. My white cloak. (She smells of one of the roses on the bush, then continues strolling toward rear, along the path adjoining the house.)

CHAMBERMAID having raised the awning, clears the table and exits with the tea things.

MRS. WAHL and ERNA coming down the highroad from the rear, along the fence, are nearing the gate. GEN LA, continuing her walk along the meadow, also approaches the gate. MRS. WAHL and ERNA nod greetings from without. GENIA returns the greeting with a slight wave of the hand, hastens her steps somewhat, and meets the others at the entrance. MRS. WAHL and ERNA, both in dark English walking suits, remain standing. MRS. WAHL slender, supple, age about 45, with a certain languorous, but intensely conscious distinction. Her enunciation is slightly nasal, and she speaks an aristocratic-Viennese that is not quite genuine. Her glance and manner of speech are now too languid, now too animated. For the most part she looks past the person whom she is addressing, and only when she has finished speaking does she direct a friendly, searching gate upon her auditor, as if to reassure herself. ERNA taller than her mother, slender, determined and direct to the point of thoughtlessness, without appearing bumptious. Steady, unaffected glance.

Genia (Giving both a friendly hand-clasp). Back safe and sound from the city?

Mrs. Wahl. At you see, dear Frau Genia. The weather was frightful.

Genia. Out here too, till an hour ago.

Mrs. Wahl. You were quite right to remain at home. We were fairly swamped at the cemetery. Really it was only to please Erna that I went at all. It might have sufficed to witness the church ceremony, — in my opinion. I beg of you, to whom does one render any service by...

Erna — There mother is right... We can't bring him back to life again, poor Korsakow.

Genia. The funeral must have been a very big one.

Mrs. Wahl. Enormous. In the church one could hardly stir. And at the cemetery, too, there were several hundred — despite the wretched weather.

Genia. Many acquaintances?

Mrs. Wahl. Naturally... The Natters came cruising along in their new scarlet car.

Genia (Smiling). I've heard about the car.

Mrs. Wahl. The effect was fantastic, at the graveyard wall... not exactly fantastic, but, — well, it did look remarkable.

The Chambermaid (Enters with the white cloak, which she robes about GENIA). My humble respects, Madam. My humble respects, Miss.

Mrs. Wahl (Affably). God bleu you, Kate.

Erna. Good evening. (CHAMBERMAID exit.)

Genia. Didn't you speak to my husband at the cemetery?

Mrs. Wahl. Yes... in passing.

Erna. He was very much shaken.

Genia. That I can well imagine.

Erna. Truly I was rather astonished. As a rule he is not one to be easily moved.

Genia (Smiling). How remarkably well you know him.

Erna. And why not? (Very simply.) As a seven-year old girl I already loved him. Long before you, Madam.

Genia. “Madam” again.

Erna (Almost tenderly) — Frau Genia. (Kisses her hand)

Genia. As for Friedrich, he was very fond of Alexei Korsakow.

Erna. Obviously. Do you know, — I used to think that Korsakow was merely his — pianist.

Genia. How do you mean that — his pianist?

Erna — Well, just as Doctor Mauer is his best friend, Mr. Natter his banker, I his tennis partner, Lieutenant Stanzides... his duelling second.

Genia. Oh Erna. Should such a thing ever come up, I mean... He takes from each what he happens to find convenient, and as to what other qualities a person may have packed away he barely concerns himself.

Mrs. Wahl. Do you know, Frau Genia, what my poor husband used to call such remarks of Erna’s? Her performances on the psychologic tight-rope.

Otto Von Aigner (Approaches. At the gate he greets). Good evening.

Genia. Good evening, Herr von Aigner. Won’t you come in.

Otto. If I may. (He enters the garden. A young man, 25, of reserved and courteous manner: in the uniform of an ensign).

Exchange of greetings.

Genia. How is your mother? I had hoped to see her here this afternoon.

Otto. Wasn’t she to see you yesterday, Madam?

Genia. Yes. And the day before, too. (Smiling) She has spoiled me a bit, you see.

Otto. My mother went to town two hours ago. She performs tonight. (To MRS. WAHL and ERNA.) Were the ladies not in town today also? I saw you this morning driving to the depot during that fearful cloudburst.

Mrs. Wahl. We were at Korsakow’s funeral.

Otto. Why, of course, that was today. Tell me, is anything known — as to why he killed himself?

Erna. No.

Mrs. Wahl. Some one expressed the notion today at the cemetery that the suicide was prompted by wounded pride.

Genia. What? — Korsakow...?

Mrs. Wahl. Yes. Because, you see, he was forever hearing it said that he could play only Chopin and Schumann — no Beethoven and no Bach... Really I found it so too.

Otto. But that such a thing should drive a man to his death is a bit unlikely. Did he leave no farewell letter?

Erna. Korsakow was not one of the sort that write farewell letters.

Mrs. Wahl. Now how do you come to know that so definitely?

Erna. He had far too much taste and good sense for that. You see he realized what it means — this thing we call death. And therefore it was a matter of absolute indifference to him what sort of a face people would put on the matter next morning.

Otto. I read somewhere that on the evening before his suicide he dined with a few of his friends... and in the best of spirits.

Mrs. Wahl. Yes, that is what the papers always print afterward.

Genia. This time it happens to be correct. I know that because my husband was one of the friends that dined with him.

Mrs. Wahl. Ah...

Genia (Casually). As you know, business often detains him in the city until late, and then he always dines at the Imperial, — there is a sort of club table always reserved for his circle — a left-over of his bachelor days. Latterly, Korsakow was often with them, — he resided at the Hotel. And as Friedrich told me himself, — there wasn't the least thing unusual about him on that last evening. Why, after dinner they played billiards in the cafe.

Mrs. Wahl. What — your husband and Korsakow?

Genia. Yes. They even made a wager — and Friedrich lost. Next morning he sent one of the office clerks to the hotel with the cigars.... and — didn't you hear? Why it was the clerk that discovered the whole thing.

Mrs. Wahl. How was that?

Genia. Well, he knocked several times and no one answered. At length he opened the door to leave the cigars and...

Erna.... found Korsakow dead...

Genia. Yes. Dead on the couch, the pistol still in his hand...

Pause.

Mrs. Wahl. What a shock it must have been to the clerk! What did he do with the cigars? Did he leave them?

Erna. Mother believes in historical precision.

Genia. Forgive me, Frau Wahl but really, I quite forgot to ask. (The throb of a motor becomes audible.)

Mrs. Wahl. It stopped here.

Genia. That's Friedrich...

Erna. Then we can have a little tennis. Is the court in shape?

Otto. Surely. Mr. Hofreiter and I got in a few sets of singles yesterday.

Mrs. Wahl. He was in the humor to play tennis?

Erna. Why not, Mamma? I see nothing whatever against it. Let them dance the cakewalk on my grave... or even the Maxixe... Yes, by all means... The idea rather appeals to me.

Doctor Mauer (Enters, aged 35, tall, fair beard, pince-nez, scar from a sabre cut on his forehead, dark sack suit, not fashionably but by no means negligently attired). Good evening, all.

Genia. Ah, it is you, Doctor.

Mauer (Quickly greeting them all). My respects, Madam. (To MRS. WAHL.) Good evening, Miss Erna. Good evening, Ensign. (To GENIA.) Friedrich presents his compliments, Frau Genia; he is still busy at the factory. I motored there with him and he had the kindness to leave me the car for a few sick-calls that I had to make out here. He will come later by train.

Mrs. Wahl. I'm sorry, but we must go. (To MAUER.) I hope you will soon call on us too, Doctor. Although, thank Heaven, we find ourselves in the best of health.

Erna. But you will have to come soon, Doctor. We are going to Tyrol in July, — to Vols Lake.

Mauer. Ah!

Mrs. Wahl. We are to meet Gustav there. (To OTTO.) That's my son. He travels about all year. Well, not exactly the whole year — but, — I believe, I may say... a good deal.... Last year he was in India.

Erna. And I want to go clambering again.

Mauer. Do you? Then perhaps we may meet on some mountain peak. I expect to go to the Dolomites too. (To GENIA.) And I won't conceal, Madam, that I have a strong inclination this year to borrow Friedrich for the purpose.

Genia. For a Dolomite tour?... What does he say to it?

Mauer. He seems not entirely averse.

Mrs. Wahl. I thought that Friedrich since... since... the misfortune the last time had entirely given up mountain-climbing.

Mauer. Oh, but not for good.

Genia (Explaining to Otto). A friend of my husband's, a certain Doctor Bernhaupt, pitched off a cliff directly from my husband's side, and was killed on the spot. But that was seven years ago.

Otto (To Genia). What? Your husband was in that party?

Erna (Reflectively). It must be said... he hasn't much luck with his friends.

Genia (To OTTO). You knew about this?

Otto. It remained in my memory, naturally, because it occurred on the self-same cliff that — my father was the first to ascend more than twenty years ago.

Genia. Why, to be sure, it was Mt. Aigner.

Mauer. Mt. Aigner... really one forgets that it is named after a living man.

(Short Pause.)

Erna. The sensation must be an extraordinary one for you, Ensign, that there is a peak up there in the Dolomites to which you are, in a measure, related.

Otto. That isn't so extraordinary, my dear young lady. For they are both strangers to me, the peak and my father. I was a boy of four or five when my parents parted from each other.

Mrs. Wahl. And you haven't seen your father since?

Otto. So it befell —

(Pause.)

Erna (Moving to go). Now Mamma... I believe it is time...

Mrs. Wahl. Yes, really! I don't know when we shall ever finish unpacking (To MAUER). We moved out here only last Sunday. We are not even keeping house as yet. We are compelled to take our meals in that frightful park.

Erna. Why, Mamma, the food seems to agree with you.

Mrs. Wahl. But there are always so many people there, especially evenings... Well, good-night, Frau Genia. Coming with us a bit, Ensign?

Otto. With your permission. Good-night, Madam. Please remember me to Mr. Hofreiter.

Erna. Good-night, Frau Genia. Good-night, Doctor.

(Adieus. MRS. WAHL, ERNA, OTTO, Exeunt)

Mauer (After a brief pause, during which his glance has followed ERNA). There is a girl, whom one could almost forgive her mother.

Genia. Not such a bad sort, good Frau Wahl. I find her rather amusing. If that is the only consideration — (She walks toward the veranda) As I said to you once before, think the matter over, Doctor.

Mauer (Half in jest). I'm afraid I haven't enough polish to suit her. (Following her slowly)

Genia (Has gone up a few steps). I didn't know that Friedrich had anything to do at the office this evening.

Mauer. Oh, — I was to tell you, — he must wait for an important telegram.

Genia. America?

Mauer. Yes. Something to do with the patent rights for his new incandescent light.

Genia. It is only an improvement, Doctor. (She sits)

Mauer (Standing, leaning on the balustrade). As usual. At any rate the matter appears to assume tremendous proportions. I hear he wants to build an addition to the factory; in fact, to buy up the adjacent block of houses...

Genia. Yes...

Mauer. And besides, that company that has been at him so persistently, has applied again, concerning the purchase of the factory. He is to confer with his banker in the morning.

Genia. With Natter.

Mauer. Natter, of course.

Genia. They were at the funeral too, the Natters, I hear.

Mauer. Yes.

Genia. The scarlet car is said to have attracted much attention.

Mauer. Well, there's nothing for it. It is scarlet — and there you are!

(Short pause.)

GENIA gates at him with a slight smile.

Mauer. And by the way — the affair is over.

Genia (Still smiling quietly). Do you know that with absolute certainty?

Mauer. I can assure you, Genia.

Genia. Did Friedrich perhaps refer...

Mauer. No, you know he doesn't speak of such matters. But, — well, isn't the diagnostic eye of some use? What is more, the thing has been over for some time now. I assure you, Frau Genia, Friedrich is really always at the office or in the factory. You know him, if anyone does. His new incandescents must carry the world by storm or the whole thing's no fun to him. As for Mrs. Natter — well, in a word, so far as he is concerned she no longer exists.

Genia. After all it is reassuring to hear such a thing.

Mauer. Really, there never was any cause for anxiety. Adele is at bottom the most harmless person in the world. If it weren't that we happened to know —

Genia. Yes, she! No danger threatened from her side. But Mr. Natter, for all his superficial courtesy and good nature, I take to be a brutal creature. Even somewhat treacherous. And there were times when I really felt anxiety for Friedrich. As you can well imagine. Anxiety, as for a son — a rather grownup one — who is involved in questionable adventures.

Mauer (Sits facing her). It is really interesting, the way you look at things. One might almost believe that women who are born to be mothers have the incidental gift to be such to their husbands also.

Genia. Or to become such, my dear Doctor. I wasn't always such a motherly person. Some time back I was more than once on the point of clearing out.

Mauer. Oh!

Genia. With my boy, of course. I wouldn't have left him Percy, you may depend on that!

Mauer. You wanted to leave Friedrich...?

Genia. Yes, I did... and another time I even wanted to kill myself. Of course, that was long ago. Perhaps it only seems to me now that I could seriously...

Mauer. Of course... That is a thing you would never, never have done... If only to avoid causing him trouble.

Genia. Do you think me so considerate? There you are mistaken, Doctor. There was even a time when I was contemplating the most ruthless thing that a woman can do to a man, particularly a vain man... to revenge myself.

Mauer. Revenge?

Genia. Well, let us say — to even the score.

Mauer. Ah... That would at all events have been the simplest. And maybe a good deal might have been said for it. Well, perhaps it will come yet. Some day the hour of fate may strike for you too, Frau Genia.

Genia. And perhaps it needn't even be the hour of fate.

Mauer (Earnestly). With you, absolutely. That's just it. A pity, rather. For a long time my sense of justice has been protesting most emphatically against the idea that it should be just my old friend Freidrich — who is not to pay.

Genia. And who tells you, my dear Doctor, that Friedrich doesn't pay? Must it be precisely in the same coin? He pays, never fear — but in his own way. Things are not so well with him as you may imagine. Nor so well as he himself sometimes imagines. There are moments when I am honestly sorry for him. Indeed, Doctor, I sometimes believe it is a demon that drives him on.

Mauer. A demon? Well, I dare say — But there are women that would pack husband and demon both to the devil, in such a case... (in reply to her questioning glance) as, for example, the mother of our Ensign did, in days gone by, with her also rather demonic spouse.

Genia. Perhaps she loved her husband more than I do mine. Perhaps, indeed, it is the higher type of love that does not forgive.

Friedrich Hofreiter (Approaches. Slender, not very tall, refined features, dark moustache cropped English fashion; fair hair, grayed, parted at the right. Now and then he removes his pince-nez, which he wears without ribbon; walks with a slight stoop. Small, somewhat wizened eyes. Courteous, mild, almost feminine manner of speech, which at times turns to biting irony. His movements are graceful, but bespeak energy. He is elegantly attired, without a trace of foppishness; dark sack suit, above which a black overcoat, unbuttoned, with broad satin collar; black derby, tightly rolled umbrella with plain handle. He is now before the gate). Good evening. (As he enters.) How are you, Mauer? (with a peculiar laugh, habitual to him, which often gives the impression that he is poking fun at the person addressed.)

Mauer. Good evening, Friedrich.

Friedrich (At the head of the veranda stairs, kisses GENIA on the brow in perfunctory fashion). Good evening, Genia. How've you been? Anything new? Letters?

Genia. Nothing. And the mail hasn't come in yet.

Friedrich (Looking at his watch). A quarter of seven. About time they pensioned that postman. He gets to be more and more tedious every year. That may be verified by actual observation. Three years ago the last mail always came in at half past six. Now seldom before half past seven. Continuing at the same rate he will presently come waltzing in at midnight.

Genia. Would you care for tea?

Friedrich. Thanks... I had some at the office. Can't say it was good. Well, did Mauer tell you...?

Genia. Yes... Did you get your telegram from America?

Friedrich. To be sure. And it is as good as settled that I must go across in the fall.

Genia. Why, — you wanted to send one of your assistants.

Friedrich. Mm — the old story, — I must attend to everything myself. Want to come, Genia? On August 29th from Liverpool, or the 2nd of September from Hamburg. North-German Lloyd. I know the captain of the King James.

Genia. We'll see each other before then.

Friedrich. I hope to have that pleasure. (Sits down.)

Genia. You must be warm in your overcoat.

Friedrich. No. Seems cool, rather. Lord, what weather! Did it pour so out here, too? And the slops at the cemetery! By which I don't mean the speeches. Be glad you didn't — Really, that sort of thing should be abolished. How they did blabber on! (Pause.) Well, Mauer, did the motor behave? No mishaps? How did you drive her? Six miles an hour, eh? I know you wouldn't go in for more.

Mauer. Josh away. I put no trust in chauffeurs. There I'm exactly like you, — depend on myself exclusively. This week I've had three more cases of injury due to automobile accidents.

Friedrich. I say, how is Stanzides?

Mauer. Well enough, — for a compound fracture of the arm. I'm just going to him. He's impatient, of course. As a matter of fact he ought to be thankful he didn't break hit neck.

Friedrich. I as well, you forget. I shot out of the car too, thirty feet off, out on the road. Well, I suppose it's true that the insurance companies will soon accept no more acquaintances of mine.

Mauer. You Ve really no luck with your friends, as Erna Wahl remarked half an hour ago.

Friedrich. Ah, Erna was here?

Genie. Yes, with her mother. They just left with the Ensign.

Friedrich. Otto, too?... (to MAUER) Did you see him?

Mauer. Yes.

Friedrich. Well, how do you like him?

Mauer (Somewhat astonished at the question). Rather nice chap.

Friedrich. Strange how much he reminds one of his father. The same gray tone. Don't you think so?

Mauer. Possibly.... Personally I was never particularly smitten with this Doctor Von Aigner. Too much pose for my taste.

Friedrich. Personality, my boy. The two are often confused. A long time, too, since I last saw him. Seven years ago. In Bozen. Remember, Genia?

Genia. Yes, indeed, (to MAUER.) I rather liked him.

Friedrich. Yes, we found him at his best, then. At all events he was in better humor than I. (to MAUER.) You know, that was just a few days after the — after that Bernhaupt thing happened. And Aigner had just returned from an election tour; in high feather; somewhere he had been fired at, by Irredentists in some South Tyrolean hole, — and, of course, on the strength of it he received tremendous ovations from the Germans... had to make two or three speeches a day...

Mauer. Speeches! Yes — that was always his strong point. Even back in the days when he was president of our Tourists' Club and I was on the committee. And now most of all, as a member of the Chamber of Deputies.... There he has a wealth of opportunity.

Friedrich. Oh, he doesn't merely talk, — he does something for the country. The new roads through the Dolomites would never have been built but for him. And the huge hotels — the automobile connections, really all his work. And what's more, in every Tyrolean village he has at least one child. Even outside of his constituency.

Mauer. Very well — we'll say he has personality. But now I'll have to go. Stanzides will be waiting —

Friedrich. Remember me to him. Maybe I'll look in on him to-morrow. You'll be back for supper, won't you?

Mauer. I don't know.

Friedrich. Come, of course you will.

Mauer (Hesitating). Thanks. Really I prefer to make the 10:20 to town. I must be at the hospital early in the morning.

Friedrich. Are you superstitious, Mauer?

Mauer. Superstitious? Why?

Friedrich. Well, I thought, perhaps you didn't care to sleep in the guest's room because poor Korsakow spent the night there a week ago. But I don't believe the dead are given their very first night off, to make ghostly visitations.

Mauer. My dear fellow, when you talk in that strain —!

Friedrich (Suddenly serious). Look here, you know — but it's horrible! A week ago he slept up there, and on the night before he had played in there — Chopin — the C flat Nocturne, — and something of Schumann's, — and we sat here on the veranda. Otto was with us, and the Natters — who of us would have dreamed of such a thing! If one only had an inkling as to the motive. Well, Genia, — did he say nothing to you?

Genia. To me?...

Friedrich (Without attributing any significance to GENIA'S hearing). Sudden mental aberration, people say. But now let someone tell us what that means: sudden mental aberration. Well, Mauer, perhaps you'll be good enough to explain it to me?

Mauer. First, I'm no psychiatrist, and in the second place, I am never astonished when anyone does for himself. We are all so often on the verge of it. At fourteen I once wanted to kill myself because one of the professors wrote a charge in my section-book.

Friedrich. In such a case I would have preferred to kill the professor.... Only in that event I should have become a wholesale assassin.

Mauer. Really now — an artist! These people are all more or less abnormal. If only in the matter of their self-importance. Why ambition in itself is a species of mental disturbance. Lord, these speculative investments in immortality! And your interpretive artists are the worst off of the lot. Be they ever so great, nothing remains but the name, — not a jot of what they have accomplished. I can readily believe that that could drive one crazy.

Friedrich. Man, what are you saying! You didn't know him. None of you knew him. Ambition... He? — Why, he had altogether too much sense, too much philosophy, to let that get the better of him. For him pianoforte-playing was in reality a minor issue. Have you any conception of the diversity of things in which he took an interest? Kant, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche he had at his fingers' ends, and Marx and Proudhon as well. Why, the man's range was almost incredible. Trust me to pick the man to converse with... And then his eight hours' practice daily! Where in the world he found the time for all that — And twenty-seven years old! And kills himself. God, think of what the chap still had before him. Young, famous, and right handsome besides — and shoots himself to death. Now if some old ass were to do that, whom life had nothing further to offer... But it's just those that — Well. And on the evening previous one chats with him, dines with him — plays billiards with him... Why, Genia — what is there to laugh at?

Genia. I'm just after telling the story to Mrs. Wahl. She at once inquired what happened to the cigars you sent him the next day.

Friedrich. Ha... That woman is priceless. (Taking out his cigar case, offers it to MAUER.) You're not superstitious. I'm just smoking one of them myself. Of course Franz brought them back to me.

Mauer. Thanks. Really a pity to light it before supper. (Takes one.)

FRIEDRICH passes him a light.

CHAMBERMAID brings letters.

Genia (Taking them from her). A card from Percy.

Friedrich (Reading). Dear Mother. For you. Only a card again. The lazy lout.

Mauer. Why expect a thirteen year old boy to write letters? And in English, too.

Friedrich. Which he knows as well as he does German.

Mauer. Now, then, au revoir. I'll be back in a half hour. I say, this cigar's choked. And that's no superstition. No, stay. (Exit.)

Friedrich. Yes, it was well you didn't go, Genia. The speeches... and the weather besides. (Glances carelessly through letters and newspapers.) Oh, yes — as they lowered the coffin, the sun suddenly came out — (pause.) Isn't this Thursday? Why he was to have dined here tonight. That's something to tell Mauer... Do let me see Percy's card.

Genia (Handing it to him). He'll be here in four weeks.

Friedrich (Reading). Ah. And leads his class in Greek composition. Not bad. Perhaps he'll be a philologist or an archaeologist. By the way, did you read the article in the London Daily Telegraph yesterday concerning the new excavations in Crete?

Genia. No.

Friedrich. Very interesting. That's another spot we must get to see some day. Yes.

(Pause.)

Genia. What you said before about America, — were you serious?

Friedrich. Most certainly. Well, wouldn't you care to come, Genia? In New York there wouldn't be very much to do. But in Chicago and in Washington, and St. Louis... And it seems to me it would be inexcusable not to embrace the opportunity to skid a bit further; say to San Francisco. Do you remember poor Korsakow telling us about his tour through California? It must be wonderful.

Genia. Why, that would be a trip of several months.

Friedrich. Yes, if things here are in full swing by then, the new building in particular, we could extend the trip into the spring. Well, think it over.

(Genia shakes her head slowly.)

Friedrich. Are you afraid of the ocean voyage? My dear, — with those new ships! And then they've just discovered an absolutely sure remedy for seasickness. Electric vibrators.

Genia. I don't believe I'll go. In spite of the electric vibrators. But I did have an idea —

Friedrich. Yes —.

Genia. While you are across, I could stay in England with Percy.

Friedrich (Gazes at her out of the corner of his eye). Hm. You wouldn't see much of him.

Genia. Oh, he could continue his studies as a non-resident. Just like my sister Mary's boys. Then he could live with me.

Friedrich. What sort of — How did that notion enter your mind so suddenly?

Genia. Not so suddenly. I mentioned it to you only the other day — Just try to recall. And since you seem determined in any case, to keep him there a few years more...

Friedrich. Oh, by all means. You see how splendidly he is getting on. It would be nothing but damned egoism to take him away now, in the midst of his studies, and bring him here, where lads are systematically trained to all sorts of sentimentalities and brutalities, instead of rowing and golf.

Genia. If only there weren't the longing...

Friedrich. Well, that must be taken in the bargain. Do you imagine that I don't long for him? But longing is, in my opinion, a very healthy element in soul economy. Longing possesses the property of improving human relationships. Indeed it seems to me that human relationships should be based to a greater extent upon longing than upon habit. Besides we might accompany him to England, and then you could still decide whether to go with me or to remain with the boy over the winter.

Genia. I had rather you regard the matter as settled now.

Friedrich. Settled?

Genia. I should have many things to attend to before going to England. This business of emigrating can't be arranged for in a day.

Friedrich. Emigrating?

Genia. Call it what you please.

Friedrich. Why, what is it, Genia? Really you are strange today.

Genia. What is there so strange about it? That a mother,.. that an only son — When he gets to be a few years older, I shall have nothing of him. And now — the two summer months, a week at Christmas, and at Easter, — really that is insufficient. I have borne up under it long enough, — I simply can't any longer.

Friedrich. Why Genia, one might almost conclude that you are less concerned about being with your son than about getting away from.... from here.

Genia. I dare say you won't particularly miss me. But why speak of it? (Rises.)

Friedrich. Now really, what is it?

Genia. Nothing. I'm going into the garden. (Goes down the staircase.)

Friedrich (Glances after her. GENIA walks slowly rearward along the lawn. He has stepped down from the veranda; still in his overcoat, having left his hat upstairs; halts beside a rose bushy smells thereof). Absolutely no scent to them this year. I don't understand it. They look lovelier every year, but they have completely weaned themselves of the habit of fragrance.

GENIA continues to walk toward rear, her hands behind her back.

Friedrich (After a pause). I say, Genia.

Genia. Well?

Friedrich. Oh, when you've reached here.

Genia (Approaches slowly). Here I am.

Friedrich. Tell me, Genia, (very quietly, fixing her with his glance) could it be possible that you do know why Korsakow shot himself?

Genia (Quietly). What is the meaning of that question? You know I was no less astounded than you.

Friedrich. That was certainly my impression. Tell me, then, why do you wish to get away from me... so abruptly.

Genia. I don't wish to get away from you. I want to go to Percy. And not abruptly, but in the fall. To be with Percy.

Friedrich. Yes, or it would be too glaring.

Genia. What would be glaring?

Friedrich. It would almost resemble flight.

Genia. Flight? Flight from you? Really, I don't believe I am under any such necessity. We are distant enough from each other even at home —

(Pause.)

Friedrich. Come, Genia — Why, he is dead and buried, — Mr. Alexei Korsakow...

Genia. Why do you continually harp on him?

Friedrich. Steady, child, steady!... I only meant to say that there is nothing that can any longer... Of course, nothing would happen to him if he were still alive, any more than to you... but you will admit, this misunderstanding receives a peculiar significance... no, that isn't the word... well, I only mean to say that it is just today that this talk... that just today, the day on which Mr.
Korsakow was buried, your mood is so strange... Even if I am a husband, Genia, I'm not altogether a fool. Well, then — that there's something here that doesn't jibe, I'll stake my head. Now — what was there between you two?

Genia. You make me stare.

Friedrich. Yes, so I observe. But you will admit that is no answer. Please don't misunderstand me, Genia. I don't necessarily imply that anything really occurred between you and Korsakow. Perhaps it was just a flirtation. Yes, to be sure. For had there been anything else — why the suicide? Unless (on the watch) there was something more — and you sent him away. (He has spoken very quietly throughout, but now has seized her arm).

Genia (Almost smiling). Jealousy? Well!... You should really do something for your nerves, Friedrich. I don't know... You know I can't help... that the affair between you and Adele Natter is over — and that as yet there seems to be no one to succeed her.

Friedrich. Ah, you are very well informed. Well, for the present I refrain from investigating from what quarter this knowledge has reached you, — besides it is really not my fault that you never questioned me directly. I would have denied nothing. In no case should I have retorted that you ought to do something for your nerves. In fact that remark is... it isn't even like you. You ought to know me better. I really don't see why you stand there like a stone image instead of answering me sensibly. Don't you trust me, Genia? Are you saying to yourself, "One can never tell, with him?" I assure you, Genia, — don't think I'm pretending, — I assure you I should understand — completely. After all, you would have been quite right — whether it were Alexei or — well, in matters of taste there can be no disputing. It is common knowledge that in these matters the wife is not usually guided by the husband's taste.

Genia. Why do you deny him now? Weren't you his friend? Today at the burial you are said to have been deeply agitated.

Friedrich. Did Mauer tell you that too?

Genia. No. It was Erna Wahl, as it happens. She wouldn't have believed that anything on earth could have affected you so.

Friedrich. Ah, Erna, the reader of souls. Of course, I was agitated. I grieve over him as I have seldom grieved over any one. And I would grieve none the less, if I knew with absolute certainty that he was — your lover. You can't begin to picture how immaterial and unessential certain things become when one has just come from the cemetery. I am not saying this merely to reassure you, but because it is true. Now give me your answer. The matter won't rest, I'm afraid, till you do. You may lie, if you like, but answer you must. I'll know if it's true, right enough. Well now — Yes or no?

Genia. He was not my lover. Unfortunately he was not my lover. Does that satisfy you?

Friedrich. Yes, it does. Because now I know that he was. You've betrayed it yourself. Don't you see? "Unfortunately he wasn't," you said. And since you loved him, he was, of course, your lover. What should have held you back? And as you put an end to it, he killed himself. Quite simple. And as to your reason for putting an end to it, that is still simpler. I'll tell you the reason: it is because such things simply must come to an end. Especially when one of the people concerned is some years the younger — and is for the most part away on concert tours. And besides, Percy will soon be back, and there may have been a certain — let us say — a feeling of purity... Well... really quite respectable. That makes it all clear, till we get to the idea of the trip to England. Yes, I understand that too. After all, if the affair were really ended for you, — the break...Yes, even if you were not passionately fond of him — or hadn't been...

Genia. Don't give yourself any further trouble. Read. (She takes a letter from her girdle.)

Friedrich. What do you wish me to...?

Genia. Read.

Friedrich. What... A letter? From him? A letter from him to you? — Ah, keep it. I don't want it. Why that would look... Thank you. If it wasn't your intention to show me this letter, kindly keep it.

Genia. Read!

Friedrich. Why should I read it? You can easily tell me what it contains. Perhaps it's in Russian. And the small writing. Bad for the eyes.

Genia. Read!

Friedrich (On the veranda. He turns up the wall light, puts on his pince-nez, and begins reading silently. Looks up at her in astonishment). What? You had no idea that he... When did you receive this?

Genia. An hour before you brought me the news of his death.

Friedrich. Then you knew of it when I came home? I declare... Well, then... at the risk of being taken for an idiot, — I noticed nothing, absolutely nothing. (Continues reading silently, then looks up again, in surprise; continues reading half aloud.) "Perhaps you were right to deny my presumptuous suit. We were neither of us versed in lying... I perhaps; not you.... in spite of all..." In spite of all... You must have complained a good deal about me.

Genia (Questioning glance.)

Friedrich (Reading). "That you do not wish to leave Him" — with a capital H, very flattering— "to leave Him, in spite of all, I can well understand now. You love him, Genia, you love your husband still. That is the solution of the mystery. And perhaps the feeling that I designate by the silly... "I can't make out the rest.

Genia. "The feeling that I designate by the silly word fidelity..."

Friedrich. Ah, you know it by heart, "The feeling that I designate by the silly word fidelity is nothing but the hope that he will still some day come back to you."

Genia. His version. You know that I hope nothing — and wish nothing.

Friedrich (Gazes at her; continues). "When I spoke to you yesterday, I had already determined—" Yesterday?... Was he here on Sunday? Yes, I remember, you walked up and down together on the path back there... yes... (reads) "When I spoke to you yesterday, I had already determined to let everything depend on your yes or no. I said nothing about it, because I feared if you had divined that it was utterly impossible for me to live on without you..." Somewhat explicit this Mr. Aexei Ivanovitch... (Music heard from the park, muffled) "I did not wish to owe my happiness to compulsion, or to any kind of pressure. Therefore..." Would you have said yes, if you had known that it was a matter of life and death?

Genia. If I had known? How can one know... I wouldn't have believed it. How could I have believed that?

Friedrich. Let me put it differently.

Paul Kreindl (Young, well dressed with a straining toward smartness, appears at the gate). Good evening. My respects, Madam.

Friedrich. Who is it?... Ah, you Paul. (Steps down.)

Paul (Enters). I hope I am not intruding. I come as ambassador from the Park; representing Frau von Wahl, Fraulein Erna, Ensign von Aigner and Lieutenant Stanzides...

Friedrich. Is he about already?

Paul... To make inquiry as to whether you would like to join them at the concert.

Genia. We thank you, but we have a guest to dinner, Doctor Mauer.

Paul. Take him with you, Madam.

Friedrich. No doubt you'll all be staying in the Park awhile.

Paul. Till they put out the lights.

Friedrich. Very well... perhaps we shall come later... but I am not promising.

Genia. At any rate please convey our thanks.

Paul. Not at all. We should all be delighted. My respects, Madam. Good evening, Mr. Hofreiter, I beg as thousand pardons if I have intruded. (Leaves.)

(Pause.)

Friedrich. Let me put it differently. What I mean is — suppose you could awake him from the dead — through declaring yourself ready... to be his...

Genia. I don't know.

Friedrich. You forget what you said before. "Unfortunately he was not my lover." If you yourself regret that he wasn't, he couldn't have been so very far from it. And now you are in doubt whether you would consent to be his, even if you could recall him... Why don't you admit it? He would only have needed to be patient a few days longer and you would have... why, you loved him.

Genia. Not enough, as you see.

Friedrich. You say that as if to reproach... I am not to blame, am I?

Genia. No. Only I. I know it.

Friedrich. And now you... regret... having driven him to his death?

Genia. I am deeply pained at his death. But as for regret, really I have nothing to regret. Had he told me what was in his mind.... Oh, I would have brought him to reason...

Friedrich. How?

Genia. I should have made him pledge his word...

Friedrich. Oh, cornel Don't tell me that. You wouldn't have asked his word, — you would have become his — That is self-evident.

Genia. I don't believe so.

Friedrich. Now, I beg of you!

Genia. Oh, not on your account. Not even on Percy's.

Friedrich. Then why?

Genia. On my own account.

Friedrich. I don't understand that, Genia. I couldn't have - done it. God knows why. I couldn't. (Pause.)

Friedrich. Here is your letter, Genia. (She takes it. MAUER enters.)

Mauer. Good evening. I hope I didn't keep you too long.

Friedrich (Moving toward him). Ah, Mauer. Well, Stanzides seems to be doing well. He is in the park at the concert.

Mauer. Yes, I took him there myself.

Friedrich. Paul Kreindl has just been here, to invite us to come over after dinner.

Genia. I'll see whether it is ready.

Friedrich. Oh, Genia, I've an idea... Let us go to the Park now. The devil knows why — but I have a hankering for music and a crowd. If it's all the same to you, Mauer.

Mauer. To me? It all depends on your wife.

Genia. I don't want to interfere, — but for myself, I should prefer to remain at home.

Friedrich. No, there's no sense in that. Come with us, Genia — it will do you good, too.

Genia. I should have to dress.

Friedrich. Then go and dress — we shall wait in the garden.

Genia. Does it mean so much to you?

Friedrich (To MAUER). What do you say? (Nervously.) Well, then we'll all remain at home... That ends it.

Genia. I'll be right down.... I'll just put on my hat.

Friedrich (after a pause). Well, Mauer —

Mauer. Really, I don't understand you... A wife must find that sort of thing unpleasant.

Friedrich. Oh they serve excellent food in the Park. (Pause.) And it is perhaps as well that you are going to town tonight. The chances for ghostly visitations in this house have appreciably increased.

Mauer. What's that?

Friedrich. You really do not deserve my confidence, because you blurt out everything you know, even things

I never told you...

Mauer. What do you mean?

Friedrich. Well, that the affair with Adele Natter is over, how goes Genia to know that?

Mauer. You ought to be glad that it is occasionally possible to say something to your credit.

Friedrich. Why, as to whether that was particularly creditable... Lord, Mauer, life is a rather complicated arrangement... but interesting... very interesting.

Mauer. What was it you meant before by the increased chances for ghostly visitations?

Friedrich. Oh, yes — Well, what do you think was the reason that Korsakow killed himself? Well, guess! — Hopeless love — for my wife. You're dumbfounded, eh? Hopeless love!...Now we know there is such a thing! He left a letter for her. She showed it to me. A remarkable letter... not badly written... for a Russian.

Genia (Enters with hat. The music is heard more distinctly). Here I am. Now, Doctor, I'll tell you frankly; it is only on your account that I am leaving our dinner in the lurch. Erna is there in the Park.

Friedrich. Ah! Erna! (To MAUER.) That would be the thing. Well, Mauer boy, pull yourself together. There aren't many I wouldn't begrudge her to. Although, it seems she takes me for a heartless rascal, and won't even believe that the death of a friend.... (They leave the garden and step out on the roadway.)

ACT II

THE HOFREITER VILLA. Adjacent portions of the garden. At lefty rear facade of the house. Door leading into the garden. On either side of the door two windows partly open. On the first story a small balcony. A lawn in the center. Further toward the right a large walnut tree, beneath it a bench, table, chairs. Farther back in the center a clump of trees, through which, in the background, tennis court is visible. About the tennis court, a high wire netting with benches outside. Two small benches beside the main door, under the ground floor window. Hot, sunny, summer's day.

GENIA under the walnut tree in thin, white gown, book in hand, but not reading. On the tennis court a game is in progress. At the left, FRIEDRICH HOFREITER and ADELE NATTER. TO the right ERNA WAHL and PAUL KREINDL. The white costumes gleam in the sun, but the faces are hardly recognizable. Now and then we hear the cries, fifteen, thirty, forty, out, deuce, second, etc.

Soon after the rise of the curtain, OTTO VON AIGNER, in tennis costume, Panama hat, with racquet in hand, comes from behind the house and is about to go to the tennis court. He observes GENIA, who has heard his steps, and steps over to her. She greets him with a friendly nod.

Otto. Good day, Madam — you are not playing?

Genia. As you see, Ensign. I haven't a chance in that company. (A ball falls at OTTO'S feet. He returns it. Voices from the tennis court: Thank you.)

Otto. Not all masters there, by any means... Except your husband, of course. Forgive me, Madam, I have interrupted you in your reading. (About to leave for the court.)

Genia. You're not disturbing me at all. I tried to read, but was on the point of falling asleep. The air...

Otto. Yes, it's warm, but then the days are fine. We can thoroughly enjoy our native forests.

Genia. You've had a nice long walk today, I presume.

Otto. Yes, I strolled over to the "Forest Hut" quite early with my mother.

Genia. She must be very happy having you with her again.

Otto. And I... The more so that this will be my last leave for a long time. I've been detailed to a ship that is to be away three years in the South Pacific.

Genia (Conventionally). Oh.

Otto. Our ship has been attached to a scientific expedition by the War Department.

Genia. I dare say, Ensign, you employ much of your leisure in study.

Otto. Why do you think that, Madam?

Genia. I can't imagine that a soldier's life in itself would entirely satisfy you.

Otto (Smiling). I may perhaps be permitted the observation that we of the marines have a great variety of things to do which may, without exaggeration, be called scientific.

Genia. Oh, naturally, — I had no doubt of that. I only meant to say that you must have other serious interests outside of your profession.

Otto. There isn't much time for such things. On my coming trip I do hope to get a nearer view of a sphere in which I have busied myself hitherto in a rather dilettante manner. The expedition with which we are connected is equipped for deep sea exploration. And since, moreover, I am friendly with one of the assistants... Ah, here is Frau von Wahl.

Genia (Rising). You must tell me more about that, Ensign. About these deep sea matters.

Mrs. Wahl (Coming from the house into the garden). How do you do, dear Genia. Good day, Ensign. (Raising her lorgnette.) Youth is already busy at its work.

Genia. If you count Friedrich among the youth.

Mrs. Wahl. Him especially. Oh, these men! Would you believe Ensign, that we are about the same age, Mr. Hofreiter and I? Really, nature has acted shamefully toward us women. (Observing GENIA'S smile.) Well, by no means decently. Who else is playing? Adele Natter, of course. I saw the car outside. The scarlet one. Here against the background of green it isn't bad. At any rate better than at the cemetery wall...

Genia (Smiling languidly). That's an impression you can't forget, as it seems, Frau von Wahl.

Mrs. Wahl. It isn't so long ago. Not two weeks.

FREIDRICH and ERNA come from the tennis court, racquets in hand.

Friedrich (With his malicious smile). How are you, Mamma Wahl? Good afternoon Otto. What about two weeks ago?

Mrs. Wahl. That they buried poor Korsakow.

Friedrich. As long as that? How in the world do you come upon that black-bordered theme?

Genia. Frau von Wahl saw the Natter car outside, the scarlet one.

Friedrich. Oh, I see.

Erna. Who would otherwise speak of a dead pianist on such a fine summer's day.

Mrs. Wahl. Have you ever seen such a deep-natured girl? That's another one of her performances on the philosophic tightrope, as her poor father used to say.

Friedrich. She had best take care lest she tumble off some day, our little Erna.

ADELE and PAUL KREINDL come from the tennis court carrying their racquets. (Greetings.)

Adele (Pretty, plump, clad in white, red belt, red scarf). Well, are we going to stop?

PAUL KREINDL kisses MRS. WAHL'S hand.

Friedrich. You might play singles.

Adele. He thinks I don't play well enough, the brute.

Paul. Why Madam? (Tearfully.) There is no one that plays too poorly for me. My game is unworthy of a suckling pig. Pardon the expression, but it's true. I don't know what's the matter with me. I seem to be clean bewitched. Or maybe it's only my new racquet. You'll excuse me, — I'm going home to fetch my old one. (Leaves.)

(The rest laugh.)

Friedrich. Why do you laugh? At least he's serious about it. That's the important thing. Whether it's tennis or skating, painting or curing the sick. I hold a good tennis player to be a far nobler specimen of humanity than a mediocre poet or general. Well, am I right? (To OTTO.)

Adele (To GENIA). When do you expect Percy back, Frau Genia?

Genia. He should be here in two weeks. And then you'll bring your children some time, won't you?

Adele. With your permission, gladly. But whether the big boy will condescend to play with the brats, — (DR. MAUER comes. With him STANZIDES in uniform. Greetings.)

Genia (To STANZIDES). Splendid to see you here again.

Friedrich. How's the arm?

Stanzides. Thank you. Our esteemed doctor has just massaged it for the last time. (Throws his arm in a friendly way about MAUER'S shoulder.) But it can't stand tennis as yet.

Mauer. That will come, too.

Stanzides (To ADELE). Are you ready for battle, Madam? I have just had the pleasure of speaking to your husband in the Park.

Friedrich. Well, Mauer, what's the trouble? We hardly see you any more. I thought you'd cleared out entirely.

Mauer. I've just come to say good-bye. I leave tomorrow.

Genia. Where are you going?

Mauer. To Toblach. From there I go off on a mountain tour — Falzarego — Pordoi —.

Friedrich. Would you take me, Mauer?

Mauer. Well, could you come, and would you?

Friedrich. Yes, why not? You leave tomorrow?

Mauer. In the morning by the express.

Erna (To MAUER). And when shall we have the pleasure at Vols Lake?

Mauer. In about a week, with your permission.

Friedrich (Honestly indignant). Ah, here we are planning clandestine meetings...

Erna. Without asking your permission, Friedrich.

Mrs. Wahl. We leave day after tomorrow, and go right through. (During the following OTTO and GENIA stand side by side, and ADELE alone.) Gustav is there already. You should see what he writes. Do you know who is managing the new hotel? Dr. Von Aigner.

Friedrich. Ah, Aigner!

Mrs. Wahl. And they say he is turning all the women's heads there in spite of his gray hairs.

Friedrich. Yes, the ladies have always been clay in his hands, — so be careful, Mamma Wahl.

(PAUL enters.)

Paul. Well, here we are again (holding his racquet aloft.) Here's my old one. At least one knows what he is holding.

Friedrich. Well, at it again. But now no excuses, otherwise you will have to take up another vocation, — law, haircutting, — (They leave.)

(FRIEDRICH, ERNA, ADELE, OTTO and PAUL to the tennis court. MRS. WAHL and STANZIDES follow).

Genia. Shall we go watch the game? Erna looks her best on a tennis court.

Mauer (Remains standing). Don't you get the impression, Madam, that she doesn't care two straws for me?

Genia. That is probably the most promising foundation for a happy marriage.

Mauer. Yes, if the indifference were mutual. But, — (breaking off.) I say, Frau Genia, do you believe that Friedrich is serious in his talk about traveling?

Genia. I — I don't quite know. I was a little surprised myself. True he has worked like a beaver the last few days — so he is entitled to a rest. But it wouldn't be necessary to — probably he wasn't serious. No, I don't believe he will go with you.

Mauer. And what is the latest about America?

Genia. Friedrich is going, that is certain.

Mauer. And you, Frau Genia?

Genia. Perhaps I too. (Smiling.) Yes, dear friend, perhaps.

Mauer. You will go together? Splendid, I am glad.

Genia. Why so ceremonious? I said perhaps.

Mauer. Ah, it will become a certainty. It would be too stupid if Korsakow were to have died in vain.

Genia (Taken aback). If Korsakow —? What do you mean? If Korsakow were to have died in vain?

Mauer. I have come to the conviction that Korsakow was destined by fate to become a sacrifice.

Genia (More and more astonished). A sacrifice?

Mauer. For you — and your happiness.

Genia. A sacrifice for my happiness? You believe in-such things?

Mauer. Oh, that doesn't necessarily mean that I believe in such things. But here I feel a sort of mysterious connection. Hasn't some such notion occurred to you?

Genia. To me? To tell the truth, I think very little about that sad affair.

Mauer. That only seems so to you.

Genia. And if I do think of it at times, the entire thing is strangely faded and distant. I assure you — quite distant. A sort of grayed mourning, — no more. I simply can't make myself better or more sensitive than I am. Maybe that will change. Perhaps in the fall. These summer days, I presume, are too bright for sadness and dejection. Not only in this is it so. I seem to take most things much more lightly. For example, I simply can't harbor any resentment against this good Adele. I even asked her just before to bring her children here sometime. I simply couldn't do otherwise. It seemed to me positively absurd to bear a grudge against her or anyone else. The woman touches me, rather. Somehow, she impresses me as a being long dead who doesn't know it.

Mauer (Gazing long at her). Well — (Pause.) And Friedrich must have attained to common sense, at last. Not a difficult thing when common sense is so closely identified with happiness as in this case. But if he fails to hold it now, —

Genia (Rapidly). For the present there is nothing to hold. You seem to have misunderstood me before, Doctor. Things haven't changed between us in the slightest degree.

Mauer. But they will change. One can't harbor any lasting anger against him, our Friedrich. My case precisely. I may be ever so enraged at him, — when he begins weaving his magic I am at his mercy.

Genia. That isn't my way, Doctor. I must be wooed, long and patiently.

OTTO, FRIEDRICH, ADELE, STANZIDES, ERNA, MRS. WAHL and PAUL return from the court.

Paul (As they approach, to ERNA). Truly, Miss, — upon my honor — your service — first class.

Friedrich. And her stroke? But then she learned her game from me.

Erna. Which, you will pardon me, teacher, was more than once a doubtful pleasure.

Friedrich. Oh?

Erna (To the others, particularly PAUL). He nagged me to the bone. If I'd let up the least bit — he could at once treat me as absolutely hopeless, a thoroughly despicable creature.

Friedrich (Casually). Yes, these things are closely linked with character, in my opinion.

Genia (Has in the meantime received a message from the chambermaid). Excuse me, ladies and gentlemen, tea is ready. And there are ices. No urging... If you please.

MRS. WAHL enters with STANZIDES; GENIA with OTTO: PAUL, ERNA and MAUER.)

Friedrich (To ADELE as she is about to enter the house). Oh, Adele. Unfortunately I have had no opportunity today to inquire about your health. How've you been?

Adele. Splendid. And you?

Friedrich. Not bad. Much to do, of course. We are building again. Next year we'll have six hundred workmen and in the fall I am going across to America.

Adele. Indeed?

Friedrich. It doesn't appear to interest you particularly Adele.

Adele. Oh, I knew all that from my husband. And I'd like to suggest that we use less familiar terms in addressing each other. The thing's over. I believe in clear relationships.

Friedrich. That they must be clear too, is new to me.

Adele. None of your jokes, now, if you please. Let us rather be thankful that it ended up so quietly. The time of our youthful follies is over for both of us, I think. My children are growing up and your boy, too.

Friedrich. Yes, that can't be altered.

Adele. And if you will permit me a word of good advice —

Friedrich. I am listening.

Adele (Changing her tone). Now, seriously, — I find that your manner toward that little Wahl girl is outrageous. For heaven's sake don't take this for jealousy. I'm not thinking about you, but about your wife.

Friedrich (Amused). Ah!!

Adele. She is really the most charming, most touching creature I have ever met. When she begged me before to bring the children — did you hear it? I sank into the ground.

Friedrich. That quite escaped me.

Adele. If I had known her better, — well — honestly you don't deserve her.

Friedrich. There I can't say I disagree with you. But if things on earth went according to deserts...

Adele. And as for Erna — be careful. A brother is not a husband. A brother sometimes notices things.

Friedrich. Ah, Gustav! My dear, such a thing wouldn't bother him... He is a philosopher. Really I don't know what's passing through your head. In fact, you're putting ideas into mine. A girl that I've bounced on my knee.

Adele. That has nothing to do with it. Age is no criterion for that sort of girl.

Friedrich. Ah, yes, Adele, — without thinking especially of Erna, so kindly suggested by you — it would really be splendid.

Adele. What would be splendid?

Friedrich. To be young once more.

Adele. You've been so long enough.

Friedrich. Yes, but I was so too soon. It is only now that I begin to understand how to be young. In fact, arrangements in this world are thoroughly stupid. One should begin to be young at forty, then he'd get something out of it. Shall I be frank with you, Adele? I have a feeling that everything that has gone before has been simply a preliminary study. And that life and love are just beginning.

Adele. Really, I don't understand you. There are other things in the world besides — us.

Friedrich. Yes, Oh yes, — the intervals between one love-affair and the next. Indeed these are by no means uninteresting. If one has the time and the inclination, he builds factories, conquers empires, writes symphonies, becomes a millionaire... but, take my word for it, all that is incidental. The essential thing is you! — You! — You!

Adele (Shaking her head). To think there are people who take you to be a serious man.

Friedrich. Why, do you consider that particularly amusing, — what I've just said to you?

Herr Natter (Comes in. A tall, rather well-built man in fashionable summer attire, mutton chops, wearing a monocle). Good day, Adele. Good afternoon, Hofreiter.

Friedrich (Extending his hand). Why so late?

Adele (In a friendly manner). Where have you been wandering about?

Natter. I must ask your forgiveness, my child. I've been sitting in the park, reading. Otherwise I should never get to it. Tell me, Hofreiter, is there anything more enjoyable than to sit out in the open under a tree and read?

Friedrich. Depends... What were you reading?

Natter. You will laugh. A new Sherlock Holmes. Really splendid. Gripping, in fact.

MAUER and ERNA come from the house. Greetings.

Erna (To FRIEDRICH). Any more tennis?

Friedrich. Why certainly. (to NATTER.) Will you have tea with us? We were just about —

Natter. With pleasure. Is Lieutenant Stanzides still here?

Friedrich. Yes, of course.

Natter. I want to invite him to go to the theatre with us. (to ADELE.) If you have no objection. I have taken a box for tonight in the Arena Theatre. (MAUER and ERNA walk toward the right.)

Friedrich. Does that trash amuse you?

Natter. Why not?

Adele. There isn't anything that doesn't amuse him. A more appreciative audience than my husband doesn't exist.

Natter. Yes, quite true. I do find life highly amusing. I enjoy myself royally. Always. At every opportunity.

FRIEDRICH, ADELE and NATTER enter the house.

Erna. And how did the accident occur?

Mauer. Apparently through the loosening of a stone under his feet. We were descending Mount Aigner. Friedrich was in front. Suddenly he hears a peculiar nimble overhead. Immediately thereafter tremendous boulders crash past him and after them, quite close to Friedrich, poor Bernhaupt himself. Friedrich doesn't like to speak of it. Even if he does act as if he were superior to emotion, that affair did make a terrible impression on him.

Erna. You believe so?

Mauer. The best evidence is that he has since undertaken no mountain trips.

Erna. Well, we must do Mount Aigner this year.

Mauer. You'll reconsider that, I hope.

Erna. It's all considered. In my case that always occurs before I speak.

Mauer. I shall write to your brother.

Erna. Why, my dear Doctor, you don't really believe that will help, if I have once put my mind to a thing? At most, I can promise to wait until you join us at Vols Lake.

Mauer. Do you really want me?

Erna. Why, of course. I engage you as guide with the usual fee.

Mauer. I've never flattered myself that I might make claim to more.

Erna. Was that intended to be morose or just clever?

Mauer. Shall I come to Vols Lake, Fraulein Erna? Yes or no?

Erna. I can't see any reason why you should change your original plan.

Mauer. Is it really impossible for you, Fraulein Erna, to give me a straightforward answer?

Erna. It isn't easy, Doctor. (She sits under the walnut tree.) You know that I like you. You should come in any case. It would give us the best opportunity to get better acquainted. But it goes without saying, you must not consider yourself bound, any more than I.

Mauer. Very wisely spoken, Fraulein Erna.

Erna. There's wiser coming. Hear me out, please. You must have some such thing as a sweetheart or lady-love, like all unmarried men. Well, then don't hurry. I mean to say, don't get the idea that after our conversation today you owe me anything like fidelity.

Mauer. Your friendly hint unfortunately comes too late. Of course, I won't deny that like all men, I, — and so forth... but I have put an end to it. I hate slovenliness in these matters — It would make me disgusted with myself.

Erna. You are a good man, Doctor Mauer. One feels that if a girl entrusts her fate to you she is anchored safe in the harbor. Then nothing more can happen.

Mauer. So I hope.

Erna. Only I don't altogether know whether such security is particularly desirable. At least for me. To be quite frank, Dr. Mauer, it seems to me at times, that I have something more to demand of existence than security and peace; something better or worse, I don't quite know.

Mauer. Don't take me for a fool, Fraulein Erna, if I flatter myself that there are many fine things, perhaps not absolutely the finest things that might be yours at my side. Life holds a great deal besides adventures of a certain kind.

Erna. Why, did I —?

Mauer. You didn't say so, Fraulein Erna, but that is your feeling. And small wonder — in the atmosphere that surrounds us here. But I assure you there is a sounder, cleaner atmosphere and I am confident that I can accustom you to breathe in it freely and joyously.

Erna. You are courageous, Doctor. I like you — I do, indeed. Come to Vols Lake. We'll see.

ADELE, NATTER and STANZIDES, come out of the house. After them GENIA, OTTO, PAUL, FRIEDRICH, MRS. WAHL.

Stanzides. I used to watch the performance, not from the auditorium, but from above — a sort of bird's eye view from the hillock back of the arena.

Adele. That must be amusing.

Stanzides. Amusing, — I don't know. It's odd. Of course you see only a small part of the picture — the angle of a cliff, or a wall decoration, or some such thing. Of the actors themselves, you see almost nothing. Only here and there you get a disjointed word. But the most peculiar thing occurs if suddenly in the midst of all the jumble a voice penetrates to you which you recognize, — for example, that of a lady in the cast whom you know. Then you can suddenly understand the words also. Of all that the others say, not a syllable can be made out; but what the well-known voice speaks can be understood perfectly.

Adele (Laughing). The well-known voice!

Friedrich. One shouldn't say well-known instead of beloved, Stanzides. Say unknown. That's more correct, Stanzides.

Adele. Or friend, if you wish to be discreet.

Friedrich. Or enemy.

Erna. If you are indiscreet.

Mrs. Wahl. Erna!

Natter. It is getting late, — we shall have to be going, if we are to see anything of the performance. Please don't let me disturb you.

(NATTER, ADELE and STANZIDES leave.)

Paul (To OTTO). Last year, I once played for nine hours at a stretch with Dr. Herz. First for four hours, then we had an omelette, and then... (continues talking to OTTO.)

Mauer (Preparing to go). My hour too, has struck. (To GENIA.) Madam...

Friedrich. Why the hurry? If you'll be patient another quarter of an hour, I'll go with you.

Mauer. Are you serious?

Friedrich. Of course. Will you wait?

Genia. You are going with the Doctor? You mean to go to the city today?

Friedrich. Yes, I think that will be best. I have all the things there that I shall need for the mountains and Joseph can pack them in an hour; then I can leave in the morning with Mauer.

Mauer. Excellent.

Friedrich. Then you'll wait a quarter of an hour?

Mauer. Yes, I'll wait.

FRIEDRICH rushes into the house.

ERNA has been listening.

GENIA gazes after FRIEDRICH.

Mauer. He is a man of quick decisions.

GENIA silent.

Paul. Well, let us make the most of the last rays of the evening sun.

ERNA, OTTO, PAUL and MRS. WAHL leave for the tennis court. After a moment of reflection MAUER follows. GENIA stands rigid; suddenly as she is about to enter the house MRS. MEINHOLD approaches her.

Mrs. Meinhold (About 44, looking her age, her features somewhat worn, figure still youthful). Good evening.

Genia. Oh, Mrs. Meinhold, so late? I feared you wouldn't come any more. Now I'm all the more glad that you are here. Come along, Mrs. Meinhold, — over there — (pointing toward the walnut tree) your favorite spot.

Mrs. Meinhold (Observing GENIA'S embarrassment). Thank you, thank you.

Genia. Or would you rather come to the tennis court? They are still playing, and you like to look on, don't you?

Mrs. Meinhold (Smiling). Why, — it is just you I come to, dear Frau Genia. (Goes with her to the walnut tree.) But I haven't disturbed you, have I? You seem a little — Weren't you just going in?

Genia. No, not at all. It is only — My husband is going to town with Dr. Mauer. He is to go off with him tomorrow on a walking tour. Imagine, an hour ago, he himself knew nothing of it. The Doctor came in to say good-bye, naturally spoke of his plans and Friedrich was at once taken with the idea of wandering through the hills again as in former days. And now he will be off directly. (Glances toward the balcony.)

Mrs. Meinkold. Then my coming is untimely. You'll have much to say to your husband, since he is leaving so suddenly.

Genia. Oh, no, it is only for a short time. And we are not sentimental, truly.

Mrs. Meinhold. And then Percy will soon be with you.

Genia. Oh, my husband will be back before that. Percy won't be here for two weeks yet.

Mrs. Meinkold. You are looking forward to his coming, I dare say.

Genia. As you may imagine, Frau Meinhold. I haven't seen him since Christmas. Not an easy lot, to have your only child among strangers. But you have a similar story to tell, Mrs. Meinhold.

Mrs. Meinhold. Yes.

Genia. And now your son is to be away for several years.

Mrs. Meinhold. Yes, three years, probably, and far, very far.

Genia. To the South Pacific, — he told me about it. Well, that is truly — And still it seems to me that you are better off than I, Mrs. Meinhold. You have a profession, such a noble one. One that entirely fills your life. That helps a good deal.

Mrs. Meinhold. A good deal. Oh, yes.

Genia. Doesn't it? For a woman to be just a mother — it doesn't seem altogether sensible. You certainly wouldn't have consented to allow your Otto to join the Marines if you were nothing more than a mother.

Mrs. Meinhold (Simply). And what if I hadn't consented?

Genia. He would have remained with you. Oh, I'm convinced of that. If you had wished it, if you had asked it. Why he loves you so. He might have gone into something else. I can just see him as a country gentleman, or — yes, as a scholar.

Mrs. Meinhold. The question is still, dear Frau Genia, whether he would have been mine more than now, when he is to sail across the sea.

Genia. Oh...!

Mrs. Meinhold. I don't believe so. (not sadly.) One can't disabuse oneself too soon of the idea that we ever can really possess our children. Especially sons. They have us, we do not have them. I believe that one becomes more painfully conscious of the feeling when the children are always under one's roof. As long as they are small they sell us for a toy, — and later, for still less.

Genia (Shaking her head). Why that is, — really — May I say something to you, Mrs. Meinhold?

Mrs. Meinhold (Smiling). Why not? We're just chatting. Each says what happens to run through her mind.

Genia. I asked myself recently, when you gave utterance, if you will pardon me, to another such morose remark about humanity in general, whether your somewhat tragic view of life may not be an outgrowth of the roles you are called upon to play.

Mrs. Meinhold (Smiling). Tragic? Do I give that impression?

Genia. At least my view of life seems less serious than yours, Mrs. Meinhold. I flatter myself, for example, that I shall never cease to mean a great deal to Percy, — a very great deal. And you too, Frau Meinhold, have every reason, I believe, to cherish a similar hope. Your son, in particular, seems to me an exceptionally devoted — a... I am convinced that he worships you.

Mrs. Meinhold (Smiling). Let us describe it so.

Genia. And if he should some day sell you, as you put it, it will be for nothing mean. And only in such an event, I believe, the relations between mother and child might change a little. (After a little reflection.) No, not even then.

Mrs. Meinhold (After a slight pause). You seem to forget, — he is a man. How can anyone prophesy... even sons become men. (With bitterness.) It seems to me you must have some idea of what that means.

GENIA casts down her eyes.

FRIEDRICH appears above on the balcony. He is tying his cravat and looks down with near-sighted, wizened eyes.

Friedrich. I hear a noble familiar voice. Ha, I knew it. My respects, Mrs. Meinhold.

Mrs. Meinhold. Good evening, Mr. Hofreiter.

Genia. Is there anything you want Friedrich?

Friedrich. Oh, no, thank you. I'll be through directly. Then I'll come down. I'm going away.

Mrs. Meinhold. Yes, so Frau Genia has told me.

Friedrich. Well, au revoir — (leaves the balcony.) —

Genia. May I say something more, Mrs. Meinhold?

Mrs. Meinhold (Smiling). Why do you always ask permission, Frau Genia?

Genia. You impress me so much, Mrs. Meinhold. The things you say always seem so positive, so irrefutable. And one has the feeling that from you there are no secrets... and you understand people, oh yes,.. but aren't you... are you not a little unjust?

Mrs. Meinhold. That may be, Frau Genia... but after all injustice is a woman's only revenge. (In answer to a questioning glance from GENIA.) The only revenge for an injustice committed against her in the past.

Genia. But everlasting injustice in punishment of an outlawed injury — isn't that too much?

Mrs. Meinhold (Bitterly), — There are things which are not outlawed. And there are hearts in which nothing is outlawed. (Pause.) Does that seem tragic to you, dear Frau Genia? You're probably thinking "What sort of tales is she telling me, this old comedian? What is it she wants? Ages ago she left her husband and after that, as we hear, she adjusted her life to her own liking. At any rate she didn't seem to bemoan the separation.

What does she want?" Am I right, Frau Genia? Isn't that what you are thinking?

Genia (Somewhat embarrassed). No one can dispute that you had the right to live as you pleased.

Mrs. Meinhold. Of course I had. That's another story. And I don't want to make anyone believe that I am still pained by that time-worn affair — or indignant — Only, — well, I haven't forgotten it, that is all, and I don't say more than that. But just think, how much I have forgotten since. Joy and sorrow... forgotten — as if they had never been. And just this, that my husband committed more than twenty years ago, I can't forget. So it must have meant something. I think of it without pain, without anger — I simply know it, that is all. But I know it as I knew it the first day, just as clearly, just as finally, just as irrevocably. That is what I mean, dear Frau Genia.

Friedrich (Comes down in gray traveling suit; very brisk and animated. Kisses FRAU MEINHOLD'S hand). I am glad of the opportunity to say good-bye to you, Madam.

Frau Meinhold. Will you remain long?

Friedrich. That is uncertain. It will depend to some extent on how urgently I am needed here. I mean at the factory.

OTTO, PAUL, ERNA, MRS. WAHL and MAUER come back from the tennis court. Exchange greetings.

Otto. Good evening, Mother. (Kisses her hand.)

Mrs. Meinhold. Well, Paul, how did it go?

Paul. Don't a6k, if you please. From tomorrow on, I play only with the instructor.

Mauer. Well, are you ready?

Friedrich. Yes, surely. Ladies and gentlemen, (shakes hands with each one.) — dear Genia...

Genia. Excuse me, Doctor, may I have my husband for a few minutes.

Mauer. Why, —

MAUER, ERNA, MRS. MEINHOLD, OTTO and MRS. WAHL leave them.

Friedrich. You have something to tell me, Genia?

Genia. Only that I'm a little astonished at your decision. I had no notion that you wanted to leave today.

Friedrich. Nor I, my child.

Genia. Really?

Friedrich. That it would occur this very evening, certainly not. If Mauer hadn't chanced to come in, — But you knew that I wished to go off into the mountains for a few days. Now whether it's today or tomorrow or the day after... I see no reason for astonishment.

Genia (Stroking her forehead). Of course. You're right. It's only that the thing was never discussed. (Constrained pause.)

Friedrich. Of course, I shall wire every day, here as well as to the office. And write me. Send me all the news. And if anything comes from Percy send it out, even if it's only addressed to his "dear mother"... Yes, my child. Now — Mauer will really be getting impatient.

Genia. Why — why — are you leaving?

Friedrich (A trifle impatient, but not angry). Now, Genia, it seems to me I've answered that already.

Genia. You know perfectly well that you haven't answered it.

Friedrich. I must say this inquisitional manner is something entirely new in our household.

Genia. Of course, you are not compelled to account to me, but I see no reason why you should refuse to answer.

Friedrich. Well, my dear child, if you really insist that it must be explicitly detailed, very well. For sometime I haven't been feeling myself. That will probably pass, — sure to — but for the next few days I feel the need of a change of air and environment. At any rate it is certain that I must get away from here.

Genia. From here? From me!

Friedrich. From you, Genia, why I didn't — but if you insist — very well, from you, yes, Genia.

Genia. But why? What have I done?

Friedrich. Nothing... Who says that you've done anything.

Genia. Now do explain yourself, Friedrich. I am entirely...I was prepared for anything but that you should... so suddenly... From day to day, — from hour to hour, — I've been expecting to talk things over with you.

Friedrich. Yes, I observed that expectation, Genia. Yes. But I believe it is still too soon for — talk. There are many things on which I must become clear.

Genia. Why, what is there that isn't clear? You had the letter in your hand. You read it. If you had any doubts before that, — which I never believed, — since that night, for heaven's sake Friedrich, since that evening, it must have become clear to you, Friedrich, what a great injustice... God, is it really necessary to put it into words?

Friedrich. No. Of course not. That's just it. That evening — to be sure. Since that it has seemed to me, forgive me — it is of course not your intention — but, I have the impression, you see, that you were... (hesitates.)

Genia. Yes, — Well —?

Friedrich. As if you were playing up Korsakow's suicide against me, mentally of course. And that, — well, that makes me a bit nervous.

Genia. Friedrich! Are you... I play up the suicide!God! How can you... That!

Friedrich. As I say, you can't help it. You don't intend it so. You are certainly not proud of the fact that he — on your account... that, so to speak you drove him — I know you are not conceited over your fidelity. I am aware of all that.

Genia. Well then, if you know that...

Friedrich. Yes, but that the thing happened at all...

Genia. What? What?

Friedrich. That he killed himself... That is the horrible thing. The thing I can't get over.

Genia. That he... (her hand goes to her forehead.)

Friedrich. Yes, yes, now consider — we can turn and twist it as we will... The cause of Korsakow's rotting in the earth remains yourself. Of course, you are innocent — in both senses — another man than I would likely kneel before you, worship you — like a saint — on that very account... You see, I am different... To me you have become, through that very thing... much more distant.

Genia. Friedrich!... More distant... Friedrich!

Friedrich. Now if he had been repulsive to you... why then it would have been the most natural thing in the world. But no, I know that you liked him... One might even say you were a little in love with him. Or — if I... had de served it of you... if you owed me what is called loyalty... but to that, I really had no claim — Well, it isn't necessary to speak of that now. But I can't help asking myself over and over again: Why must he have died?

Genia. Friedrich!

Friedrich. And, you see this thought — that something or other, something which is in reality nothing, a shadow, a phantom, a nullity, at least when weighed against so terrible, so irreparable a thing as death — that your virtue has driven a man to death, that is to me simply ghastly. Yes, — I can't put it in any other way... well... I daresay, it wilt pass in time… in the mountains... when we have been separated for a few weeks... but now, — well, there it is and I can't help it. There, dear Genia, that's the sort of person I am... others, of course, are different.

Genia (Silent).

Friedrich. I hope you won't hold it against me that, in compliance with your wish, I have said all this so plainly. So plainly, that it has already almost ceased to be true...

Genia. Oh, it remains true, Friedrich. (The others come slowly nearer.)

Mauer (In the lead). Pardon me Friedrich, but it is the highest time — I have something to do in the city before...

Perhaps you might take a later train.

Friedrich. No, I am ready. (Calling into the house.) Well, Kate — Hurry. My overcoat and my small yellow bag. You'll find it on the couch in my room.

Mrs. Wahl. Well, a pleasant trip and au revoir but, let us hope, not good-bye.

Erna. Until we meet at Vols Lake.

Mrs. Wahl. Do you know what would be splendid, Frau Genia? If you came too.

Erna. Yes, Frau Genial —

Genia. Impossible, unfortunately. Percy is coming.

Friedrich. But not so soon. (To MAUER.) When do we get there?

Mauer. In about eight or ten days, I think.

Friedrich. Yes, Genia, that would be an idea. Really, consider it, Genia.

Genia. I... will think it over.

CHAMBERMAID comes with overcoat and bag.

Mauer. And now good-bye, Frau Genia. (Takes leave of the others also.)

Friedrich. Good-bye, ladies and gentlemen. Well, what are you all going to do today?

Paul. I have an idea. How about a moonlight party to Holy Cross?

Erna. Count me in.

Frau Wahl. You're going to walk it?

Friedrich. Oh that won't be necessary. I'll send back the car from the depot.

Paul. God reward the noble giver.

Friedrich. No ovations I beg. And now Good-bye. A pleasant time to all of you. Good-bye Genia (takes GENIA'S hand again; she lets it fall listlessly. FRIEDRICH and MAUER leave through the house).

GENIA stands rigid. PAUL, ERNA and MRS. WAHL stand side by side. OTTO and MRS. MEINHOLD have exchanged a quick, significant glance.

Otto (To GENIA, as he is about to leave). We must also —

Genia (Agitated, speaking rapidly). You are going? And you Madam? But why? We'll all find room in the car.

Erna. Why of course. Mr. Kreindl will sit in front with the chauffeur.

Paul. With rapture.

Otto. I'd like to say that the moonlight party will present some difficulties. We happen to be under the new moon.

Erna. The stars will do, Ensign.

Frau Meinhold (Looking skyward). I'm afraid you'll have to do without them too.

Erna. Then we'll plunge boldly into the dark.

Genia. Yes, Erna, perhaps that will be the jolliest. (She laughs loudly.)

ACT III

ENTRANCE — HALL or lobby of the Hotel Vols Lake. Entrance in front, left. (revolving glass door). At the right, opposite the entrance, a lift; on either side of which there are stairs leading upward. The background consists of a broad alcove with glass windows. A view of forest, hill, and mountain scenery. At rear right, a portiere, the door leading to the dining-room. By the entrance a long table, raised, on which are prospectuses, timetables, etc. Behind it practical wooden wall with small compartments for letters and room keys. In the lobby as well as in the alcove, tables, chairs and couches. Newspapers on the tables. Rockers. Moderate activity in the lobby which continues throughout the act without disturbing the action, and with occasional interruptions.

Tourists and guests entering from without, guests entering the lift, others going up and down stairs. Occasionally a waiter. Ladies and gentlemen who read at the tables or chat. A boy at the lift. Behind the table at the entrance stands ROSENSTOCK, the porter, a red-cheeked, youngish man with small black moustache, black hair, shrewd, good-natured eyes, obliging and self-possessed. He gives newspapers to the boy who runs upstairs with them. Two men in mountain apparel come from without and go into the dining room. ROSENSTOCK noting memoranda in a small book. DOCTOR MEYER short, somewhat shy man in negligent summer attire comes down the staircase and approaches the porter, with a folded map in his hand.

Meyer (Who has waited a short while before venturing). I say, Porter...

Rosenstock (Courteously, but not without a certain reserve). What is it Doctor?

Meyer. I wanted to ask, Porter... It was my intention to make a tour tomorrow and I wanted to ask whether a guide would be necessary to make the Hofbrand Lodge.

Rosenstock. Not at all, Doctor. The road can't be missed. There are plenty of signs posted.

Meyer. And if after making the Lodge I were to take in one of the peaks? For example, Mount Aigner.

Rosenstock (Smiling). Mt. Aigner? Mt. Aigner is the most difficult tour in the entire region. Very seldom done. Only by climbers of endurance and experience. This year it hasn't been made at all so far.

Meyer. Pardon me, I didn't mean Mt. Aigner (looking at the map.) I meant Rotwand. That isn't so bad, is it?

Rosenstock. By no means. Any child can climb that.

Meyer. No mishaps?

Rosenstock. Yes, — now and then people have tumbled off Rutland too.

Meyer. What?

Rosenstock. That can't be helped in the mountains. You'll always find amateurs.

Meyer. Mm. Well, thank you, for the present, Porter.

Rosenstock. Don't mention it.

DR. MEYER leaves him, goes to the alcove, sits down at a table, studies his map, and later exit. Two young tourists — knapsacks, ulsters, mountain-staffs, enter from without.

First Tourist (Very brusquely; note: the two tourists speak in the dialect of Saxony.). Good morning. Good evening, rather.

Rosenstock. Honored.

First Tourist. Tell me, have you a room with two beds, or two rooms with a bed apiece?

Rosenstock. May I ask the name?

First Tourist. Ah, — must one be introduced here? Bogenheimer, law student at Halle, Born in Merseburg, Protestant-Episcopal...

Rosenstock (Very politely and with a slight smile). I only wanted to ask whether the gentlemen have reserved a room.

First Tourist. No, we haven't.

Rosenstock (Very courteously). Then I'm very sorry. There is nothing vacant.

First Tourist. Nothing at all? That's bad. Not even a straw litter that we could snuggle into?

Rosenstock. No, I'm sorry.

SECOND TOURIST has seated himself first in one chair then in another, neither seeming sufficiently comfortable for him.

At last he drops into a rocker.

First Tourist (To the second). What's to be done now? (To ROSENSTOCK.) We've got fourteen hours of hike in our legs.

Rosenstock (Sympathetically). That's a good deal.

Second Tourist. I don't stir from this spot.

First Tourist. Do you hear, Cerberus? My friend won't stir from that spot.

Rosenstock. Yes, sir. The spacious hall has room for all.

First Tourist. Ah, a poet.

Rosenstock. Only in emergencies.

First Tourist. Well, what are we going to do?

Rosenstock. If the gentlemen would like to try the Alpenrose...

First Tourist. Is that a hotel, too?

Rosenstock. So to speak.

First Tourist. Do you think they'll have anything?

Rosenstock. They always do.

First Tourist. Well, let's try to pluck the Alpenrose, (to the other.) Come on, boy.

Second Tourist. I don't stir from this spot. Send a sedan-chair for me, Bogenheimer, when you've found something... or a donkey. (He composes himself and soon falls asleep.)

First Tourist (To ROSENSTOCK). Take good care of my friend. See that no one disturbs his slumber. (As he goes out.) Oh, wandering is the miller's joy... (Exit.)
A couple come in, behind them boy with baggage. ROSEN- STOCK greets them.

The Man. Is the room ready?

Rosenstock. Surely, your honor. Number 57.

Bell. Couple with boy take the elevator.

Paul Kreindl (Enters. Fashionable traveling suit, loose cloak, green hat with chamois hai,9 red gloves, tennis racquet with case. Boy with baggage behind him). Good-day.

Rosenstock. Honored, Herr von Kreindl.

Paul. Ah, what's this? You my dear Rosenstock? You here now? What will Semmering do without you?

Rosenstock. One climbs, Herr von Kreindl. From three thousand to forty-two hundred... feet.

Paul. Well, have you anything for me?

Rosenstock. Certainly. But, nothing below the fourth story. If Herr von Kreindl had only telegraphed a day sooner —

Paul. Oh, let it be on the sixth for my part. What's your elevator for?

Rosenstock. If she doesn't happen to be shipwrecked. By the way, you will find numerous acquaintances. Herr von Hofreiter is here, Frau von Wahl, her son and daughter, Dr. Mauer and Rhon, the poet, resting here on his laurels.

Paul (After each name). Yes... Yes... Yes.. (after RHON) Ah, he too. (to the boy.) Take that stuff up. (As the boy is about to take his racquet.) No, I'll keep that right in my hand. Oh, yes, Rosenstock, don't say anything to Mr. Hofreiter that I've come. In fact, to no one. I want to surprise them.

Rosenstock. Mr. Hofreiter is out on a tour since yesterday.

Paul. Something big?

Rosenstock. Oh, no. He has given up the big tours since the accident seven years ago on Mt. Aigner. They went to the Hofbrand Lodge. There are ladies with them, too. Mrs. Rhon and Miss Wahl. Here comes the mother of the young lady now.

Mrs. Wahl (Coming down the stairs in a thin dress that is somewhat too youthful.)

Paul. My respects Madam.

Mrs. Wahl. Ah, good day, Paul. (To Rosenstock) Aren't they back yet?

Rosenstock. Not yet, Madam.

Mrs. Wahl (To PAUL). I am in despair. Well, not exactly in despair but seriously concerned. Erna is out on a tour since yesterday. She was to be back to lunch today. It's now five. I've just been up to her room — you see she lives in close proximity to the heavens. Always her way. And she isn't here yet. I am beside myself.

Paul. Why, it's a large party, as I hear.

Mrs. Wahl. Yes, Gustav is with them and Friedrich Hofreiter, and Dr. Mauer and Mrs. Rhon.

Paul. Oh, well, then nothing will happen. Now, please, Madam, tell no one that I'm here, if the folks should come back while I'm dressing. I'd like to be a surprise. (Disappointed.) In your case I am sorry to say I didn't succeed, dear Madam.

Mrs. Wahl. Really you must excuse me today, my dear Paul, with all this excitement. What's new in Baden? Isn't Genia coming out?

Paul. Mrs. Hofreiter? She said nothing about it. I saw her only the day before yesterday. We were all together, a large party of us, at the Arena Theatre. Well, I'll tell you more news later on. For the present, I must give some attention to the external man. When one has put in a night on the train and then six hours on a wagon... (To ROSENSTOCK.) Lord, what connections!

Rosenstock. In three years at the latest we shall have a railroad up here, Herr von Kreindl. Our manager is going to Vienna at the next opportunity to see the cabinet minister.

Paul. That's sensible. My things are already upstairs, aren't they, Rosenstock?

Rosenstock. Yes, Herr von Kreindl.

Paul. Good. Well, my respects, Madam. And you won't say anything, will you? (Takes the elevator.)

Rosenstock (To MRS. WAHL). Madam need not concern herself. The party has taken a guide.

Mrs. Wahl. A guide? A guide to the Hofbrand Lodge? I knew nothing about that. I must say it seems strange.

Rosenstock. Oh, it's only on account of the knapsacks. You need someone to carry them. And besides your daughter is a splendid tourist.

Mrs. Wahl. So was Bernhaupt.

Rosenstock. Yes. In the midst of life we are in death.

Mrs. Wahl. Well — If you please!...

Rosenstock. Oh,.. No reference to your daughter, of course.

Mrs. Wahl. I left a book here somewhere, Rosenstock. Yellow binding — One of Rhon's. Ah, here it is. I think I'll sit down a bit and read... If I can.

Rosenstock. Oh, the book will distract you, Madam. Rhon writes so cleverly.

MRS. WAHL sits down at one of the tables.

Dr. Meyer (Has been standing nearby with unfolded map and now ventures to approach). I wanted to ask, Porter — I find a reference in Baedeker to the effect that the tour I am planning is extremely difficult, and I wanted to ask whether you wouldn't recommend that I employ two guides...

Rosenstock. You may even have two guides, if you like, Doctor.

Serknitz (Comes from the staircase, tally well-set, waterproof suit, carelessly dressed, tourist's shirt with pleats. To ROSENSTOCK ignoring MEYER). Any letters?

Rosenstock. Not yet, Herr von Serknitz. In a half hour, about.

Serknitz. Service, I must say. Why the mail has been in for some time.

Rosenstock. But it must be sorted, Herr von Serknitz.

Serknitz. Sorted! I'll sit down there and sort the whole batch for you in fifteen minutes. If I took as long to sort mail in my office at home — That's your Austrian dawdling. And then you complain about poor business.

Rosenstock. We're not complaining, Herr von Serknitz. We are filled up.

Serknitz. You don't deserve the climate, I tell you.

Rosenstock. But we have it, Herr von Serknitz.

Serknitz. I'll waive the ceremonious title, Porter. I'm not subject to flattery on that score. Besides it wasn't the mail I wanted to ask you about. It was my laundry.

Rosenstock. If you please, Herr Serknitz, with that I have nothing...

Serknitz. No, nor anyone else. The girl upstairs directs me to the office. I've been waiting three days now for my wash.

Rosenstock. I'm really very sorry. Here is the manager.

Serknitz. As usual, not alone.

DR. VON AIGNER comes from without with a very handsome Spanish woman from whom he now takes leave. She takes the elevator. DR. VON AIGNER, a man over fifty, still well appearing, fashionable mountain costume, knickerbockers, black hair well grayed, imperial beard, monocle; courteous, not without affectation. Wears no hat.

Serknitz. If you please, Sir —

Aigner (With forced affability). In a moment. (to ROSEN- STOCK). My dear Rosenstock, the honorable Mr. Wondra expects to be here tomorrow instead of Thursday and will require four rooms, as you know.

Rosenstock. Four rooms, Sir, for tomorrow. How are we going to arrange that? Why I should have to... You will pardon me, Sir, but I should have to murder a few.

Aigner. Very well, Rosenstock. But try to do it quietly. (To SERKNITZ, introducing himself.) Dr. Von Aigner... What can I do for you?

Serknitz (With some embarrassment which he strives to conceal beneath an assumed ease.) — I have just... I must express my indignation or at least my dissatisfaction, — (breaking out). In short, the state of affairs here is outrageous.

Aigner. Well, I am sorry. What is your complaint, Mr. Serknitz?

Serknitz. I can't get my wash. I've been after it for three days. I find myself in the greatest embarrassment.

Aigner. So I observe. Hadn't you better see the chambermaid?

Serknitz. You're the manager. I apply to you. It has always been my custom to appeal to the highest tribunal. Really, I don't enjoy appearing in this state among your countesses and dollar princesses.

Aigner. Excuse me, Mr. Serknitz, but there isn't the least constraint here so far as dress is concerned.

Serknitz. No constraint? Do you think the difference in the treatment accorded your guests isn't noticeable?

Aigner. My dear Sir!

Serknitz. I'm speaking plainly, my dear Sir. If instead of Mr. Serknitz of Breslau you had a Lord Chamberlain or an Honorable Mr. Bulow before you, you would adopt a different tone. Yes, Mr. Manager, and it would be in order to hang up a sign outside in front of your door: In this hotel the individual begins at the rank of Baron, bank director, or American.

Aigner. That wouldn't be in accordance with the truth, Mr. Serknitz.

Serknitz. Do you think that because I didn't arrive in a motor car I'm not entitled to the same consideration as any trust magnate or cabinet minister? The man isn't born that may allow himself to patronize me, whether he wears a monocle or not.

Aigner (Calm throughout). If anything in my personal attitude should displease you, Mr. Serknitz, you will find me at your service, of course.

Serknitz. Ha! You want me to fight a duel with you? Is that it? That's the latest. You really should have that patented. A man complains that he can't get his shirts and other effects, and for that reason he is to be shot dead. Look, here, sir, if you believe that you are furthering the interests of your hotel in that way, you are making a serious mistake. I'd leave this ridiculous place, this Eldorado of snobs, strutters and stock market Jews with express speed, if I felt like making you a present of my wash. In the meantime I'll go see whether it's come. Good morning, Sir.

Aigner. Good day, Mr. Serknitz. (Approaches MRS. WAHL to whom he has already nodded a greeting during the conversation.) Good day, Madam.

Mrs. Wahl. I admire your patience, Sir.

Aigner. That comes with practice.

Mrs. Wahl. I wish I had some of your self-control.

Aigner. What's the trouble?

Mrs. Wahl. I'm in a terrible state of excitement. Our party isn't back.

Aigner. But I beg of you Madam... No one was ever lost going to the Hofbrand Lodge. Why it's just a stroll. Will you permit me? (Seats himself.)

Mrs. Wahl. Will I permit? Really one must be thankful if occasionally you're not otherwise engaged... Exotically.... Erotically...

Aigner. Exotically, erotically...? That isn't yours, Madam. You're not so pert, fair lady.

Mrs. Wahl. No, that's Rhon.

Aigner. Yes, I thought so. A poet, Mr. Rohn....Yes... What a handsome brooch you have there madam!
A cameo, eh? Really magnificent.

Mrs. Wahl. Yes, rather handsome, isn't it? And not at all expensive. Well, not exactly cheap, either. Swatek in Salzburg always saves these things for me. He knows my taste.

Albert Rhon (Medium height, corpulent, with black hair spotted with gray and somewhat disordered. Comfortable summer attire. Comes downstairs.) Good evening, Madam. Good evening, Sir. Well, have our tourists come back?

Mrs. Wahl. No! Imagine!

Rhon. Oh, they'll come. Maybe they've had a somewhat elaborate breakfast... My wife at all events.

A very handsome English woman steps in; to AIGNER, with strong English accent.

English Woman. Sir, may I beg a word?

Aigner. If you please. (Walks toward the rear with her.)

Rhon (To FRAU WAHL). You know who that is? His latest conquest.

Mrs. Wahl. That one? Why, yesterday you showed me another woman.

Rhon. Yesterday it was another woman. What a chap! Have you any idea how he carries on in this neighborhood? Tell me, Madam, haven't you ever observed the likeness of our head waiter to Aigner?

Mrs. Wahl. Do you really believe... You think the head waiter is his son?

Rhon. At least his nephew. Yes, the man's a wastrel. Even his nephews resemble him.

Mrs. Wahl. I can't understand your being in the mood for joking at such a time. They were to be back to lunch. Now it's half-past five. Really I'm reproaching myself for not going with them.

Rhon. There you're wrong, Madam. What could you have contributed to the rescue? We should only have one more victim.

Mrs. Wahl. Disgusting, your jokes, I must say. You seem to forget that your wife is with them too. How can a man allow his wife to remain away so long?

Rhon. You see, Frau von Wahl, mountain climbing is a thing I don't enjoy. In fact, I have no gift for things manual. Besides, I am writing a tragedy.

AIGNER has come in again.

Rhon. Really they should be back by this time. At least my wife. I'm accustomed to her company on my periodic returns to the commonplace. We spend the entre-actes together.

Aigner. Mostly at the buffet.

Rhon (Clapping him on the shoulder, good-naturedly). Quite right. Tell me, is it really such a safe proposition, this Hofbrand Lodge?

Aigner. As I remarked before, — just a stroll. Why I'd undertake that myself.

Mrs. Wahl. Why didn't you go with them, Sir? It would have been reassuring.

Aigner. Well, I am rather busy here, as you remarked before, Madam. And since I couldn't get very much further than — the Hofbrand Lodge, I prefer — not to go even that far.

Rhon. Very fine. But, Sir, it just occurs to me, doesn't the ascent to your mountain start at the Lodge, — to Mt. Aigner, I mean?

Aigner. Ah, it was mine, once. It is so no longer... Nor anyone's else.

Rhon. It must be an extraordinary feeling to camp at the foot of a mountain which one was the first to climb, and not to be able any longer... If I might venture a comparison, — well, better not. Besides, I am convinced you only imagine that you couldn't get to the top. You see I have my idea of you. I regard you as a hypochondriac.

Aigner. Hadn't we best drop the subject, Mr. Rhon?

MRS. WAHL utters a faint cry.

Rhon. What is it, Madam?

Mrs. Wahl. Lord, perhaps they're on Mt. Aigner.

Rhon (Also a little unnerved). Impossible.

Mrs. Wahl. Why, without a doubt. Or they would have been back long ago. They have a guide with them, too. Why, of course. You sir, (To AIGNER) are in the plot. You had better confess at once.

Aigner. I can make oath that not a word passed...

Rhon. Here's a guide. Suppose we ask him?

Mrs. Wahl. Where? Oh that's Penn. Maybe it was he...

PENN the guide stands talking to the Porter. RHON and MRS. WAHL rush towards him.

Mrs. Wahl. Were you with the Hofreiter party, Penn?

Penn. Sure.

Mrs. Wahl. Where's my daughter?

Rhon. Where's my wife?

Mrs. Wahl. Why don't you speak?

Rhon. When did you get back anyhow?

Mrs. Wahl. Where are the others? Why are you alone? What's happened.

Penn (Smiling). Madam, we're all back. The young lady is a good sport.

Mrs. Wahl. What does that mean?

Rhon. Where were you?

Penn. Up Mt. Aigner.

Mrs. Wahl (With a faint cry). There! Frightful!

Aigner. But, Madam, they're all safely back.

Rhon. My wife was up Mt. Aigner? Why, how is that possible?

Penn. Naw, the little fat one warn't up there. Only Miss Erna and Hofreiter and Dr. Mauer.

Rhon. And what of my wife?

Mrs. Wahl. And my son?

Penn. They waited for us in the Lodge till we got back. Mrs. Wahl. Where are they now?

Penn. They all went in through the cafe so as not to make a fuss.

Mrs. Wahl. I must go up. I must see Erna (To AIGNER.) Oh, you... (Goes toward elevator which happens to be at an upper story. Rings frantically. To AIGNER.) I'd like to know why your lift spends most of its time up at the fourth story. That's another mysterious peculiarity of your hotel. (To RHON.) Are you coming up?

Rhon. I'll wait. (The lift comes down with the boy. RHON takes MRS. WAHL aside.) Just take a look at that boy. A remarkable resemblance —!

Mrs. Wahl. To whom?

Rhon. Well... (Points to AIGNER.)

Mrs. Wahl. Another son of his?

Rhon. Probably a grandson.

Mrs. Wahl. Heavens, you... (goes up in the elevator.)

Aigner (To PENN). Did you really make the Mount?

Penn. Yes, Sir. T'warn't easy.

Aigner. That I can believe.

Penn. You know, boss, I was expectin' the storm of las' week might'a' done damage. A couple of times we had to duck and the last hundred yards — oh, — the devil!... the way that pile was cut up since last year! Why there used to be places to step, anyway, and to fasten a rope. This time we had to hop.

Aigner. But it was fine up on top.

Penn. You know, Sir. It's always nice on top, especially on Mt. Aigner.

DR. MEYER with the map entirely unfolded, advances shyly to the Porter.

Rosenstock. There's a guide for you, Doctor.

Meyer. Thank you. (Approaching PENN.) If you please.

GUSTAV WAHL comes in, dressed in fashionable summer attire; speaks with an affected somnolent drawl, and again at times with pointed significance; always with humor.

Gustave Wahl. Good evening, Sir. Good evening, Mr. Rhon. Permit me to felicitate you upon your wife. She's a wonderful domino player.

Rhon. You played dominoes with her? Weren't you up on Mt. Aigner? You, such a great tourist? Last year I understand you were up in the Himalayas or...

Gustav. I've given up climbing. Now I'm only a lodge haunter. Not so bad.

Rhon. And you played dominoes the entire time while the others were hovering between life and death? I'm not surprised at my wife — women have no imagination. But you...

Gustav. We didn't play all the time. At first I attempted to begin a conversation with your wife.

Rhon. On the subject of Buddhistic Philosophy, I presume.

Gustav. For the most part.

Rhon. My wife isn't interested in Buddha.

Gustav. Yes, that's the impression I received. And so we played dominoes together. Outdoors, if you please. On a wonderful meadow abloom with rare Alpine plants.

Aigner. Since when do they have dominoes there?

Gustav. Oh, you'll always find them. This time I found them in my knapsack. I never leave home for any length of time without dominoes.

Aigner. Extraordinary taste.

Gustav. It's the most difficult came there is. More so than chess. Do you know how many possible combinations there are in the game?

Rhon. How should I know that?

Gustav. But I know it. I've studied the philosophy of games, for years.

Rhon. And you didn't tremble?

Gustav. Why so? I don't mind losing.

Rhon. While your sister hovered between heaven and earth?

Gustav. But my dear Sir, nothing can happen to my sister. She is to reach the age of eighty-four.

Rhon. You know that with absolute certainty?

Gustav. I've read her horoscope. She is born under Scorpio... She may wander in safety through a glacier at eighty-three if it amuses her.

Rhon. You are not trying to make me believe that you take such things seriously?

Gustav. Why not? With most people I can tell at the first glance under what constellation they are born.

MRS. RHON enters; short, pretty, rather corpulent woman. Throws her arms about her husband.

Mrs. Rhon. Here I am again.

Gustav (To AIGNER). Now take Mrs. Rhon for example.

Aigner. Yes —?

Gustav. Little Bear, undoubtedly.

Rhon. My dear, we are not alone.

Aigner. Oh, don't mind us.

Rhon (Coolly). Well, did you enjoy it?

Mrs. Rhon. It was wonderful.

Rhon. I hear you played dominoes.

Mrs. Rhon. You're not angry? I won.

Rhon. Well, it's better than if you had tried to climb mountains.

Mrs. Rhon. Do you know, for a moment I was almost tempted. Only they wouldn't take me along.

Rhon. Now that would be an idea. I don't want the happiness of being alone spoiled by anxiety for you. If you're not with me, I don't want to be compelled to think of you.

Gustav. Well, she didn't think of you, Master, I assure you. You will have something to worry about some day. I simply happened not to be her style.

Rhon. Tell me, Gustav, what makes you so tactless?

Gustav. Don't you know that I travel on it? And besides, what is tact? A virtue of the third order. Even the word is somewhat new. You won't find it in the Latin or Greek, or, — and that's highly significant — in the Sanskrit.

Mrs. Rhon (To RHON). Well, and what did you do in the meantime? Did you make any progress?

Rhon. Finale of the third act. The public, deeply moved, surges into the restaurants.

Mrs. Rhon. I seem to have returned in the nick of time.

Rhon. Yes, but this time the entre-acte will be short. Beginning with tomorrow morning I lock myself in again and remain invisible. And if you have nothing against it, I won't eat in the dining-room, but in the cafe so that I won't lose the mood through gazing at silly faces. Then you can play dominoes again.

Gustav. Madam, divorce him. How can anyone marry a poet? They're inhuman. It used to be much better when people kept poets as they did slaves or barbers. Similar conditions are still found in the Azores. But to allow poets to run around loose is the purest idiocy.

Friedrich (Enters clad in a fashionable tourist's costume). Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. My respects, Madam. Well, dressed already? That was quick work.

Aigner (Who has been speaking to the Porter). Good evening, Hofreiter.

Friedrich. Good evening, Sir. (To ROSENSTOCK.) Nothing for me? No telegrams? No letters? Queer. (To AIGNER.) Well, I can report to you that nothing has changed up there, not on the peak at any rate. The road conditions have deteriorated, — Or is it that we are older? Now it's dangerous to climb up. But if this disintegration continues, it will be rank suicide.

Aigner. Yes, Penn told me.

Friedrich. Do you know, Aigner, when we reached the crevice, about nine hundred feet under the peak —

Aigner (Interrupts him). Please don't speak of it. All that is over for me. How did the little one hold up?

Friedrich. Erna? Splendidly.

Aigner. To take her up there... I must say...

Friedrich. She took us. I had no intention ever again to make Mt. Aigner. Where's Mauer?

Aigner. I haven't seen him.

Rhon. Tell me, Hofreiter how did you feel when you passed a certain spot up there?

Friedrich. O, that — Well, seven years are a long time. I've forgotten things that go back much less. I forget very quickly when I wish.

Rhon. Yes, I suppose one often encounters places where someone fell beside us, only one doesn't recognize them. Don't you agree?

Friedrich. If you had any notion how little I am in the mood for philosophizing, Master Rhon —

Paul Kreindl (Coming down the steps rapidly). Good evening, Mr. Hofreiter.

Friedrich (Somewhat indifferently). Ah, Paul. Good evening.

Paul. Good day, Mr. Rhon. I believe we've met. Now in the first place I have a mass of greetings to deliver.

First from your wife, then from Lieutenant Stanzides, then from the Natters, then from Frau Meinhold-Aigner, then from young Mr. Aigner.

Friedrich. Permit me — Mr. Paul Kreindl — Mr. von Aigner.

Paul. Ah, delighted... (He is silent. Then to AIGNER having recovered himself.) I have the pleasure of knowing your son.

Aigner (Calmly). I unfortunately have not.

Friedrich. Well, what's new in Baden. (Quietly.) Don't you know — isn't my wife coming?

Paul. Sorry, Madam said nothing to me.

Friedrich. Are they having a jolly time?

Paul. Splendid. Here lately we were all together in the Arena Theatre. Your wife will have written to you about it.

Friedrich. Yes, of course.

Paul. And before that, we were on the Common where there was a sort of public festival. We mixed with the crowd. We even danced.

Friedrich. My wife too?

Paul. Yes, of course, with the Ensign... And in the Theatre there was a sensation when the actors suddenly made the discovery that the celebrated Frau Meinhold was seated in our box. They really played to us.

Rhon. What was the piece?

Paul. Truly, I didn't notice.

Rhon. For such one pours out one's heart's blood.

Paul (To RHON). Ah, isn't that your wife? Excuse me gentlemen. (Joins MRS. RHON and GUSTAV at a table.)

RHON follows them.

FRIEDRICH lights a cigarette and is seated.

Aigner. I didn't know that my one time family visited with you so frequently.

Friedrich. Yes, we see each other now and then. Your former wife and mine are great friends. And I often play tennis with Otto. He's an excellent player. In fact, you may be congratulated upon your son. He has a bright future and is said to be very popular with his superiors. Perhaps he is the coming admiral of the Navy.

Aigner. You speak of a young man who is a stranger to me.

Friedrich. Tell me, Aigner, haven't you the slightest desire to see him again?

Aigner. To see him again? At most you might say to get acquainted with him. For the ensign of today probably bears not the faintest resemblance to the young gentleman whom about twenty years ago his father kissed for the last time.

Friedrich. Well, then, no desire to see him again, — but curiosity to become acquainted with him —? There will be an excellent opportunity. You have business in Vienna, I am told.

Aigner. Yes, I am going to see the Cabinet Minister. We want to construct a railroad, as you know, from Lake Vols all the way up here. You'll admit there's room for at least three more hotels here.

Friedrich. I'll make a proposition to you Aigner. Call on us at Baden. There is plenty of room in our cottage. We have a handsome guest's room. Yes, indeed. Very comfortable. Only that it is occasionally haunted by spirits of departed friends who once spent the night there — but that wouldn't trouble you.

Aigner. Against spirits of the departed I have no objection. But living spirits are distasteful to me.

Friedrich. Really it would give me a heap of pleasure, Aigner, to make you acquainted with your son. We could arrange it so nicely in our garden, — we playing tennis, — you suddenly appearing, a distinguished stranger...

Aigner. Thank you, Hofreiter. I am not saying that I should avoid a meeting of that sort, but a prearranged encounter would savor strongly of sentimentality.

Friedrich (Casually). Why so —?

Aigner. And you forget that at such an occasion I would certainly meet my divorced wife, and that I would rather avoid.

Friedrich. Well, as you think best.

(Pause.)

Aigner. Really there are extraordinary coincidences.

Friedrich. To what do you refer?

Aigner. That on this day, of all days, you should begin speaking to me of my son — right after your return from up there.

Aigner. A misfortune — yes...!

Friedrich. How did she discover it?

Aigner. In the simplest manner. I told her.

Friedrich. What? You —?

Aigner. Yes. That at least I owed her. Just because I worshipped her. I owed it to her and to myself. I should have felt a downright coward had I remained silent. One can't make things as easy as all that for oneself. Don't you find that I am right?

Friedrich. It was rather grandly conceived — if it wasn't just a sort of affectation or over-refinement... or convenience.

Aigner. Or all combined, which is also possible. For... the soul is — and so forth.

Friedrich. And in spite of this fabulous uprightness and in spite of all her love, your wife could not decide to...

Aigner. For heaven's sake, don't say ''forgive." Words of that sort absolutely do not fit the case. There was never any scene between us or anything of that sort. It was simply over, my dear Hofreiter, — over, irrevocably over, then and there. That we both felt. It could not but be over.

Friedrich. It could not?

Aigner. It could not. Well, let us leave the living in peace. The dead usually take care of that without our assistance.

Mrs. Wahl (Comes down the stairs). Ah there he is —!

Friedrich. My respects, Mamma Wahl.

Mrs. Wahl. With you, Friedrich, I shall never speak another word. Suppose she had pitched off. How would you face that? Could you ever look me in the eye? And as for Dr. Mauer, I am through with him, too. Where is he? It's monstrous. I could...

Friedrich. But Mamma Wahl, Erna would have climbed up without us.

Mrs. Wahl. Then you should have tied her.

Friedrich. She was tied, Mamma Wahl, We were all tied, to one and the same rope.

Mrs. Wahl. Strait-jackets are what you need, all of you.

Erna (Comes down clad in a thin white dress). Good evening.

Aigner. Ah, Good evening, Erna. Good evening. (Takes her hands and kisses her on the brow.) With your permission.

Friedrich. As old Liszt to the young lady pianists.

Erna (Kissing AIGNER'S hand). And as a very young pianist to the not particularly old Liszt.

Aigner. Oh, Erna...

Frau Wahl. Well! What next?

Erna. That hour was the most wonderful I have ever experienced, Herr von Aigner.

Aigner. Yes, up there!... Nevertheless, I hope, Erna, that you will experience still more wonderful ones.

Erna. That would hardly be possible. That life should again appear just as beautiful, might well happen. But that one should at the same time be so utterly indifferent to death, that, it seems to me can occur only at such moments. And that is the wonderful part of it.

(The mail has now arrived. ROSENSTOCK sorts letters, guests enter9 receive their correspondence, etc.)

Paul. Erna, permit me, also, to lay my admiration at your feet.

Erna. Good evening Paul. How are you?

Paul. What the devil — I beg your pardon. Isn't anyone surprised that I am here?

Friedrich (Seated). My dear Paul, it is a far greater surprise that we are here.

AIGNER standing aside with a handsome French lady.

Rhon (To MRS. WAHL). See there Madam, that's the one for tomorrow. He's assembling reserves.

Erna (To MRS. WAHL who has taken her letters from ROSENSTOCK). Well, Mamma?

Mrs. Wahl. From home. And here is a card from your wife. (To FRIEDRICH.) She wishes to be remembered to you, Friedrich.

Friedrich. About coming out here — does she say nothing?

Rosenstock. Here are some letters for you, Mr. Hofreiter.

Friedrich (Rising). For me? Ah, here is one from Genia.

GUSTAV pressing his letters to his forehead.

Mrs. Rhon (To GUSTAV). What are you doing there?

Gustav. I never read letters any more. I simply lay them on my forehead and know at once what they contain.

Mrs. Wahl (To FRIEDRICH). Well, is she coming?

Friedrich. No. She writes that Percy has postponed his arrival and has been invited to friends at Richmond where he will stay a week. The rascal! To have friends in Richmond already.

Rhon (Seated, reading his letters). Ha!

Mrs. Rhon. What is it?

Rhon. It is incredible. These questions of correspondents! Really people are getting more curious every day. Formerly they were content to ask whether you preferred macaroni or stewed peaches, — whether Wagner should be given with or without cuts. But the things they want to know now, Hofreiter!

FRIEDRICH at the next table, looking through his letters.

Rhon. Here is a ladies' journal that inquires: (a) At what age did you first experience the joy of love? (b) Have you ever felt perverse inclinations?

Signer (To HOFREITER). I am just in receipt of an inquiry as to whether bathing is permitted in our Lake.

Rhon. At 40 degrees Fahrenheit... brr! —

Aigner. Now, if we could arrange for that it would be the end of Switzerland.

Rhon. Look here, — I have an idea. Of course, I should claim a share of the profits. You have tremendous water power here, these falls that rush down the mountain side. Why not warm your lake with electricity?

AIGNER laughs.

Rhon. You laugh — of course. But if I had any knowledge of technical matters, — I'd build the whole plant myself. So clearly do I see it all. But I lack the gift for things manual. If I had that I believe I should never have touched a pen.

Friedrich. Really I sometimes wonder whether it is not through some inner lack that poets — become poets.

Rhon. What do you mean?

Friedrich. I imagine that many poets are born criminals — without the necessary courage — or wastrels who do not like to incur expense.

Rhon. And do you know what manufacturers of incandescent lights usually are, Mr. Hofreiter? Manufacturers of incandescent lights — and nothing more.

Friedrich. Excellent, if it were true.

BOY hands FRIEDRICH a letter.

FRIEDRICH opens it, smiles, bites his lip.

ERNA has observed it.

Mrs. Wahl. Good-bye, I must go in to dress. Good-bye, little wife of the poet, good-bye illustrious bard.

GUSTAV opening his letters.

Mrs. Rhon. Why you're opening them after all.

Gustav. That is only as a check. People sometimes write the wrong things.

MRS. RHON and GUSTAV go toward the rear, then exeunt. RHON exit. The hall is left nearly empty.

Erna (Looking over FRIEDRICH'S shoulder). Love letter?

Friedrich. Guess from whom? Mauer...

Erna. Oh...

Friedrich. He has just received an urgent telegram from Vienna. Had to leave at once... He's already gone. Asks me to say good-bye for him.

Erna. I expected something like that.

Friedrich. I, too — That gayety of his at supper last night in the Lodge, — and then his moodiness today when we started our climb... On the way back he didn't say a word... Well, Erna, an open meadow, fifty paces from a lodge with twenty windows isn't the place for two people to rush into each other's arms.

Erna. You think he saw that?

Friedrich. Most likely.

Erna. And you believe if that hadn't happened on the meadow he wouldn't have left? There you are mistaken. Even if we hadn't so much as looked at each other he would have noticed, as others are noticing...

Friedrich. What is there for the others to notice?

Erna. How things are between us two.

Friedrich. Why, Erna, how can these people...

Erna. Oh, maybe there is a sort of halo about our heads.

FRIEDRICH laughs.

Erna. Yes, it must be something like that. I've often thought of it. How is it that people see such things at once...

Friedrich. I should have gone away, Erna.

Erna. That would have been a wise thing to do.

Friedrich. Don't be a flirt, Erna.

Erna. I'm not, really.

Friedrich. Then what are you?

Erna. I am — as I am.

Friedrich. There is your advantage over me. I am no longer the man I was. I am mad, since that kiss of yesterday, mad. Do come a little closer, Erna (Takes her hand.) Sit here, facing me.

Erna. Now don't be rude...

Friedrich. Erna, I didn't sleep a wink last night.

Erna. I'm sorry. I slept wonderfully well.

Friedrich. I am usually troubled that way in this damp air.

Erna. You should have done as I did... I took my blanket out on the meadow — our meadow — and lay down in the open air.

Friedrich. Weren't you cold?

Erna. No, I fetched your coat from the card room and put it around me.

Friedrich. Magic, too! That was superfluous, Erna.

Erna. And so I slept splendidly, from ten to three, under the stars, and then went back to the room to my dear, fat Mrs. Rhon.

Friedrich. Erna, Erna! I feel myself capable of committing some raging folly. I suddenly seem to comprehend all the nonsense at which I used to laugh. I understand window promenades, serenades... (Gesture.) I understand how one can spring at a rival with drawn knife, — how, for unrequited love, one can plunge into an abyss.

Erna. Why should you speak of unrequited love?

Friedrich (Seriously). Why deceive ourselves, Erna? That occurrence of last night, in fact the whole business, the moment up there on the peak, the handclasp, this fancy of belonging to each other, this tremendous sense of happiness, it is all, I presume, a sort of delirium, — mountain-giddiness. At least for you. It is an effect of the altitude, the rarefied air, the danger. I dare say I play the smallest part in your mood.

Erna. Why do you say that? I have loved you since my seventh year. Of course, with interruptions. But lately the case has become pretty serious. And now — yesterday and today — and up there — and here. Oh, Friedrich, how I should like to get into your hair and ruffle it!

Friedrich. Careful! That isn't necessary. Listen, Erna. I have something to ask you.

Erna. Very well, ask.

Friedrich. Now then! What would you say... attend carefully. I am quite sensible again. Erna, you know, of course, my marriage — I needn't tell you about that. The fault was mostly mine. At all events, we do not suit each other, Genia and I. And especially since the extraordinary affair of Korsakow, about which I spoke to you. Heavens, why make a long story of it? I want to divorce Genia, and marry you, Erna.

ERNA laughs.

Friedrich. Well?

Erna. You said before you felt capable of committing an act of raging folly.

Friedrich. Perhaps it wouldn't be if we were, from the beginning to look at it in the proper light. I know, Erna, that your love for me will not be a thing of eternity.

Erna. But yours for me!

Friedrich. More likely. Besides, Eternity! Next year there may be another Mount Something or other and it will be all over with eternity. Or it may begin all over again. So much for that. I only know, and I know with absolute certainty, that I cannot exist without you. I am dying with longing for you. I shall be unable to think, work, or engage in any rational undertaking, until you... until I hold you in my arms, Erna.

Erna. Why didn't you come for your coat last night?

Friedrich. I beg of you not to play with me, Erna. I am honest enough with you. Simply say no, and the thing is settled. Mauer is still within hailing distance. I have no penchant for becoming ridiculous. Will you by my wife?

Erna. Wife? No.

Friedrich. Very well.

Erna. Maybe later on, sometime.

Friedrich. Later on —?

Erna. Finish your letters.

Friedrich. Why should I. So far as I am concerned the factory may be blown to shreds. Everything may be blown to shreds. What do you mean by later? Life isn't so very long. I refuse to grant a respite. A kiss like that of yesterday is a pledge. Either of immediate departure or of an unconditional yes. Wait I cannot. Will not. Say no, and I leave here today.

Erna. I am not playing with you. I know to what our kiss pledges me.

Friedrich. Erna...

Erna. Haven't you always known that I belong to you?

Friedrich. Erna... Erna!

Sound of a kettle-drum heard. The tourist who fell asleep at the beginning of the act awakens from a dream, rises, cries out, fairly howls, and at length rushes off across the entire stage.

MRS. WAHL comes down.

Aigner (Meeting with her). Ah, that is a clasp I haven't seen. Charming!

Friedrich. Lord, how we have been chattering. I shan't have time to dress.

Mrs. Wahl. You are handsome enough as you are. Where is Doctor Mauer?

Friedrich. Oh, yes — he sends his respects; he received a telegram and had to leave suddenly.

Mrs. Wahl. A telegram? Doctor Mauer? Why, that is... You are keeping something from me. He fell from the cliff! He is — dead!

Friedrich. Now, Mamma Wahl, do you imagine we could sit here chatting so comfortably...

Mrs. Wahl. With you one can never know.

Friedrich. At least I should have worn black gloves.

Serknitz (Enters in frock coat, white scarf; goes to AICNBR). I have the honor to report, Sir — my laundry has arrived, and I took the liberty of dressing in a manner befitting your hotel.

Aigner. You look positively stunning, Herr von Serknitz.

SERKNITZ goes into the dining room.

MRS. WAHL and AIGNER follow. MRS. RHON, GUSTAV, Rhon, METER, and others come down and enter the dining room.

Friedrich (Loudly). Come, Erna. (Softly.) Do you remember what you said before?

Erna. Yes.

Friedrich. Then they are serving our wedding dinner in there.

Erna. And thank Heaven there will be no toasts.

Friedrich. And you are mine.

Erna. Yet.

Friedrich. Consider what you are saying, Erna. If I find your door locked tonight, I shall break in, and it will be over with us.

Erna. It will not be over with us.

Friedrich. Erna!

Erna. And I anticipate hours still more wonderful than the one up there on Mounta Aigner.

Friedrich. Erna!

Erna (At length with the full tone of truth). I love you.

(They enter the dining-room.)

ACT IV

Scene of Act II. Summer afternoon. Under the walnut tree. MRS. NATTER'S two children, one a girl of nine, the other a seven-year-old boy, are playing under the supervision of their English governess who is showing them a picture book. GENIA, NATTER, MRS. WAHL, DEMETER STANZIDES, GUSTAV, PAUL, ERNA, OTTO, and MRS. ADELE NATTER come out of the house, little by little, in the order mentioned.

Natter. The dinner in honor of our esteemed host's return was excellent. Too bad he wasn't here.

Genia. He must have been detained at the factory.

Natter. No wonder, after an absence of three weeks.

Mrs. Wahl. Have you telephoned to the office, Genia?

Genia. There was no reason to. I had expected him for dinner after his telegram, yesterday, from Innsbruck. (She is now with the children.) Do you like the pictures?

Children. Oh, yes.

Genia. You must ask your mother to bring you out here next Sunday. Percy will surely be here by then. What would you like to do now?

Gustav. Children, I'll show you a wonderful game which the good little Hindu children play on the banks of the Ganges. Now watch carefully. If you please, Miss, lend me your parasol. Thank you. Now here I draw three concentric circles in the sand. One of a diameter of three feet, the second of two feet, and the third of one foot and six inches. (To the others who stand by and laugh — MRS. WAHL, PAUL, ADELE, GENIA.) Permit me to state that the Hindu children get that with mathematical accuracy to the sixteenth of an inch. Now keep watching. We draw a tangent to the outermost circle, a second perpendicular thereto along the middle circle, a third parallel to the first touching the inside circle; thus, we get several segments. Now if you place in the most easterly segment — (He takes a small compass from his vest pocket and says to the others who are again laughing.) Something I always carry with me. In fact, I can't see how a respectable person can go about without a compass. Now, that's east over there. Into the outer segment there comes a small turtle, into the most westerly one a scorpion, whose sting, of course, has been removed. Now, let's see — what can we substitute for a scorpion here in Europe? (The seven-year old boy begins to cry.)

Adele. Now stop it, Gustav. Miss, 'Voulez vous' — Oh, bother! (She gives up the French.) If you please, Miss, will you take the children to the meadow back there — they'll have plenty of room to play there... (to the children) and there won't be anybody to tell you such rubbishy stories about scorpions and tangents. (The governess leaves with the children.)

DEMETER STANZIDES has sat down on the small bench near the gate and taken up a newspaper which lies there. The position from left to right: STANZIDES at left on the bench; near him MRS. WAHL and

OTTO; then PAUL and ERNA. At the extreme right GUSTAV, ADELE, GENIA.

Stanzides. Hear, hear! (He reads.) "As is reported from the Hotel Vols Lake, a young lady from Vienna, Miss Erna Wahl, in the company of the Vienna tourists, the manufacturer Hofreiter and the well known physician, Dr. Mauer, ascended Mt. Aigner, a peak, which, owing to its dangers..."

Erna. Come Paul, let's play tennis.

Paul. Unconditionally agreed. (To ADELE.) Madam? Ensign?

Adele. I never play right after dinner.

Otto. In a moment, I'll just finish my cigarette.

Paul. Good. We'll play only singles today. A singles' tournament. Let us hope that Mr. Hofreiter will be here in time to take part. Today the relative standing must be cleared up once for all. (Leaves with ERNA.)

Mrs. Wahl. What else does it say there?

Stanzides (Reads on). " —... A peak which owing to its dangers is notorious among the folk in the South West Dolomites. It is the same peak from which seven years ago a young physician, Dr. Bernhaupt, through an unfortunate accident.

Mrs. Wahl. There, Frau Genia, that's where they dragged Erna. I've never been so angry in all my life as I am at Dr. Mauer and your husband.

Gustav. They were so afraid of Mamma that both gentlemen beat a hasty retreat.

Genia (With a glance at ERNA, smiling). Yes, it seems that a bad conscience made Friedrich extremely uneasy. Every day I received a card from somewhere else, — Caprile, Pordoi, and heaven knows where.

Mrs. Wahl (Newspaper in hand, turning the pages). What paper is this, pray?

Natter. Madam must be proud of the fame of Miss Erna.

Frau Wahl. Proud — I?

Genia (Has stepped across toward the center of the stage, where MRS. WAHL is standing.) — What paper is that? I don't seem to know it... How did it get here?

Mrs. Wahl. There's a part marked in red.

Stanzides. One had better not read anything marked in red in such a paper.

Mrs. Wahl. This is really remarkable.
Adele, Gustav, Genia (All speak at once). What's remarkable?

Mrs. Wahl (Reads). "For some days there has been a persistent rumor in Vienna social circles which we repeat with due reservation. It concerns the suicide of a world-renowned virtuoso which created a profound sensation in the early summer and was for the most part shrouded in darkness, which even the popular phrase ‘mental aberration’ did not quite clear up. The report states that the cause of this suicide was an American duel, but that the decision in this duel was not determined as usual through a white and a black ball, but by means of two white balls and one red one.” Two white and one red, — What does that mean? (Embarrassed pause,)

Genia (Quietly), — The game of billiards which is referred to was lost by my husband. Therefore, if it was a case of an American duel, Friedrich would have had to kill himself — Isn’t that so? (Pause.)

Stanzides. It is incredible that there is no defense against such infamies. Particularly since no name is mentioned.

Natter. They are too wise for that.

Mrs. Wahl (At last understands). Ah, the game of billiards. Why, of course, Frau Genia, you told us about that. Your husband sent the cigars to Korsakow in the morning. Why yes, I could testify to that in court.

Gustav. You won’t have to testify, Mamma. No one bothers about such things. (ADELE and STANZIDES are on the way to the tennis court and disappear gradually from the scene.)

Mrs. Wahl. Really that is... How does such a thing get into the paper? And why should Friedrich and Korsakow have... (MRS. WAHL, GUSTAV and after them MR. NATTER go toward the tennis court.)

Genia. You believe it?

Otto. This silly duel story? How can you think that?

Genia. No, but that this story was not entirely without foundation. In a word, do you believe that I was Korsakow’s mistress?

Otto. No, I don’t believe it.

Genia. Why shouldn’t you believe it?... Because I deny it? That doesn’t prove anything. I, in your place...I should believe it. (Moves to go to the tennis court.)

Otto. I don’t believe it, Genia. I swear to you I don’t believe it. Why speak of it? Please stay, please. Who knows whether we will have another undisturbed moment. I must be in the city early in the morning. I have a great many things to do there... Notifying the registration authorities, shopping, and then the night train to Pola.

Genia (Gazing at him). Tomorrow? So soon?

Otto. How shall I communicate with you?

Genia. Simply write. My letters are not opened. And if you wish to be particularly careful, write me as you’re speaking to me now — as to an old friend.

Otto. That is asking too much. That is more than I can do.

Genia. There would be another way — Not to write, not to write at all.

Otto. Genia!

Genia. Wouldn't that be the wisest? We shan't see each other again.

Otto. Genia! In two years I shall be back.

Genia. In two years!

Otto. If I still have your confidence, Genia. I could be back sooner, much sooner. There are other possibilities for me, you know that. I wouldn't have to go at all.

Genia. You must. Moreover, you should, which is a stronger commandment.

Otto. How am I to live without you?

Genia. You will live. It was beautiful. Let it be enough. Pleasant journey, Otto and the best wishes for your future.

(Pause.)

Otto. What will you do when I am away?

Genia. I don't know. Today, I don't know. What did we know a few weeks ago, a few days? One drifts, — one drifts on and on, God knows whither.

Otto. How can you... Oh, I understand. You are saying this to make the parting easier for me. Genia, remember, Genia.

Genia. I remember. Oh, yes, I remember. (Bitterly.) But forgetting begins just so.

Otto. Does it amuse you to give me pain?

Genia. Why do you take me for better than I am? I am no better than the rest. Don't you see that? I lie, I dissemble, I enact my rôle before people, — before Natter and Frau Wahl, before your mother as well as before my chambermaid. I play the respectable woman — and at night I leave the window open for my lover. I write my son to remain longer with his friends, I write that to my beloved son... only that he may not disturb my adventure. And I write my husband that Percy insists on staying at Richmond, only that he too, may remain away longer. And when he returns today and takes your hand, I shall stand by and smile, and probably take pride in my cleverness. Splendid, isn't it? Do you think I am one to trust? I am like the others, Otto, believe me.

Otto. You're not like the others. No one would blame you. You were free. You owed him nothing. No one would hold you in less esteem for it.

Genia. No one?

Otto. No one — I know what's passing through your mind. No one, not even my mother, if she suspected.

Genia. Why wasn't she here today?

Otto. Because she doesn't care for large gatherings. That is the only reason. She suspects nothing. Why, she was here yesterday. What then should keep her away today?

Genia. That I can tell you. She thought Friedrich would be here and it would have been painful for her to see you, her son... it would have been unbearable for her to see the three of us together, the husband, the wife and the lover. That is what she feared and why she didn't come. Oh, I understand her. How well I understand her!

Friedrich (Appears on the balcony, speaks at once.). Good afternoon. (GENIA and OTTO at the close of their conversation are almost directly under the balcony,) Genia (Not frightened). Friedrich!

Otto. Good day Herr Hofreiter.

Friedrich. How do you do, Otto.

Genia (Gayly). How long have you been here?

Friedrich. I came in ten minutes ago. (He nods toward the tennis court where he has been observed.) Good evening, Good evening. (To GENIA.) I just stopped to dress. (To OTTO) I'm glad I still find you here. I was afraid you had gone back to Pola, or that you were already on the ocean.

Otto. I leave tomorrow, Herr Hofreiter.

Friedrich. Ah, tomorrow. Well, I'll be right down. (Leaves the balcony. OTTO and GENIA step away. The following spoken very rapidly.)

Otto. You can't stay here.

Genia. Be sensible, Otto.

Otto. Now I feel it. You are not made to lie. You would betray yourself or confess voluntarily.

Genia. That is possible.

Otto (With a sudden resolve). Let me speak to him.

Genia. What are you thinking of?

Otto. Yes, that is the only way. You feel it yourself. Anything else would be unworthy, shameful.

Genia. I shall tell him as soon as you are gone. Tomorrow, perhaps today.

Otto. And what will happen?

Genia. Nothing, probably. And you will never come here again, never, promise me, never, not in two years, never.

Otto (As if enlightened). You love him. You love him again. That is where you are drifting. (MRS. WAHL, NATTER, MRS. NATTER, STANZIDES, and GUSTAV come from the tennis court. ERNA and PAUL play on.)

Friedrich (Appears in his tennis costume). Good afternoon, Genia. (Kisses her on the brow. He greets the others also. To FRAU WAHL who does not take his hand.) Well, Mamma Wahl, still angry with me?

Mrs. Wahl. I won't speak a word to you. Or to Dr. Mauer.

Friedrich. Well, we'll see.

Genia. We haven't seen Doctor Mauer lately.

Friedrich. Is that so? I expect he'll come today. I have written him. Well, Paul and Erna refuse to be disturbed.

Genia. Tell me, when did you arrive in Vienna?

Friedrich. Last night. I would have come out to supper but it was absolutely impossible.

Genia. We had a party in your honor.

Gustav. Yes, it was a splendid dinner.

Friedrich. Is that so? Perhaps you will be so good as to have them bring me a cup of black coffee, Genia. (He sits under the tree and lights a cigarette.)

Natter. You remained away longer than you intended, Hofreiter.

Friedrich. Yes. (Fixes him with a glance.) Are those your children romping about there on the lawn?

Adele. I thought Percy was here already. (STANZIDES and MRS. WAHL have walked to the rear meanwhile.)

Friedrich. Well, when do you expect him? Accepts invitations to English castles, the rascal.

Genia. I believe he will surprise us today or tomorrow with my sister Mary... because I haven't had news from him for three days.

ERNA and PAUL come from the tennis court.

Paul. My respects Mr. Hofreiter.

Erna. Good evening, Friedrich. (Hand clasps.)

Friedrich. Well, how have you been?

Paul. Fraulein Erna has beaten me again.

Friedrich. Well, did you have any more good times at Vols Lake?

Erna. Yes, splendid. Even without you, — think of that! Really it wasn't at all nice of you to disappear so suddenly. Oh, and thanks for the card. You seem to have had some interesting trips.

Friedrich. I see your fame is celebrated in the paper today, Erna.

Frau Wahl. We've seen it.

Friedrich. Has that paper got here? An interesting sheet, isn't it? (Pause. He is amused at the embarrassment of the others.) It was beautiful up there on Mt. Aigner. Oh, Otto! Where is he? (OTTO is standing aside with MRS. NATTER.) I am to convey regards to you — that is, regards is hardly the word — I've seen your father.

Otto. Mrs. Hofreiter told me.

Friedrich. Too bad you're going away tomorrow. Your father was coming to Vienna in a few days.

NATTER, STANZIDES, GENIA exeunt. GUSTAV follows.

Otto. You know, Mr. Hofreiter, there have never been any relations between my father and myself.

Friedrich. They might still develop. Should, in fact. To think that you are about to go off to sea for so long without seeing your father. It isn't right. Don't you think so?

Otto. Yes, perhaps you're right. But I'm afraid it's too late.

Paul (Who has been standing with ERNA and FRAU WAHL, approaches). Well, Ensign, our singles match, if you please. (To FRIEDRICH.) We are playing only singles today. You'll have to join us Mr. Hofreiter. The Ensign is leaving tomorrow, and the relative standing must be cleared up once for all.

Friedrich. Why, of course, I'm at your service. Please don't let me disturb you. As soon as I've finished my coffee.

PAUL, ADELE and OTTO exeunt. ERNA has remained standing behind his chair.

Friedrich. Oh, Erna. (Remains seated.)

Erna. I'm so glad you're back.

Friedrich. Really? (He kisses her hand over the back of the chair.) I too.

Erna. And now I should like to know the real reason why you vanished.

Friedrich. You are odd, Erna. I told you. You were prepared for it. If had stayed there, in a few days, yes on the same day, the entire hotel would have known the whole business. That's the way these things go. You know, the halo about our heads. We've earned it honestly enough.

Erna. And if they had seen it?

Friedrich. Child, such a thing should not be revealed. The less so, the more you despise people. The world doesn't understand. Or it does after its fashion, which is worse. You may be thankful that I did not compromise you. Later you would have resented it.

Erna. Later? Oh, I see. I shan't marry, Friedrich.

Friedrich. Don't speak of the future, child. One should never prophesy, not for himself nor for others, — not even for the next minute, believe me.

Erna. And do you think that if I really loved anyone after you I could be silent about this?

Friedrich. Of course, you could. And you would be right. I assure you we deserve nothing better.

Erna. "We?" There are better men than you.

Friedrich. Do you think so? (Rises.)

Erna. What is it? Why are you so distracted? Why do you constantly look towards the door. Do you expect anyone?

Friedrich. Yes, Dr. Mauer.

Erna. Dr. Mauer? What do you want of him?

Friedrich. Oh, it's about some business.

Erna. Mauer isn't a lawyer.

Friedrich. But a friend.

Erna. Do you believe he still is?

Friedrich. Yes. Such relations never depend on the experiences which people have together... Otherwise disappointments would not hurt... if through them, the inner relations were simply to end. But that one still hangs on, that... There is only eternal love and eternal friendship and Mauer is and remains my only friend. That holds true — and even if he should kill me some day, that wouldn't change it.

Erna. What is there of such importance that you have to talk about?

Friedrich. It concerns my journey to America.

Erna. Then you are going across?

Friedrich. Yes. And there are many odds and ends of other days that need shaping; a task for which none but Mauer will do.

Erna. Of other days?

Friedrich. Why child, a wife couldn't be more curious. Besides they're all very tedious affairs.

Erna. Which seem to make you extremely nervous.

Friedrich. Do I give that impression? Nothing of the sort. It's only that I haven't had enough sleep.

Erna. Why so? You weren't on the train all night?

Friedrich. No, but I didn't sleep much. I made a window promenade.

Erna. Last night?

Friedrich. Yes, last night. Why are you surprised? I told you on a certain evening that I suddenly comprehended all these things. Window promenades, serenades, man-slaughter, suicide —

Erna. I don't understand. For whom was this window promenade?

Friedrich. For you, of course.

Erna. For me? What sort of a story —

Friedrich. Don't you believe me? Now listen, I came out here last night, right after my arrival in Vienna. It was almost midnight when I came under your window. You still had a light up. I saw your shadow passing over the curtains. If your room had been on the ground floor... who knows Erna. You were beneath my window — and then —

Friedrich. Then I walked away. I had seen your shadow, had been near you. I had been longing for that.

Erna. You had been longing, Friedrich? And where did you go then?

Friedrich. Back to Vienna. My car was waiting at the square. I had something to do at the office at eight o'clock this morning.

Erna. You were beneath my window... Friedrich!

Friedrich. Why should I tell you such a thing if it weren't true. What shall I swear by? By the sacred waters of Vols?

Erna. You were beneath my window, my sweetheart.

Friedrich. Quiet, quiet. (He goes to the door of house.)

Mauer (Comes from the house). Good afternoon, Friedrich. Good day Fraulein Erna.

Friedrich. How are you, Mauer.

Erna (Calmly). Good day, Doctor.

Mauer (Quite unembarrassed). Been back long, Fraulein Erna?

Erna. Only two days. (To FRIEDRICH.) You have something to say to the Doctor. Excuse me. (Leaves for the tennis court.)

Mauer. You sent for me. Here I am.

Friedrich. Thank you again for coming. I hope I didn't keep you from anything important.

Mauer. You write that you want my advice. I assume you are ill.

Friedrich (Gazes at him). Oh, that's it. No I haven't called for the Doctor, but for the friend.

Mauer. The friend, just so. Well, I'm here.

Friedrich. It concerns a silly story that you've probably heard or read.

Mauer. What story?

Friedrich. That Korsakow —

Mauer. Well —?

Friedrich. That Korsakow was the victim of an American duel.

Mauer. Ah.

Friedrich. Have you read it?

Mauer. Heard, to be accurate.

Friedrich. Well then I ask you; what shall I do?

Mauer. Do? You have the evidence to disprove it. Korsakow's letter to your wife.

Friedrich. What good is that? Why I couldn't — That would be in horrible taste.

Mauer. Well, then, simply pay no attention to it. The report will vanish as it came. It is not likely that sensible people will believe such a thing about you.

Friedrich. Even so. Something will remain. And someone must have been the first to utter this infamy. If one could hold him to account.

Mauer. The man will be difficult to trace.

Friedrich. For me he is traced. It is Natter.

Mauer. You think so?

Friedrich. It is his revenge. You see he knew...

Mauer (Rapidly). Everything?

Friedrich. Yes. It seems there are fewer deceived husbands than the wives or even the lovers believe.

Mauer. Have you any proof that the rumor emanates from him?

Friedrich. Proof? No.

Mauer. Then you can do nothing.

Friedrich. Confront him.

Mauer. He would simply deny it.

Friedrich. Punish him.

Mauer. That won't improve the situation.

Friedrich. Maybe my humor.

Mauer. The machinery you propose to employ would be too big for that.

Friedrich. No, I don't think so. Good humor is the principal thing in life.

Mauer. I should let the matter rest. With the best of intentions, that is the only advice I can give you. Now I'll say good night to your wife and go.

Friedrich. Mauer, are you angry?

Mauer. I, angry? No. But my desire to remain here is not overpowering.

Friedrich. I say, Mauer, you know that I left Vols Lake soon after you did?

Mauer. "Soon" is good.

Friedrich. Immediately after. On the next day. Do you know why? I ran away.

Mauer. Ah.

Friedrich. Yes, from myself. For that I was in love with Erna I admit without further ado.

Mauer. You owe me no account of your doings.

Friedrich. Of course not. I'm not giving you one. Only I can't see why your false suspicions...

Mauer. Whatever I suspect, whether justly or not, the affair is ended for me. Allow me to say good night to your wife.

Friedrich. Later. Now you will kindly remain here. We must talk this out. I assure you that you are mistaken. I kissed her, yes. Once. I'm not denying it. Such an embrace in the open air, with fine weather, six thousand feet above the sea, means nothing. I should call it mountain giddiness.

Mauer. Well, if you call it that, then it's all right.

Friedrich. Do you imagine there are many unkissed girls running about? Even on the plain it is said to happen occasionally. For a man to get the idea for that reason, that he is too good for a girl, is nothing but megalomania, if you'll excuse me.

Mauer. It amuses you to lie, doesn't it?

Friedrich. It does sometimes... But just now I'm not doing so. And now I'll tell you something else. Even if more had occurred than this kiss —

Mauer. I didn't ask you. And I assure you that now I'm rather indifferent as to how far things have gone between you.

Friedrich. There you are unjust.

Mauer. Ah!

Friedrich. Perhaps your position would have been better if she had been my mistress. The thing would be finished. Then you would be to a certain extent more secure.

Mauer. You begin to amuse me.

Friedrich. I am glad of that. That's the most important thing in any conversation. Whether one gets to hear the truth, one can't tell in any event.

Mauer. I could obtain it from Erna.

Friedrich. You think so?

Mauer. Lying is the only thing of which I consider her incapable.

Friedrich. There you may be right. And that after all is the important thing. In fact, I consider it rather narrow to judge women only from the erotic standpoint. We are apt to forget that in the life of every woman, even if she has lovers, there are many hours in which she has things quite other than love to occupy her mind, — music, charity work, cooking, raising her children — she may even be a very good mother, yes, and sometimes an excellent wife, and worth a hundred times more than the so-called respectable women. Now take Adele Natter.

Mauer. I hope you haven't asked me here to present your philosophic views.

Friedrich. No, that is just incidental. But since we are on the subject I would like to ask you whether you know anything about the affair between my wife and Ensign von Aigner.

Mauer (Astonished). Your wife and... Not a word. Why where could I... I haven't been here for three weeks.

Friedrich. Then I'm giving you the news. Well, what do you say to it?

Mauer. Perhaps it isn't true. And if it should be true.

Friedrich. You think it serves me right. I know. But I want to tell you that your gloating is entirely without point. Because, obviously the only basis for your gloating would be that I regarded the thing as something painful or at least irritating. And that is absolutely not the case. On the contrary, to me it is rather a release. I no longer wander about this house like a guilty man. I breathe again. It seems, in a manner, as if I were doing penance for Korsakow's death. And in the most sensible and painless way. She begins to be humanly nearer. We are again, so to speak, living on the same planet.

Mauer. You take it very philosophically. My congratulations. Obviously you don't believe it. Since one can never know such a thing with absolute certainty...

Friedrich. Oh, sometimes you can. For example, if you see the lover, at half past one in the morning, climbing out of your wife's window.

Mauer. What's that?

Friedrich. Well, what do you say to it? Last night at half past one I saw Mr. Otto von Aigner, Ensign in his Majesty's Marines, climb out of the window of the wife of the manufacturer Hofreiten. To which I could make legal oath.

Mauer. Last night at half past one?

Friedrich. Yes, I came out here last night.

Mauer. You did? And where were you until half past one, if I may ask?

Friedrich. (Oh, seems to me you're thinking of Erna again. In order to reassure you, I took the last train here from Vienna. I walked here from the station and entered the garden as I sometimes do, through the little door, from the meadow. And to my surprise I heard voices. I crept nearer and saw a gentleman and a lady sitting here under the tree. Genia and Otto. At midnight, here in the garden. What they said I could not understand. I remained at a discreet distance. After a few seconds, both get up and disappear inside. I leave the garden quickly through the same door, step around the house, and post myself so that I can easily see who leaves at the door. No one comes. For a half hour no one. The lights in the house are extinguished. Quickly I walk around the gate into the meadow where I keep my eye fixed on Genia's window. It was dark, the night was lovely. I lie down on the meadow in the shadow of the trees which stand near the fence. And I wait. I waited until half past one. At half past one the window opens, a gentleman climbs out, and disappears from my sight for a short time in the dark of the garden. Then I hear the gate open and immediately, thereafter, right past me, swings the slender figure of Ensign Otto von Aigner.

Mauer. And what did you do then?

Friedrich. I lay down on the meadow.

Mauer. Why, you lay there already.

Friedrich. Quite right. But I lay down more comfortably than before because I no longer had to keep watch, and I slept splendidly till seven in the morning. It is really delightful to sleep in the open on fine summer nights. Only recently some one sang its praises to me.

Mauer. I hope you're not thinking of any sort of revenge. The only thing you can and may do now is to end it once for all.

Friedrich. Who speaks of ending it?

Mauer. Surely that's understood. You could do it now without attracting much attention. It would merely be necessary for you to leave for America somewhat sooner than you intended.

Friedrich. Genia will go to America with me.

Mauer. What?

Friedrich. Yes.

Mauer (Shrugging his shoulders). If you will allow me, I shall regard this communication as the last evidence of your confidence. Now...

Natter (Comes in). Good evening, Dr. Mauer, how are you? My dear Hofreiter, I wanted to ask you, since we can't stay any longer...

Mauer. Allow me now to say good night to your wife.

Friedrich. She will be pleased.

MAUER goes to the tennis court.

Natter. I wanted to ask you, Hofreiter, whether I might see you tomorrow at the office. I have a good deal to tell you. That company has applied again. They make an offer of...

Friedrich. Business tomorrow, Herr Natter.

Natter. As you please.

Friedrich. Today we will chat a bit.

Natter. With pleasure.

Friedrich. Tell me, Natter, what do you think of Demeter Stanzides.

Natter. Stanzides? A decent fellow. Somewhat sentimental for a lieutenant of Hussars. But, on the whole, a good chap.

Friedrich. Hasn't he any debts?

Natter. Not that I know.

Friedrich. Doesn't he abuse his subordinates?

Natter. I've heard nothing to that effect.

Friedrich. Doesn't he cheat at cards?

Natter. Do you believe that, Hofreiter?

Friedrich. No. I merely wanted to make it easier for you to find something against him later, when the affair between him and your wife is over.

They stand looking hard at each other.

Natter. I'm glad, Hofreiter, that you don't take me for a fool.

Friedrich. No, for a...

Natter. I warn you not to call me a scoundrel. It probably wouldn't suit me to settle the affair through a game of billiards. Friedrich. No, but in another way.

Natter. If I had wished that, not so very long ago there would have been a better opportunity.

Friedrich. Why didn't you do it? A man doesn't suddenly become... I know that as a young man you risked your life for less valuable considerations.

Natter. Less valuable? For other things.

Friedrich. If the thing affected you so, why do you remain with your wife?
Natter, — Let me explain. Because to me life without Adele would be absolutely absurd. I am hopelessly in love with her. Such things happen, Hofretter. There is nothing to be done about them. Have you any idea what measures I have tried to loose the inner ties that bind me to her? In vain, all in vain. I love her in spite of everything. Monstrous, isn't it? Yet, there it is.

Friedrich. And you revenge yourself against me by inventing a monstrosity?

Natter. Perhaps by spreading the truth.

Friedrich. Man, do you really believe that I... about the American duel?

Natter. Disprove it if you can.

Friedrich. I could. I know the reason for Korsakow's suicide. I know... But what am I coming to —? To justify myself to you — you, you...

Natter. Be careful.

Friedrich. I swear to you, you are mistaken. I swear it. Natter. By your wife's virtue, eh?

Friedrich. Sir... (Makes a step towards him.)

Natter (Grasps his arm). Quiet, no scene. I won't fight with you. But another word and...

Friedrich. Is it possible that I should be defenseless against you?

Natter. One is sometimes.

Friedrich. Yes, against a...

Natter. Against a man who finds life tremendously amusing, my dear Hofreiter, and nothing more.

Paul (Coming from the tennis court). Mr. Hofreiter, your singles match is due with the Ensign.

Friedrich. Oh, yes. I'm ready. The relative standing must be cleared up once for all... I know...

Natter. Don't let me keep you. (In a whisper.) Perhaps even to the point of life and death?

Friedrich. Perhaps.

MAUER and GENIA come in from rear.

Mauer (About to leave). Well, my friend, —

Friedrich. No, you simply mustn't go. Genia, you must hold him... with all your seductive arts.

FRIEDRICH, PAUL and NATTER go to the tennis court.

Genia. I am afraid my arts will prove insufficient.

Mauer. I'm sorry but I must go, Madam.

Genia. And I presume we shan't see you for a time.

Mauer. That is quite likely, Madam.

Genia (Gazing at him). I'm sorry I've lost a friend. I who am really without blame, at least toward you. Why don't you answer me, doctor? I don't want to force myself upon your confidence, the less so that I can readily imagine what is driving you away from here.

Mauer. There I am hardly warranted in complimenting you on your acuteness. Permit me now, Madam, to say goodnight.

Genia. It is not for me to permit or forbid. Especially as... Madam. Good-bye, Doctor. And please let me give you a parting injunction. Don't take the thing too hard. It would be too ridiculous, if you, a man who knows the serious side of life, were to attach any importance to such a frivolous game. Love affairs are nothing more, Doctor, believe me, and once you've found that out, very amusing to watch and to take part in.

Mauer. Once you've found that out.

Genia. Oh, you shall, my friend. The sad, stupid words that are trailing through your mind, — just let them evaporate, and you will see how immaterial they really are. They vanish, all. They blow away. Those sad, stupid words.

Mauer. Perhaps there is only one really sad thing in the world, and that is a lie.

Genia. A lie? Does such a thing occur in a game? Strategy or fun is what you call it there.

Mauer. A game? Ah, if it were so. I assure you Genia, I shouldn't make the least objection to a world in which love were really nothing more than an amusing game. But then, — honesty if you please! Honesty, — even to the orgy. That I could let pass. But this mixture of restraint and impudence, of cowardly jealousy and hypocritical complacence, of raging passion and empty lust as we see it here — that I find sadly disgusting. The freedom that is boasted of here lacks faith in itself. Therefore the gayety which it would like to assume is a failure. Therefore it merely grins where it attempts to laugh.

Genia. You are unjust, Doctor. We are all trying our best. Of course the thing doesn't go as well as we would like. But we have the best intentions. Haven't you noticed? Adele Natter, for example, brings her children here. I chat with Erna as if the Lake at Vols were the most harmless sheet of water in the world. Friedrich plays his game of tennis with Ensign von Aigner...

Mauer. Why shouldn't he?

Genia. Oh, Doctor!

Mauer. Yes, I know that, too.

Genia. Who told you?

Mauer. Who? Be careful, Genia — Friedrich himself.

The tennis match is over. The participants come in slowly.

Genia. Friedrich? Of course he suspects. I saw that at once in his glance as he greeted us from the balcony. But why this cautionary "Be careful?" He won't hold it against me. Maybe Otto would have killed himself too, — like the other one. And one mustn't drive a young man to his death for such a trifle. Friedrich will be satisfied with me. Tomorrow when my lover is gone, I shall tell him the entire story myself.

Mauer. That won't be necessary. It isn't that he suspects. He knows. He saw the Ensign last night at half past one.

GENIA winces, but quickly regains her composure.

PAUL, GUSTAV, ERNA, STANZIDES, ADELE, MRS. WAHL, NATTER, OTTO and FRIEDRICH come from the court.

Genia. Well, who was the winner?

Paul. The old guard still lives. Mr. Hofreiter won, nine to eight.

Stanzides. Too bad you weren't there, Madam. It was a good game.

Friedrich. Well, Mauer, I see you remained after all. That's handsome of you.

Paul. Now the match of Miss Erna against Mr. Hofreiter.

Erna. It is too dark now. We shall have to postpone that until tomorrow. We can wire the Ensign the final result of the series.

Otto. Ladies and gentlemen, I really must go. (He begins to take leave.)

Friedrich (Following him with his glance). Too bad we can't play another game tomorrow, Otto. I really don't enjoy my victory today.

Paul. Why? The Ensign played splendidly and you still better.

Friedrich. I don't know. You weren't in form, Otto. You had a stroke that I had never observed in your play. Such a distracted, undecided, timid stroke. Due to your farewell mood, I suppose.

Otto. Perhaps embarrassment... in facing so strong and well rested an opponent. Well, when I come back in three years, you'll enjoy my competition a little more, Mr. Hofreiter.

Friedrich. Yes, if it were so certain that we shall see each other again. I never speak of such distant things. Three years! Just think what can happen in that time. We haven't control of things to that extent. There are occurrences against which all foresight may be in vain. And all prudence.

Natter. True. And perhaps that very quality is not one of the Ensign's outstanding attributes.

Otto. I fear so myself, Herr Natter.

Friedrich. That's a thing you really can't know, Otto — whether or not you are prudent by nature — In a calling that is based so completely on bearing and discipline as yours is, one really hasn't the opportunity of getting acquainted with oneself. Don't you think so?

Mauer. Enough psychology, for so late in the evening. (to OTTO.) Perhaps we may as well go together.

Friedrich (Paying no attention to the last words). Of course I have no doubt that you would be ready at all times to lay down your life for your country and your emperor, and even for lesser things. But in these matters, external pressure plays a strong part. In the depths of your soul, right down in the very depths, Otto, you are a coward.

Extended pause.

Otto. I must have misunderstood.

Friedrich. I don't know what you understood. At all events, I shall repeat it. Coward.

OTTO taking a step toward him.

FRIEDRICH stepping toward Otto.

Otto. You will hear from me.

Friedrich. I trust so. (Softly.) And soon. In an hour in the park.

OTTO exit.

PAUL says something softly to GUSTAV, and follows OTTO with him. ERNA stands motionless. GENIA motionless. MRS. WAHL looks about her in perplexity, turns to ADELE.

Natter. We won't disturb our friends any longer.

Friedrich. No disturbance, I assure you — on the contrary (Aside to MAUER.) I hope I can count on you.

Mauer. No, I'll have nothing to do with it.

Friedrich. As a physician, Mauer. You can't deny me that. It is your duty.

Mauer (Shrugs his shoulders). Very well.

Friedrich. Thank you. My dear Stanzides.

Stanzides. Consider me at your service.

Friedrich. Thank you. Natter may I request...

Natter. My dear Hofreiter...

Friedrich (Draws NATTER forward). I believe we are agreed in our views of life, are we not? Fit to laugh oneself to death. Natter. I've always said so.

Friedrich. The latest joke would have an additional spice for me if you agreed to be my second.

Natter. Gladly. The Ensign must be a good shot.

Genia (With a sudden resolve, going to FRIEDRICH). Friedrich.

Friedrich. Later.

Genia. Now.

Friedrich (To the others). You will excuse me. (Going forward with her.)

MRS. WAHL, supping to ERNA, wishes to induce her to leave. ERNA repulses her, remains standing against the wall of the house. MRS. WAHL turns to ADELE who is standing under the walnut tree and gazing after her husband. NATTER and STANZIDES walk toward the rear. MAUER stands alone.

Friedrich (To GENIA). Well —

Genia. What are you thinking of? What right had you Friedrich. Don't be afraid. I won't do much to him. Probably nothing.

Genia. Then why? If you had the slightest regard for me... If it were hate, jealousy, love —

Friedrich. Well, to be sure, of all that I feel damned little. But one doesn't like to feel the fool. (Turns from her, follows NATTER and STANZIDES.)

GENIA stands forward motionless. ERNA stands against the wall of the house. The eyes of the women meet.

ACT V

A LIGHT, PLEASANT room in the villa adjacent to the veranda. Large glass door leading to the veranda stands open. Cupboards to the right and left of the door. In the center a large table with cover; on it periodicals, books — Chairs. At the left wall a stove. In front of it a small table with chairs, etc. Pictures on the walls. Another door at the right, A wall clock in front at the left. Whatnot with books to the right of the stove.

GENIA comes from the right in morning gown, very pale and agitated. Goes to veranda door, steps out on the veranda, back again, sits down at the large table, takes up one of the periodicals, stares into it, then straight before her.

ERNA without hat, in summer frock enters rapidly from the veranda.

Genia (Rises, quickly composed). You, Erna? What news?

Erna. They haven't got back yet. Haven't you heard anything?

Genia. How could I? Pull yourself together, Erna. It can't possibly take place before this afternoon, probably not before morning. Very likely the arrangements are now being made.

Erna (Gazing at her). Yes, of course. Forgive my questioning you. I know I have no right, but the unusual circumstances —

Genia. You have as much right to tremble for someone, as I have.

Erna. I am not trembling, Frau Genia. That isn't my habit. I simply wanted to ask whether you had seen your husband today.

Genia. My husband went to the city last night. Probably to consult his lawyer. That is the usual thing, even if it is superfluous. He must be arranging his affairs. And probably burning some letters and papers. In short he will act precisely as if it were a deadly serious matter, though it is nothing but a bit of farcical vanity and a travesty on honor, as we all know.

Erna. I am not convinced of it, Frau Genia.

Genia. I am. Come Erna, let us go into the garden. The day is fine. We may as well chat. You have told me nothing about your trip. You have had interesting experiences at Vols Lake.

Erna. Is it possible that you can indulge in mockery at such a time?

Genia. I am not mocking. Far from it. You love him very much — my husband — do you not? Well, no wonder. The first, — that is always an experience. Or has that too lost its meaning? You must help me to understand. I can't get my bearings any more. Life has become so much more trivial of late years. When I was your age, certain things were still looked upon as terribly serious. That wasn't much more than ten years ago, but it seems to me the world has changed greatly since then.

CHAMBERMAID enters right, with telegram. Leaves directly.

Genia (Opens it quickly). From my sister Mary. She is coming at noon today with Percy. Here (she hands the telegram to ERNA.) A jolly reunion. But won't you come into the garden? Or let us take a short drive. Will you? The day is so fine. The air will do you good. You are pale... maybe you haven't slept well.

Erna. No, I was awake all night. And at five this morning I saw my brother go away. Any moment now we may hear how it turned out. For while we talk here, all is long since over.

Genia. Erna, I told you — Friedrich went to the city — to his lawyer probably.

Erna. He didn't go to his lawyer. I know it. I spoke to my brother this morning, as he was leaving. It was all arranged last night. The duel took place at eight this morning. I presume not very far from here. In Holycross Wood probably. And by now it is all over.

Genia. Well, then it's over. There is nothing more to do, is there? In Holycross Wood you think? And they are all sitting together in the public garden, under the shade trees, celebrating the reconciliation. The breakfast was all arranged for in advance by the seconds. People are easily reconciled when they were never really angry. What do you say, Erna, — are they drinking our health? Why not? Life is so merry. Perhaps they will come in together, arm in arm. Suppose we go out to meet them.

Erna. I'm going home. My brother may be back.

Genia. Yes — go home, Erna. I'll wait here.

ERNA appears to be listening.

Genia. What is it? Someone coming?

Erna (Goes to the veranda door). It is Mrs. Meinhold.

Genia (With a start). What —?

Erna. She is quite unconcerned. She knows nothing.

Genia. Why does she come so early?

Erna. I'm sure she knows nothing. She is walking slowly. Her face is perfectly calm. If she had the slightest suspicion her looks would show it. How could she know? Compose yourself, Frau Genia.

Mrs. Meinhold (Approaching). Good morning.

Erna. Good morning, Madam.

Genia. Ah, it is you, Mrs. Meinhold.

Erna. Good-bye.

Mrs. Meinhold. You are going? I hope I am not driving you away.

Erna. Not at all, Madam. I was just about to go. Goodbye, Frau Genia. (Exit.)

Genia (With tremendous self-control). I am very glad to see you again, Mrs. Meinhold. I was very sorry you didn't come yesterday.

Mrs. Meinhold. You had many people here and I don't like a crowd. Today I am here the earlier, as you see, Frau Genia.

Genia. It isn't so very early. (Looking at the wall clock.) Only ten o'clock. I thought it was near noon. Friedrich left long ago. As you probably know, Mrs. Meinhold, he returned yesterday.

Frau Meinhold. Of course I know (Smiling.) He sent his regards with Otto.

Genia. Your son is leaving today?

Mrs. Meinhold. My son has left already. He took the last train to the city yesterday. Tonight he goes to Pola.

Genia. So soon?

Mrs. Meinhold. Are you really learning that now for the first time?

Genia. Oh, I knew that. But I thought he would want to pass the last day with his mother.

Mrs. Meinhold. He has a great many things to attend to in the city today; so we said our farewells yesterday. It is better so.

Genia. Of course that is better.

Mrs. Meinhold. Can you imagine, Frau Genia, how I felt this morning as I sat all alone again at breakfast in my arbor? My little house has suddenly become so empty... as I haven't been accustomed to see it for a long time. I've been spoiled for a while — in spite of all. And the thought that he has gone away so far, and for so long, makes the house seem sadder and emptier. So I thought I had better go out...

Genia. I understand.

Mrs. Meinhold. Not with the intention of disturbing you so early Frau Genia, that I must confess. Not at all, I wanted to take a walk — a lonely walk in the woods. And yet, here I am. God knows how that came about. Something must have driven me here. (Looks long at GENIA.)

Genia (Returning her glance). Thank you.

Mrs. Meinhold. Oh, don't thank me. I simply had the choice of either being very angry with you or holding you very dear. When I left my home, I had by no means decided. For in these last days — I may tell you now that he is gone, Genia, — I have often felt anxious, —

Genia. Anxious?

Mrs. Meinhold. I know my son. And I saw how he suffered during these last weeks. He is not adapted — to false relationships —. I feared for him. You meant so much to him, Genia. More than his calling, his future, than I, than his life. Oh, God, how I feared. And kept silence. Was compelled to keep silence. And even compelled to understand. I felt it coming the first day Otto entered your house. With all my anger, my fear, my jealousy, I was still compelled to understand. You were so alone, Genia, and so deeply grieved... throughout the long years. Even if it had been someone less worthy than Otto, I could not have blamed you. And now that he is away, all my anger and jealousy are gone, and I ask myself: How will she bear it? She — who loved him?

Genia. Mrs. Meinhold, I am not worth so much sympathy. I shall try to forget him. And I shall succeed. That is certain — as certain as that he will. It is my firm resolve to forget him. Why do you look at me so, Mrs. Meinhold? Don't you believe me? You mustn't be afraid. There is no understanding between us. I swear it. We shan't even write. That is fixed.

Mrs. Meinhold. You are very good, Genia.

Genia. I am only wise, Mrs. Meinhold. Only wise. (Suddenly she gives way to a fit of sobbing. Her head droops down on the table.)

Mrs. Meinhold. Genia, Genia, (she strokes her hair.) Don't cry, Genia. It is a small consolation, of course — but we will bear it together, his being away. You see that my choice is made and that I have decided not to hate you. Child, child, control yourself. We shall be friends, Genia. It must be so. Genia... Genial Genia. Frau Meinhold (She takes her hand as if to kiss it.)

Mrs. Meinhold. Can you really find nothing better to call me? I am his mother.

Genia (Shaking her head wildly). No, no, no. I can't.

Mrs. Meinhold (Gazing long at her). I had better leave you now. Good-bye. But if you weary of loneliness, come to me. You'll always find me ready to receive you. Good-bye, Genia.

FRIEDRICH coming in from the terrace. Dark overcoat over his black dress coat. Buttons his overcoat quickly, composes his face.

GENIA stares at him questioningly.

Friedrich (Forces a smile without nodding. To MRS. MEIN- HOLD in his laughing malicious way which now serves as a mask). My respects, Madam. (He takes her proffered hand with a barely noticeable hesitation.) How are you?

Mrs. Meinhold. Thank you. Back so early from the city?

Friedrich. From the city? No. I am just going there. I've been taking a morning walk. A... glorious day...

Mrs. Meinhold. I hear you've had a fine trip.

Friedrich. Yes, splendid. I am highly pleased with it. Excellent weather, interesting people. What more can one expect?

Mrs. Meinhold. Oh, by the way, I am to convey regards to you.

Friedrich. Regards — to me?

Mrs. Meinhold. You will be a little astonished. Regards from Mr. von Aigner.

Genia. From your husband?

Mrs. Meinhold. Yes, this morning. Before I left the house, a letter arrived from him, the first for many, many years. And in a few days he will be here himself. He is to confer with one of the cabinet ministers, he writes me.

Friedrich. Yes, I remember, — concerning the new railroad. It will be a fine thing, that new road. Besides, he will be a cabinet minister himself, some day, — your husband. All in all, a remarkable man, a most remarkable man. He still has a great future before him.

Mrs. Meinhold. Do you really think so?

Friedrich. Why not?

Mrs. Meinhold. His letter says something about poor health.

Friedrich. Poor health? I don't suppose he could do any more mountain climbing — but, being a cabinet minister is less exacting. And the fall is less dangerous. Don't imagine he is ill. The man is life itself. He will survive all of us. Oh, pardon me, — of course I can speak only for myself, — that is all that any of us can do. (Laughs.) A very interesting man.
We talked much together... in those few days. I like him.

Mrs. Meinhold. He seems to have conceived a strong regard for you too. Yes, it is an odd letter. Touching almost. And somewhat affected. That's a habit he is not likely to break himself of.

Friedrich. No, hardly now.

Mrs. Meinhold. Well, au revoir.

Friedrich. Au revoir, Madam. And when your husband comes, our house is, of course... Les amis de nos amis.. and so forth... Good-bye, Madam.

GENIA (Accompanies her a short distance.)

Mrs. Meinhold. Stay, stay, dear Frau Genia. Au revoir.

(Exit.)

GENIA returns rapidly.

FRIEDRICH stands motionless.

Genia. Well, — everything all right?

Friedrich (Glances at her). Well, —

Genia. He is wounded? Friedrich!

Friedrich. No. Dead.

Genia. Friedrich, don't go too far. This is not the time for mockery.

Friedrich. He is dead. I can't say it differently.

Genia. Friedrich, Friedrich... (rushes to him, grasps his shoulders.) You killed him Friedrich... and took his mother's hand.

Friedrich (Shrugs his shoulders). I didn't know she was here... with you. What could I do?

Genia. Dead... Dead! (Suddenly nearing him.)
Murderer!

Friedrich. It was an honest fight. I am no murderer.

Genia. Why, why...

Friedrich. Why? Obviously... it pleased me so.

Genia. That isn't true. Don't make yourself out more terrible than you are. You didn't want to do it. It was a frightful accident. You didn't want to... It isn't true.

Friedrich. At the moment that he stood facing me, it was true.

Genia. Horrible wretch! And you took his mother's hand. You didn't even hate him. And killed him. Monster! Vain, gruesome monster!

Friedrich. It isn't so simple as all that. You can't see inside of me. No one can. I am sorry for poor Frau Meinhold and my good old Herr von Aigner. But I can't help them, no, and not you. And not him. Or me. It had to be.

Genia. Had to?

Friedrich. As he stood facing me with his impudent young glance, I knew it... He or I.

Genia. You lie, he would not have... Not he.

Friedrich. You are mistaken. It was life or death. He wished it so as well as I. I saw it in his eye, as he in mine. He... or I.

ERNA and MAUER come from the garden. ERNA remains standing at the door. MAUER going quickly to GENIA, presses her hand.

Friedrich. Ah Mauer, here already?

Mauer. I had nothing further to do.

Genia. Where is the body?

Mauer. On the way.

Genia. Where to?

Mauer. To his mother.

Genia. Does she...? Who will tell her?

Mauer. No one has yet dared.

Genia. I will tell her. It is my duty. I am going to her.

Friedrich. Genia... Just a moment. When you return I shall hardly be here any more. I can't ask you to give me your hand, but we will say good-bye.

Genia (Remembering). Percy is coming. In less than an hour.

Friedrich. Percy? I'll wait for him... Then... the others... well...

Genia. What do you intend to do?

Friedrich. Go to the city. The best course will be to give myself up. Nothing will happen to me. I merely defended my honor. Perhaps they will release me on bail. Still — they would naturally suspect flight.

Genia. You think of all that? And he lies dead.

Friedrich. Ah yes, — it is easier for him than for me. For him all things are settled. But I, — I am on earth and I mean to continue living. You and I must come to a decision. One way or the other.

Genia (Staring at him). It is over — between us. (About to go.)

Mauer. Frau Genia, you mustn't go alone. Allow me to accompany you.

Genia (Nods). Thank you. Come.

MAUER and GENIA leave.

FRIEDRICH still motionless as before.

Erna (At the door. Without moving). What will you do?

Friedrich. However it turns out, conviction or release, — away, of course, from these parts... from the continent.

Erna. And — wherever you go Friedrich — I follow.

Friedrich. Thanks. Not accepted.

Erna. I feel it more than ever, Friedrich, — we belong to each other.

Friedrich. Wrong. You are under the influence of this thing now. Probably it even impresses you, that I... but that is an illusion. Everything is illusion Presently I shall snap to like a pocket knife. Over, Erna, between us too. You are twenty, you do not belong to me.

Erna (Always standing on the same spot). You are younger than all of us.

Friedrich. Hush! I know what youth is. It isn't an hour ago, that I saw it gleam and laugh in a cold, impudent eye. I know what youth is. And it won't do to serve every one as I served... Stay where you are, Erna, amuse yourself, and...

Erna (Listening). A wagon.

Friedrich (Remaining rigid). Percy.

Erna (A little nearer to him). Believe me, Friedrich, I love you. I belong to you.

Friedrich. I to no one on earth. No one. And don't want to.

A Child's Voice in the Garden. Mother! Father!

Friedrich. Percy! (He moans faintly.) Yes, Percy, I'm coming. Here I am. (Exit rapidly to the veranda.)

ERNA remains standing.

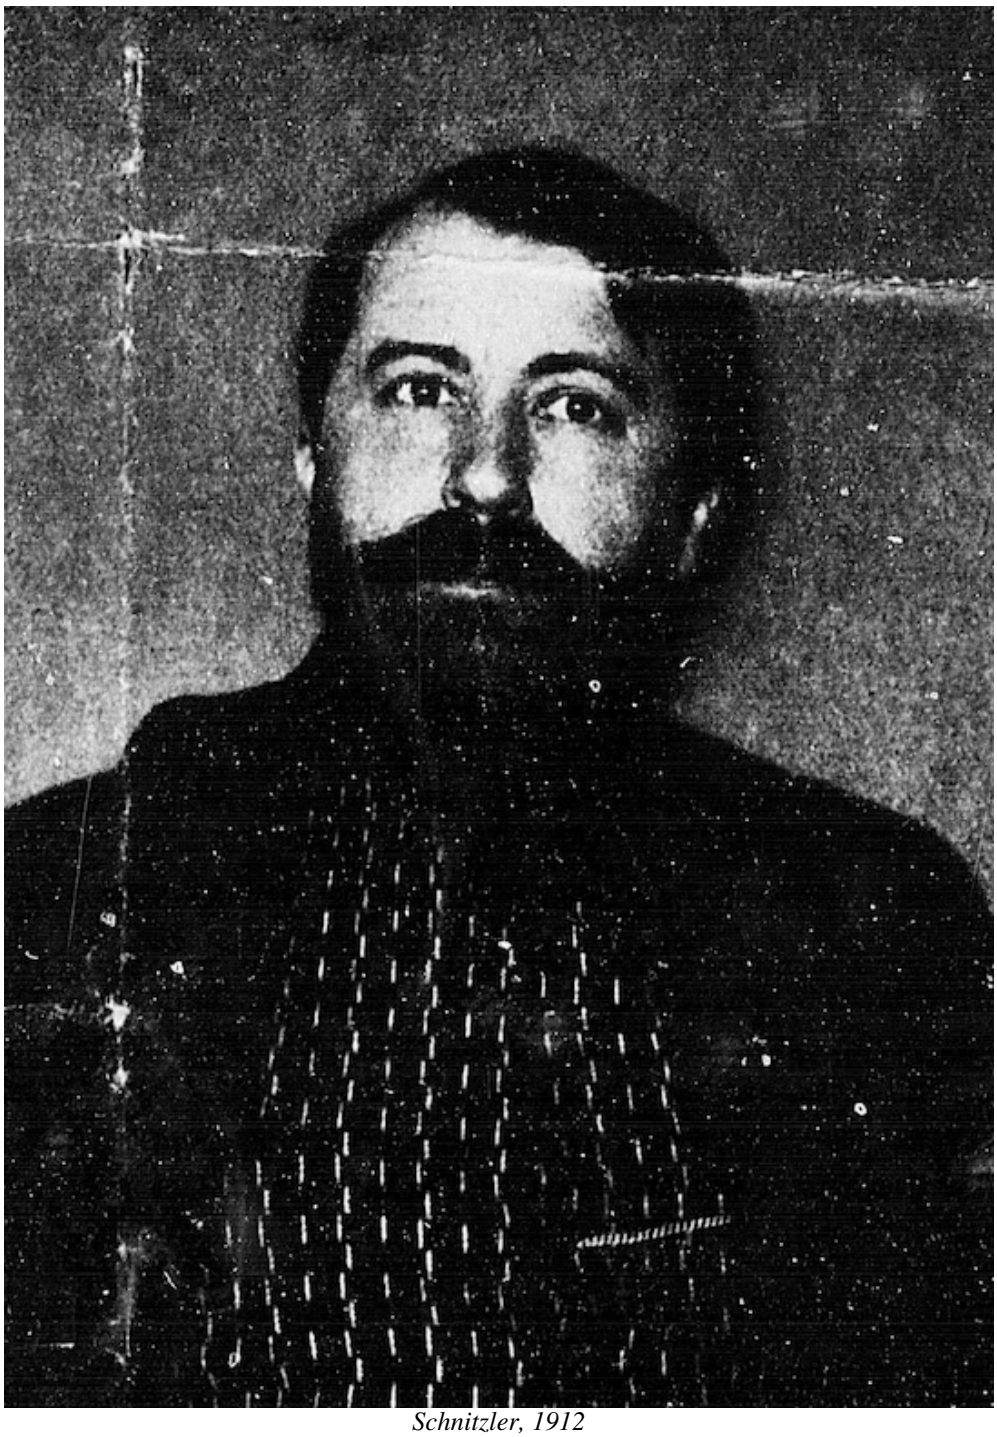
CURTAIN

Professor Bernhardi (1912)

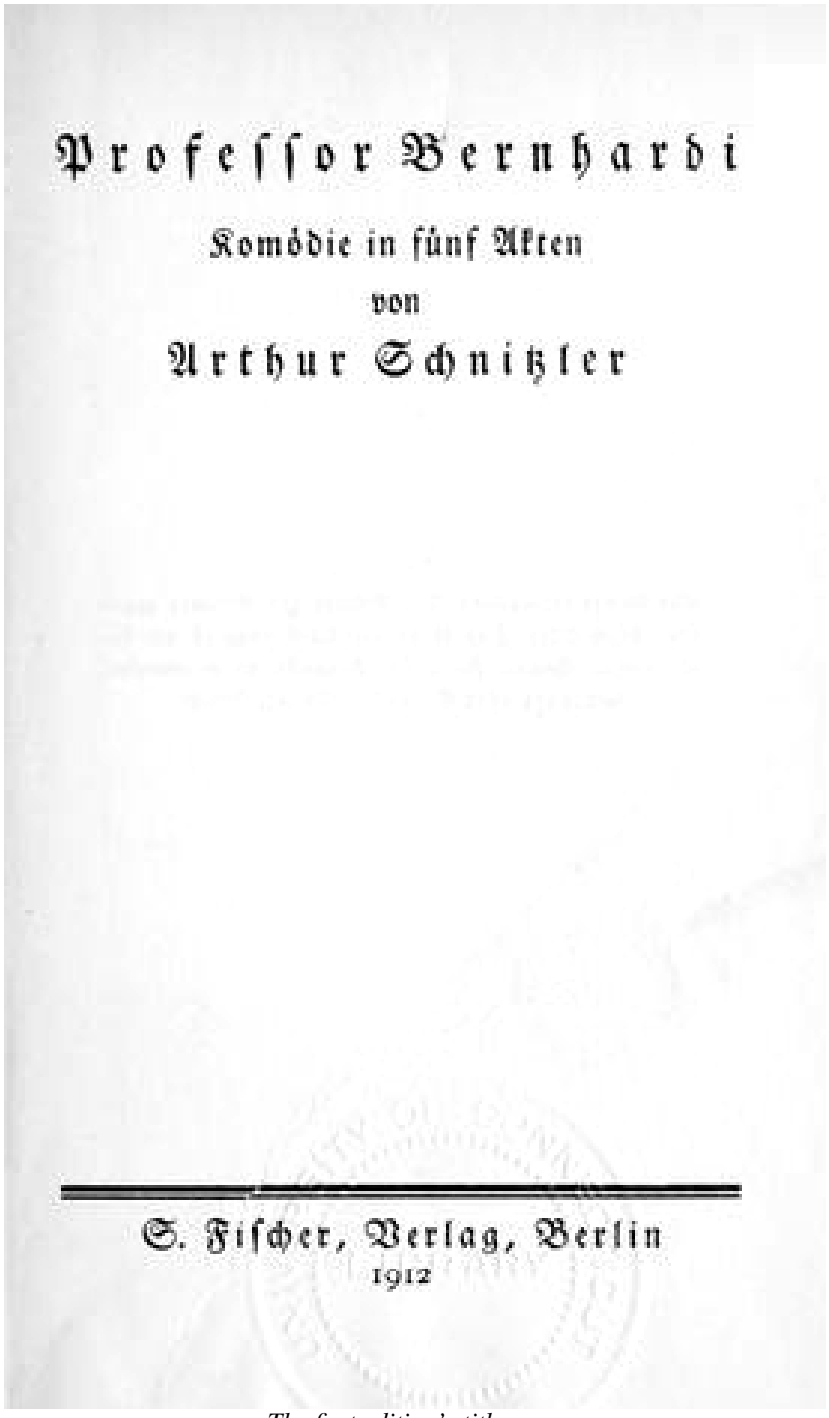
A COMEDY IN FIVE ACTS

Translated by Hetty Landstone, 1927



Professor Bernhardi, a play about a Jewish doctor who turns away a Catholic priest in order to spare a patient the realisation that she is on the point of death, is Schnitzler's only major dramatic work without a sexual theme. It premiered successfully on 28 November 1912 at the Kleines Theater in Berlin, with Bruno Decarli as Bernhardi and Alfred Abel as the chaplain.

One of the playwright's enduring masterpieces, Professor Bernhardi takes place in Vienna at the turn of the century. The protagonist is a Jewish physician and the director of the Elisabethinum, a clinic named in honour of Empress Elisabeth of Austria. A young woman, Philomena Bejer, in his care is dying of sepsis following an abortion. Unaware that she is on the brink of death, she is happy and believes herself to be recovering. Father Reder, a priest summoned by a nurse arrives to give the patient the last rites, but Bernhardi refuses him admission. He wants to spare her the anguish she would suffer when realising she is about to die. The priest argues that she must be absolved of sin, especially since she has undergone an abortion. While Bernhardi and Father Reder are arguing, the girl dies, having been told by the nurse that the priest arrived. Her death was hastened by the discovery that her condition was terminal and she died in a state of fear.



A press campaign causes public outcry. False testimony and fabrications about Bernhardi are printed across the city, revealing the endemic anti-Semitism of the time. As Bernhardi faces trial, Professor Ebenwald, a man with influence among corrupt judicial officers offers to pay a bribe so that Bernhardi can avoid trial. He will do this on condition that Bernhardi agrees to instate a Christian physician rather than Dr. Wenger, a Jewish physician Bernhardi had wanted to appoint based on merit…

For this play, Schnitzler used the Vienna General Polyclinic as a model for The Elisabethinum. As a young doctor, he had worked at the polyclinic, along with his father, Johann Schnitzler, who directed the hospital until his death in 1893. Also, Schnitzler used the German nationalist professor Julius Hochenegg as the model for Professor Ebenwald. Throughout the drama, his use of extensive dialogues addresses important themes such as anti-Semitism, problems of ethics and jurisprudence, as well as Catholicism. Primarily, however, the drama deals with navigating between ethics and what is feasible. Should one act individually in a right and ethical manner — as Bernhardi does — or should one pursue collective, grand goals? Schnitzler argues for the rejection of collective goals at the expense of personal ethics.

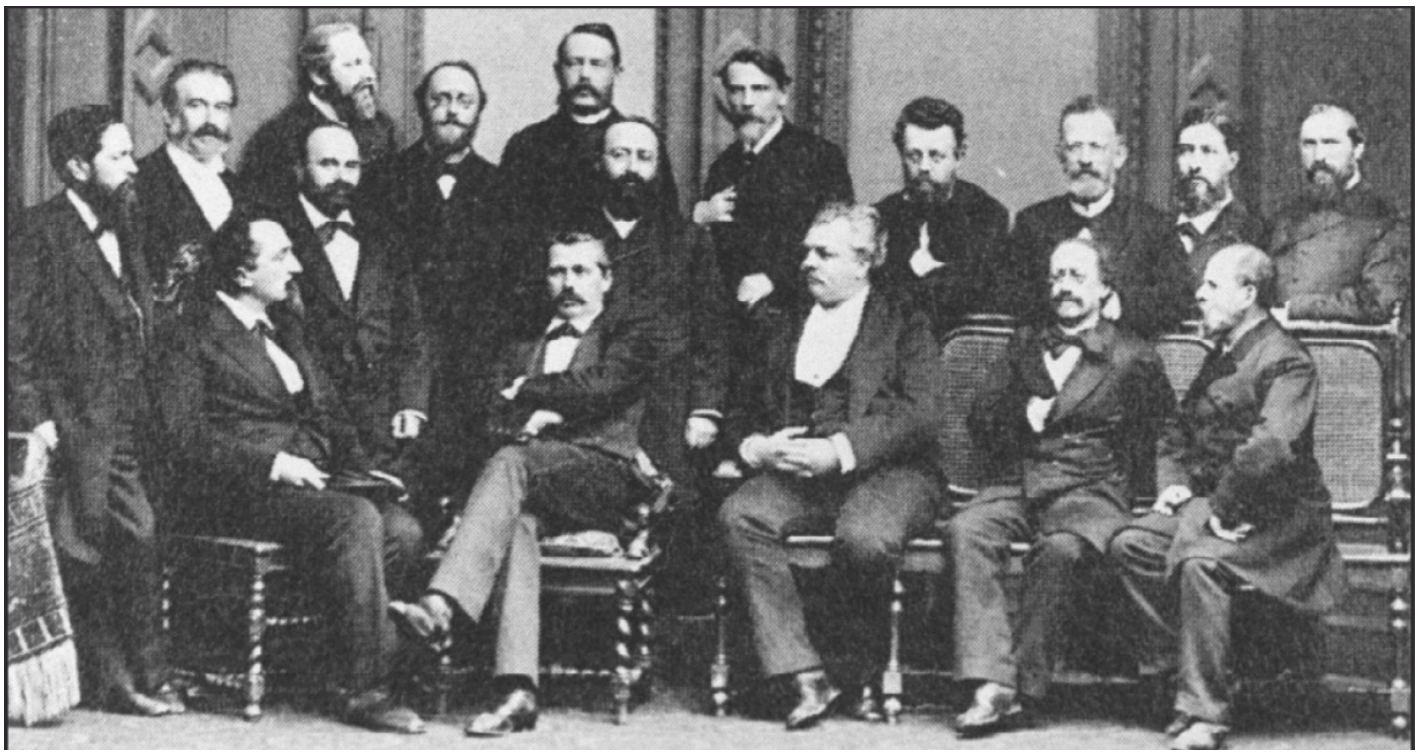
The play was banned in Austria until the collapse of the Habsburg Monarchy in 1918. From the 1930's onward, it was rarely, if ever, performed, especially in Austria and the German Reich, and even after 1945 it was performed only rarely in German-speaking countries. In Vienna, since 1980, it has been interpreted as a metaphor for the decline of the West, which can be understood on the one hand as the disintegration of the Danube Monarchy, shaped by polyglot liberalism, German nationalism and clericalism, and on the other as the rise of political anti-Semitism — a breeding ground for Hitler's ideology.

Schnitzler, 1912

The first edition's title page

CONTENTS

NOTE
DRAMATIS PERSONÆ



ACT I

ACT II

ACT III

ACT IV

ACT V

The heads of departments at the Vienna General Polyclinic, c. 1885. Schnitzler's father is the second seated from the left.

NOTE

THIS PLAY WAS FIRST PRODUCED IN BERLIN UNDER THE MANAGEMENT OF BARNOWSKY ON NOVEMBER 28TH, 1912. IT HAS SINCE BEEN PRODUCED IN THE MAJORITY OF THE LARGER TOWNS OF GERMANY AND AUSTRIA, GENERALLY UNDER SEVERE CENSORSHIP RESTRICTIONS. IT HAS ALSO BEEN PLAYED IN HOLLAND, DENMARK, NORWAY, SWEDEN AND HUNGARY. SO FAR, IT HAS NOT BEEN PRODUCED IN ENGLAND OR AMERICA, WITH THE EXCEPTION OF A CHARACTER READING GIVEN AT THE LITTLE THEATRE, LONDON, IN FEBRUARY 1927, BY THE JEWISH DRAMA LEAGUE.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ

DR. BERNHARDI: — Specialist in Internal Diseases; Head of the Elizabeth Institute.

DR. EBENWALD: — Specialist in Surgery; second to Bernhardi

DR. CYPRIAN: — Specialist in nervous diseases

DR. P. PFLUGFELDER: Specialist in diseases of the eyes

DR. FILITZ: — Specialist in Gynæcology

DR. TUGENDVETTER: — Specialist in Dermatology

DR. LOEWENSTEIN: — Lecturer on infantile diseases

DR. SCHREIMANN: — Lecturer on diseases of the throat

DR. ADLER: — Lecturer — on pathological anatomy

DR. OSKAR BERNHARDI Assistant to Bernhardi

DR. KURT PFLUGFELDER Assistant to Bernhardi

DR. WENGER: — Assistant — to — Tugendvetter

HOCHROITZPOINTNER: — Medical student

SISTER LUDMILLA: — Nurse

PROFESSOR FLINT: — Minister of Education

COUNCILLOR WINKLER: On the staff of the Ministry of Education

FRANZ REDER: — Priest of the Church of St. Florian

DR. GOLDENTHAL: — Advocate

DR. FEUERMANN: — District doctor in Ober-Hollabrunn

KULKA: — A journalist

A MAN SERVANT AT BERNHARDI'S

A PORTER AT THE ELIZABETH INSTITUTE

A COMMISSIONAIRE AT THE MINISTRY OF EDUCATION

THE SCENE IS LAID IN VIENNA IN THE

YEAR 1900

ACT I

A FAIRLY LARGE lobby leading to a sick ward. On the right a door to the passage. At back a door to the ward. Left, a rather broad window. In the middle, a little to the left, a longish table, on which a thick journal is lying; beside this a folder containing histories of cases, documents and various papers. Near the entrance door coat-pegs. In the corner on the right an iron stove.

Near the door a wide étagère, on the top 'shelf a test-tube stand; by the side of it some medicine-bottles. On the lower shelves books and magazines. Each side of the middle door a closed cupboard. A white smock, a coat and hat, are hanging on the coat-pegs. Over the étagère hangs a rather faded photographic group of the medical staff. A few chairs according to requirements.

Sister Ludmilla (about 28, not too pretty, pale, with large, sometimes swimming, eyes) busy at the étagère when the curtain rises.

Hochroitzpointner comes in from the ward. (Young man aged 25, medium height, stout, small moustache, student's scar, pince-nez, pale, very sleek hair.)

HOCH. The Professor not here yet? They're taking their time down there to-day. (At table, opening one of the folders.) This is the third post-mortem in eight days. About enough for a ward of twenty beds. And to-morrow we shall have another one.

SISTER. Do you think so, Doctor? The sepsis case?

HOCH. Yes. By the way, has it been notified?

SISTER. Of course, Doctor.

HOCH. It's true that nothing could be proved.
But it was undoubtedly an illegal operation. Yes,
Sister, strange things happen in the world out there.
(He notices a half-open package lying on the table.)
Ah, here are the invitations to our Ball. (Reads.)
'Under the patronage of Duchess Stixenstein.'
Well, Sister, are you coming to the Ball, too?

SISTER (smiling). Oh hardly, Doctor.

HOCH. Why, is dancing forbidden?

SISTER. Oh no, Doctor. We are not a Religious Order. Nothing is forbidden.

HOCH (giving her a cheeky glance). Really? Nothing at all?

SISTER. Still, it would hardly be seemly. Besides, we haven't the head for such things in our profession.

HOCH. Why not, indeed? What should we doctors say then? Look at Dr. Adler, for example. There you have a pathological anatomist — and a very jolly gentleman. Come to that, I'm never in better humour than in the dissecting-room.

Enter from the right Dr. Oskar Bernhardi, aged 25, very elegant, of amiable but somewhat diffident behaviour.

OSKAR. Good morning.

HOCH & SISTER. Good morning, Doctor.

OSKAR. Father will be here directly.

HOCH. So they're finished downstairs, Doctor? What conclusions did they arrive at, if one may ask?

OSKAR. The tumour originated in the kidney and was very sharply defined.

HOCH. So it would really have been possible to operate?

OSKAR. Yes, possible.

HOCH. If Professor Ebenwald had been of the same opinion —

OSKAR. Then we should have had the post-mortem eight days earlier. (At table.) Ah, here is the printed matter for our Ball. Why do they send all this stuff here...?

HOCH. The Ball of the Elizabeth Institute promises to be one of the most fashionable events of the season this year. It's in the papers already. I understand, Doctor, that you have dedicated a waltz to the Committee.

OSKAR (deprecatingly). It's nothing — (Looking towards the ward.) What's the news in there?

HOCH. The sepsis case won't last long.'

OSKAR. Ah yes.... (Commiserating.) Nothing could be done there.

HOCH. I gave her a camphor injection.

OSKAR. The art of prolonging life — that we understand to a T.

Enter from the right Dr. Bernhardi: aged over 50, beard sprinkled with grey, straight hair, cut rather short, his bearing shows more of the man of the world than the student. With him enters Dr. Kurt Pflugfelder, his chief assistant, aged 27, moustache, pince-nez, lively and, at the same time, somewhat stern.

Greetings are exchanged.

BERNH (still at the door). But — Sister takes his overcoat, which he has hanging over his shoulder, and hangs it on a coat-peg.

KURT. I can't help it, Professor. Dr. Adler would have been better pleased if Dr. Ebenwald's diagnosis had turned out to be right.

BERNH (smiling). Really, Dr. Pflugfelder. You suspect disloyalty everywhere. Where will you end up with all these suspicions?

HOCH. Good morning, Professor.

BERNH. Good morning.

HOCH. I have just heard from Dr. Oskar that we have been proved in the right.

BERNH. Yes, my colleague. But, at the same time,
'we' were proved in the wrong. Or are you no longer studying under Dr. Ebenwald?

OSKAR. Doctor Hochroitzpointner attends in nearly every section.

BERNH. You must have a big stock of loyalty on hand! Hochroitzpointner purses his lips.

BERNH (laying his hand lightly on Hochroitzpointer's shoulders. Kindly). Well, what's the news?

HOCH. The sepsis case is going very badly.

BERNH. Is the poor girl still alive?

KURT. They might have kept her in the gynaecological section.

OSKAR. There happened to be no bed free the day before yesterday.

HOCH. And, what shall we give as the cause of death?

OSKAR. Blood-poisoning, of course.

HOCH. And the cause of the blood-poisoning? Because there was undoubtedly an illegal operation —

BERNH (who has meanwhile signed some papers which the Sister placed in front of him). We couldn't prove it. No injury could be definitely traced. The case has been notified, and that ends the matter, for us. And for the poor creature in there — it was ended from the first.
He gets up and moves towards the ward.

Enter Professor Ebenwald, a very tall slim man, aged about 40, overcoat hung round his shoulders, small beard, spectacles, speaks with a polished and somewhat exaggerated accent.

EBEN. Good morning. Have you seen — Oh, here you are, Chief.

BERNH. Good day, Doctor.

EBEN. Have you a minute to spare for me?

BERNH. Now, at once?

EBEN (coming closer to him). Yes, if possible. It is about the new appointment in the Tugendvetter section.

BERNH. Why such haste? If you would like to speak to me in half an hour's time in my office —

EBEN. Unfortunately I shall be lecturing then, Professor.

BERNH (after a few minutes' consideration). I shall soon be done in there. If you could wait here a little, Doctor.

EBEN. Certainly, certainly.

BERNH. (to Oskar) Have you given Dr. Hochroitzpointner the Department Journal?

OSKAR. Oh yes. (Takes it out of his pocket) Would you be so kind, doctor, as to enter it at once.

HOCH. Certainly.
Exit Bernhardi, Oskar, Kurt, Sister into the ward.
Ebenwald has gone to the window. Looks out.
Polishes his glasses.

HOCH (officiously). Won't you sit down, Professor?

EBEN. Don't let me disturb you, Hochroitzpointner. Well, how goes it?

HOCH (getting up). Thanks very much, Professor. As well as can be expected, a few weeks before the finals.

EBEN. Oh, you'll come to no harm — with your diligence.

HOCH. Yes, I feel pretty safe on the practical side. But the dull theory, Doctor!

EBEN. Is that the trouble? It was never my strong point, either. (Coming closer to him.) If it's any comfort to you, I even failed in physiology once. You see it's no particular hindrance to one's career. Hochroitzpointner, who has sat down, laughs with pleasure.

EBEN (looking over his shoulder). Department Journal?

HOCH. Yes, Professor.

EBEN. Great joy in Israel — eh?

HOCH (doubtfully). What do you mean, Professor?

EBEN. Well, because Bernhardi's Department triumphed.

HOCH. Oh, you mean, Professor, that the tumour was defined.

EBEN. And did actually originate in the kidney.

HOCH. But it was impossible to diagnose that with absolute certainty. It was, after all, if I may say so, mere guesswork.

EBEN. My dear man, guesswork!... How can you —? Intuition is the word! The diagnostic gift!

HOCH. Anyway, it would have been too late to operate.

EBEN. Out of the question. In the State Hospitals they can indulge in such experiments, but we, a comparatively young, so to say, private institute.... You know, my dear fellow, there are always cases where only the house-doctors are in favour of operating. Then, on the other hand, they always say that we are too ready with the knife — But go on writing.
Hochroitzpointner begins to write.

EBEN. Excuse my interrupting you again. Of course you attend at the Tugendvetter Section also?

HOCH. Yes, Professor.

EBEN. I should like to ask you something in confidence. How does Dr. Wenger lecture?

HOCH. Dr. Wenger?

EBEN. Well, yes, he often acts as substitute, doesn't he, when the old man has an urgent call to a hunting party, or to a prince with an infection?

HOCH. Yes, certainly, on those occasions, Dr. Wenger gives the lecture.

EBEN. Well, how does he get on?

HOCH (dubiously). On the whole, very well.

EBEN. Yes?

HOCH. Perhaps a little too — learned. But very much alive. Of course, I mustn't really take the liberty of discussing a future Chief —

EBEN. How so, future Chief? That's not so certain yet. There are others. And, anyway, this is only a private conversation. We might just as well be sitting opposite in the Riedhof and chatting. Speak up, man. What have you got against Dr. Wenger?
Vox populi, vox dei.

HOCH. Well, to tell the truth, I've no complaint against his lecturing, it's more his whole manner. You know, Professor, he is a bit ponderous in his manner.

EBEN. Aha! what you are driving at, my dear fellow, is probably identical with that which my cousin so aptly termed in Parliament recently 'The Jargon of the Soul'.

HOCH. That's good. Jargon of the Soul. (Taking courage.) But he has the other as well, Dr. Wenger.

EBEN. That makes no difference. We live, so to say, in an atmosphere of dialects.
Enter from the ward Bernhardi, Oskar, Kurt and Sister.

BERNH. Well, here I am, Professor.

Sister places some papers before him to be signed.

BERNH. What's this? Some more? Will you excuse me for another moment, Professor? — (While signing.) How astonishingly it always acts — (To Ebenwald.) You must know we have a bloodpoisoning case lying in there. Girl of eighteen. Quite conscious. Would like to get up and go for a walk. Thinks herself quite well. And the pulse already imperceptible. She may not last another hour.

EBEN (professionally). This condition is frequently met with —

HOCH (officiously). Shall I give her another camphor injection?

BERNH (looking at him quietly). You might have saved yourself the trouble of the previous one. (Consolingly.) All the same it is possible that you have given her the happiest hour of her life. Of course, I know that wasn't your intention.

HOCH (irritated). Why not, Chief? After all, one isn't a butcher?

BERNH. I don't remember ever having reproached you in that respect.

Glances exchanged between Hockroitzpointner and Ebenwald.

BERNH (to the Sister.) Has she any relations?

SISTER. No one has been here during the three days.

BERNH. Not her lover, either?

KURT. He'd take good care to keep away.

OSKAR. She hasn't even mentioned him. Possibly she is unaware of his name.

BERNH. And that's what they call love's ecstasy.
(To Ebenwald.) Well, I am at your service, Professor.

OSKAR. Excuse me, Father, will you come up here again? You know she begged you so earnestly to come.

BERNH. Yes, I'll look in presently.

Kurt has gone to the étagère and is busying himself with two test-tubes.
Oskar goes up to him. They talk a few minutes and then go into the ward together.

SISTER (to Hockroitzpointner). I'll go across now and fetch His Reverence.

HOCH. Yes, go. And if you're too late, it won't much matter, either.
Exit Sister.

EBEN (who has become very impatient). This is the point, Chief. I have had a letter from Professor Hill of Graz. He would be willing to stand as successor to Tugendvetter.

BERNH. Oh, he would be willing.

EBEN. Yes, Professor.

BERNH. Has anybody asked him?

EBEN. I took the liberty — as an old friend and fellow-student.

BERNH. Of course, you wrote in a private capacity?

EBEN. Naturally, Professor, since no official decision has been arrived at. All the same, I considered myself entitled to make the suggestion, especially as I know that Tugendvetter himself looks on Hill's candidature with favour.

BERNH (rather sharply). Professor Tugendvetter is to take up his new position at the State Hospital only at the beginning of the summer term. Our discussion of this affair — and, if I may be permitted the remark, your exchange of letters with Professor Hill — all seem somewhat premature. And there is all the less reason to be precipitate as Tugendvetter's assistant, Dr. Wenger, has several times shown his capacity to fill the position, at any rate temporarily, in a most capable manner.

EBEN. On principle, I must express my objection to provisional appointments.

Enter right, Tugendvetter, aged about 50, grey hair, side-whiskers, rather jovial in bearing, intentionally humorous, at the same time a little uncertain, looking for approbation; in appearance more like a banker than a scientist. Comes in with his hat on his head, which he only takes off after a little while.

TUGEND. Good morning. How do, Bernhardi! How do, Ebenwald! I have been looking for you upstairs, Bernhardi.

EBEN. Perhaps I am in the way —

TUGEND. Not at all. Not at all. No secrets.

BERNH. Well, what is it? You wish to speak to me?

TUGEND. It's like this. His Excellency the Minister of Education has asked me whether I would be in a position to take on the Clinic over the way, immediately.

BERNH. Immediately?

TUGEND. As quickly as possible.

BERNH. I thought it was arranged that Brunnleiter would carry on the Clinic until the beginning of the summer term.

TUGEND. Applied for leave. Poor devil! Six per cent sugar. Last days of Pompeii. Eh? (He has a habit of putting a thoughtless questioning 'Eh?' after his sentences, especially after quotations.)

BERNH. How do you know that? Is it authentic?

TUGEND. Authentic? Why, Flint himself told it me. You must know, I was at the Ministry yesterday. They are to build me a new pavilion. I shall get it, too. By the way, he wants to be remembered to you.

BERNH. Who wants to be remembered to me?

TUGEND. Flint. We talked a lot about you. He thinks very highly of you. He still remembers the time with pleasure when you were both assistants at Rappenweiler's. His own words. Ipsissima verba. What a career that is! The first time within memory, at any rate in Austria, that a Professor of a Clinic has become Minister of Education!

BERNH. He was always a good politician, your latest friend, Flint.

TUGEND. He takes a great interest in our — in your — no, for the present still in our Institute.

BERNH. That's no news to me. He did his best to ruin it once through excess of interest.

TUGEND. That wasn't he. That was the whole Collegiate. It was the battle of the old against the young. And, any way, all that is an old story. I assure you, Bernhardi, that he has feelings of the utmost sympathy towards the Institute.

BERNH. Which we can fortunately now dispense with, thank God.

TUGEND. 'Proud is the hidalgo'. Eh?

BERNH. Anyway, my only concern at present is with your attitude towards his inquiry.

TUGEND. I have no attitude (humorously). The decision remains with the Head. If you let me have your consent privately, then I will make my application to the Directorate. Or, do you want it in writing too, eh, Pedant?

BERNH. Of course we shall not keep you a day longer than you wish to stay. I promise you to arrange the matter with all possible speed. Fortunately, you have a very capable assistant, who can meanwhile carry on the Section, on your lines.

TUGEND. Oh yes, little Wenger. Smart boy. Yes. But you won't let him act as supply for any length of time?

EBEN. I have just ventured to remark that I consider provisional appointments in general an unsound proceeding, and I also took the liberty of informing the Professor of a letter from Professor Hill in Graz, who would be prepared —

TUGEND. Is that so? He's written to me as well.

BERNH. He seems to be a very active gentleman.

TUGEND (with a short glance at Ebenwald). Listen, Bernhardi, your Institution would make an excellent acquisition in Hill.

BERNH. Then he must have developed brilliantly in Graz. So long as he was in Vienna, he was considered a very incompetent customer.

TUGEND. By whom?

BERNH. By you, for example. And we all know to whom he owed his call to Graz. Certain influences from above were responsible.

EBEN. Well, it's no disgrace to him, that he cured a Prince.

BERNH. I don't blame him on that account. But a whole career should not be dependent on one such instance. As regards his contributions to science —

TUGEND. Excuse me, as regards that I am the most competent to speak. He has published some excellent treatises.

BERNH. Maybe. In any case, I must draw the conclusion from all this, that you yourself would rather propose Hill as your successor than your assistant and pupil, Wenger.

TUGEND. Wenger is too young. I am convinced that he himself does not think of it.

BERNH. That would be wrong of him. His last work on serums attracted universal attention.

EBEN. Caused a sensation, you mean, Chief. That is not the same thing.

TUGEND. He has talent. Undoubtedly he has talent. But as regards the reliability of his experiments —

EBEN (simply). There are people who call him — shall we say? — a faddist —

TUGEND. That is going too far. Anyway, I cannot hinder anyone from handing in his application. Neither Hill nor Wenger.

BERNH. But I must remind you that you will have to decide for one or the other.

TUGEND. It surely doesn't depend on me? I don't appoint my successor.

BERNH. But you will take your share in the voting. The fate of your recent Section and of our Institute will still interest you sufficiently for that, I presume.

TUGEND. I should say so. That's not bad! Why, we founded it, didn't we, the Elizabeth Institute (turning to Ebenwald), Bernhardi, Cyprian and I.

'Three horsemen through the gate came riding—'

Eh? How long ago is it now?

BERNH. It's fifteen years ago, my dear Tugendvetter.

TUGEND. Fifteen years. A nice time. By Jove, it will be a wrench for me. Listen, Bernhardi, wouldn't it be possible for me just at first, to begin over there and also put in attendances —?

BERNH. Out of the question. The day you take up your position over there, I shall, of course, promote your assistant provisionally.

EBEN. Then I must beg you to arrange for the discussion of a definite new appointment within the next few days.

BERNH. Why, if I may ask? That would almost seem as if we wanted to prevent Wenger from proving his worth during a few months' interim.

EBEN. I question whether the Elizabeth Institute was founded as a school for young lecturers.

BERNH. You can leave all the details safely in my hands, Professor Ebenwald. I think you will admit that so far nothing has been postponed unnecessarily in our Institute, and, on the other hand, nothing has been undertaken with careless precipitancy.

EBEN. Your suggestion that I am urging precipitancy, or even careless precipitancy, I beg to refute.

BERNH (smiling). I will make a note of it.

EBEN (looking at the clock). I must go to my section. Good day, gentlemen.

BERNH. And I must go to my office at last. (Makes way for Ebenwald to pass him.) If you please, Professor. Your students are waiting.

TUGEND. 'And in your band I'll make the third—' Eh? (Meets Dr. Adler in the doorway.) Good day.
Exit Ebenwald.

ADLER. Good morning.

BERNH. What brings you into the sphere of the living, Dr. Adler?

ADLER. I wanted to see something more about your case in the case-book, Chief.

BERNH. Everything is at your service.

ADLER. It's a pity, Chief, that you weren't down there just now. A case from the Cyprian Section. Just think, apart from the tabes which was diagnosed, there were beginnings of a tumour on the brain, of which no symptoms seem to have appeared in life.

BERNH. If you began to think of all the illnesses that lie in wait for people who, so to speak, don't live long enough to die of them, you might lose your faith in Providence.

OSKAR (entering from ward. To Tugendvetter). Good day, Professor.

TUGEND. How do, Oskar! Heard all about it — maker of music—' Quick Pulses' dedication waltz.

OSKAR. Oh but, Professor —

BERNH. What's this? You've composed something again, and I don't even know about it. (Pulls his ear playfully.) Well, are you coming with us?

OSKAR. Yes, I'm going to the laboratory.

TUGEND. Fathers and sons —, eh?
Exit Tugendvetter, Bernhardi and Oskar. Enter Hochroitzpointner from the ward.

HOCH. Good day, Professor.

ADLER. How do, Doctor. I should be obliged if you would let me have another peep into the history of that case.

HOCH. Certainly, Professor. (He takes the page out of a folder.)

ADLER. Thank you, my dear Hochroitz — what —?

HOCH. Hochroitzpointner.

ADLER (sitting at the table). What a name you have!

HOCH. Don't you like it?

ADLER (bending over case history). Why, it's splendid. Makes one think of mountain peaks, glacier tours. You come from the Tyrol, don't you, Doctor?

HOCH. Yes, from Imst.

ADLER. Ah, Imst. I made a wonderful mountain tour from there when I was a student. To the Wetterfernkögel.

HOCH. They built a hut up there last year.

ADLER. They're building huts everywhere now.
(Bending over the sheet again.) No albumen the whole time.

HOCH. Absolutely none. He was examined every day.

KURT (entering from the ward). Yes, in the last few days albumen appeared. In considerable quantities, too.

HOCH. Oh yes, in the last three days, that's true.

ADLER. I see, it's entered here.

HOCH. Of course it's entered.

ADLER (to Kurt). And how is your father? He never comes down to see us now. (Bending over The case history.) So he was only lying eight days in your Section.

HOCH. Yes. Before that he was in Professor Ebenwald's section. But as it was an inoperable case —

ADLER. As a diagnostician, he's really in the first rank, your Chief, say what one will.

KURT. What does one say?

ADLER. Eh?

KURT. Well, you used the expression 'say what one will'.

ADLER (rather sugary). Why do you pull me up so sharply, Doctor Pflugfelder? I simply meant that your chief strength lies in diagnosis, not in therapeutics. In that field you are too damned experimental, according to my humble opinion.

KURT. Well, Professor, what can we do where internal treatment is concerned? We must try new remedies if the old ones don't help.

ADLER. And to-morrow the new is the old again. You can't really help it. I also went through all that once. But it gets depressing sometimes to have to grope about in the dark so much. That was the reason I fled to pathological anatomy. There you are, master of the situation.

KURT. Excuse me, Professor, there's still ope over you.

ADLER. But he has no time to bother with us. He's too busy with his other faculty. (Bending over the case history.) X-Rays, too? Do you really think in such cases —

KURT. We feel bound to try everything, Professor. Especially where there's nothing more to be lost. This is in no way a fad or an advertising stunt, as is asserted in some quarters, and no blame should fall on the Professor for it.

ADLER. Why, who blames him? Certainly not I.

KURT. I know, Professor, not you. But there are people.

ADLER. Every man has his detractors.

KURT. And those who envy him.

ADLER. Naturally. Anyone who works and achieves. Many enemies — much honour. Bernhardi really can't complain. Practice in the highest circles and in certain others, where, fortunately, the emoluments are higher — Professor — Director of the Elizabeth Institute —

KURT. Well, who should it be if not he? He's had enough fights on behalf of the Institute.

ADLER. Certainly. Certainly. I should be the last to belittle his merits. And that he should have climbed so high in spite of present tendencies — I have a certain right to speak of it, as I myself have never made any secret of my Jewish origin, even though on my mother's side I come from an old burgher family of Vienna. I even had occasion in my student days to shed blood for the other side.

KURT. It is well known, Professor.

ADLER. It pleases me particularly, Doctor, to see that you give our Chief his full meed of appreciation.

KURT. Why does that please you particularly, Professor?

ADLER. You were a student under the German Nationalist colours.

KURT. And an anti-Semite. That's true, Professor. I'm still one. Only meanwhile in a general way I've also become an anti-Agrarian. I find that humanity makes a very poor show all-round, so I stick to the few exceptions, wherever I may find them.
Enter right Professor Cyprian; small elderly gentleman with long hair, still almost fair, rather sing-song, drawn out manner of speaking, drops unconsciously into lecturing manner, speaks as to an audience.

CYPRIAN. Good day, gentlemen. (Greetings exchanged.) Is Dr. Adler here, perhaps? Ah, here you are. I've been looking for you downstairs. Can I rely on it, Dr. Adler, that to-day's skull will not disappear again, as the one of the paralytic case did a little while ago?

ADLER. The commissionaire has been instructed, Professor —

CYPRIAN. The commissionaire is not to be found. No doubt in the public-house again. We shall still live to see the same thing occur that happened in Prague once, when I was working there under Henschel. We also had a drunkard as porter in a pathologicalanatomy institute. Every now and then the fellow swilled up all the spirit out of the specimen jars.

ADLER. So far, Professor, ours still prefers whisky.

CYPRIAN. Well, I should like to come down to-night. When will you be there?

ADLER. I generally work till midnight now.

CYPRIAN. Very well, then I'll come about ten o'clock.
Enter right Bernhardi and Oskar.

BERNH. Good morning. How are you, Cyprian. Are you looking for me, perhaps?

CYPRIAN. I really had something to talk to Adler about. But I am very pleased to meet you as well. I wanted to ask you when you could spare the time to come to the Ministry of Education with me?

BERNH. Why, what's the matter?
They are standing alone. Oskar has gone straight into the ward. The other doctors are standing talking apart.

CYPRIAN. Nothing special. But I think we ought to strike the iron while it's hot.

BERNH. I really don't understand you.

CYPRIAN. This is the favourable moment to obtain something for our Institute. When a doctor, a clinical Professor, is at the head of affairs, that is a constellation which we must utilize to the full.

BERNH. You are all extraordinarily optimistic with regard to Flint.

CYPRIAN. With good reason. I prophesied his career when we were both working together in the laboratory under Bruecke, nearly thirty years ago. I have already sketched out a memorandum. What we want first of all is a State Subvention, so that we should no longer be entirely dependent on the somewhat degrading method of soliciting private contributions. Further —

BERNH. You are forgetful in one particular. Flint is our most bitter opponent.

CYPRIAN. Oh, but that's all dead and done with. To-day his attitude towards the Elizabeth Institute is entirely sympathetic. Councillor Winkler mentioned it again to me yesterday. Quite of his own accord.

BERNH. Well —

OSKAR (Coming out of the ward. Quickly to Bernhardt). I think, father, if you want to speak to her again —

BERNH. Excuse me, my dear Cyprian. Perhaps you won't mind waiting for five minutes.

OSKAR (to Cyprian). A dying girl, Professor.

(Follows his father into the ward.)

KURT (explanatory). Septic case. Young girl. Abortus.

HOCH (to Adler), To-morrow, Professor.

CYPRIAN (declaiming in monotonous tones). When I was an assistant under Skoda, we had a Professor in the hospital, nomina sunt odiosa, who asked us — I mean us assistants — to call him, if possible, to every death-bed. According to his account, he was writing a psychology of last moments. I said at once to Bernitzer, who was co-assistant with me, that there was something queer about it. It wasn't the psychology that he cared about. Then, just fancy, one day, this Professor disappeared suddenly. He was a married man with three children. The next night a ragged fellow was found stabbed in a side street. Well, I expect you've guessed the point, gentlemen. It turned out that the Professor and the stabbed vagabond were one and the same person. For many years he had been leading a double life. In the day-time he was the busy physician; at night he was a frequenter of all sorts of low-down dens — a procurer —

Enter Priest, a young man, about 28, with clever energetic features. Sacristan remains standing at the door.

ADLER (officiously). Good day, your Reverence.

PRIEST. Good day, gentlemen. I hope I am not too late.

KURT. No, your Reverence. The Professor is just with the patient. (Introduces himself.) I am his assistant, Dr. Pflugfelder.

PRIEST. Then hope has not been altogether abandoned.

OSKAR (coming out of the sick-room). Good day, your Reverence.

KURT. Oh, yes, it has, it is quite a hopeless case.

OSKAR. Would your Reverence like to —

PRIEST. Perhaps I had better wait until the Professor has left the patient.

The Sacristan draws back, and the door shuts. Hochroitzpointner places a chair for the Priest.

PRIEST. Thank you. Thank you.
At first he will not sit down.

CYPRIAN. Unfortunately, your Reverence, we cannot limit our attendance to cases where we can still be of use. Sometimes we can only console.

KURT. And tell lies.

PRIEST (Sits down), That is a hard word, Doctor.

KURT. Your pardon, Reverence, this refers only to the medical profession. Anyway, that is sometimes the most difficult, and at the same time the noblest part of our work.
Bernhardi appears at door. Priest gets up. Sister enters behind Bernhardi.

BERNH (somewhat taken aback). Oh, your Reverence!

PRIEST. We relieve each other, Professor. (Holds out his hand.) I hope I shall find the patient still conscious.

BERNH. Yes. One might even say with heightened consciousness. (Speaking more to the others.) Absolute Euphoria has set in. (Explaining to the Priest.) She, so to speak, feels quite well.

PRIEST. That's pleasant hearing. Who knows — Quite recently I had the pleasure of meeting a young man hale and hearty in the street, who had received the last unction from me only a few weeks previously and had been quite prepared for death.

ADLER. Perhaps it was just your Reverence who gave him the strength and the courage to live.

BERNH (to Adler). His Reverence has misunderstood me, Doctor. (To the Priest.) What I meant was that the patient is quite unconscious of her condition. She is dying, but thinks herself cured.

PRIEST. Indeed?

BERNH. And it is almost to be feared that your appearance, your Reverence —

PRIEST. Have no fear for your patient, Professor. It is not my mission to pronounce a death sentence.

BERNH. Naturally, but all the same —

Sister, unnoticed by Bernhardi, goes into the ward in response to a hardly noticeable flicker of the eyelids on the Priest's part.

BERNH. That wouldn't mend matters. As I remarked before, your Reverence, the patient is absolutely unconscious of the nearness of the end. She expects anything rather than this visit. On the contrary, she is under the happy illusion that, within the next hour, some one dear to her will appear to fetch her away and take her back to life and happiness. I think, your Reverence, it would be no good, I might even say, no God-given deed, to waken her from this last dream.

PRIEST (after a slight hesitation, more firmly). Is there any possibility, Professor, of my appearance causing an unfavourable turn —?

BERNH (breaking in quickly). It is quite possible that it might hasten the end, perhaps only by minutes, but still —

PRIEST. Again: Can the patient still be saved? Does my appearance constitute a danger in this sense? If so, I should, of course, be prepared to withdraw.

Adler nods his approval.

BERNH. She is beyond all earthly hope, there can be no doubt about that.

PRIEST. Then, Professor, I can see no reason —

BERNH. Excuse me, your Reverence, so far I am still acting in my capacity of physician. And one of my duties when nothing else remains to me, is to ensure as far as possible a happy death for my patient.

Cyprian shows impatience and irritation.

PRIEST. A happy death.... It is possible, Professor, that this conveys different meanings to our minds. And from what your Sister has told me, it appears that this patient is in greater need of Absolution than many another.

BERNH (with an ironic smile). Are we not all sinners, your Reverence?

PRIEST. This is hardly the place to discuss that, Professor. Who knows but that, at the bottom of her soul, which God alone can see, just in these last moments, there is the longing to free herself from sin by a death-bed confession.

BERNH. Must I repeat it once more, your Reverence? The patient does not know that the end is near. She is gay, happy, and — unrepentant.

PRIEST. All the greater would be my sin if I moved from this threshold without having ministered to the dying woman the consolations of our holy religion.

BERNH. From this sin God and every human judge would declare you absolved. (In answer to the Priest's movement of impatience.) Yes, your Reverence. For
I, as physician, cannot permit you to approach the bed of this patient.

PRIEST. I was called here. I must therefore beg —

BERNH. Not by my orders, your Reverence. And I can only repeat that I, as doctor, to whom the weal of his patient is entrusted until the last hour, must forbid you to cross that threshold.

PRIEST (taking a step forward). You forbid me?

BERNH (touching his shoulder lightly). Yes, your Reverence.

SISTER (hurrying out of the ward). Your Reverence —

BERNH. You have been in there?

SISTER. You will be too late, your Reverence.
Kurt hurries into the ward.

BERNH (to the Sister), You told the patient that his Reverence was here?

SISTER. Yes, Professor.

BERNH. I see. And — answer me quite quietly — how did the patient take it? Did she say anything? Speak up. Well?

SISTER. She said —

BERNH. Well?

SISTER. Of course she got a little bit of a shock.

BERNH (not angrily). Well, speak up, what did she say?

SISTER. 'Must I really die?'

KURT (coming out of the ward). All is over –

Short pause.

BERNH. Don't let it upset you, your Reverence. It was not your fault. You only meant to do your duty as I wished to do mine. I'm sorry enough that I was unsuccessful.

PRIEST. It is not for you, Professor, to grant me absolution. The poor creature in there died a sinner without the consolations of her religion and for that you are responsible.

BERNH. I accept the responsibility.

PRIEST. It remains to be seen, Professor, whether that will lie in your hands. Good day, gentlemen.
Exit.

The others remain moved and in some embarrassment.

BERNH. To-morrow, then, dear Doctor Adler, the post-mortem.

CYPRIAN (to Bernhardi, inaudible to the others). It was not right.

BERNH. How so, not right?

CYPRIAN. And besides, it will remain an isolated instance. You can't alter the principle.

BERNH. Alter the principle? I had no such intention.

ADLER. I should consider it dishonest on my part, Professor, if I did not speak up at this moment, to inform you that, in this matter, I am unable to stand formally on your side.

BERNH. And it would be disloyal on my part, Doctor, if I did not assure you that I might have known that beforehand.

Exit Cyprian and Adler.
Oskar bites his lip.

BERNH. Well, my son, it won't hurt your career, I hope.

OSKAR. Oh, but Father —

BERNH (taking his arm affectionately). There. I didn't mean to offend you.

SISTER. Professor, I thought —

BERNH. Well, what did you think? But what's the use? It's all over now.

SISTER. You know, Professor, it's always — and (pointing to Hochroitzpointner) the Doctor —

HOCH. Well, of course, Chief, I didn't forbid her.

BERNH. Naturally, Doctor Hochroitzpointner. No doubt you attend the clerical section also?

HOCH. Professor, we live in a Christian State.

BERNH. Yes. (Gives him a long look.) The Lord forgive you — you know damned well what you do.
Exit with Kurt and Oskar.

HOCH. What an idea — to apologize! You only did your duty. Why, what's the matter with you?... Now you are starting to cry.... Don't get hysterical.

SISTER (sobbing.) But the Chief was so angry.

HOCH. Well, and what if he was angry — the Chief! He won't be that much longer! This will break his neck!

CURTAIN

ACT II

Professor Bernhardt's consulting-room. Right, main entrance. Left, door into adjoining room. A medicine chest left. Bookshelves take up the whole of the back wall, partly hung with green curtains. On the mantelpiece in the right-hand corner a Bust of Æsculapius, writing-table with chair. Close to writing-table, facing audience, a sofa. Chairs. On walls photographs of scientists.
Dr. Oskar Bernhardi sitting at writing-table, making notes in journal, then rings bell. Enter manservant.

OSKAR. Is there no one else waiting?

SERVANT. No, Doctor.

OSKAR. Then, I'll go out now. If father comes home — (Bell rings.) Oh, see who that is.
Exit Servant.

Oskar closes journal and puts writing-table in order.
Servant enters, bringing visiting-card.

OSKAR. Does he want to speak to me?

SERVANT. The gentleman asked first whether the Professor was at home. But —

OSKAR. He'll make do with me. Well, tell him to come in.

Exit Servant.
Enter Dr. Feuermann. Short young man. Blackbeard. Spectacles. Very excited. Hat in hand, overcoat, gloves. Oskar goes towards him.

FEUER. I don't know whether you still remember me —

OSKAR. Why, Feuermann! Of course I remember you quite well. (Shakes hands with him).

FEUER. All the same, it is eight years since —

OSKAR. Yes, indeed, how time flies. Well, won't you sit down. You wanted to see my father, didn't you?

FEUER. Well, yes —

OSKAR. I am his locum to-day. He has been summoned to Prince Konstantin at Baden.

FEUER. Your father has a fine practice.

OSKAR. Well, and how's the world treating you? I suppose you have not come here as a patient. Where is your practice?

FEUER. In Ober-Hollabrunn.

OSKAR. Oh yes, I remember. Well, what brings you here, then? Are you perhaps opening a Sanatorium or are you taking up a position somewhere in a Hydro, or are you making a health-resort of Ober-Hollabrunn?

FEUER. None of these things. It is a terrible story. Have you heard nothing yet?

Oskar shakes his head.

FEUER. I've already written to your father about my affair.

OSKAR. He gets so many letters.

FEUER. If you could put in a word for me —

OSKAR. What's it all about?

FEUER. You know me, Bernhardi. We studied together. You know I was never lacking in application or conscientiousness. A misfortune such as this may happen to anyone, who is forced to go into practice straight from the University. Not many are as fortunate as you, for instance.

OSKAR. Oh, there is a reverse side to every picture, even to being the son of a famous father.

FEUER. I beg your pardon, that is not what I meant. It is a great thing to be able to continue at the Clinics, to hear lectures, and imbibe wisdom at the bosom of the Alma Mater —

OSKAR (becoming impatient). Well, tell me what actually happened.

FEUER. There is a charge of culpable negligence against me. It is a so-called technical lapse. I do not want to say that no blame at all attaches to me. If I had been able to practise another year or two at the gynaecological Clinic here, perhaps the woman would not have slipped through my fingers. You must imagine the thing in such a little hole, no assistance, no proper antiseptics. You have no idea of it here in your big towns. No one takes count of how many lives I have saved. If you once have a mishap, you may as well put a bullet through your brain.

OSKAR. Oh, but, Feuermann, you mustn't anticipate the worst at once. You have not been convicted yet. The experts will have their say.

FEUER. Yes; the experts. Well, that is why I want to see your father — he knows me, too; perhaps he may even remember me. You know I once attended a course of his on diseases of the heart.

OSKAR. Oh, that —

FEUER. I expect he is very friendly with Professor Filitz, who runs the gynaecological section at the Elizabeth Institute, and Filitz has been suggested as the expert for the case. And so I wanted to ask your father if he would not put in a word for me with Professor Filitz. Oh, I don't ask for any backstairs influence, but —

OSKAR. Yes, but, my dear Feuermann, I don't know whether my father's intervention — He is not on such good terms with Filitz, just now, as you seem to think.

FEUER. But your father is the head of the Elizabeth Institute.

OSKAR. Yes, but the conditions here are not so simple. I should have to tell you many a tale. The circumstances here would, no doubt, be as incomprehensible to you in Ober-Hollabrunn as yours are to us. There are currents, under-currents, and cross-currents; so, whether my father's intervention might not have exactly the opposite effect —

FEUER. Perhaps he could break a lance for me in another way. Your father writes so brilliantly. His articles on professional matters always hit the nail on the head. It would be a question of looking at my case from a general point of view. To point out the causes of the trouble. The miserable circumstances of so many young doctors; the difficulties of country practices; the enmities; the rivalries, and so on — Oh, that would be a theme for your father, and I could supply him with a wealth of material for it.

Enter Servant with visiting card.

OSKAR. Oh, Fil — (He gets up), I must ask you, Feuermann — you must excuse me — (To Servant.) Show him in.
(Exit Servant.)

FEUER. Did you not say Filitz?

OSKAR. I —

FEUER. Yes, you said it.

OSKAR. But you would not, just now — I would even ask you — This door here —

FEUER. Oh no, you cannot ask that of me. This is the finger of God.

Enter Filitz. Fair, good looking, age 40.

FILITZ. Good morning.

FEUER. Would you be so kind as to introduce me to the Professor, my dear fellow?

OSKAR (with an embarrassed smile). I expect the Professor wants to speak —

FEUER (introduces himself). I am Doctor Feuermann. You see, Professor, I look on it as a dispensation from Heaven that just at this moment — I have the luck — I have a practice in Ober-Hollabrunn — Doctor Feuermann — a charge has been brought against me.

FILITZ. Feuermann.... Oh yes, I know (very amiably). You sped a patient across the border — a schoolmaster's wife —

FEUER (aghast). Oh, sir, you are wrongly informed. If you only knew the details — if you would have the kindness to enter into the case fully — it was a series of unfortunate accidents.

FILITZ. Yes, that is always the way. But such accidents would not occur if the young men were not forced out into practice minus all preparation. By the skin of their teeth they scrape through a few exams, and hope that God will do the rest, but sometimes He fails them — and with very good reason too!

FEUER. Oh but, Professor, if you will allow me. I passed all my exams with distinction, and I was obliged to go into practice, otherwise I should have starved. And that this poor woman bled to death — I venture to assert that the same thing might have happened to a Professor also.

FILITZ. There are all kinds of Professors.

FEUER. But if it had been a Professor he would not have been charged — it would have been the fathomless decree of the Almighty.

FILITZ. You think so? Oh, well (stands facing him and stares at him fixedly). I suppose you are one of these young men who consider it their duty to their scientific status to pose as atheists.

FEUER. Oh, Professor, I assure you —

FILITZ. Just as you please, Doctor. But I assure you science and faith are wholly in accord. I would even formulate the opinion that science without faith will always remain a rather uncertain quantity, because, to begin with, it has no moral foundation — the ethical standpoint is lacking.

FEUER. Certainly, Professor. I beg to withdraw my previous —

FILITZ. Examples are not wanting of the outcome of agnostic arrogance. And I hope it won't be your ambition, Dr. Firestone —

FEUER (deprecatingly.) Feuermann.

FILITZ. To provide the gaping public with a fresh example. Anyway, I have the particulars of your case at home. Perhaps you might like to come and see me at eight o'clock to-morrow morning, when we could go into the matter further.

FEUER (overcome by this new development). Oh, Professor, you would really allow me? I am immensely grateful to you. I will bring all the data — you must know my existence is at stake. I have a wife and two children. I should have to kill myself.

FILITZ. I should be obliged, Doctor, if you would leave such sentimental remarks out of the discussion. If you really have nothing to reproach yourself with, there is no need for such posing — at least so far as I'm concerned. Au revoir, Doctor!

OSKAR. You will excuse me from seeing you out, my dear Feuermann.

FEUER. Oh! Thank you, thank you.
Exit.

OSKAR. I must apologize to you in his name still, Professor, for his somewhat tactless remarks. You can understand that he was somewhat agitated.

FILITZ. A fellow-student of yours?

OSKAR. Yes, Professor. And I should like to remark now that he was a very industrious and conscientious student. I know that during the first few years he had to live on 30 or 40 kronen per month, which he earned by giving lessons.

FILITZ. That proves nothing, my dear fellow. My father was a millionaire, and I have become quite a capable man in spite of it. Oh well! Is your father out of town?

OSKAR. Only in Baden, Professor, with Prince Konstantin.

FILITZ. Ah!...

OSKAR. He really intended to be back in time for his evening consultation.

FILITZ (looking at the clock). I am sorry I cannot wait much longer. Perhaps you will be so kind as to tell your father, what may be of some interest to you also, that to-day my wife was not received by the Duchess Stixenstein.

OSKAR (not quite comprehending). Is that so? No doubt the Duchess was out.

FILITZ. My wife had a definite appointment for one o'clock, my dear sir, in her capacity as President of the Honorary Ball Committee to confer with the Duchess as Patroness and wife of the President of the Trustees' Committee. I think this incident speaks volumes. (According to his habit he fixes Oskar with a glance.)
Oskar looks rather embarrassed.
Enter Servant with card.

OSKAR. Excuse me, Professor. It is Professor Loewenstein.

FILITZ. Don't let me disturb you. Anyway, I must —

OSKAR (to Servant). Ask him in.

Filitz makes a show of getting ready to leave.
Enter Loewenstein. Man about 40. Medium height.
Rather bustling, small eyes which he sometimes opens very wide. Wears spectacles. He has a habit of standing facing the person to whom he is speaking with his left shoulder lowered and knees slightly bent. Sometimes runs his hand through his hair.

LOEWEN. Good afternoon. Oh, Professor Filitz, are you just going? Wait a moment. This will interest you. Here you are, Oskar, read this. (Gives him a letter.) Excuse me, Professor Filitz. He must read it first as member of the Ball Committee. Duchess Stixenstein has thrown up the patronage of the Ball.

OSKAR (glances through letter and hands it to Professor Filitz). Without stating any reasons.

LOEWEN. She found that unnecessary.

FILITZ. Especially as they are clear for all the world to see.

OSKAR. Do you mean to say — has this matter already become public? Within eight days?

LOEWEN. My dear Oskar, I never had a moment's doubt on that score. As soon as I heard of the scene I thought to myself: 'There's a tit-bit for certain folk. That will be boosted up.'

FILITZ. I beg your pardon, my dear Dr. Loewenstein, there's nothing boosted up in this. There was no need for any exaggeration. The plain facts of the case with all their stark details — But I prefer to express my opinions regarding this to my friend Bernhardi in person.

OSKAR. I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to remark, Professor, that in this matter I side with my father.

FILITZ. Naturally, naturally, that is your duty.

OSKAR. It is also my conviction, sir.

LOEWEN. And mine also, Professor. And here and now I should like to express my conviction that only bad feeling could attempt to make anything like a cause célèbre out of a perfectly innocent incident, and, to speak quite plainly, that no one would have made the attempt, if Bernhardi had not happened to be a Jew.

FILITZ. Ah, there you are back at your fixed idea. Perhaps you would like to say that I am an anti-Semite also? I, who always have at least one Jewish assistant. There is no anti-Semitism against decent Jews.

LOEWEN. Yes, yes, I was just saying —

FILITZ. If a Christian had behaved in the same way as Bernhardi, a case would also have been made out of it. You know that very well, my dear Loewenstein.

LOEWEN. Granted. Possibly. But then this Christian would have been backed up by thousands or hundreds of thousands, who now not only do not move a finger, but, on the contrary, will range themselves against Bernhardi.

FILITZ. Who are they?

LOEWEN. The German Nationalists and, of course, the Jews — a certain class, I mean, who miss no opportunity of sheltering themselves behind the governing powers.

FILITZ. If you will pardon me, my dear Loewenstein, this savours of persecution mania. And I should like to say quite clearly now, that it is just people like you, with their ridiculous smelling out of anti-Semitism, who are mainly responsible for the regrettable increase of the antagonism. And it would be a hundred times better —

Enter Bernhardt.

BERNH (evidently in a good humour, greeting them with his light, ironical laugh, and holding out his hand). Well, gentlemen, what's ado here? Are we burnt down? Or has some one left us a million?

OSKAR (handing him the letter). The Duchess has resigned from the patronage of our Ball.

BERNH (glancing through the letter). Well, then we must find another patroness. (Jokingly to Oskar.) Or are you perhaps resigning your Presidency also, my son?

OSKAR (offended). Father —

LOEWEN. My dear Bernhardi, your son has just formally declared that, in this matter, he is entirely on your side.

BERNH (stroking Oskar's hair). Oh, certainly. You don't take it amiss I hope, Oskar. And as for you, Loewenstein, I don't need to ask at all. But what is the matter with you, Filitz? To look at you one would think that we had really been burnt down.

OSKAR. I must go now. (Smiling.) We have a meeting of the Ball Committee at six o'clock. Good day, Professor. Good-day, Doctor. (Both hold out their hands to him.) Oh yes, father, Dr. Feuermann was here. He says he wrote to you.

BERNH. So he did.

FILITZ. Don't worry yourselves at all about this Firestone. If it is at all possible to pull him through, I will do so (with a triumphant look at Loewenstein) although he is a Jew.

OSKAR. I really think, Professor, that, in this case, you are not espousing an unworthy —

FILITZ. Certainly. Certainly. Good day, my dear colleague.
Exit Oskar.

BERNH. Was it perhaps on account of this Feuermann —

FILITZ. Oh no, I only met him here by accident. I came here to inform you that this morning my wife was not received by the Duchess Stixenstein.

BERNH. Well?

FILITZ. Not received. The Duchess has not only thrown up the patronage, she has refused to receive my wife.

BERNH. Really! And is that why you come to me?

FILITZ. Don't play the innocent, my dear Bernhardi. You know very well that all this, insignificant in itself, is very symptomatic of the impression made in influential quarters by an incident not entirely unknown to you.

BERNH (very cheerfully). I, for my part, can report quite different symptoms from perhaps even more important quarters. I have just come from Prince Konstantin, who has naturally also heard of the affair, and who seems to take quite a different standpoint from that of Her Highness Duchess Stixenstein.

FILITZ. I beg of you, Bernhardi, don't quote Prince Konstantin to me. Being democratic is a form of sport to him, much as pigeon-shooting is to others of his class.

BERNH. All the same —

FILITZ. And, as far as I am concerned, the opinion of Prince Konstantin in this matter is quite immaterial to me. For my part, I take the liberty of holding an entirely different view of your action, that is to say, of your behaviour, in the matter in question.

BERNH. I see. Did your wife send you here to reprimand me?

FILITZ. I am not in any way entitled, neither does it enter my head — To cut a long story short, I am here to ask you what you intend to do to compensate my wife for the affront to which she has been subjected.

BERNH (genuinely astonished). You don't seriously mean —
Enter Cyprian.

CYPRIAN. Good evening, gentlemen. Please excuse me for coming so — But I can imagine —
(Shakes hands all round)

BERNH. DO you perhaps also honour us because the Duchess Stixenstein has thrown up the patronage of the Ball?

CYPRIAN. The question of the Ball is a secondary matter.

FILITZ. I am sorry I have no time now. You must excuse me, Cyprian. But I must reiterate my question to you, Bernhardi, as to what satisfaction you intend to offer my wife for the insult from the Duchess Stixenstein?
Loewenstein looks at Cyprian.

BERNH (very quietly). Tell your esteemed wife, my dear Filitz, that I had far too good an opinion of her to have assumed for a moment that she would let the closed drawing-room of a blue-blooded goose cause her a single pang.

FILITZ. Your mode of answering, at any rate, closes the matter for me. Good day, gentlemen.
Exit Filitz in haste.

CYPRIAN. You shouldn't have said that, Bernhardi.

LOEWEN. Why shouldn't he?

CYPRIAN. Apart from the fact that certain people should not be irritated unnecessarily, he is in the wrong. The Duchess is anything but a goose. As a matter of fact, she is a very clever person.

BERNH. Clever? Babette Stixenstein?

LOEWEN. She is narrow-minded, petty and bigoted.

CYPRIAN. You must know it would be heresy for the Duchess to enter into the problems and speculations which engross you. We have to understand these people: that is our duty. They must not understand us at all. That is their duty. Besides, this is only the beginning. Of course the Prince will take steps also — that is to say, the Trustees will probably resign in a body.

LOEWEN. That would be monstrous.

BERNH (who has been striding up and down, stands in front of Cyprian). Excuse me, Cyprian. The Trustees' Committee consists of Prince Konstantin, Bishop Liebenberg, Duke Stixenstein, Bank Manager Veitsh and Councillor Winkler. And apart from the Duke, I guarantee —

CYPRIAN. Better not guarantee anything.

BERNH. I spoke to the Prince an hour ago.

CYPRIAN. I suppose he expressed his approval to you.

BERNH. He was kindness itself. And the fact that he sent for me just to-day speaks volumes in itself, for he is in perfect health, and it was obviously only to talk the matter over with me.

CYPRIAN. Did he start on the subject?

BERNH. Naturally.

LOEWEN. What did he say?

BERNH (smiling, rather flattered). That a hundred years ago, I should probably have been burnt at the stake.

CYPRIAN. And that you take as approval?

BERNH. You haven't heard yet what he added to it, 'I also, no doubt'.

LOEWEN. Ah!

CYPRIAN. Which does not hinder him from going regularly to Mass and voting against Divorce Reform in the House of Lords.

BERNH. There are official obligations.

CYPRIAN. Well, and didn't you inquire of the Prince at the same time how the other members of the Committee regard the matter?

BERNH. The Prince repeated a remark of the Bishop's to me without being asked.

LOEWEN. Well?

BERNH. 'I like that man.'

LOEWEN. You like the Bishop?

BERNH. No, he likes me.

CYPRIAN. Yes. That remark has been reported to me also, but the second part of it was not suppressed.

BERNH. The second part?

CYPRIAN. The complete speech of the Bishop's ran as follows: 'I rather like this Bernhardi, but he'll rue it.'

BERNH. And who told you this so exactly?

CYPRIAN. Councillor Winkler, from whose office I have just come, and who also hinted to me that the Trustees will resign.

BERNH. Oh, surely not. The Councillor himself is on the Trustees' Committee and he won't leave us in the lurch.

CYPRIAN. He would have no other choice. He can't remain as the only trustee if all the others resign.

BERNH. Why not? If he is the man I have always thought him —

LOEWEN. But, my dear fellow, a Councillor —

CYPRIAN. What use would it be if he alone took your part? Can you ask him for your sake —

BERNH. It is not a question of myself. You know that very well.

CYPRIAN. Very well, then. Not for your sake. You have said it yourself. It is a question of the Institute. Of our Institute. And if the Trustees go, it is all up with us.

BERNH. Oh, but surely —

LOEWEN. HOW do you make that out? Your Prince Konstantin and His Eminence have not distinguished themselves with their generosity.

CYPRIAN. But on the other hand, I can name you a dozen Jews who only contribute at all because a Prince and a Bishop are sitting on the Committee. And if we get no more money, we may as well shut up shop.

BERNH. And all this is to happen just because I did my duty as a doctor —

LOEWEN. It is monstrous, monstrous. Then let it go to pieces, our Institute. We shall found another one, a better one, without the Filitzes and the Ebenwalds and that clan. Oh, Bernhardi, I warned you against these people. But you are so trusting. Now perhaps you will be more wary.

CYPRIAN (who has vainly tried to silence him). Perhaps you will let me say a word. So far the Institute is still standing, and even the Committee are still with us. They have not resigned as yet. And perhaps a modus may still be found to prevent this painful occurrence —

BERNH. A modus?

CYPRIAN. Even the Councillor, who you will admit is a very clever, intelligent man, really well inclined towards you — is of the opinion —

BERNH. What opinion? Explain yourself, Cyprian —

CYPRIAN. That you would not commit yourself in the slightest degree — if, in some suitable manner —

LOEWEN (breaking in.) He is to apologize?

CYPRIAN. Who talks of apologizing? He is not to do penance in a hair shirt at the church door. He is not to forswear anything or declare allegiance to any dogma. It will be quite sufficient if you express your regret —

BERNH. I have nothing to regret.

LOEWEN. Quite the contrary.

CYPRIAN. Very well, then, not your regret. We won't quibble about words. But you can explain, without committing yourself in the slightest degree, that it was far from your intention to offend any religious feelings. After all, you really did not wish to do that.

BERNH. People know that quite well.

CYPRIAN. As if that were the point! You always talk as though you had to do with honest people only. Of course they know it quite well, and those who wish to twist the matter into a hangman's rope for you, know it the best of all. All the same, indications are not lacking that an attempt will be made to depict you as a wilful blasphemer and to charge you with having mocked at the Holy Sacrament.

BERNH. Surely not?

CYPRIAN. You may depend on it, and there will be nobody, absolutely nobody, to take your part.

BERNH. Nobody?

CYPRIAN. And you will have to carry the whole affair through, not only in face of the malicious howlings of your hereditary and newly acquired enemies, but also amidst the embarrassed silence and the discontented murmurs of the world at large and possibly even of your friends. And, of course, the reproof will not be lacking that just you should have avoided such an indiscretion, as in your case the fundamentals are missing which would make you capable of grasping the significance of the Catholic Sacrament.

BERNH. Yes, but tell me —

CYPRIAN. — All these things I have already heard said, my dear friend, by well-wishers, so-called intelligentsia. And from this you may form a conception of what you have to expect from the others.

LOEWEN. And on account of this rabble —

CYPRIAN. Don't always indulge in moral indignation. Yes, men are a rabble — but we have to reckon with that. And (to Bernh) as it is neither your intention nor your business to have dealings with this rabble, and as you cannot alter people or things one iota by your obstinacy, I advise you once more, most emphatically, to do your utmost to calm the threatening storm and, in the first instance, to make an explanation such as I suggest. The opportunity is ready to hand — to-morrow there is a meeting to discuss the new appointment in the Tugendvetter section.

BERNH. Ah yes, quite right, that would be a more important matter to talk about than all this damned —

CYPRIAN. — So I think. Nobody wants you to deny your convictions, Bernhardi. As I said before, a simple explanation will be sufficient.

BERNH. And you think that that ——

LOEWEN. Surely you won't do it, Bernhardi? If you do that, then I'll take it on myself. I'll shoulder the whole burden. As though I myself had —

CYPRIAN. Don't let this hot-head influence you, Bernhardi. Think it over carefully. Would you hesitate a moment to make such a small sacrifice of your vanity if it were a question of your son's career, for instance? And such an achievement as the Elizabeth Institute is, after all, nothing less than a child. And it is your achievement chiefly, though I stood side by side with you. Just think against what attacks you defended it. How you worked for it, fought for it.

BERNH (walking up and dozen). There's truth in that. They were years of struggle, especially at the beginning. It was no small matter — though I say it myself —

CYPRIAN. And now that we are so far out of the wood, is the Institute to be seriously imperilled, perhaps even ruined over such a bagatelle? No, Bernhardi, it must not be. You have better things to do than to wear out your strength in a fruitless and rather ridiculous struggle. First and foremost you are a physician. And one human life saved is worth more than a banner held on high.

LOEWEN. Sophistry.

CYPRIAN. We are at a turning-point. It only depends on you, Bernhardi, and our Institute may look forward to a brilliant future.
Bernhardi stands still in surprise.

CYPRIAN. You haven't heard the most important thing yet. I had an opportunity of speaking to Flint, too.

BERNH. About this matter?

CYPRIAN. No, not a word about that. I avoided it purposely, and so did he. I went to see him about a criminal-anthropological exhibition, which is to be held in the autumn. But of course we touched on the subject of the Elizabeth Institute, and I can assure you, Bernhardi, he has entirely altered his attitude towards us.

LOEWEN. Flint is an opportunist, a tub-thumper.

CYPRIAN. He has his faults, we all know that. But he is an administrative genius. He plans great reforms in all directions, especially in medical tuition and public hygiene. And for this — I am quoting his own words — he wants men, not puppets, men like you and me —

BERNH. Oh, he wants men, does he? Perhaps he believed it himself at the moment.

CYPRIAN. We know that he is easily inflamed. But the thing is to keep him warm. Then great things may be achieved through him. And he really has the highest regard for you, Bernhardi. He was really moved when he talked of his time as assistant at Rappenweiler's, together with you. He is genuinely sorry that you have drifted apart, and he hopes — these are his own words — that on the pinnacle of life you may meet again. What occasion would there be for him to say such things if he did not mean them?

BERNH. Oh, he means them — at the moment. I know him well. Had you been there another few minutes he would have persuaded himself that I have always been his best friend. And in just the same way, I remember that, ten years ago, he called the Elizabeth Institute a plague-spot in the midst of the town, and us — an undesirable clique of over-ambitious young theorists.

CYPRIAN. But now he is older and more mature. To-day he knows what the Elizabeth Institute stands for, and we can look on him as a friend. Take my word for it, Bernhardi.

BERNH (after a short pause.) Anyway we have to meet again to-day, on account of that appointment.

CYPRIAN. Yes, of course, I will telephone Tugendvetter also.

LOEWEN. He won't come.

BERNH. Very well. If it suits you we'll meet at half-past nine at the Riedhof, and then we can take the opportunity of discussing the shape which the so-called explanation —

LOEWEN. Bernhardi!

BERNH. You see, I have no burning desire to pose as a hero. That I am the man to carry my point through in serious matters I have proved many a time, so perhaps we shall find a form of —

CYPRIAN. I have no misgivings on that score You are sure to find the right thing to say, in your usual manner, slightly ironical if you like, but only slightly. Even your smile might be enough, which need not be reported to the Duchess.

LOEWEN. Are you men?

CYPRIAN. Silence, Loewenstein; you are only the onlooker to whom no stake is too high.

LOEWEN. I am not an onlooker. I take my part in the game.

CYPRIAN. Good-bye, Bernhardi. Nine-thirty then. And you'll bring a rough draft.

BERNH. Yes, one that will not offend even your religious feelings, Loewenstein.

LOEWEN. Well, I like that!

Bernhardt shakes hands with both and they go out.
Bernhardt, alone, walks up and down a few times, then looks at the clock, shakes his head, takes out his notebook, puts it away again, with a gesture as much as to say 'That can wait Then he sits down at the writing-table, takes a sheet of paper out of a folder, begins to write, at first with a serious face, but soon smiles ironically and continues to write. Enter Servant.

Servant hands card.

BERNH (taken aback, hesitates — then). Ask him in.
Enter Ebenwald.

EBEN. Good evening.

BERNH (goes towards him. Shakes hands). Good evening, Colleague. To what do I owe this pleasure?

EBEN. If you have no objection, Chief, I should like, without any preamble —

BERNH. Certainly — take a seat.
Takes chair near writing-table. Bernhardi sits on revolving chair.

EBEN. I consider it my duty, Professor, to tell you that something is brewing against you, that is to say, against our Institute.

BERNH. Is that so? Well, I can reassure you there. The matter will be smoothed over.

EBEN. Which matter, if I may ask?

BERNH. I presume you are speaking of the impending resignation of the Trustees.

EBEN. The Trustees intend to resign? Well, that's pretty stiff; but this is the first I hear of it. Mine is a different affair. I have authentic information that a question will shortly be asked in Parliament about a matter not entirely unknown to you.

BERNH. Oh, then I think we may take it for granted that this step also will not be taken.

EBEN. Forgive me. Of course I am in the dark as to your plan for giving the unwelcome though not incomprehensible attitude of certain personages towards this lamentable incident, a favourable turn for us all. But I am afraid my optimism cannot rise to the hope that the danger of a question in Parliament can be averted from your — that is to say from our — heads in such an airy fashion.

BERNH. We must just wait and see.

EBEN. That's easily said. But you must know, Professor, that this concerns not only you, but our Institute.

BERNH. I know that quite well.

EBEN. And so, it would certainly be advisable to think out some means by which this interpellation might be averted.

BERNH. I am afraid that is not so simple. For the question will surely be asked out of conviction, in the name of the religion against which I am supposed to have offended. And what in the world could induce men of principle to swerve from a path which they conceive to be right and necessary?

EBEN. What could induce them to desist? Only one thing. If they could be made to see that no harm was meant, that you have no intention to take up — shall we say an anti-Catholic — position — at all costs —

BERNH. Do these people really need to be told that?

EBEN. No, not told; talking is easy. They must have proof.

BERNH. This becomes interesting. And what form is such a proof to take?

EBEN. We should need a concrete case which should give the indubitable lie to an anti-clerical tendency.

BERNH (impatiently). Such a case would have to be expressly manufactured.

EBEN. Not at all. We have it at hand.

BERNH. How so?

EBEN. To-morrow, Professor, the appointment for the Tugendvetter Section is to be decided.

BERNH. Ah!...

EBEN (coolly). Yes. Two candidates are opposing each other.

BERNH (very firmly). One of whom is suited for the post and another who is not. I know of no other difference which could affect the question.

EBEN. It is quite possible that both might be suited for it, and I really do not know, Professor, whether you have made a sufficient study of dermatology to be in a position to —

BERNH. I have, of course, studied the theses of both candidates very carefully during the last few weeks. It is simply ridiculous, my dear man — and you know it as well as I do — to mention these two people in the same breath. Your Dr. Hill has written a few treatises, in very poor style moreover; while Wenger's writings, on the other hand, open up new lines of thought.

EBEN. But then again, many think that Hill's treatises are excellent and of great use to the practitioner, while Wenger's works, though undoubtedly clever, are thought by experts to be not too reliable. And as regards his personality, his overbearing and not too amiable manner wins him little sympathy, even from his friends. And in my opinion a doctor, especially the head of a department —

BERNH (very impatient). I can see no point in this discussion. The decisions rest with the majority, not with me.

EBEN. But you have the casting vote in the case of a tie. And an equal vote is fairly certain —

BERNH. How SO?

EBEN. In Wenger's favour — Cyprian, Loewenstein, Adler and of course Pflugfelder, the stiff-necked old Liberal —

BERNH. And Tugendvetter —

EBEN. That you don't believe yourself, Professor.

BERNH. Has he promised you his vote?

EBEN. There is no need for that. You know as well as I do, Professor, that he does not favour Wenger. And if his own teacher denies him his vote, I think, Professor, that might make even you a little doubtful —

BERNH (striding up and down in his usual manner). You know perfectly well, Professor Ebenwald, why Tugendvetter is against his own pupil. Simply because he is afraid that he might cut against him in his practice. And you also know, as we all do, that Tugendvetter's latest treatises come from Wenger's pen.

EBEN. Would you not rather tell Tugendvetter this to his face, Professor?

BERNH. You may leave that to me. It has always been my custom to tell people straight to their face what I think of them, and to you, Professor Ebenwald, I say that you only stand up for Hill because he is — not a Jew.

EBEN (very quietly). I should have just as much right, Professor, to retort that your championship of Wenger —

BERNH. You forget that three years ago I voted for you, Professor Ebenwald.

EBEN. But it went against the grain, didn't it? That's how it would be in my case with regard to Wenger. That's why I refuse to do it. One always rues such actions. And even if I held a higher opinion of Wenger than I do, I can assure you, Professor, that, in a Community, individual talent is not always the only consideration —

BERNH. No, it must be combined with character.

EBEN. I intended to say 'atmosphere'. And here we are back at our starting-point. It's really terrible that all personal questions in this country always end in the political arena. But we must resign ourselves to that. Look here, Professor, if Hill were an idiot I should, of course, not vote for him, nor expect it of you. But, after all, he cures the sick, quite as well as Wenger. And when you consider, Professor, that a stand made by you might avert all the unpleasant consequences, which the other affair — Of course, I can't guarantee anything. It's just an idea of mine.

BERNH. Ah!

EBEN. Naturally. And it would certainly be worth your while, Professor, to meditate on it sine ira et studio. We'll talk it over again to-morrow before the meeting.

BERNH. Quite superfluous.

EBEN. As you please, sir. But if I may be permitted an observation, you should not let false pride — Of course all this is strictly between ourselves.

BERNH. I have no occasion to beg for your discretion, Professor Ebenwald. Tell the gentlemen who sent you to me —

EBEN. Oh!

BERNH. — that that sort of bargain is not in my line and —

EBEN. Excuse me, no one sent me to you, and therefore I am not in a position to carry any messages. My visit to you, sir, was entirely unofficial. Let that be clear. I come neither as an emissary nor in my own interest, since anyway I have no intention of sharing any responsibility for your attitude towards his Reverence, but simply in the interests of our Institute, and in your interests, Professor. You have rejected my proffered friendship —

BERNH. And you depart as my enemy. So much the better. It is the more honest rôle.

EBEN. As you please, sir; I bid you good day.

BERNH. Good evening.
Accompanies him to the door. Exit Ebenwald.

Bernhardi, left alone, walks up and down once or twice, takes up the sheet of paper on which he had started to write, looks through it, then tears it across. Looks at the clock, and prepares to go out. Enter Servant.

BERNH. What is it now?
Servant hands him a card.

BERNH. What! In person? Is his Excellency here himself?

SERVANT. Yes, Professor.

BERNH. Ask him in.
Exit Servant.
Enter Flint immediately.
Flint, tall, slim, over fifty, with short clipped hair, small mutton-chop whiskers, his face deliberately non-expressive, very amiable, sometimes even cordial.

BERNH (standing at the door). Your Excellency?

FLINT (extending his hand.). It is a long time since we last saw each other, Bernhardi.

BERNH. Why, we met quite recently — at the Medical Conference.

FLINT. I mean privately like this.

BERNH. Yes, that's true. Won't you sit down?

FLINT. Thanks, thanks. (He seats himself, and then Bernhardi sits down.)

FLINT (with intentional lightness). You are surprised to see me here?

BERNH. It is an — unexpected pleasure, and I must not miss this opportunity of congratulating you upon your new honours.

FLINT. Honours. You know quite well that I do not regard my new position in that light. All the same I accept your congratulations with quite especial pleasure, although you may imagine that I did not come here for the express purpose of receiving your good wishes in person.

BERNH. I am sure of that.

FLINT. Well, my dear Bernhardi, I need hardly tell you that I have no intention of looking upon my portfolio as a cushion for my head. I am resolved to make the most of my possibly limited term of office in order to push through all the reforms which, as you may remember, I have had at heart since my youth. Reforms in the sphere of medical education, social hygiene, general popular culture and so on. For these ends the worthy but somewhat bureaucratic gentlemen whom the State places at my disposal will not serve. For this I require a staff, a voluntary staff naturally, of independent and unprejudiced men. Of capable officials there is of course no lack, and especially in the Ministry of Education, but for the carrying out of my plans I require men. And I have come to ask you, Bernhardi, whether I may depend on you.

BERNH (after a little hesitation). Perhaps you will be so good as to explain more precisely.

FLINT. More precisely? — h'm — well, of course I was prepared to find you stiff-necked.

BERNH. Oh no, not at all. I only want you to be more explicit. Otherwise it would be impossible for me; I should have to know in which sphere you require my co-operation (with his usual ironical smile). In that of medical education, social hygiene or popular culture — have I left out anything?

FLINT. Still unchanged. But just for this reason I am encouraged to set especial hopes on you. There may still be matters to clear up between us, although I hardly know —

BERNH (gravely). I will tell you, Flint. The friendship of youth — and what came of it.

FLINT (cordially). Well, what came of it, Bernhardi? We drifted apart with the years. That was force of circumstances, perhaps it was even due to the development of our respective characters.

BERNH. That's just what I think.

FLINT. You are surely not resentful, Bernhardi?

BERNH. I happen to have a very good memory.

FLINT. That may be a grave error, Bernhardi, if it clouds one's view of the present. I really thought that the battle-axe between us had been deeply buried and the years of combat forgotten —

BERNH. Combat? That is a noble word for a somewhat ignoble deed.

FLINT. Bernhardi!

BERNH. No, my friend, it was not right. And it would seem to me a betrayal of my own past, could I overlook it so easily. Oh, with what weapons you fought us, you and the other medicos! With what means you attempted to sap our young undertaking. What tales you invented in order to lower us in people's estimation, how you accused us and persecuted us! You asserted that we had founded our Institute in order to deprive the doctors of their fees, that we were a plague-spot in the town, that we wished to found a second medical faculty —

FLINT (interrupting him). My dear Bernhardi, all these reproaches would, to a certain extent, apply to-day still, if it were not that the good work you have done in scientific and humanitarian fields has long outweighed the more negative side of your undertaking. We appreciated this, I the most of all, my dear Bernhardi, and for this reason, and this reason only, we have changed in our attitude towards you. And you must believe me when I say that to-day the Elizabeth Institute has no warmer friend than I. You know they were never personal motives that determined my attitude towards you, but my conviction only —

BERNH. Yes, that is a self-deception which one always practises in the growing bitterness of strife. Conviction!

FLINT. Excuse me, Bernhardi. We all have our faults. You, no doubt, as much as I. But if I can pride myself on anything at all, it is that I have never, even in the slightest degree, spoken or acted against my conviction.

BERNH. Are you quite sure of that?

FLINT. Bernhardi!

BERNH. Think seriously a moment.

FLINT (rather uncertainly). I may have erred during my life, as we all do, but against my conviction — never!

BERNH. Well, I know of a case where you quite palpably acted against your conviction.

FLINT. Now, really —

BERNH. And your action even resulted in the death of a man.

FLINT. Well, that is a bit strong. I must really insist now —

BERNH. Yes, yes. (He goes up and down the room several times, then stands still suddenly, speaking very animatedly.) We were assistants at that time at Rappenweiler's. A young man was lying ill at the Clinic, I can see him now. I even remember his name, — Engelbert Wagner, a Government clerk — about whom our Chief — and come to that all of us — had made a wrong diagnosis. When it came to the post-mortem, it was found that the patient might have been saved by a different (antiluetic) treatment. And as we stood there and the case became clear, you whispered to me, 'I knew it all the time'. Do you remember? You knew what the illness was, you had made the right diagnosis —

FLINT. I was the only one.

BERNH. Yes, you were the only one. But you took great care to let nothing transpire in the patient's lifetime. And why you refrained from speaking, is a question you can best answer yourself. I can hardly think it was from conviction.

FLINT. Great Scott, what a memory you have! I recall the case, and it is true that I held my peace about a treatment which I considered might be of service and ought to be tried. And I will confess to you quite openly that I only kept silent so as not to offend Rappenweiler's susceptibilities, because, as you know, he could not bear to see his assistants cleverer than himself. And so your reproach that I sacrificed a human life is perhaps justified. Only in the motives, in the underlying motives which you ascribe to me, you are in error. This sacrifice had to be made, Bernhardi, for the sake of the hundreds of other human lives which were later to be entrusted to my skill. At that time I could not do entirely without Rappenweiler's support, and the professorship in Prague lay on the near horizon.

BERNH. You think Rappenweiler would have let you down if you —

FLINT. It is very probable. You have too high an opinion of humanity, Bernhardi. You have no idea how petty people are. Certainly it would not have cost me my career, but all the same it might have meant a set-back. And I was very anxious to advance, so as to give scope to my talents, which even you, Bernhardi, will not deny me. Therefore, my dear Bernhardi, I let the clerk Engelbert Wagner die, and I even feel incapable of remorse. For it is no great thing, Bernhardi, to act correctly, true to conviction if you like, in one single unimportant case; it is a question of being true to the guiding principle of one's whole life. It is indeed interesting that you should have raised poor Engelbert Wagner from out his grave, for now I see in a flash the deep underlying difference between us and — perhaps this will astonish you, Bernhardi — our capacity for complementing each other. Perhaps you, Bernhardi, more than I, are what is usually called a decent man. In any case, you are more sentimental; but whether a great cause could be better served by you than by me, seems very questionable. What you lack, Bernhardi, is an eye for the essential, without which all conviction is only pigheadedness. For it is not a question of being right in one single instance, but of one's influence upon a complete whole. And to give up the possibility of such activity for the somewhat meagre satisfaction of being in the right in one unimportant case, seems to me to be not only petty, but in the highest sense, immoral. Yes, indeed, my dear Bernhardi, immoral —

BERNH (considering). If I am not mistaken, you have now some quite definite instance in your mind.

FLINT. Yes. It came to me while I was speaking.

BERNH. Possibly we have quite inadvertently approached nearer to the actual purpose of your visit?

FLINT. Not the actual purpose, but all the same, one nearly allied.

BERNH. And for this purpose you endeavour —

FLINT. For this also. For I foresee with some certainty that the matter of which we are both now thinking will have very far-reaching effects. Of course, you did not foresee all this. According to your amiable, but sometimes unfortunate, qualities, you omitted, in the no doubt noble emotion of the moment, to look any further; and so you forgot one small matter in your behaviour towards the priest, namely, that we live in a Christian State. I can't see what there is to smile at.

BERNH. You will wonder again at my good memory. I remember an article that you wanted to write when in your student days. It was to have the title: 'Houses of Prayer — Houses of Healing'.

FLINT. H'm!

BERNH. You wanted to preach the necessity for building more hospitals instead of so many churches.

FLINT. Ah, one of the many articles that I wanted to write and never did.

BERNH. And never will.

FLINT. Not that one, at any rate. To-day, I know very well that they can exist side by side, the houses of prayer and the houses of healing, and that many an ill can be cured in the churches against which we in the hospitals, my dear Bernhardi, are at present powerless. But we don't want to lose ourselves in political discussion, do we?

BERNH. All the less as I can hardly hold my own with you in that field.

FLINT. That may be. Well then, let us confine ourselves to the case in point.

BERNH. Yes, let us do so. I am really curious to know what proposal his Excellency the Minister of Education and Religion wishes to make to me.

FLINT. Proposal? I have nothing definite. But I cannot conceal from you that the feeling against you on every side, wherever one keeps one's ears open, even in quarters where you would hardly suspect it, is very antagonistic, and for your sake and for that of your Institute, it must be regarded as very desirable that the whole affair might, as far as possible, be swept out of the way.

BERNH. No one desires it more than I do.

FLINT. Really?

BERNH. I can find a great many more important things to do than to occupy my time further with this matter.

FLINT. Are you in earnest?

BERNH. Can you doubt it? I can even tell you that, less than an hour ago, I consulted with Cyprian and Loewenstein about the desirability of making an explanation which should satisfy those gentry who are alleged to have been offended.

FLINT. Why, that would be — that would be splendid. But I fear that, under present conditions, that will hardly meet the case.

BERNH. How so? What else could I do?

FLINT. If you could — as, to my knowledge, no official complaint had yet been lodged, you would not commit yourself in the least, if through a personal visit to his Reverence —

BERNH. What's that?

FLINT. It would make an excellent impression. As you committed the, shall we say, indiscretion, of obstructing his Reverence with violence.

BERNH. With violence?

FLINT. Of course that is too strong a word. All the same, you pushed him away from the door, — at least so I have been told —

BERNH. What have you been told?

FLINT. — rather roughly.

BERNH. That's a lie. Surely you believe me —

FLINT. Then you did not push him away?

BERNH. I hardly touched him. Anyone who speaks of violence knows that he is telling a lie. Oh, I know who these people are. But they shall not — now I myself will —

FLINT. Calm yourself, Bernhardi. There is no official motion against you. As you have already decided to give an explanation, it would be quite simple to mention expressly, at the same time, that all these rumours —

BERNH. Excuse me, my dear Flint, you are under a misapprehension. I certainly had the idea of making an explanation at to-morrow's meeting, but since then circumstances have arisen which make such a step absolutely impossible.

FLINT. What does this mean? What circumstances?

BERNH. Compelling ones, you may believe me.

FLINT. And you cannot tell me anything more explicit? It would be of the greatest interest to me.

BERNH (smiling again.) Tell me, my dear Flint, have you really come here only to help me out of a difficulty?

FLINT. If it were immaterial to me how the matter might end for you — and for your Institute, I should certainly not need to trouble myself any further. To say the least of it, your actions have been so misguided, that I should have no uneasy conscience whatever about letting you settle your own hash, if it were not that I am sorry for you and for your Institute.

BERNH. So, to cut a long story short, you are anxious for my sake that I should save you the unpleasantness of an interpellation in Parliament.

FLINT. That is so. There would not be much credit in it. You certainly did not conduct yourself in a proper manner towards the Priest. And, as an honest man, I should have to admit that; even though, on the other hand, the purity of your motives, and your services to science —

BERNH. My dear Flint, I am afraid you do not realize how you are over-estimating your own authority.

FLINT. H'm!

BERNH. You obviously imagine that it lies within your powers to prevent such an interpellation.

FLINT. It lies with you. I can assure you of that.

BERN. Yes, with me! You are not aware with what truth you speak. With me alone! Half an hour ago I had it in my power to avert the danger of this interpellation from your head and mine —

FLINT. You had it —

BERNH. Yes. In the simplest way in the world. You know that a new appointment is to be made in our Tugendvetter Section. To-morrow we have a meeting. Had I pledged myself to give my casting vote in favour of Hill instead of Wenger, in the event of a tie, everything would have been in order.

FLINT. Pledged? How so? To whom?

BERNH. Ebenwald has just been here. He brought me this proposition.

FLINT. H'm! Do you really believe —?

BERNH. Anyway I got the impression that Ebenwald had full authority to drive this bargain, even though he denied it. Or perhaps it was only a trap for me, and the question would still have been asked, even if I had given my vote for Hill.

FLINT (walking up and down). Our colleague is very friendly with his cousin, Ebenwald the M.P. The latter is the leader of the Clerical Party, and if he wished it, no doubt the question would be withheld. I really believe that Ebenwald was acting squarely in this case. How did you meet his proposition?

BERNH. Flint!

FLINT. Ah well, of course you consider Wenger the more capable dermatologist.

BERNH. We both do. You know as well as I that Hill is a nonentity. And even were they equally qualified, Ebenwald's action would have made it impossible for me to vote for anyone but Wenger.

FLINT. Yes, Ebenwald has certainly not been very adroit in the matter.

BERNH. Not adroit —? And is that all you have to say? That is rather a mild expression, my dear Flint.

FLINT. My dear Bernhardi, in politics —

BERNH. What concern of mine are politics?

FLINT. They concern us all.

BERNH. And because such infamies are daily occurrences in your so-called politics, you think that I must accept this latest one with a smile, and give even a moment's consideration to this degrading bargain.

FLINT. It may not depend on you at all. There may not be an equal vote; Hill or Wenger may be elected independently of you.

BERNH. Oh, my dear Flint, things won't turn out so conveniently for you.

FLINT. For me? I think —

BERNH (with heat), Flint, even if you are a Cabinet Minister to-day, you are still above all a physician, a man of science, a man of honour. What were your own words: To keep faith with the Essential is what counts in life. Well, what is the essential here? Don't you see it yourself? That the best man should be appointed to our section, the one to whom it will open out the possibility of rendering true service to humanity and science. That is something to strive for! That is the essential. Not that you or I may be spared the inconvenience of an interpellation, to which, come to the worst, an answer might be found.

FLINT. H'm! Certainly I should not be at a loss for an answer.

BERNH. That is just what I think.

FLINT. Tell me, Bernhardi, would you be able to make a written explanation — I mean, could you write me a letter, setting out the whole matter briefly and concisely, so that, if necessary —

BERNH. If necessary?

FLINT. In any case, I should like to have it in black and white. There may be no need to read the letter. At first I might make guarded replies — if the question is asked, I mean. But if they would not let the matter rest then, then I would produce your letter.

(Makes a gesture as though drawing a letter from, his breast pocket.)

BERNH. No doubt your Parliamentary experience will guide you.

FLINT. Experience? So far, more in the nature of intuition. But I really think it would not come to that. I mean the reading of your letter. From my opening words, from the tones of my voice, they would recognize at once that I am keeping something in reserve. They would all see it. For I hold them in the hollow of my hand, Bernhardi. As soon as I begin to speak, I hold them all. Just as I held my audience at the clinics, so do I hold the members of Parliament. Recently, there was a little debate on the new school regulations. I only made a few casual remarks, but you can have no conception of the breathless silence in the House, Bernhardi. To tell the honest truth, I said nothing of any importance. But I had their ear at once. And that is the point. They listen to me. And when you have given a speaker your full attention, you can't believe him to be entirely in the wrong.

BERNH. Certainly, certainly.

FLINT. And, even though you may look on it as vanity, I am almost beginning to wish that the rascals may ask their question.

BERNH. Flint!

FLINT. For on this occasion one might digress into generalities. I see in this incident a symbol of our whole political situation.

BERNH. It is that, undoubtedly.

FLINT. I always have this experience — even with seemingly quite insignificant occurrences. Each becomes a symbol to me. No doubt it is that which destines me for a political career.

BERNH. I am sure of it.

FLINT. — So, I think, this would be an opportunity for generalizing.

BERNH. — Aha! — Houses of Prayer, Houses of Healing.

FLINT. You smile. I am sorry mine is not a nature to treat such matters lightly.

BERNH. Well, my dear Flint, from all you have just been saying, one might almost get the impression that you wish to side with me in the matter.

FLINT. That is pretty obvious. I will make a confession. At first I was not so entirely — I still find your action towards the Priest blameworthy — but this Ebenwald business throws the whole matter into a different perspective. The most important thing now is that all this should be kept strictly private between us two. I mean that even your friends should hear nothing of this Ebenwald affair. For, if these people get wind of my intentions, they might even reconsider the matter and withdraw the interpellation. Of course you will keep a copy of this letter, but the contents remain a secret until I lay it on the table of the House. (Makes a gesture without exaggeration.)

BERNH. I am overjoyed that you are so — but — there is one other thing that you must consider. The party you are opposing is very strong, very ruthless; and it remains to be seen whether you can exist without its support.

FLINT. It must be put to the test.

BERNH. All the same, if you value your position more —

FLINT. Than you —?

BERNH. Than the truth — that is the only thing that counts — then it would be best to leave the matter alone, not to enter the arena for me —

FLINT. For you? I am not doing so. For truth, for justice rather.

BERNH. And are you quite sure, Flint, that this insignificant affair is worthy of your intervention?

FLINT. This insignificant affair? Bernhardi — don't you realize even now that higher issues are at stake than appear at the first glance? That, to a certain measure, this is the eternal strife 'twixt light and dark — But that sounds like conventional phrasing.

BERNH. A strife, my dear Flint, whose issue, under present conditions, is a somewhat doubtful one, and in which your whole ministerial magnificence —

FLINT. Let that be my affair. Come what may. I can imagine no more glorious death than for Right and Justice and in the service of one who — I confess it — until an hour ago, was my enemy.

BERNH. I was not your enemy. And in any case, I will gladly apologize if I have done you an injustice. But one thing I can tell you, Flint, even in case the matter does not end well for you, my conscience will not prick me in the least. For you know where right lies in this matter, and I decline in advance to offer you my admiration, should you do your duty.

FLINT. I don't wish it, Bernhardi. (Holds out his hand). Good-bye. (Not too seriously.) I have sought a man, I have found a man. Au revoir!

BERNH. Au revoir, Flint. (Hesitatingly.) I thank you.

FLINT. Oh! You must never do that. Our friendship must rest on a firmer foundation.
Exit.

BERNH (stands still thoughtfully). Well, we shall see.

CURTAIN

ACT III

Committee Room in Elizabeth Institute. Furnished in the usual manner. Long table centre covered with green baize, two windows towards centre back. Photographs of famous Doctors, a picture of Empress Elizabeth over entrance door left. It is evening, artificial lighting. Central hanging light with green shade, at first not fully turned on. Small table right against wall.

Hochroitzpointner sitting with large journal in front of him, copying from another page.

Enter Dr. Schreimann, Lecturer. He is tall, bald, black martial moustache, fringe on forehead, spectacles. Speaks in strikingly Austrian dialect, sometimes suddenly breaking into Jewish accent.

HOCH. Good morning, Capt — Doctor.

SCHREIM. Good morning. Had a good sleep after the Ball, Hochroitzpointner?

HOCH. I didn't go to bed at all, Doctor. It was not worth while any more.

SCHREIM (as Hochroitzpointner is still standing at attention). No ceremony, man.

HOCH (making himself comfortable). I danced until seven, at eight I was in the Internal Section, at ten at the Surgical, at twelve —

SCHREIM (interrupting him, sits at table). That will do. I know you are everywhere. And now you have copied out the Minutes of the last Meeting.

HOCH. Unfortunately I could not find time for it until now.

SCHREIM. Quite. Quite. It's not your job at all. And in my capacity as Minute Secretary I give you my best thanks. Did you find it quite easy to read it all? (Sits next to him, reads Minutes, mumbling.) Motion put to vote. Four votes for External Professor Hill of the Graz University; four for Dr. S. Wenger (turning to Hochroitzpointner) — Samuel —

HOCH. There is no need to write it out in full.

SCHREIM. I should like to know why not. My grandfather, for instance, was named Samuel and always wrote it in full. And my name is Siegfrid, and I always write it in full.

HOCH (stupidly). Yes, Captain!

SCHREIM. I'm not your Regimental M.O. now.
(Continues to read.) The Director made use of his statutory right to give the casting vote in the case of a tie and decided in favour of Dr. Wenger, whereby Doctor Wenger becomes head of the Department for Dermatology and Syphilis. (After a short pause.) Well, are you satisfied with your new Chief?

HOCH (involuntarily clicking his heels together). Certainly.

SCHREIM (laughing, lays his hand on his shoulder). Why, what are you doing, Hochroitzpointner? You're not my regimental pupil now.

HOCH. Worse luck, Doctor! Those were good times.

SCHREIM. Yes, we were all younger then. But tell me, Hochroitzpointner, as we are on the subject, when do you intend to take your finals?
Enter Ebenwald.

EBEN. Yes, that's what I'm always asking him.

HOCH. Good day, Professor.

EBEN. How do, Schreimann-SCHREIM. How d'you do!

EBEN. I'll tell you something, Hoch — you should take a holiday from all your various Sections and cram. You take me? — cram, so that you should really get finished some time. But what are you doing in the Committee-room?

SCHREIM. Dr. Hochroitzpointner has been so kind as to copy out the Minutes for me.

EBEN. Dear me! That too! I really don't know how the Institute could get on without Hochroitzpointner — and at the Ball last night you led the dances?

HOCH. Led and followed.

SCHREIM. He hasn't been to bed at all.

EBEN. Ah, these young people. Well, what was it like?

HOCH. Crowded out. Very lively.

EBEN (to Hoch.) Do you know where you danced all night, Hochroitzpointner? On the crust of a volcano.

HOCH. Well, it was hot, Professor.

EBEN (laughs). Well now! Take a holiday, pass your exams. and give up dancing on volcanoes. Even on extinct ones! Good-bye. (Holds out his hand in dismissal.)

Schreiman does the same.

Hoch again clicks his heels together.

EBEN. Like a lieutenant.

SCHREIM. I have just told him of it.

Exit Hochroitzpointner.

EBEN. I hear that his Excellency the Minister of Education was also there.

SCHREIM. Yes, and was talking to Bernhardi at least half an hour.

EBEN. It is most strange.

SCHREIM. Why not? At a Ball?

EBEN. But he must know that the Trustees have resigned.

SCHREIM. All the same, even one of the Trustees was at the Ball.

EBEN. Who?

SCHREIM. Councillor Winkler.

EBEN. He is always a free lance.

SCHREIM. Come to that, the matter is not official yet.

EBEN. As good as official. The Meeting to-day has no doubt been called on account of the resignation. Well — (hesitatingly) can I rely on you, Schreimann?

SCHREIM (airily). I take the liberty of considering this question rather extraordinary.

EBEN. Don't be foolish. We are not students now.

SCHREIM. You can always rely on me when I am in agreement with you. And as, fortunately, this is generally the case —

EBEN. But there might be a question where to agree with me would cause you some misgivings.

SCHREIM. I have already told you once, my dear Ebenwald, that, in my opinion, this whole affair is not to be judged from any sectarian or religious standpoint, but is to be looked on more as a question of tact. So, even if I were a Nationalist Jew, I would side against Bernhardi in this case. And permit me to remark, once more, that I am as much a German as you. And I can assure you it takes more courage at the present time for a man of my origin to declare himself a German and a Christian than to remain what he was at birth. I should have had an easier time as a Zionist.

EBEN. Quite likely. You could have been sure of a Professorship in Jerusalem, at any rate.

SCHREIM. That's a stupid joke.

EBEN. Well, Schreimann, you know my feelings towards you. But, on the other hand, we live in such muddled times — and in such a muddled land —

SCHREIM. Don't dig up that old business of the anonymous letters.

EBEN. Ah, you still remember that? As a matter of fact they were not anonymous at all. They were signed in full by good old friends of our student days. They were naturally surprised that I championed you so warmly. You must not forget, my dear Schreimann, that I was a leader of the German Nationalist Party at the University of the strictest type. And you know what that means — Watch on the Rhine — Bismarck's Oak — Waidhof Resolution. No satisfaction given to Jews or anyone of Jewish extraction —

SCHREIM. It had to be given sometimes, though, in spite of the strictest observance. I received this scar as a Jew.

EBEN. Well, don't we live in muddled times? You are more proud to-day of your Jewish scar than of all your Germanism.

Enter Professor Pflugfelder. Looks like a scientist, wears spectacles.

PFLUG. Good day, gentlemen. Have you heard that the Committee has resigned?

EBEN. That is why we are here, Professor.

PFLUG. Well, what do you say to it?

EBEN. You seem to be surprised. I thought everyone was prepared for it.

PFLUG. Surprised? Not at all. I may tell you I have long ceased to be astonished at anything. But I retain the power to be disgusted, unfortunately. I am steeped in disgust.

SCHREIM. Disgust?

PFLUG. Surely you will agree, gentlemen, that the agitation which is being worked up against Bernhardi is devoid of all justification.

EBEN. I know of no agitation.

PFLUG. Oh, you know of nothing? I see. I see. And that your cousin, Ottokar Ebenwald, is the leading spirit, is also news to you?

EBEN. I must really ask you —

PFLUG. But of course I must not identify you with your cousin. You would rightly disclaim all connection. For it happens, just at this juncture, that your cousin, who began so proudly as a German Nationalist, now simply lends himself to do the jobs of the Clerical Party. And you are no Clerical, Ebenwald. You are a German, are you not? An old German student. And what are the German virtues, Ebenwald? Courage, loyalty, conviction. Have I left out one? No matter. These are enough to go on with. And, therefore, I hope you are in agreement with me. We will make a solemn demonstration of loyalty to-day to our Bernhardi.

EBEN. Demonstration? What about? What has happened to him? Nothing so far except that the Trustees have resigned. And we can close down because no more money is forthcoming: whether this is quite the right occasion to accord an ovation to the Director who has brought us to this position through his not very tactful behaviour —

PFLUG. Ah yes — I see. Well, you are as you were made, Ebenwald. All the same, if I needed an operation, I would have none but you. For there you beat them all. But what about you, Schreimann? You are silent? Also against Bernhardi? Also indignant because he begged the Priest to let a poor sick creature die in peace? Quite natural. Quite natural. Such newly-acquired religious feelings must be treated with respect.

EBEN (quietly). Don't let him work on you, Schreimann.

SCHREIM (very quietly). I have just been saying to my friend Ebenwald, Professor, that not my religious feeling, but my good taste has been offended. For I must confess that I consider a sickroom the wrong place for politics.

PFLUG. Politics! Bernhardi and politics! You don't ask me to believe that you yourself think that. Well, really that is —
Enter Filitz. Greetings exchanged.

FILITZ. Good evening, gentlemen. I will tell you at once what I intend to do. You can please yourselves. For my part I am going to follow the good example of the Trustees and resign.

EBENWALD. What?

PFLUG. Eh!

FILITZ. I cannot see what other course is open to an honest man if he does not wish directly to associate himself with the behaviour of our Director, not to stigmatize it further at the moment —

EBEN. Excuse me, Professor, I don't agree with you at all. There must certainly be some other way of showing that we do not identify ourselves with our Director. We must not leave the Institute in the lurch, certainly not just at this moment. On the contrary, we must try and influence the Committee to withdraw the resignation.

FILITZ. That will never happen, so long as Bernhardi is at the head.

SCHREIM. Quite so — so long as he is at the head.

FILITZ. So long as —

PFLUG. Oh indeed, gentlemen, so that is what you are driving at. But that is beyond all —

Enter Adler.

ADLER. Good evening, gentlemen. Have you seen it?

EBEN. Seen what?

ADLER. The Interpellation.

SCHREIM. In the Affaire Bernhardi?

FILITZ. Has it been already?

ADLER. It is in all the evening papers.

EBEN (rings bell.) We haven't seen anything. (To Filitz.) I thought it was to-morrow only.

SCHREIM. You see we doctors have no time to sit in cafés in the afternoon.
Enter Servant.

EBEN. Run over to the newsagents and get an evening paper.

FILITZ. Bring three.

SCHREIM. Six!

EBEN (to Servant). Bring a dozen while you are about it. But be quick.
Exit Servant.

SCHREIM (to Adler.) Was the question worded very strongly?

PFLUG. Is there no one here who knew the wording beforehand?
Enter Dr. Wenger. Small, crushed, uncertain, but sometimes blustering.

WENGER. Good evening, gentlemen.

SCHREIM. Hand it over, Dr. Wenger. (Draws evening paper from his breast pocket.) He has one.

WENGER. Oh, but Doctor —

EBEN. It was nice of you to bring it in with you.

WENGER. What have I brought with me? Oh, I see. Is it the custom for the Benjamin always to bring the evening paper to the meetings'?

EBEN. Here it is.
All the others, except Adler and Wenger, try to see the paper over Ebenwald's shoulder.

ADLER (to Wenger). Well, what do you think of it?

WENGER. What can I say? I understand nothing of politics. And I was not present.

SCHREIM (to Ebenwald). No one can see anything like this. Read it out.

EBEN. Well, gentlemen, the question ran as follows:
'The undersigned consider it their duty—'

PFLUG. You are quite breathless. Let Professor Filitz read. He is sonorous and rhetorical and has the deep tones of conviction.

EBEN. So have I, but no doubt Professor Filitz reads better than I. If you please.

FILITZ (reading). 'The undersigned consider it their duty to bring to the notice of the Government the following incident which took place in the Elizabeth Institute on the — And so on and so forth.

His Reverence Frank Rider, Priest at the Church of St. Florian, was called to the death-bed of Philomena 84 Beier, spinster, by Hospital Sister Ludmilla, to administer the Holy Sacrament and last unction.

In the entrance chamber to the ward his Reverence found a number of doctors, among them Professor Bernhardi, head of the Department in question, Director of the Institute, who harshly requested his Reverence to desist from his intention, on the grounds that the dying woman might suffer in health through the excitement.'

PFLUG. No, no!

THE OTHERS. Oh!...

FILITZ (continuing to read). 'Professor Bernhardi, as a member of the Mosaic religion, was informed by his Reverence that he had come in fulfilment of a holy duty which, in this case, was all the more urgent as the patient's illness was the result of a criminal action on her part, whereupon Professor Bernhardi sneeringly insisted upon his rights as manager of the premises, which are naturally built out of funds provided by noble contributors. As his Reverence then tried to enter the sick-ward, waving off further discussion, Professor Bernhardi obstructed the door, and at the instant when his Reverence seized the handle to enter the sickroom for the performance of his holy duty, Professor Bernhardi gave him a push—'

ADLER. Absolutely untrue.

PFLUG. Infamous.

SCHREIM. Why, were you there?

FILITZ. Does the push make any difference?

EBEN. There are witnesses.

PFLUG. I know your witnesses.

ADLER. I was there too.

PFLUG. But your evidence was not taken.

WENGER. Evidence?

PFLUG. Yes, in the Commission. Is it possible that you have not heard of the commission, Professor Ebenwald?

SCHREIM. Read on!

FILITZ (reads). 'During this scene in the antechamber, the patient passed away without having received the consolations of her religion, which, according to the testimony of Sister Ludmilla, she urgently desired. In bringing this case to the notice of the Government, we ask the Government and especially his Excellency the Minister of Education and Religion, what measures he intends to take to give satisfaction to the Christian population of Vienna, who have been offended in their deepest religious feelings. Further, what steps his Excellency intends to take to prevent the recurrence of such preposterous incidents, and finally whether in future, when public positions are to be filled, his Excellency would not consider it advisable, having regard to this incident, to exclude persons who, through origin, education and character are not in a position to have the necessary understanding for the religious feelings of the indigenous Christian populace. Signed—'

Excitement.

EBEN. Now we are in a fix.

WENGER. How so we? Not a word has been said against the Institute.

SCHREIM. That's true.

EBEN. Bravo, Wenger!

WENGER (encouraged). The Elizabeth Institute is without reproach or stain.

PFLUG. And the Director?

WENGER. He too, of course, if he can rebut the aspersions contained in the interpellation, of which I, naturally, have no doubt.

PFLUG. Aspersions? You call these aspersions? But, my dear friend, this question — do you really need to be told that — that this interpellation is nothing less than a political move of the combined Clerical and anti-Semitic parties?

FILITZ. Stuff and nonsense!

EBEN. The old war-horse!

WENGER. Excuse me, I recognize no political or national differences. I am a man of science. I abhor —

SCHREIM. We all abhor —
Enter Bernhardi and Cyprian.

BERNH (very expansive, his manner of speaking even more humorous and ironical than usual, but not without embarrassment. He takes the evening papers from the hand of the Servant who opens the door for him.) Good evening, gentlemen. Here, please help yourselves. I must apologize for being late, but hope you all found sufficient entertainment in my absence. Greetings all round. Bernhardi at once sits at head of table, the others take their various seats; some smoke.

BERNH. I declare the Meeting open. Before starting on the agenda, I wish, in the name of the Elizabeth Institute, to offer a hearty welcome to our new Member, who is, for the first time, attending a Meeting of our Committee, and that an extraordinary one. Let me express the hope, at the same time, that Dr. Wenger will feel at ease in our midst and find further opportunity in his new and more responsible position, to demonstrate his proved devotion to duty, to develop his talents and to become that which we all are, an ornament to the Institute. (The joke finds no response.) Dr. Wenger, once more I heartily welcome you in all our names.

WENGER. My honoured Director and honoured colleagues! It would be immodest on my part to trespass on your valuable time with a lengthy speech —

EBEN, AND SCHREIM. Hear! Hear!

WENGER. So I will only express my sincerest thanks for the great honour — (The others show impatience.)

SCHREIM (stands up). In consideration of the lateness of the hour, I would suggest that our honoured colleague, Dr. Wenger, should postpone his no doubt highly interesting speech of thanks until the next meeting, so that we may proceed at once with the agenda.

THE OTHERS. Agreed! Hear! Hear!
Schreimann presses Wenger's hand and several of the others follow suit.

BERNH. Gentlemen, I have taken the liberty of summoning you to an extraordinary meeting, and must, first of all, apologize for its being at such a late hour, and should like, all the more for that, to express my gratification that the number is complete.

ADLER. Loewenstein is missing.

BERNH. Let us hope he will come still. I see in this a new proof of the great, I might almost say patriotic interest which you all take in our Institute, a proof of our professional solidarity, which prevails, unaffected by occasional differences in single instances, which after all cannot be entirely avoided in any large body, the more so if prominent personages are represented thereon. (Impatience shown.) But that we are at one in all fundamental matters has transpired more than once, and we trust will be proved again in the future to the joy of our true supporters and the discomfiture of our enemies. For we have these also. Gentlemen, I think I need not fear the reproach that I am putting your curiosity on the rack. For you all know why I took the liberty of calling you together. All the same, it is my duty to read out the letter which reached me this morning, registered and reply paid.

FILITZ. Let us hear it!

BERNH (reading). 'Dear Sir, etc. I have the honour to inform you that the members of the Board of Trustees have passed a unanimous resolution terminating their honorary membership. I bring this resolution to the notice of yourself, as the respected Director, and I should be obliged if you would make the contents thereof known to the other members of the Board of Directors and Board of Tuition.

'Yours etc.
'Councillor Winkler,
'as representing the Committee.'

Ebenwald bends over the letter.

BERNH. Certainly. (The letter circulates — Bernhardi smiles.) Gentlemen, I hope you will convince yourselves that I have not suppressed one syllable of this interesting communication. The Committee has resigned and, as a logical sequence, to-day's agenda is as follows: The attitude of the Board of Directors and the Plenary Committee in relation to this fact. Professor Ebenwald wishes to speak.

EBEN. I wish to ask the Director whether he is acquainted with the reason which caused the Trustees to resign, this question being all the more permissible as the Committee in their letter keep silent on this point.

PFLUG (disgusted). Eh!

BERNH. I might put the counter-question whether this cause is unknown to Professor Ebenwald or the other gentlemen. But as we all have plenty of other business outside this room —

CYPRIAN. Quite right.

BERNH. — and the proceedings should not be unnecessarily prolonged, I will answer the question of our sub-director, Professor Ebenwald, with exemplary brevity. The cause lies in the same incident of which you have just been reading in the evening papers with more or less pleasure, in the shape of a so-called interpellation.

SCHREIM. The interpellation does not enter into the question here.

BERNH. Quite true. And, in my opinion, it has no place in Parliament either —

PFLUG. Hear! Hear!

BERNH. As this interpellation refers to an incident, gentlemen, of which witnesses are here present and for which I bear the full responsibility, and has been brought forward as political propaganda for a certain party —

FILITZ. Which party?

PFLUG. The anti-Semitic — clerical Party.

FILITZ. Nonsense!

BERNH. a certain party, of whose aim there can be no doubt, however varied may be our feelings toward it —

PFLUG. Hear! Hear!

BERNH. — misrepresented in party fashion. However, I am not here to justify myself, to whomsoever it may be, but I stand here as Director of this Institute to ask you what is to be our attitude towards the accomplished fact of the resignation of the Committee. Professor Cyprian!

CYPRIAN (beginning in his monotonous manner). A few years ago I was on holiday in Holland, and stood in the Picture Gallery — (Impatience.) What is the matter, gentlemen?

SCHREIM. In consideration of the advanced hour, I would earnestly beg Professor Cyprian to spare us his anecdotes and to come to the point as quickly as possible.

CYPRIAN. It would have been no anecdote. In the deepest sense it would have — but as you will, gentlemen. Well, the Committee has resigned. We all know the reason, or let us rather say the pretext. For we all know that Bernhardi, when refusing the Priest entrance to the sickroom acted entirely in the pursuance of his duty as a physician. In similar circumstances we should all have taken the same course.

FILITZ. Oh!

EBEN. You, at any rate, have never done so.

SCHREIM. As far as we know, it was the first time in Professor Bernhardi's case also.

FILITZ. That's true.

CYPRIAN. If we have never taken such action, gentlemen, the reason is simply that the position in which Professor Bernhardi was recently placed seldom occurs in such an acute form. No one would attempt to deny that innumerable devotional spirits, in face of death, have found peace and consolation in the Holy Sacrament and last unction and that even doubters have found comfort and strength in the ministrations of kindly priests; and in all cases where the dying patient or his relations wish for a priest, no doctor has ever denied him entry.

FILITZ. That would be a fine thing.

CYPRIAN. But the presence of the priest at the death-bed against the wish of the dying or against the well-founded doubts of the person responsible at the end, must be regarded, at the best, as an excessive display of clerical zeal, the prevention of which in certain cases is not only admissible but may even become a duty. And such a case confronts us now. Therefore I repeat with full conviction, we should all have done as Bernhardi did — even you, Professor Ebenwald — and you, Professor Filitz —

FILITZ. No!

CYPRIAN. Or, to put it more correctly, we should have been forced to act so had we followed our true impulses. Only considerations of possible consequences could have induced us to allow the priest to enter. Bernhardi's fault then, if fault it can be called, lay in that he followed the promptings of humanity and of his profession, of which we as doctors must approve: so it seems to me that only one answer is called for by the Committee's letter, that of passing a full and unanimous vote of confidence in our Director, Professor Bernhardi.

PFLUG. Bravo!

Adler nods, somewhat doubtfully.
Wenger looks towards Adler, then round at the others.

BERNH. Professor Ebenwald!

EBEN. Gentlemen, let us not be deceived. Under present conditions the resignation of the Committee is practically the worst thing that can happen to our Institute. I would not hesitate to describe it as a catastrophe. Yes, gentlemen, as a catastrophe. I will not inquire into the question as to whether the members of the Committee were ethically justified in their action. We are not gathered here for the purpose of entering into religious questions, as Professor Cyprian found it necessary to do — to pass criticism on Prince Konstantin, or his Eminence, or Veitsh the Bank Manager, and so on — we simply have to face the fact that the supporters of our Institute, to whom we are so deeply indebted materially and morally, and on whose continued material and moral support we are dependent (.Interruptions) — we are dependent on them, gentlemen — that these supporters have turned their backs on us. And we have to face the further indisputable fact that our honoured Director, Professor Bernhardi, bears the sole responsibility for this misfortune.

BERNH. I admit it —

EBEN. And I consider that it would show, not only the basest ingratitude to the Committee, but would be utterly disloyal to our Institute, if we should at this moment declare ourselves in unanimous agreement with our Director who has, perhaps without evil intent but at any rate with grave indiscretion, brought our Institute to the verge of an abyss. (Excitement.) I repeat it, to the verge of an abyss. Therefore, in opposition to Professor Cyprian, I not only oppose the suggested vote of confidence in Professor Bernhardi, but propose, on the contrary, that we give suitable expression of our regret for the occurrence and emphasize that we strongly censure our Director's behaviour towards his Reverence. (He shouts above the rising tumult.) I further propose that this Resolution be communicated to the Committee and that they be asked, in consideration thereof, to withdraw their resignation. (Great excitement.)

BERNH. Gentlemen. (Interruptions. He begins again!) Gentlemen — To avoid all misunderstandings, I wish to remark at once not only that your censure causes me no concern, the more so as it was to be anticipated, but that, on the other hand, I am in the pleasant position of being able to dispense with official marks of confidence. All the same, to save you from taking steps which you might subsequently regret, I will let you into the secret that it is extremely likely that, before very long, we shall have no need for any honorary Committee. We can depend on a State subvention for a considerable amount within a very short time and, what may be of more far-reaching significance, the nationalization of our Institute is receiving consideration in authoritative quarters, as his Excellency again hinted to me yesterday.

EBEN. Small talk at a dance!

CYPRIAN (stands up). I must point out that a few days ago his Excellency said to me also —;

FILITZ. All that is beside the point.

SCHREIM. Castles in the air.

EBEN. A subvention now, after all this business.

FILITZ. After this interpellation! (Noisy interruptions.)

BERNH (raising his voice). You forget, gentlemen, that the question will receive a reply in the House. And there can be no doubt as to the nature of the reply, without questioning the good faith of the Minister of Education, who is doubtless well-informed of the circumstances which led up to this interpellation.

FILITZ. I hope his information was not one-sided.

SCHREIM. The interpellation is not under debate.

FILITZ. Quite true. A motion has been put.

SCHREIM. Put it to the vote.

CYPRIAN (below his breath to Bernhardi). Yes, put it to the vote.

BERNH. Gentlemen! Two motions are before the Meeting. One, put forward by Professor Ebenwald that — Enter Loewenstein.

LOEWEN. Gentlemen, I come from Parliament.
(General excitement.) The interpellation has been answered.

EBEN. Please put the motion to the vote, Professor.

CYPRIAN. I thought we had given up playing at Parliament. Naturally we all want to hear —

SCHREIM (who has noticed Loewenstein's perturbed face). I think I am expressing the wishes of all present, if I ask our Chairman to suspend the Meeting for a moment, so that Professor Loewenstein may have the opportunity of giving us a detailed report of the answer to the interpellation.

BERNH. Are we all agreed? Then I will interrupt business for a short time. (Humorously calling upon Loewenstein to speak.) Loewenstein has the word.

LOEWEN. There is — An action for sacrilege is to be brought against you. (Great excitement.)

PFLUG. Impossible!

CYPRIAN. Loewenstein!

SCHREIM. Oh!

ADLER. Sacrilege!

CYPRIAN. Tell us about it.

EBEN. Perhaps Professor Loewenstein will kindly tell us the details.
Bernhardi stands motionless.

LOEWEN. What is there to tell? There is to be an official inquiry. It's a disgrace! And you've brought it about between you!

FILITZ. No abuse, my dear Loewenstein.

LOEWEN. What can be of further interest to you gentlemen? You will read all the details in tomorrow's morning papers. The crux of the whole speech lay in its climax, and that you know now. It makes no difference that at first his Excellency obviously intended to take another course.

CYPRIAN. What course?

SCHREIM. My dear Loewenstein, do try to speak coherently and —

LOEWEN. Well, gentlemen, I can assure you that, at first it seemed as though the interpellators would suffer an ignominious defeat. The Minister spoke of our Director's great merits and strongly emphasized the point that there can be no question of any malicious intent on his part, that Professor Bernhardi stands aloof from all political strife; that there is no occasion to make public appointments on other grounds than those of worth and merit. And here came interruptions: 'If it were only so', and 'Jews overrunning the Universities', and so on. Then somehow the Minister seemed to veer away from his theme and appeared to become confused and angry. Somehow or other he came to speak of the necessity for religious education, of the combination of a Christian outlook with scientific progress and suddenly he concluded — I am sure to his own surprise — as I have already told you, with the information that he would consult his colleague, the Minister of Justice, as to whether the latter does not feel compelled (mockingly) to institute proceedings against Professor Bernhardi for sacrilege. In this manner, he said, or something to that effect, an explanation of the incident referred to by the interpellators could be given in a form equally acceptable not only to all parties in the House, but also to the populace.

PFLUG. Shame!

FILITZ. Oh!

CYPRIAN. And how did the House take it —

LOEWEN. A good deal of approval, no dissent as far as I could hear. Speaker was congratulated.

ADLER. Is it possible that you heard wrong, Lowenstein —

LOEWEN. Oh, you need not believe me unless you like —

CYPRIAN. And, after all, it is no concern of ours.

FILITZ. Indeed!

EBEN. I think we might resume the proceedings.

BERNH (calmly). I think I am voicing the wishes of all present by expressing our thanks to Dr. Loewenstein for his report, and I would ask you, gentlemen, to calm yourselves, so that we may continue the Meeting which has been held up for a short time. Gentlemen, as you have rightly pointed out, neither the interpellation nor its answer is under debate. Two motions are before the Meeting.

EBEN. I withdraw mine.
Excitement. Adler whispers explanations to Loewenstein.

EBEN. Or rather, I will change it to another motion, which now seems advisable to me in the interests of our Institute, as a result of the position created by the Minister's reply.

CYPRIAN. The Minister's reply is no concern of ours.

PFLUG. It has nothing whatever to do with us.

EBEN. I move that our respected Director be suspended from the administration of the Institute pending the completion of the inquiry. (Great excitement.)

PFLUG. Shame on you, Ebenwald.

CYPRIAN. It is not even certain yet that a charge will be brought.

LOEWEN. Unprecedented!

CYPRIAN. If you withdraw your first motion, then mine still stands — that we wish to express our confidence in our Director, Professor —

PFLUG (interrupting). What have the interpellation and the answer to do with us. It is an external matter.

EBEN (shouting). Just consider for a moment. We are in danger of making ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the world if we go on debating and deciding — while the possibility exists that, at any moment, all our resolutions may be cancelled by a higher authority.

CYPRIAN. Excuse me, Ebenwald, that is nonsense.

ADLER. Who has the power to cancel our resolutions?

LOEWEN. Professor Bernhardi is and remains Director of the Elizabeth Institute. No one has the right to depose him.

FILITZ. In my eyes his reign is over to-day.

CYPRIAN (to Bernhardt). Put my motion to the vote.

Commotion.

BERNH. According to rote —

ADLER (very excited). Gentlemen, will you permit me to say a few words. If the inquiry foreshadowed by the Minister of Education and Religion leads to legal proceedings, my evidence, among others, cannot be dispensed with, as I was present on that occasion. And not only I, but all of you here, know that the incident in question has not been reported with a strict regard for truth by the interpellators. But just because I have the deepest conviction of Professor Bernhardi's innocence and swear to it —

BERNH. Thank you.

ADLER. Just for this reason I welcome — and we all, without party differences, must welcome —

SCHREIM. There are no party differences!

ADLER. an official inquiry, which will clear up the matter in the full light of publicity. Also, we do not wish to create the impression that we are prematurely taking sides before the completion of the legal inquiry and the final decision, which cannot be other than favourable to Dr. Bernhardi. If, therefore, I vote in favour of the motion of our Vice-President, Professor Ebenwald, for the suspension of our Director — (Sensation.)

FILITZ. Bravo!

ADLER. I ask you all, and above all our respected Professor Bernhardi, to see in this a proof of my confidence in him — and of my conviction that he will come scatheless through the inquiry.

CYPRIAN. But, Dr. Adler, this amounts to an admission on your part that such an inquiry is unavoidable.

FILITZ. Who can dispute that?

LOEWEN. After such a denunciation —

FILITZ. Time will show.

PFLUG. All toadying on the Minister's part. He crawls to the Clerical party.

LOEWEN. It is not the first time either.

CYPRIAN (to Bernhardi). Put my motion to the vote.

BERNH. Gentlemen — (Impatience

SCHREIM. Is this still supposed to be a Meeting? Saloon without the Billiards.

FILITZ. Professor Ebenwald's is the more far-reaching motion. It should be put to the vote first.

BERNH. Gentlemen, I wish to ask a question of our Vice-President, Professor Ebenwald.

SCHREIM. What is the meaning of this?

FILITZ. To be strictly in order, it is not admissible.

PFLUG. Childish playing at Parliament.

BERNH. Professor Ebenwald may answer my question or not as he pleases.

EBEN. I am at your service.

BERNH. I ask you, Professor Ebenwald, whether it is known to you that I might have averted this interpellation, the Minister's reply to which has caused you to propose my suspension?

LOEWEN. Attention!

SCHREIM. Don't answer!

BERNH. If you are a man, Professor, you will answer.
(Excitement.)

EBEN. Gentlemen, Professor Bernhardi's question does not take me by surprise. As a matter of fact I have been expecting it all through this remarkable meeting. But you will not blame me if, in view of the peculiar tone which the Professor chooses to adopt towards me, I refrain from answering him directly, but give my explanation to you all as to the meaning of this somewhat insinuating question of Professor Bernhardi's. (Excitement. Suspense.) Well, gentlemen, soon after the incident which put our Institute in such a pleasant position, I took the liberty of visiting the Professor and expressing to him my fear that Parliament might take up the matter in a way which might prove detrimental to our Institute. You know we have always had enemies and to-day we have more than some of you suspect. For there are still some among you, gentlemen, who do not know how to read the signs of the times, and to reckon with popular tendencies — and where public Institutions are concerned, these must be taken into account, whether we consider them justified from a philosophic standpoint or not. The fact is that there are many people who do not consider it right that, in an Institute where a Prince and a Bishop are curators, and where, according to statistics, 85 per cent of the patients are Catholics, the house-doctors should, in preponderating numbers, belong to another religion. That sort of thing causes bad blood in certain quarters.

LOEWEN. But 80 per cent of the money which supports us comes from that other religion.

EBEN. That is a side issue. The patients are the chief consideration. Well, as you know, recently there has been a contest for the appointment in the Tugendvetter Section — between Professor Hill of Graz and Dr. Wenger. I may speak of it, in spite of our respected colleague's presence, since he already knows all about it. Hill is, above all, a capable practitioner; our colleague, Wenger, has worked principally in the sphere of theory. He has naturally not had as much scope for practice as Hill — that is still to come. Now just imagine, gentlemen, a good friend comes to see me —

PFLUG. Or perhaps a cousin —

EBEN. Maybe a cousin — and says to me, 'You know remarks will be passed if yet another Jew is elected to the Elizabeth Institute, especially after the painful incident of which all Vienna is talking. And Parliament might attack you.' Well, gentlemen, do you find it so very blameworthy on my part that I should have gone to the Director and said to him, 'Let us rather take Hill, who is after all no unworthy candidate, and so escape all possible unpleasantness.'

WENGER. Hear! Hear! (Laughter.)

EBEN. You see, gentlemen! Perhaps it might have been better for me to go to Dr. Wenger and ask him to withdraw. But I hate hole-and-corner methods. So I preferred to go straight away to the Principal. And this is the meaning of Professor Bernhardi's question to me, which was, no doubt, to have touched me to the quick. And it is quite true that we might have been spared the interpellation had Hill stood in Wenger's shoes to-day. Well, I will not say,
'Great it might have been, but it was not to be And now we are in the soup. Dixi!

PFLUG. Bravo, Bernhardi!

BERNH. Gentlemen, following on famous precedents, Professor Ebenwald's reply to me has shown more eloquence than pertinence. But each one of you will form his own opinion. I do not defend myself for having refused to enter into the proposed deal —

SCHREIM. Oho!

BERNH. I permit myself to call it a deal with at least as much right as my action towards the Priest is described as sacrilege.

PFLUG. Excellent!

BERNH. All the same I must plead guilty — guilty that I, as Director of the Institute, did not do my utmost to avert an interpellation which seems destined to lower the prestige of our Institute in the eyes of all hypocrites and blockheads. And to accept the consequences voluntarily, as well as to avoid further delay, I herewith resign my position as Head of the Institute. (Great excitement.)

CYPRIAN. Are you crazy?

LOEWEN. You mustn't do that.

PFLUG. A vote must be taken.

BERNH. Quite unnecessary! In favour of my suspension we have Professor Ebenwald, Professor Filitz, Doctors Schreimann and Adler —

LOEWEN. That only makes four.

BERNH. I prefer to spare Dr. Wenger a mental conflict. He might perhaps feel constrained to vote for me out of gratitude because I recently gave my decision in his favour. And I would rather not owe to such a motive the now more than doubtful honour of remaining your Director.

SCHREIM. Oho!

FILITZ. This is too much!

CYPRIAN. What are you doing?

PFLUG. Adler, this is your fault.

LOEWEN. Put it to the vote!

PFLUG. It would be desertion.

BERNH. Desertion!

CYPRIAN. You must await the vote.

BERNH. No. I'll have no vote. I will submit myself to no judgment.

FILITZ. Especially as it has already been expressed.

SCHREIM. Has Professor Bernhardi resigned? Yes or no?

BERNH. Yes.

SCHREIM. Then, according to the Constitution, Professor Ebenwald, as Vice-President, becomes Director of the Institute and, first and foremost, Chairman of this Meeting.

LOEWEN. Unheard of!

FILITZ. Naturally.

PFLUG. Must we put up with this?

CYPRIAN. Bernhardi! Bernhardi!

EBEN. As Professor Bernhardi, to our regret, has resigned the position of Principal, according to Clause 7 of our Constitution, I take over the Directorship of the Institute and at the same time, the Chair of this Meeting. Gentlemen, I ask you for the same confidence which you always gave so readily to the retiring President, and hope to prove myself worthy of it. I call upon Professor Filitz to speak.

LOEWEN. Infamous!

PFLUG. You are not Principal yet, Professor Ebenwald, not yet! (Commotion.)

FILITZ. The first question that now confronts us is — Who is to become Head of Professor Bernhardi's Department?

CYPRIAN. Are you mad?

BERNH. It is true, gentlemen, that I am no longer Principal of the Institute, but I am as much a member as any of you, and Head of my Department.

ADLER. That is understood.

WENGER. Most certainly.

CYPRIAN. It admits of no discussion.

SCHREIM. It would, of course, be liable to lead to complications if the suspended Principal of the Institute —

LOEWEN. He has not been suspended.

CYPRIAN. He resigned of his own accord.

FILITZ. Not quite voluntarily.

PFLUG. He threw it in your faces.

EBEN. Quiet, gentlemen, quiet.

BERNH (who is now quite beside himself). Of course no one has the right to turn me out of my Department, but I will take leave of absence until this affair is over.

CYPRIAN. What are you doing?

BERNH. — Taking leave.

EBEN. It is granted.

BERNH. Thank you. And for the duration of my absence I entrust the work of my Department to my assistants, Dr. Kurt Pflugfelder and Dr. Oskar Bernhardi.

EBEN. I can see no objection to that.

BERNH. And now, gentlemen, I start on my furlough, and bid you good day.

LOEWEN. I also.

Cyprian picks up his hat.

BERNH. Why, that's just what would please these gentlemen. I beg you to remain.

PFLUG. Then you must stay.

BERNH. Stay? Here?...

ADLER. Professor, I should be very sorry for you to misinterpret my behaviour. At this moment, before all present, I am glad to express my esteem for you.

BERNH. My best thanks. Who is not for me is against me. Good day, gentlemen!
Exit.

PFLUG (speaking amid growing disorder, which he often has to shout down). Gentlemen, are you really letting him go? I beg of you to come to your senses before it is too late. You must not let Bernhardi go. Put all personal questions aside. If you have thought me hasty, I also ask your pardon. Just think — remember for a moment how all this unfortunate business started — and then you must come to your senses. A poor creature is dying in hospital — a young thing who has paid dearly enough for her little bit of youth and joy — sin, if you like — with pain and fear and even life itself. In her last hour Euphoria comes to her. She feels well, is happy again. She thinks herself cured. She dreams that her lover will come to fetch her, to take her away from this house of sickness and pain — out into life and joy. Perhaps it was the most beautiful moment of her life — this last dream. And from this Bernhardi did not wish to waken her to the terrible reality. That is his whole fault. This was his crime. This and nothing else. He begged the Priest to let the poor girl sink to sleep peacefully.

Begged him — you all know it. Even had he been less polite, it would have been pardonable. What extraordinary perversity it must be that can regard the matter in any other light than that of pure humanity. Where is the man whose religious feelings have really been hurt by Bernhardi's action? And should there be even one such man, whose fault is it but that of the people who maliciously perverted and spread the report? Who else is to blame, gentlemen, but those in whose interest it lay that religious feelings should consider themselves to have been hurt, in whose interest it lies that there should be people who offend against religious feelings? And were there no place-seeking, no parliamentary propaganda, no human pettiness — in one word, no politics — would it ever have been possible to work up this case into an agitation? Yes, gentlemen, it has happened — because there are place-seekers, scoundrels, and fools. But surely, gentlemen, we should not belong to any of these categories. What mirage is it that induces us — you — physicians, men who are used to stand at death-beds, who have insight into real misery, into the core of life, what can induce us — you — to take part in this miserable swindle, to play a lamentable parody of Parliament, with pros and cons, advances and retreats, insincerities and hypocrisies — and to turn away our eyes from the heart of things; for the sake of petty political considerations to leave in the lurch a man who has done nothing but what was natural and proper. For I am far from praising him and calling him a hero, simply because he is a man. And of you, gentlemen, I ask nothing more than that you should also be worthy of this modest title of honour, to regard the decisions and resolutions of this meeting as simply non-existent and to beg Professor Bernhardi to resume the position which can be filled by no better or worthier man than he. Call him back, gentlemen, I adjure you, call him back.

EBEN. May I venture to inquire whether Professor Pflugfelder has reached the end of his rhapsody? It seems so. Well then, gentlemen, we can go on with the agenda.

PFLUG. Good day, gentlemen.

CYPRIAN. Good-bye.

LOEWEN. You are no longer a quorum.

SCHREIM. We shall not desert the Institute.

FILITZ. We shall take the responsibility of passing our resolutions without your help.

PFLUG (opening the door). Ah, just in the nick of time. Dr. Hochroitzpointner, please walk in.

LOEWEN. Hail to the new Vice-President!

PFLUG. Now the company is complete. My best wishes.
Exit Cyprian, Pflugfelder, Loewenstein.

EBEN. Do you want anything, Dr. Hoch —

HOCH. Oh! (Stands at the door hesitating.)

EBEN. Very well, then. Shut the door. (This is done.) Gentlemen, we will now resume the Meeting.

CURTAIN

ACT IV

Drawing room in Bernhardi's house. Doors at back, door right. Enter Pflugfelder and, immediately after him, Loewenstein.

LOEWEN (speaking behind the scenes). Professor Pflugfelder. (Enters.)

PFLUG. Ah, Loewenstein. Why, you are quite out of breath.

LOEWEN. I have been running after you right up the street. (Questioningly.) Well, what?...

PFLUG. Weren't you at court?

LOEWEN. I was called away when the length of the term was being discussed. How long —?

PFLUG. Two months.

LOEWEN. Two months in spite of the Priest's evidence? Is it possible?

PFLUG. That evidence! Only the Priest himself benefited by it. It did Bernhardi no good.

LOEWEN. But that — How so? The Priest —

PFLUG. Why, didn't you hear the Public Prosecutor's speech?

LOEWEN. Only the beginning of it. Four times was I called away during these proceedings. Other times one can wait for days till it enters a patient's head —

PFLUG. Well, well, you have nothing to complain about on that score.

LOEWEN. What about the Public Prosecutor?

PFLUG. The Priest's evidence that he felt no violence, but only a light touch on the shoulder, gave the Public Prosecutor a welcome opportunity to picture his Reverence as a pattern of Christian forbearance and charity and, at the same time, to sing a pæan of praise to the whole priesthood — who could get on quite well without it.

LOEWEN. Then Bernhardi's conviction rests entirely on the evidence of this hysterical sister Ludmilla and that fine fellow Hochroitzpointner. For all the other witnesses cleared him completely. I must really apologize to Adler. He behaved splendidly. And Cyprian, too! Not to speak of your son.

Enter Cyprian.

PFLUG. Where is Bernhardi?

LOEWEN. Have they kept him there right away?

CYPRIAN. I expect he will come with Dr. Goldenthal.

PFLUG. Oh! Is he bringing him along?

CYPRIAN (annoyed). We can hardly do without the Counsel for the defence in our consultation to-day.

PFLUG. We ought to have done without him from the beginning.

LOEWEN. That's very true.

CYPRIAN. What have you got against him? He spoke excellently. Not very pungent perhaps....

PFLUG. Certainly no one could accuse him of that.

LOEWEN. Goldenthal behaved like a turncoat, which was only to be expected of him!

CYPRIAN. How so to be expected?

LOEWEN. A convert! His wife wears a cross that size. His son is being educated at Kalksburg, the Jesuit college. Those are the right sort of people.

CYPRIAN. You really get on one's nerves with your fixed idea.

LOEWEN. I am no ostrich to hide my head in the sand. Dr. Goldenthal is one of those who are always afraid some one might imagine they are — With a different lawyer, the matter might have ended otherwise.

CYPRIAN. I very much doubt it. With a different defendant, perhaps.

PFLUG. Eh!

CYPRIAN. Well, my friends, it is no use reproaching Bernhardi after the event — certainly not to-day. But even his most glowing admirers can hardly say that he behaved very wisely.

LOEWEN. How so? I was lost in admiration of him. That he could keep calm, even in the face of that rascal, Hochroitzpointner's evidence —

CYPRIAN. Calm, do you call it? It was mere obstinacy.

LOEWEN. Obstinacy? How do you make that out?

PFLUG (to Cyprian). I expect he was not present when Bernhardi demanded that Ebenwald should be subpoenad.

LOEWEN. Ah!

CYPRIAN. Didn't you know that? He wanted Flint, the Cabinet Minister, called as well.

LOEWEN. Magnificent!

CYPRIAN. It was anything but magnificent. What have Ebenwald and Flint to do with the case?

LOEWEN. Well, really now —

CYPRIAN. Absolutely nothing. It really looked like sensationalism.

PFLUG. But —

CYPRIAN. If you wanted to trace the matter to its roots, there would be no end to the people who might have been called to Court to-day. It would have been an illustrious assembly, I can tell you.

LOEWEN. Pity! Pity!
Enter Kurt.

PFLUG. Kurt! (Runs to him and embraces him.)

LOEWEN (to Cyprian). Why this touching family scene?

CYPRIAN. Haven't you heard? Kurt called Hochroitzpointner a liar in the open court.

LOEWEN. Did he?

CYPRIAN. Yes, and he was fined 200 Kronen for contempt of Court.

LOEWEN. My dear Dr. Pflugfelder, may I give you a kiss, too?

KURT. Many thanks, Professor. I will take it as done.

LOEWEN. Then at least let me pay a share of the 200

Kronen.

PFLUG. We'll see to that. But listen to me, Kurt. Don't you let it enter your head to fight that fellow —

KURT. Let him only challenge me. I would refer it to a duelling-committee. And then we shall see —

LOEWEN. He'll take good care to keep quiet.

KURT. I am afraid so too. But all the same, the Hochroitzpointner affair is not ended, even if the Bernhardi affair is.

CYPRIAN. Which we hope is not the case.

LOEWEN. What do you intend to do, Dr. Kurt?

Enter Dr. Goldenthal. Stout gentleman. Curly hair sprinkled with grey. Black side-whiskers. Stately. Somewhat unctuous and nasal.

GOLDEN. Good evening, gentlemen.

CYPRIAN. Where is Bernhardi?

GOLDEN. I advised the Professor to leave the Court by a side door.

LOEWEN. To escape the ovations prepared for him?

GOLDEN. Patience, gentlemen! That may still come.

CYPRIAN. Well, I must say —

GOLDEN. For, even if we have won no victory this time —

LOEWEN. That's certain, anyway.

GOLDEN. It was, at least, an honourable defeat.

PFLUG. At any rate in the eyes of those who are not going to prison.

GOLDEN (laughing). Do you mean the defending Counsel by that, Professor? That is one of the few unjust laws against which I have not yet felt impelled to agitate. (Changes his tone.) But now, gentlemen, let us speak seriously. Perhaps it is just as well that the Professor is not here yet, for I urgently wish to ask you to support me to the utmost in the coming consultation.

CYPRIAN. In what way?

GOLDEN. Our respected Professor Bernhardi is — how shall I say it? somewhat obstinate. Unfortunately it was apparent to-day in the course of the proceedings. This idea of calling the Cabinet Minister — and then his defiant silence — it made no good impression. We won't speak about it any more. But it seems that now Professor Bernhardi means to continue to play the injured party and intends to dispense in advance with all legal steps against the verdict — and that —

CYPRIAN. I expected something of the sort.

LOEWEN. And your idea, I presume, is to appeal.

GOLDEN. Naturally.

LOEWEN. Anyway, it would be hopeless.

PFLUG. I know what we ought to do now. We must appeal to the public.

GOLDEN. Excuse me, Professor. The hearing was not behind closed doors.

PFLUG. We must appeal to the populace. That's what I mean. We've been foolish to keep silent so long. Look at our opponents. The Clerical papers have made all the commotion they could. It was entirely their doing that the charge against Bernhardi was not a civil but a criminal one and that he could be brought before a jury right away. They did not wait for the affair to be concluded before writing about it, as our Liberal papers seem to have thought necessary.

LOEWEN. They are more high-minded.

PFLUG. Yes, and it might sometimes be called by another name. But things have fallen out as they so often do in this world. What the unscrupulousness and hatred of our enemies could not quite accomplish, has been brought about by the laxity and cowardice of our so-called friends.

CYPRIAN. You want to speak to the people? To our populace? I should think to-day's jury might have given you a sample of what to expect.

PFLUG. Perhaps the right words were not found to touch them.

GOLDEN. Oh!

PFLUG. You may think me a fool if you like, but I believe in an elementary sense of Justice among heads untouched by legal quibbles — in the sound and healthy instinct of the people.

LOEWEN. Pflugfelder is right. We must hold meetings to give the people the true facts of the Bernhardi case.

CYPRIAN. It is quite probable that such meetings might be prohibited.

PFLUG. There are other opportunities. The Municipal Elections are near at hand.

CYPRIAN. Are you standing, perhaps?

PFLUG. No, but I shall speak. And I shall not fail to put the Bernhardi case —

CYPRIAN. What will you say? You will be reduced to saying the obvious —

PFLUG. And what if I am? If our opponents have the impudence to deny the obvious, we have no alternative but to shout it to the world again and again. The fear that some snobs might call us windbags must not frighten us into leaving the field clear for paradoxes and lies.

LOEWEN. And it is a question for consideration whether Bernhardi should not serve his two months anyway in the interest of the campaign. (Laughter.)

PFLUG. Certainly! The infamy practised against him would then become more conspicuous.
Enter Bernhardi and Oskar.

BERNH (who has just heard the others laughing, very cheerily). There seem to be high doings here. Let me join in. I must apologize for keeping you waiting.
Handshakes all round.

CYPRIAN. So you were able to escape the ovations.

BERNH. Not quite. To be on the safe side a few — gentlemen — were waiting at the side door also. They gave me a suitable reception.

LOEWEN. Did they unharness your horses?

BERNH. 'Down with the Jews', they cried. 'Down with the Freemasons'.

LOEWEN. You see!

BERNH. I hope to have the pleasure of your Company for supper, gentlemen. You might see, Oskar, whether things are in order. The fact is my housekeeper has given me notice. Her Father Confessor explained to her that she could not possibly remain in such a house without endangering her soul! So it will be rather a frugal repast as befits the table of a convicted prisoner. Why Oskar, I believe there are tears in your eyes. (Aside.) Don't be sentimental.

OSKAR. I am only raging.

Exit and returns in a few moments.
Enter Adler.

BERNH. Ah, welcome, Dr. Adler. A repentant sinner is more pleasing to me than ten righteous men.

ADLER (lightly). I was never a sinner, Professor. I repeat once more that these proceedings seemed unavoidable to me from the first. Of course I could not foresee that Hochroitzpointner would receive more credence at Court than Professor Cyprian or I.

CYPRIAN. We have nothing to complain of. The Priest fared no better.

GOLDEN. Yes, gentlemen, the Priest! That was a remarkable, one might almost say in a certain sense, a historic moment, when the Priest gave his evidence and — certainly only in answer to my question — expressed his conviction that Professor Bernhardi intended no hostile demonstration against the Catholic Church. One can measure the strength of certain tendencies among our populace to-day by the fact that even the Priest's evidence could do us no good.

BERNH. Had his Reverence had any fear of that, his evidence would no doubt have been different.

GOLDEN. Oh, Professor, how can you imagine that a servant of the Church would speak a deliberate untruth.

PFLUG. Such things have happened.

ADLER. I think, Professor, you are doing the Priest an injustice. His words and his whole manner seemed to express a measure of sympathy towards you. He is not quite an ordinary man. I had that impression even that time in the sickroom.

BERNH. Sympathy! I can only believe in that when its expression involves some personal risk.

GOLDEN. I doubt whether his Reverence will find his evidence to-day of much service to his future career. Anyway we will hope that he will be in a position to bear witness again — And then, Professor, if Justice is meted out to you, you yourself will also be more just.

BERNH. I have already told you, sir, that I decline to enter into any more litigation. To-day's case was a farce! I will not subject myself to these people, or their like, again. Besides, you know as well as I that it would be useless.

GOLDEN. It is impossible to say how a higher Court will —

PFLUG. The higher the worse.

GOLDEN. Gentlemen, I expect it has not escaped your notice that certain changes in the political situation have been brewing during the last few months.

LOEWEN. I see no signs of it. Matters are getting worse; and worse.

GOLDEN. Pardon me. I can feel a freer air being wafted through our land — and next time our case comes up, it may be tried under less clouded skies.

BERNH. And what is the utmost I could hope for? A favourable verdict. That would not satisfy me now. Even if I obtained Justice now, I should not be finished by a very long way with Messrs. Flint, Ebenwald and their tribe.

GOLDEN. My dear Professor, I have already told you that there is no legal redress for your complaints against these gentlemen.

BERNH. I shall be believed — even without legal proof.

GOLDEN. But these gentlemen can be charged with no offence at all, in a judicial sense.

BERNH. That is just why I wish to dispense with any further judicial handling of the case.

GOLDEN. It is my duty, Professor, to warn you against being over-hasty. I do so now, before witnesses. I can understand that the injustice you have suffered makes your blood boil. But the path which you seem inclined to take is beset with more lawsuits —

CYPRIAN. And new verdicts, no doubt.

BERNH. The truth will stand out clear, just as it does to-day.

PFLUG. Whatever you have in view, you may reckon on me.

LOEWEN. And on me. And I maintain that we must strike at the root of the whole system.

PFLUG. Flint must be sent to the devil.

GOLDEN. Gentlemen!

LOEWEN. Yes, this Flint, on whom you built such hopes and who has now become merely the catspaw of the Clericals. This so-called man of science under whom the parsons have become more impudent than ever. If this continues all our schools will be delivered up to the black brood by the Minister for Religion and Hypocrisy.

GOLDEN. Pardon me, it is a well-known fact that journalists of undoubtedly Liberal tendencies have the entrée to the Ministry of Education. And as regards the measures of the new Minister, to which you are obviously alluding, I must say, at the risk of earning your displeasure, that to me they do not appear to be worthless.

PFLUG. What? Are you in favour of the compulsory confession of schoolchildren? Do you approve of the foundation of a Catholic University?

GOLDEN. I don't say that I would send my sons there to study.

LOEWEN. Why not, Doctor? It will be possible to get there by through train from Kalksburg.

GOLDEN. Kalksburg, gentlemen, is one of the most excellent Colleges of which our country can boast. And I will take this opportunity to admit with pleasure that there may be among the much abused Clericals men of outstanding intellect and even, as we have seen to-day, men of courage and nobility. And my principle has always been, even in the heat of battle, respect for my opponent's convictions.

LOEWEN. The convictions of Minister Flint!

GOLDEN. He is the protector of all convictions. And that is his duty in the office to which Providence has called him. Believe me, gentlemen, there are matters which are best left alone — which should not be touched upon.

PFLUG. And why, if I may ask? All progress in the world is due to the fact that someone has had the courage to touch on matters of which the people, in whose interests it lay, cried 'hands off' for centuries.

GOLDEN. Your witty observation can hardly be applied in such a general sense, and anyway it can have no bearing on our affair as it no doubt lay far from our friend Bernhardi's intentions to further the world's progress.

LOEWEN. Time may show that he has done so, nevertheless.

BERNH. Oh, oh, you are letting your ideas run away with you.

PFLUG. As things stand at present your case can only be regarded from a general point of view. Your opponents have already made the start. The State Prosecutor also did not hesitate. You must have noticed it, Doctor.

GOLDEN. I could not follow the Public Prosecutor in this sphere. Politics are not my business. My duty is to conduct the defence.

PFLUG. It is a pity you did not fulfil that duty.

BERNH. Pflugfelder, I will not allow —

GOLDEN. Oh, let him talk, Professor; the matter begins to interest me. You consider that I did not fulfil my duty in defending my client?

PFLUG. For what my opinion is worth — no. For, on listening to you, Dr. Goldenthal, one must have obtained the impression that Bernhardi's behaviour towards the Priest caused the deepest offence to the religious feelings of the whole Catholic world, from his Holiness the Pope down to the pietist in the most remote village. And, instead of declaring quite simply that every doctor was bound to act as Bernhardi did and that none but a fool or a knave could dispute this, you found it necessary to depict what was his simple duty as a physician as an act of thoughtlessness needing an apology. You treated the malicious idiots on the jury, who had made up their minds from the first moment to find Bernhardi guilty, as the choicest brains of the Nation — and the judges who had, so to say, brought the term of imprisonment for Bernhardi with them in their dispatch cases, you treated as patterns of penetration and Justice. Even that ragamuffin Hochroitzpointner and Sister Ludmilla you handled with kid gloves and went so far as to credit these false witnesses with good faith. And you, you, Dr. Goldenthal, acted as though you yourself, in your innermost soul, believed in the indispensability and power of that sacrament, against which Bernhardi is supposed to have offended, and hinted that our friend Bernhardi is really very much in the wrong in not sharing these beliefs. You always gave first a polite nod to your client and then a deep obeisance towards the quarter where his enemies stood, towards stupidity, calumny and hypocrisy. If Bernhardi is satisfied with this, that is his concern, but I am afraid that I, Dr. Goldenthal, have not the right understanding for this kind of defence.

GOLDEN. And I can only say, Professor, that it is a great blessing your undoubted gifts have been applied to Medicine and not to Law, for, with your temperament and your conception of the dignity of a Court of Law, you would have managed to get the most innocent man into prison.

LOEWEN. You seem to have success in that direction also, Dr. Goldenthal, in spite of your fortunate lack of temperament.

BERNH. Now really, that is enough. I must ask you —
The door into the dining-room is opened.

GOLDEN (waving off the invitation). My dear Professor, happy the man who has such friends. I, for my part, will gladly bear the reproach that I am not one of those advocates who subject their clients to the anger of the judge merely for the sake of a rhetorical effect. But, of course, Professor, I would not think of forcing my advice on you any further and leave it to you —

CYPRIAN (to Pflugfelder). There you are!

BERNH. Oh, no, no, Dr. Goldenthal.

PFLUG. If anyone is to take his departure, it is, of course, I. I must ask your pardon, my dear Bernhardi, for letting myself be carried away, although I cannot withdraw anything I have said. Not another word, Bernhardi. I am in the way here. (Exit)

Enter Servant. Whispers to Bernhardi.

Bernhardi very much taken aback. Hesitates. Turns to Cyprian and away again without speaking.
All except Bernhardi have walked into the dining-room.

BERNH (to Servant). Ask him in.
Exit Servant.
Bernhardi draws curtain over dining-room door.
Enter Priest.

BERNH (receiving him at the door). Come in.

PRIEST. Good evening, Professor.

BERNH. A visit of condolence, your Reverence?

PRIEST. Not quite that. But I had an irresistible desire to speak to you to-day, still.

BERNH. I am at your service, your Reverence.
He offers the Priest a chair. Both sit dozen.

PRIEST. In spite of the unfavourable result of the hearing, Professor, I am sure you realize that the verdict against you can in no sense be said to lie at my door.

BERNH. Were I to attempt to give you thanks, your Reverence, for having spoken the truth under oath, I must needs fear to give offence. So —

PRIEST (already somewhat put out). I did not come here to receive your thanks, Professor, although I went beyond my mere duty as a witness. For if you will cast your mind back, you will remember that, in answer to a question from your advocate, I expressed my conviction without hesitation that your attitude towards me at the sickroom door was in no way actuated by feelings of hostility towards the Catholic Church.

BERNH. Certainly in this your Reverence exceeded the scope of your duty, but perhaps the effect which your announcement produced is sufficient reward to you for this.

PRIEST. Whether this effect will be universally favourable to me, Professor, outside the four walls of the Law Court, is an open question, which we will not discuss. But you may readily imagine that I did not come here to recapitulate in private what I have already said in public. What induced me to call on you to-day still, at so late an hour, is the fact that I have a further admission to make.

BERNH. A further admission?

PRIEST. Yes. In Court I expressed my conviction that you had no animosity towards me — or towards that which I represent. But now I feel myself compelled to admit that in this particular case — only in this case, mind you — you acted absolutely correctly in your capacity as a doctor — that within the sphere of your duties, just as I in mine, you could not have acted differently.

BERNH. Do I understand you aright? You admit that I did absolutely the right thing — that I could not have done otherwise?

PRIEST. That, as a doctor, you could not have done otherwise.

BERNH (after a pause). If such is your opinion, your Reverence, I must say that the best, indeed the only, suitable opportunity for this admission was afforded a few hours ago.

PRIEST. I need hardly tell you that it was not lack of courage which sealed my lips. Otherwise should I be here now?

BERNH. Then — what —?

PRIEST. I will tell you, Professor. What silenced me in Court was the sudden insight that came to me like a Divine revelation that one word more might do incalculable harm to a Holy Cause, to that cause which to me is the most sacred in the world.

BERNH. I can hardly imagine, your Reverence, that to a man of your courage there could be a holier cause than Truth.

PRIEST. What? Nothing holier than the insignificant truth, which I might have upheld to the end, in this one small instance? Why, not even you could maintain that had I publicly admitted not only your good intentions — in which I already went further than the majority of my well-wishers will ever forgive me — but had also conceded your right to turn me away from the bed of a dying woman, a Christian, a sinner, then the enemies of our Holy Church would have seized on my words and used them to an extent for which I did not dare to be responsible. For our enemies are not all honourable men, Professor, as you are no doubt aware. And the unimportant truth to which I should have given utterance, would have become in a higher sense a lie. And what would have been the outcome of it? I should have stood before my superiors, to whom I owe duty and obedience — and even before my God — not only as a man of ill-considered lenience — but as a renegade and a traitor. That is why I held my peace.

BERNH. In that case, why speak now?

PRIEST. Because, in the moment when that revelation came to me, I swore a silent oath to make personally to you, the only man who really has a right to hear it, the confession which in public would only have been misunderstood and distorted.

BERNH. Many thanks, your Reverence. And let us hope you will never be in a position to bear public witness where larger issues are at stake than — my insignificant fate. For it might easily happen that, even at such a time, you might regard as Divine Revelation what appears to me to be merely personal caution upon your part, and that then an even higher truth than the one which you represent and guard, might be endangered.

PRIEST. I can admit of no higher truth, Professor, than my Church. And the most sacred commands of my Church are loyalty and submission. And if I were to be cast out of the Community, which sheds such limitless blessings upon the world, it would go other with me, Professor, than with a man who follows an independent calling, as you do for instance — I should lose all opportunity for activity and the whole purpose of my existence would be lost.

BERNH. I believe, your Reverence, there have been priests whose purpose in life only sprang into being when they tore themselves loose from their Communities and proclaimed to the world that which they held to be the truth, fearing neither danger nor inconvenience.

PRIEST. Were I one of these, Professor —

BERNH. Well?

PRIEST. — then no doubt God would have permitted me to say at Court to-day what you alone are allowed to hear now, within these four walls.

BERNH. So, it was God who sealed your lips! And now God sends you to me to confess in private what you were forbidden to speak in public! I must say He makes things very convenient for you, your God!

PRIEST (rising). You will excuse me, I trust, Professor. I have nothing to add to my admission, which you curiously enough seem to regard as the confession of a wrong done to you. My vow certainly did not include a conversation with you upon matters on which we can have no common ground.

BERNH. So, you shut the door in my face, your Reverence? However, I cannot accept this as a proof that you are within and I without the gates. All that remains to me now is to express my regret that your Reverence should have had the trouble of this visit in vain.

PRIEST (not without irony). In vain?

BERNH. Yes — since I am unable to absolve you as completely as you might expect after so unusual a step.

PRIEST. Absolution? I do not seek it. Perhaps all I wanted was reassurance. And that has been given to me in greater measure than I dared to hope. For now, Professor, I begin to see the whole matter in a new light. It has become clear to me that the whole motive of my visit, of my inspiration, was based on an error.

BERNH. Oh!

PRIEST. I had no confession to make to you as I wrongly thought, but only to rid myself of a doubt. Of a doubt, Professor, of which I myself was hardly conscious when I entered this room. But now it is dispelled and light has entered my soul. I very much regret, Professor, that I must take back what I admitted to you a few minutes ago —

BERNH. How can you take it back now? I have accepted it.

PRIEST. It holds good no longer. For now I know, Professor, that you were not in the right when you sent me away from that death-bed.

BERNH. Ah!

PRIEST. Not you! Others, in a like case, might have been justified. But you are not such a one. I know it now. At best it is self-deception on your part to think that it was your duty as a physician, or human compassion, that compelled you to refuse me admission to the sickroom. This compassion — this sense of duty — were only pretexts, perhaps not quite consciously, but all the same only pretexts.

BERNH. Pretexts? Have you forgotten already, your Reverence, what you admitted to me only a moment ago, that a responsibility rests on me as on you?

PRIEST. That I still concede. What I dispute now, is that you were actuated by this sense of responsibility in refusing me admission to the death-chamber. The real motive of your attitude towards me was not your sense of responsibility, not the noble impulse of the moment as you imagine and as I myself came near to believing. It lay much deeper — in the very roots of your being. Yes, Professor, the real motive was — how shall I put it — an antipathy towards me — an unconquerable antipathy, I might even say animosity —?

BERNH. Animosity —?

PRIEST. — Against all that this garment represents for you and others of your kind. Oh, you have given me sufficient proofs during this conversation that that is how matters stand. And now I know also that, at that time, just as to-day, your whole attitude, every word you spoke, expressed this deep and insurmountable animosity, which a man of your type finds unconquerable against any of my calling.

BERNH. Animosity! You repeat again and again. What if it were so? What I have suffered in the course of the last few weeks, this whole agitation against me, which you yourself find false and unworthy — is not this sufficient justification for what you call animosity — even though it comes after the event, assuming that a spark of it was in me before? And I will not deny that, though by birth I have a strong, even a combative sense of Justice, I have nevertheless during the last few weeks, felt the beginnings of such animosity rising up in me — not for you so much as for the — company that has gathered round you. But one thing I can swear to — at the moment when I denied your Reverence entry to the sickroom — there was no breath of such animosity in me. I stood before your Reverence a physician, as pure in heart as ever any member of your calling performing a Church rite at the altar. No less pure in heart than you, who came to bring my patient the last religious consolations. You knew this when you entered my room a moment ago. You confessed it to me. You should not suddenly cast out this conviction because you feel, as I also feel, and have perhaps never felt more strongly than in this hour, that something stands between us — a something which will not be denied, even under more pleasant conditions.

PRIEST. And you never felt it more strongly than in this hour?

BERNH. Yes, in this hour, when I stand facing perhaps one of the most enlightened of your calling. And now it seems to me, your Reverence, that animosity is too poor and small a word for that which parts us, and will probably part us for all time. It appears to me as something far deeper — and more hopeless.

PRIEST. You may be right there, Professor. Hopeless. Just in this instance, between you and me, it manifests itself. For I have often had opportunity for similar conversations, frequently treading on delicate ground, with men of your circles — scholars, enlightened men (slightly mocking), but never did the possibility of an understanding seem so remote as now. However, perhaps just on the evening of this day, I should not have allowed myself to be led into such a discussion.

BERNH. I trust, your Reverence, your opinion of me is not so low as to suggest that the bad humour I have acquired from to-day's proceedings, is responsible for my outlook on the world.

PRIEST. No, indeed, Professor. When so deep, so unfathomable a chasm opens up between two such men as you and I, who have no personal animosity towards one another, the trouble must certainly have deeper roots. And in my opinion it lies in the fact that while some understanding might be reached between belief and doubt — none is possible 'twixt humility and — you must excuse the word in view of some of your utterances — arrogance!

BERNH. Arrogance —? And you, your Reverence, who can find no milder word for what you suspect in the depths of my soul, do you really think yourself free from animosity — towards men of my type?

PRIEST (inclined to be hasty, then mastering himself, with hardly perceptible smile.) I know myself to be free. My religion, Professor, bids me love even those who hate me.

BERNH (impressively). And mine, your Reverence, or what is planted in my breast in place of religion, bids me bring comprehension even where I am misunderstood.

PRIEST. I don't doubt your good intentions. But comprehension has its limits, Professor. Where material thoughts are paramount, there exists, as you will, no doubt, often have experienced yourself, error and self-deception. What never deceives, what cannot deceive a man of my type is (hesitatingly) is — I had better choose a word at once, Professor, against which even you cannot cavil — the spirit within.

BERNH. Let us call it that, your Reverence. I also endeavour to put my trust in this spirit within, although in my soul it may flow from different sources than in yours. What else remains to us — when all is said? And if it comes harder to a man of my type, than to one of yours, then the God who created you with so humble a mind and me with so much — arrogance — this incomprehensible God will have had His reasons for this also.

The Priest gives him a long look — then, with a sudden decision, holds out his hand to him.

BERNH (hesitating, smiling a little). Across — the chasm — your Reverence?

PRIEST. Let us refrain from looking down for a moment.
Bernhardi gives him his hand.

PRIEST. Good-bye, Professor.

Exit.
Bernhardi alone, seems undecided for a moment. His brow wrinkles in meditation, then becomes clear again; he makes a gesture as though shaking something off, then draws back curtain and opens door. The others are seen sitting at table, some already standing and smoking.

CYPRIAN. At last!

ADLER. We are already at the cigars.

CYPRIAN (coming through door towards Bernhardi). What was it? A patient — so late?

BERNH. Your question is hard to answer.

OSKAR (also coming out of dining-room). Here are a few telegrams for you, father.

BERNH (opens one). Ah, that's good.

CYPRIAN. May I ask what it is?

BERNH. A former patient who assures me of his sympathy. A poor devil who was lying ill a few weeks at the Elizabeth Institute.

GOLDEN. May I see? Florian Ebeseder.

LOEWEN. Ebeseder? Florian? That seems to be a Christian.

PFLUG (touching his shoulder). Such things happen!

BERNH (opens another telegram). Good God! (To Cyprian.) Look at that!

ADLER. Read it out, read it out!

CYPRIAN (reads), 'We assure the courageous champion of freedom and enlightenment of our heartiest sympathy and respect, and assure him that we shall always stand by him in his fight against the obscurantists — Dr. Reiss, Walter Koenig—'

BERNH. Never heard these names before.

GOLDEN. This is a most welcome demonstration. It is to be presumed that it will not be an isolated one.

BERNH. And can nothing be done against it?

GOLDEN. What? Against it —?

OSKAR. Father, won't you sit down and have some supper now?
Servant enters with card.

BERNH. What is it now?

OSKAR (reads). The chairman of the Brigittenau Freethinkers.

BERNH. The Freethinkers from Brigittenau — lam not at home. Please tell the gentlemen that I am not in.

GOLDEN. But why?

BERNH. I am already in gaol. I am executed.
(Goes into dining-room. The others follow, with the exception of Goldenthal and Lowenstein.)

GOLDEN (to the servant, whom he catches at the door). Tell the gentlemen that the Professor is very tired now, but he will — When is the Professor's consulting hour?

SERVANT. From two o'clock onwards.

GOLDEN. Well then, it will give the Professor pleasure to receive the gentlemen to-morrow at a quarter to two.
Exit Servant.

LOEWEN. It will give him pleasure? Are you sure of that?

GOLDEN. Leave it to me to guard my client's interests.
Loewenstein shrugs his shoulders and goes into the dining-room.
Enter Servant with card.

GOLDEN (turns to him). What's this? Let me see. Oh!

SERVANT. The gentleman will not be put off.

GOLDEN. Ask him in.

Exit Servant.
Goldenthal clears his throat. Prepares himself.
Enter Kulka.

KULKA. Oh, Dr. Goldenthal, if I am not mistaken?

GOLDEN. That is my name. We know each other, Dr. Kulka.... You must make do with me for to-day. The Professor is somewhat fatigued as you may imagine.

KULKA. Fatigued?... H'm!... Then I had better — I could not face my Chief —

GOLDEN. But you hear —

KULKA. Certainly I hear. I also understand. But what's the use of that? If I can't see the Professor I shall only get the blame for it.

GOLDEN. Perhaps I can be of service to you?

KULKA (hesitating). If you would be so kind — May I ask whether it is true that Professor Bernhardi does not intend to appeal?

GOLDEN. As a matter of form we have reserved time for consideration.

Kulka takes out his notebook.

GOLDEN (influenced by the notebook, talks as though making a speech). For, though it does not enter our minds to cast the slightest doubt on the legal knowledge and wisdom of our Austrian judges, or to mistrust the sound sense of our fellow-citizens on the jury, still we cannot shake off the suspicion that the prejudiced attitude of a certain section of our press, which we will not designate more nearly, prepared the way for a miscarriage of Justice and —

Enter Bernhardt.

KULKA. Ah, Professor —

BERNH. What is all this?

GOLDEN. I took the liberty, Professor, as you did not wish to be disturbed — and I think I expressed your —

BERNH. With whom have I the pleasure?

KULKA. Kulka of the Topical News. My Chief who has the pleasure of your personal acquaintance, asks to be remembered to you and —

GOLDEN. Reports have been spread, which it would be best to contradict at once.

KULKA. It is said, Professor, that you decline to take further legal steps —

GOLDEN. I have already explained to Dr. Kulka that we have reserved time for consideration.

BERNH. That's true.

Enter singly from the next room, Lowenstein, Cyprian, Adler, Kurt, Oskar.

KULKA. I am very grateful to you for this explanation. And now, Professor, I have to convey to you a special request from my Chief. During to-day's proceedings you suggested that the Minister of Education should be called. It would appear from this that there are aspects of the case which did not come to light during the hearing, or which were perhaps purposely suppressed. My Chief would be honoured, Professor, to offer you the hospitality of the columns of our paper —

BERNH (with a gesture of refusal). Thank you. Thank you —

KULKA. You are, no doubt, aware, Professor, that although our paper placed the fullest trust and confidence in his Excellency at the beginning of his official career, we have lately been forced to put up an energetic opposition to surprising anti-progressive, not to say reactionary measures of the Minister of Education, although, as has always been our policy, we have preserved the moderation which seems to be essential for fruitful work — even in the political arena. And so, in our fight for progress and freedom, we would naturally welcome in our ranks a man whose passion, curbed by discernment, assures us of an ally who —

BERNH. Excuse me, I am no ally.

KULKA. But we are your allies, Professor.

BERNH. No doubt you imagine so at the moment. My matter is a purely personal one.

LOEWEN. But —

KULKA. Many a personal matter holds the seed of a political event. Yours —

BERNH. That is an accident by which I refuse to be governed. I belong to no party and wish to be adopted by none —

KULKA. You will hardly be able to escape it, Professor —

BERNH. Then I will do nothing towards it. Whoever becomes my partisan, does so at his own risk. (Speaking lightly with his characteristic ironical smile.) Just as I was accused to-day of having offended against the Catholic religion, next I might be suspected of being an enemy of another religion, perhaps one nearer to you —

KULKA. I am a freethinker, Professor. We all are — at any rate inwardly. Our standpoint, the standpoint of my paper, as is well known, is that of absolute freedom of thought. What does Frederick say?
'Let every man work out his own salvation.'

BERNH. Then please apply this principle to me also. Give my best thanks to your Chief for his kind invitation, but it would be a direct misuse of his confidence, if I were to avail myself of his offer. I should be sailing under false colours.

KULKA. Is that really your last word, Professor?

BERNH. My last word seldom differs from my first.

KULKA. My Chief will be extremely sorry... I am quite at a loss — but should you still decide to give public expression to your grievance against his Excellency, Professor, may I ask that no other publication —

BERNH. You may rely on it that, whatever steps I take, I shall never shelter under the wing of any newspaper. My best regards to your Chief.

KULKA. Thank you, Professor. Good day, gentlemen.

Exit. Short, uncomfortable pause.

CYPRIAN. Well, that was hardly necessary.

GOLDEN. I also must say, Professor —

BERNH. Don't you understand yet, gentlemen, that I will have nothing whatsoever to do with people who wish to make a political affair out of my case.

LOEWEN. But it is a political matter.

GOLDEN. Certainly, as matters have developed, you stand in the midst of a political conflict. And we really ought to welcome —

BERNH. I beg of you, Doctor, welcome nothing. I fight no political battle. The ridiculous war cry, which is rising up from all sides, will not tempt me to play a part which does not suit me and for which I do not feel competent, since I should only be playing a part. And as regards the time for consideration, Dr. Goldenthal, I should be obliged if you will consider it terminated.

GOLDEN. I do not understand —

BERNH. I wish to begin my term of imprisonment as quickly as possible. Preferably to-morrow.

CYPRIAN. But —

BERNH. I want to have the whole business behind me. That is the only thing that matters to me now. The whole of these past months are as good as wasted for my work and my profession. Nothing but conferences and hearings. And what has come of it all? As a legal question the whole thing was distasteful enough: now I am about to see it develop into a political storm. And from that I shall flee, to prison if there is no other refuge. My business is to cure people, or, at any rate to persuade them that I can do so. And to this I want to return with all possible speed.

LOEWEN. And your revenge?

BERNH. Who talks of revenge?

LOEWEN. Well, what about Flint and Ebenwald? Surely you won't let these gentlemen go scot-free.

BERNH. It will not be revenge — merely a settling up. But I do not intend to let a skirmish with these people suddenly become my life-work. Never fear. They will get their due.

CYPRIAN. Whether you wish to follow the matter up politically, or quite privately, I still maintain that it was not necessary to show this Kulka the door.

GOLDEN. I, also, should like to emphasize that the friendship of the publication which Dr. Kulka represents —

BERNH (interrupting him). My dear Doctor, one's enemies one must take as and where one finds them; my friends I can choose for myself — fortunately —

CURTAIN

ACT V

An office at the Ministry. Furnished suitably, not without comfort. Councillor Winkler, about 45, looks younger, slim, fresh countenance, small moustache, close-cut fair hair sprinkled with grey and sparkling blue eyes, alone, busy with documents. He gets up and places documents in drawer. Telephone bell.

COUNCILLOR (goes back to table, speaking into telephone). This is the Ministry of Education. No, Councillor Winkler. Oh, Professor Ebenwald. He is not here yet. Perhaps in half an hour. He will certainly not go to Parliament before half-past one. Yes, I am sorry I can give no information about that, at any rate not on the 'phone. I shall be very pleased. Good day, Professor. (Rings off; continues his previous occupation.) Messenger enters, brings post and a visiting-card.

COUNCILLOR. Doctor Kulka?

MESSENGER. He wishes to see his Excellency in person.

COUNCILLOR. He must come again later, then.

MESSENGER. There were also two other journalists here earlier in the day. They are coming again, too.

COUNCILLOR. Well, you need not announce these newspaper men to me at all. They all want to see his Excellency in person.
Exit Messenger.

Telephone rings.

COUNCILLOR. This is the Ministry of Education. Councillor Winkler. Yes — ah, I think I know that voice. Charmed, dear lady. This evening? Yes, with pleasure, if at all possible. — I have nothing to say about the Election — No — I won't have pretty women bothering their heads about politics — Nobody understands them. — You have time for that in another twenty years, dear lady — Au revoir. Best regards to your husband. (Rings off.)

Messenger enters with card.

COUNCILLOR. What, another of them? Ah, Dr. Feuermann. Ask him in.
Exit Messenger. Enter Dr. Feuermann. Feuermann bows very low.

COUNCILLOR. Good day, Doctor. What brings you here?

FEUER. I come about a very serious matter, Councillor.

COUNCILLOR. Oh, I hope you have had no more accidents, Doctor, as the good sense of the worthy citizens of Ober-Hollabrunn has only just —

FEUER. It is true, Councillor, that I was acquitted. But what is the use of it? No patient comes near me. If I stay in Ober-Hollabrunn as District Doctor, I shall simply starve. I am therefore putting in an application for a transfer, and —

Telephone rings.

COUNCILLOR. Excuse me, Doctor. (Into telephone.) Yes, Councillor Winkler speaking. Oh — What? No — You don't say so! Really! Sister Ludmilla. That is an extraordinary coincidence. Why, he is released to-day — Professor Bernhardi, of course. To-day, yes. You are coming round yourself? Yes. How extraordinary! Of course I will say nothing to his Excellency for the present, if you wish it. Good day. (Rings off — at first very moved, then turns to Feuermann.) Now, sir!

FEUER. And specially wished to seek for your support, Councillor — as you always —

Enter Flint.

FLINT. Good day, Councillor. (Notices Feuermann.) Ah!

FEUER (bowing very low). Excellency, my name is Dr. Feuermann.

FLINT. Ah yes — I know. From the Sunday paper.

COUNCILLOR (aside). As it happens, no journalist, your Excellency — Dr. Feuermann of Hollabrunn —

FLINT. Ah yes — Dr. Feuermann —

COUNCILLOR (aside). He was charged with a so-called technical error and acquitted.

FLINT. Yes, I remember. Professor Filitz made a brilliant report. Ten votes against two.

FEUER. Nine against —

FLINT. My congratulations, my dear Dr. Feuermann.

FEUER. I am deeply touched, Excellency, that my insignificant affair —

FLINT. No matter is insignificant to me. There must not be such a thing for one in my position. In a higher sense all matters are equally important.

(He glances casually, but seeking approval, at Winkler.)

And it may be some satisfaction to you to know that a thorough reform of medical study is under consideration, not unconnected with the impression made by your 'insignificant affair'. I hope it will be possible to effect this as a matter of routine. If only one did not have always to ask Parliament (glance at Councillor) how easy it would be to govern.

COUNCILLOR. At any rate much quicker, and that's the main thing.

FEUER. I took the liberty, your Excellency —

COUNCILLOR. I presume all that is included in your petition, Doctor.

FEUER. I would only like to say still —

COUNCILLOR. No doubt that is also written there —

FEUER. Oh, yes.

COUNCILLOR. Then let me have it, Doctor. It will be attended to as quickly as possible. Good day to you, Doctor.

FLINT (who has meanwhile been handed some newspapers by the messenger). Good day, Doctor. (Shakes hands with Feuermann and Feuermann goes.)

FLINT (looking over a paper). What does he really want?

COUNCILLOR. Application for a transfer, Excellency. Of course the poor devil is being boycotted in OberHollabrunn, in spite of the favourable verdict —

FLINT. Well, I suppose you yourself would hardly have him to attend you.

COUNCILLOR. Not if I were about to have a child, at any rate.

FLINT (throwing newspaper aside angrily). What other news is there?

COUNCILLOR. Professor Ebenwald telephoned. He will call in during the morning.

FLINT. What again? He was only here day before yesterday.

COUNCILLOR. Well, you see, they need money urgently in the Elizabeth Institute. They are up to their eyes in debt.

FLINT. Why, the Trustees withdrew their resignation after Bernhardi left.

COUNCILLOR. Yes, but you see it has since transpired that the only one who kept things a bit alive on the Committee was Bernhardi. Since he went they are all asleep. Even I.

FLINT. They must have a subvention. I promised it some time ago to Bernhardi.

COUNCILLOR. We have an enormous estimate this time, Excellency; we can't squeeze out more than three thousand. As it is, the Finance Minister is already angry with us. I am not at all sure yet whether we shall get the money for the new building for the Physiological Institute. And that is—'

FLINT. If we can't carry it through in the Budget statement — and a few other things as well — I shall ask for a special supplementary credit in Parliament.

COUNCILLOR. Oh!

FLINT. They won't refuse it. The Liberals and Social Democrats can't do it, as it would be cutting away the ground under their own feet if they were suddenly to counsel the Government to economize on educational buildings. And as regards the Christian Socialist party, I should think I have the right to expect that they will make no difficulties. Don't you agree with me?

COUNCILLOR. Certainly these gentlemen have every cause for gratitude towards your Excellency.

FLINT. You are wide off the mark, Councillor. Gratitude is no factor in political life, it's more a matter of balancing accounts. Come to that, I have still to congratulate you on yesterday's County elections. Ten Social Democratic gains, that was more than one could expect.

COUNCILLOR. I would rather you reserved your congratulations until after the Parliamentary elections, your Excellency.

FLINT. The Parliamentary elections may have a different result, as the majorities yesterday were not exactly overwhelming. So don't triumph too soon, Sir Anarchist.

COUNCILLOR. You are treating me to rapid advancement, your Excellency. Just now I was distinguished by the title of 'Social Democrat'.

FLINT. No such great difference.

COUNCILLOR. I must not omit to offer you my congratulations on yesterday's speech.

FLINT. Speech. They were only a few improvised words. But they were effective.

COUNCILLOR. That is the general opinion. (Pointing to the papers.)

FLINT. Anyway, Councillor, it shows praiseworthy detachment on your part that you join in the congratulations. I was really afraid of you.

COUNCILLOR. You flatter me!

FLINT. For it seemed very unlikely to me, my dear Councillor, that you should be in favour of an increase in the hours devoted to religious education.

COUNCILLOR. And what about your Excellency?

FLINT. My dear Councillor, my private attitude towards this or that question is a separate story. Only political dilettantes would chatter freely about their own opinions. Conviction gives but a hollow ring to one's utterance. What is effective, even in politics, is the counterpoint.

COUNCILLOR. Until someone comes with a new melody, your Excellency.

FLINT. That's good. But to leave these metaphors and return to reality, do you really believe, my dear Councillor, that the people to-day are ripe, or ever will be ripe, for an existence without religion?

COUNCILLOR. What I understand by religion, your Excellency, can be learnt better anywhere else than in a bible class.

FLINT. Well, are you an Anarchist, my dear Councillor, or not?

COUNCILLOR. It seems your Excellency that a Civil Servant has no alternative but to be an anarchist — or a fool —

FLINT (laughing). Oh, I think you must concede a few intermediate steps. But, take my word for it, my dear Councillor, anarchy is a fruitless state of mind. I have also been through that phase. It is all over now. My present philosophy can be expressed in two words — work, achieve! Against this compelling demand, all else retreats into the background. And as I have all sorts of plans on hand, as you know, for which I need the support of Parliament, I am unfortunately forced to make concessions. The Anarchists also make them, my dear Councillor, otherwise they could not become Councillors. (More seriously.) But you are mistaken, if you think that such concessions always come easy. Or do you really think, my dear Councillor, that it was an easy matter for me to throw my old friend Bernhardi to the wolves. But it was unavoidable. One day the circumstances will become clear. They are all stored up in my mind. And should the time come when I can shake off certain people, well, I will say no more — but it will be understood one day that I am not a Minister for Education and Clericalism as some reporter chooses to call me to-day, in a so-called leading article.

COUNCILLOR. Ah!

FLINT. That phrase is quite after your heart, I suppose. And it isn't even his own. It comes from that worthy Pflugfelder who recently said it at one of those highly superfluous election meetings, where he found it necessary to drag out the Bernhardi affair. Altogether I find, my dear Councillor, that the authorities were sadly lacking in energy at some of these meetings.

COUNCILLOR. But the meeting at which Pflugfelder spoke was dispersed. What more can you want?

FLINT. Yes, but when? Only when Pflugfelder attacked the Archbishop for having transferred the Priest who spoke so favourably of Bernhardi, to somewhere on the Polish frontier.

COUNCILLOR. Well, naturally the Archbishops have higher protection from the Government than the Ministers of State.

FLINT. This Bernhardi affair. It seems the people won't let it die down. An absolutely perfidious article appeared lately in the Worker, your organ, Councillor.

COUNCILLOR. It was not badly written. But I have no organ and I am against all newspapers.

FLINT. Not more than I. And now even the Liberal papers, who did restrain themselves a little, have started to paint Bernhardi as a sort of martyr, a political sacrifice to clerical intrigues. Have you seen to-day's article in the Topical News. It is a veritable festive greeting to Bernhardi on the occasion of his release from prison. It is really a bit too strong.

COUNCILLOR. Bernhardi is innocent of it, at any rate.

FLINT. I am not so sure. He likes himself in the rôle. You are well aware that already in the third week of his imprisonment he was advised that a petition to His Majesty might no doubt be favourably received. You yourself undertook the mission to him.

COUNCILLOR. You know I did my best to persuade him, your Excellency. All the same it pleased me that he would not hear of applying for a pardon.

FLINT. Well, it would be a pity if he allowed his friends to drive him still deeper into a morass where he must always come off worst. For I am not at all inclined to let these intrigues continue much longer — and the Minister of Justice, to whom I broached the topic yesterday, is quite in agreement with me. We are dealing with a Res Judicata, and we are quite prepared, if necessary, to act without any consideration. And, if this should be necessary, I should be sorry for Bernhardi's sake. For, however unwisely he has behaved so far, and in spite of all the unpleasantness he has caused me, I still feel a certain sympathy for him here (pointing to his heart.) It seems that one can never rid oneself of such feelings.

COUNCILLOR. Of course, youthful friendship —

FLINT. Yes, that's just it. But anyone in my position ought to be quite free from such sentimentalities. After all, how does it affect the question that we were assistants together at Rappenweiler's twenty-five years ago, and that we went for walks together in the hospital gardens and confided our plans to each other? In my position one should have no memories, no heart if possible; we should walk over dead bodies — yes, my dear Winkler —

Messenger enters with card.

COUNCILLOR. Professor Ebenwald.

FLINT. Ask him in.
Exit Messenger.

FLINT. How much did you say we might ask for the Elizabeth Institute?

COUNCILLOR. Three thousand —
Enter Ebenwald. Bows.

FLINT. Good morning, my dear Professor. Or should I say Director?

EBEN. Not yet, your Excellency. Only temporary. It is not at all out of the question that Professor Bernhardi may be re-elected within the next few days. You know he was only suspended.

COUNCILLOR. There might be a hitch in a re-election. For, as matters stand at present, Bernhardi is neither Professor nor even Doctor.

EBEN. Oh well, there is no doubt that the civil penalties will soon be remitted. Thanks to the efforts of some of his friends, and a certain section of the Press there seems to be a revulsion of feeling in his favour. No doubt your Excellency is aware that he has just been escorted home in triumph from jail.

FLINT. What's that?

EBEN. Yes, my students have just told me about it.

FLINT. What does 'in triumph' mean?

EBEN. Well, it is said that a number of students met him at the prison gates and greeted him with cheers.

FLINT. All we need now is a torchlight procession.

COUNCILLOR. If your Excellency would like orders to be issued —

EBEN. If I may be permitted the remark, I think it extremely likely that these demonstrations are not unconnected with yesterday's election results.

FLINT. Do you think so? You may be right. You see, my dear Winkler, they are not to be regarded too lightly. Not that I would attach any particular importance to these demonstrations. No doubt they were Zionists.

EBEN. Even they are gaining some power ——

FLINT. Ah well! (changing his tone). You have come concerning the Subvention, Professor?

EBEN. Yes, your Excellency.

FLINT. Unfortunately we shall only be able to put a fraction of the anticipated sum at your disposal: on the other hand, however, I am able to report that the most earnest consideration is being given to the question of making the Elizabeth Institute a State organization.

EBEN. Your Excellency knows as well as I what a long road lies between consideration and decision.

FLINT. Quite true, my dear Professor. But you must not forget that we are dealing not only with the Elizabeth Institute and not only with the Faculty of Medicine, but with the whole immense field of education, secular and religious.

EBEN. And we members of the Elizabeth Institute dare to hope that your Excellency, who is one of us, an academic teacher and ornament of our faculty, will give your special attention to this branch of medical education, so sadly neglected by your predecessor.

FLINT (to Winkler). This man knows my weak point. My dear Professor, I have never forgotten that I am physician and teacher. One can change in every other particular — but once a doctor always a doctor. I will tell you something, Professor, but don't repeat it, else it might be used against me in Parliament, sometimes I am actually homesick for the laboratory and the hospital. It is quieter and pleasanter work, I can assure you. And if you achieve something there, then the results are evident. In work such as ours, in politics I mean, where it is left for a future generation —

Messenger brings card.

COUNCILLOR. Professor Tugendvetter.

FLINT. I will leave him to you, my dear Councillor. If you please, Professor —

TUGEND. Good day, Councillor. I won't keep you long. 'Gaily flows the work along by happy chatter sped eh? Well, I take the liberty of inquiring once more how my matter is progressing.

COUNCILLOR. It is well in hand, Professor.

TUGEND. I hardly need to tell you, Councillor, that to me personally the title is nothing. But you know, my dear Councillor, what women are —

COUNCILLOR. How should I know that, Professor?

TUGEND. Oh yes. 'Alone am I, but lonely never' — eh? Well, between ourselves, my wife is crazy for the title of 'Imperial Court Councillor'. She can hardly bear to wait any longer. And if it could possibly be managed by the first of June — you know that's my wife's birthday. I should like to present her with the title as a birthday offering.

COUNCILLOR. A cheap and practical birthday present, at any rate.

TUGEND. So, if you could do something to hasten the matter, my dear Councillor —

COUNCILLOR (in a forced official manner). Unfortunately the Ministry of Education is not in a position to take any account of the Professors' personal affairs, or family matters, in their bestowal of titles, unless this should be provided for by a special mandate.

Messenger brings card.

COUNCILLOR (astonished). Ah!

MESSENGER. The gentleman would like to speak to his Excellency in person.

COUNCILLOR. There will be no objection to that, but it will be a special pleasure to me to see the Professor first in my office.

TUGEND. Am I in the way?

COUNCILLOR. A good friend of yours.

Enter Bernhardt.
Tugendvetter starts, astonished.

BERNH. Oh, you are not alone, Councillor?

TUGEND. Bernhardi!

COUNCILLOR (shaking him warmly by the hand.) I am very pleased to see you again, Professor.

BERNH. I am very pleased, too.

TUGEND. My greetings, Bernhardi. (Holds out his hand to him.)

BERNH (takes his hand coolly). Is his Excellency not to be seen?

COUNCILLOR. He won't be long. Take a seat, Professor.

TUGEND. Why, you — you look splendid. I — I — do you know that I absolutely forgot — how long is it since you —

COUNCILLOR (to Bernhardt). I must congratulate you on the ovations which you received earlier in the day.

TUGEND. Ova —

BERNH. You have already heard of it. But 'ovations' is rather too strong a term.

COUNCILLOR. There is even talk of a torchlight procession in front of your windows to-night — and of a serenade by the Brigittenau Freethinkers.

TUGEND. You know, my dear Bernhardi, it absolutely slipped my memory that your term of imprisonment was up to-day. Why, how quickly two months pass, after all!

BERNH. Especially for free men.

TUGEND. But you really do look splendid. Doesn't he, Councillor? If he had been to the Riviera he could not look better. Fresh as from a holiday.

COUNCILLOR. Perhaps you would like to commit a small act of sacrilege, Professor, then I could promise you as cheap a holiday.

TUGEND (laughs). My best thanks.

BERNH. I really did not have such a bad time. A guardian angel watched over me — the bad consciences of the people who got me there.

TUGEND. I am glad of the opportunity to tell you that my sympathies in this affair were always entirely on your side.

BERNH. Have you really found the opportunity at last? I'm glad of that.

TUGEND. I hope you never doubted that I —

BERNH. Would it not be possible to announce me to his Excellency? It is rather an urgent matter.

COUNCILLOR. I expect his Excellency will be here directly.

TUGEND. Do you know what I heard only the other day? I heard that you are going to write a history of your whole affair.

BERNH. IS that what people are saying?

COUNCILLOR. That should make an interesting book. You have had plenty of opportunity to get to know people; inside and out.

BERNH. As a matter of fact, my dear Councillor, I knew them pretty well before and, after all, it is not a very surprising matter if people treat you shabbily because they dislike you, or because they can draw some personal advantage from their behaviour. Only one class of people are still a mystery to me —

TUGEND. Namely —

BERNH. The people of impersonal malice. Those who behave badly, not for the slightest personal advantage, but out of pure pleasure in doing so.

FLINT (quickly self-possessed). Oh, Bernhardi.

EBEN (also quickly self-possessed). Good day, Professor.

BERNH. Good day, Professor. No doubt you are here in connection with the Elizabeth Institute?

EBEN. That is so.

FLINT. It is a question of a subvention —

BERNH. I always knew that the interests of my work would be well guarded by you, Professor — for the duration of my absence.

EBEN. Thank you for the testimonial, Professor.

FLINT (to Bernhardi). You wish to speak to me, Bernhardi?

BERNH. I shall not keep you very long.

COUNCILLOR (to Ebenwald and Tugendvetter). May I ask you, gentlemen —
Exit with the two others.

FLINT (quickly coming to a decision). I gladly take this opportunity, my dear Bernhardi, of congratulating you upon your release from prison. Unfortunately my official position forbade my conveying to you my painful astonishment at the result of your trial; it will, therefore, give me all the more pleasure, now that the business is over, to be of service to you in any possible way.

BERNH. Very kind of you, my dear Flint. As a matter of fact I have come to ask a favour of you.

FLINT. I am all attention.

BERNH. This is how matters stand. Prince Konstantin is seriously ill and has sent for me.

FLINT. Well — But I cannot see —

BERNH. He has sent for me as his doctor. I am to treat his case.

FLINT. Well, what hinders you?

BERNH. What hinders me? I don’t want to become guilty of a new breach of the Law.

FLINT. A breach of the Law?

BERNH. You know how matters stand. It would be quack doctoring if I undertook the treatment of Prince Konstantin again. As I was misguided enough to commit an act of sacrilege and was convicted for it, I have lost my diploma and the right to practise medicine. And therefore, I have taken the liberty of bringing here in person my petition for the remission of the civil penalties attached to my conviction. I come to you, my old friend who, as has been shown in other cases, are in a position somewhat to influence the decisions of the Minister of Justice, and, at the same time I ask you to speed the matter as far as possible, so that, in the case of my request being granted, the Prince should not be kept waiting too long.

FLINT. I see. I see. You have come here to mock at me —

BERNH. How so? I am only doing the correct thing. I have no desire whatever to be locked up again, although I had a comparatively easy time. So, if you will have the kindness — (Hands him the petition.)

FLINT. It is granted. I take all responsibility on myself. There is no reason whatever why you should not respond immediately to Prince Konstantin's call. I give you my word that no consequences of a penal nature will devolve upon you. Is that enough for you?

BERNH. It should be, as in this case no unpleasant consequences for you are likely to be bound up with the keeping of your word.

FLINT. Bernhardi!

BERNH. Your Excellency.

FLINT (quickly at his ease). Well, wasn't I right, my friend? Didn't I know at once that it was not for Prince Konstantin's sake you came here? But well and good. Let us spare a little time to discuss this matter at which you are hinting. In any case, we wouldn't avoid the subject. So you accuse me of breaking my word.

BERNH. I do, my dear Flint.

FLINT. And do you know my answer to that? That I have never broken my word. For the only promise I gave you was this — that I would intercede on your behalf. And I could do that in no better way than to bring your case to the light of day by process of the Law. Further, even had I done that which you call 'breaking my word', it would be foolish of you to reproach me with it, as you were a lost man in any case even had I kept my word. There was already a civil summons out against you and the trial could no longer have been avoided. Finally, however, you must understand that there is a higher aim in public life than to keep one's word, as you call it. And that is to keep one's goal in view, not to be turned aside from one's life-work. Never was I more keenly aware of this than at that remarkable moment when I was about to take up the cudgels for you and felt the ill humour, the distrust and the embitterment of the House welling up towards me and when, by a happy turn, I was able to calm the storm, to smooth the waves, and to become master of the situation.

BERNH. 'Turn' is an apt description.

FLINT. My dear Bernhardi, I had only two alternatives, as I recognized at that moment in a flash, either to plunge into an abyss with you, which would have been a crime towards myself, towards my mission and perhaps even to the State — or to give up a man who was lost in any case. And by accepting the latter course,

I preserved the possibility of building new Institutes, of reorganizing the curriculum of the various faculties in a manner suited to modern requirements, to raise the health of the people, to effect, or at any rate pave the way, for the most varied reforms in our intellectual life which, as you will admit yourself one day, are not too dearly paid for by two months' imprisonment. For I hope you do not think that I am particularly impressed by your martyrdom. Had it been for anything great that you endured these various discomforts, which are after all cancelled out now by a number of small triumphs, had it been for an ideal, for your fatherland, for your faith, then it might have evoked respect in me. But I see in your whole behaviour — as an old friend you will permit me the remark — nothing but a tragi-comedy of obstinacy, and I also make bold to doubt whether you would have carried it through with the same consistency if the flames still reached to heaven round the stake in Austria.

Bernhardi looks at him for a while, then begins to clap.

FLINT. What the —?

BERNH. Oh, I thought you might miss it.

FLINT. And have you no answer except this mediocre joke?

BERNH. What answers I could give you, you know as well as I do; and — as an old friend I may say it — you could find words for it better than I. So what use would it be for me to reply to you — here between four walls.

FLINT. I see. I see. Well, you must not think that the Ministry is unaware of the plans you are brewing. I only ask myself to what, under these circumstances, I owe the honour of your personal call. For I can hardly think that Prince Konstantin —

BERNH. Perhaps I was a little too thorough, my friend. It naturally interests me to know what explanation you can give for your behaviour towards me. And this entertainment between his Excellency and the discharged jailbird should make a quite effective closing chapter for a certain book, if the writing of it were worth while.

FLINT. Oh, I hope you will not be held back from it. It might serve as your election address right away.

BERNH. Election address?

FLINT. Oh, it is certainly only a question of days or even hours till you are offered a constituency.

BERNH. My dear Flint, I think I shall continue to leave the sphere of politics entirely to you.

FLINT. Politics! Politics! I wish you would leave me alone with that. The devil take politics! I accepted office merely because I knew that there is no one else in Austria to-day who can do what, after all, must be done. But even if I am destined to introduce a new era, these few years — or months — of office, will only remain an episode in my life. I have always known that, and from day to day I feel it more strongly. I am a physician, a teacher, I yearn for patients, for students —

Enter Winkler.

WINKLER. I beg your pardon, Excellency, for taking the liberty — but I have just received a very important communication from the Ministry of Justice — and as it concerns Professor Bernhardi's case —

BERNH. My case?

WINKLER. Yes. Sister Ludmilla, the Crown witness in your case, has made a statement, in which she accuses herself of having given false evidence at the hearing —

BERNH. Accuses herself —

FLINT. What, in Heaven's name —

WINKLER. Councillor Berman of the Ministry of Justice will be here shortly to give you a full report. But there is no doubt about the facts. Sister Ludmilla's written statement is at the Ministry.

FLINT. At the Ministry?

WINKLER. And of course, Professor, you will immediately reopen proceedings.

BERNH. Reopen proceedings?

WINKLER. Naturally.

BERNH. Not if I know it!

FLINT. Ah!

BERNH. To what end? Am I to go through the whole farce again? Under another guise? Every sensible man knows that I went to prison an innocent man. And no one can give me back my two months.

FLINT. Those two months! Always the two months. As though that were the point. Higher values are at stake here. You have no sense of justice, Bernhardi.

BERNH. Obviously.

FLINT. Do you know any further particulars, Councillor?

WINKLER. Not many. The most peculiar feature of the case is that, according to the Sister's statement, she first made the confession of her false evidence to her Father Confessor, who urged her to mitigate the consequences of her sin to the best of her powers.

FLINT. The Father Confessor?

WINKLER. Evidently he had no idea to what the matter referred —

FLINT. Indeed! How can you say that?

BERNH. To face the Court again? I would sooner certify the Sister as highly hysterical and unaccountable for her actions.

FLINT. That would be like you.

BERNH. Much satisfaction it would be to me to have this person locked up after the event —

WINKLER. But someone else might meet with the same fate. A certain gentleman called Hochroitzpointner might fare badly, especially as Nemesis is threatening him from another quarter also.

BERNH. Nemesis, in this case, no doubt, bearing the name of Kurt Pflugfelder?

WINKLER. I think so.

FLINT. You seem to be remarkably well informed.

WINKLER. My duty, your Excellency!

BERNH. I am sure that worm is not worth the waste of time. That our good Kurt, who might also find something better to do —

FLINT (who has been walking up and down). In Confession — that should give food for thought. Perhaps it will appear that Catholic customs may sometimes have beneficent results for members of other faiths also.

BERNH. I can dispense with the beneficent results. I want peace and quiet.

COUNCILLOR. It is to be assumed, Professor, that the renewal of the proceedings will not depend entirely on you. They will probably take their course, with or without you.

BERNH. Then it will have to be without me.

FLINT. I must point out to you, Bernhardi, that this matter is not to be decided entirely by your convenience. And it would certainly make an extraordinary impression if now, when the right path lies open to you, you were to choose a less worthy way to attain justice — to become entangled with people of all classes — reporters —

BERNH. I take no way at all. I have had my fill. For me the matter is closed.

FLINT. Dear! dear!

BERNH. Completely closed.

FLINT. So suddenly? And I even heard that you were to write a pamphlet on the subject or a whole book. Isn't that so, Councillor? You heard —

BERNH. I see that it is no longer necessary. And if the case is tried again my statement from the first trial is available. I have nothing at all to add to it. And this time I will dispense with his Excellency's evidence.

FLINT. Is that so? But you can hardly avoid it if I, myself, consider it my duty to appear at Court. The world will understand; even you, Bernhardi must see it eventually, that from the outset my aim has always been to bring clarity into the situation. The first trial was absolutely necessary, for otherwise how could we have attained this second one, which will at last bring the affair completely into the light. And perhaps, Bernhardi, it is wisest to keep some ammunition in reserve. (Points to his breast pocket.)

BERNH. What is that?

FLINT. A letter, my friend. A certain letter which may perhaps do service in the fight which is impending. Your letter!

BERNH. Oh, my letter — I really thought it was perhaps — your article.

FLINT. What article?

BERNH. The famous one of your youth: 'Houses of Prayer — Houses of Healing' —

FLINT. Oh, that —

Winkler makes a questioning gesture.

FLINT. Yes, Councillor, of my — my revolutionary youth. If it interests you I will look it out some day ——

BERNH. Oh, it exists, then?

FLINT (his hand to his forehead). No! What tricks memory can play one — why I never wrote it — But who knows perhaps before long I shall have occasion to — declaim it.

Enter Servant.

SERVANT. Councillor Berman wishes to see your Excellency in person —

FLINT. Ah! (To Bernhardi.) Would you mind waiting just a little while?

BERNH. Yes, but Prince Konstantin —

FLINT. Has waited two months for you. Another half-hour won't make much difference. Keep him till I come back, my dear Winkler. Perhaps we shall have to discuss a joint move. I suppose I can ask this little favour of you, Bernhardi?
Exit.

WINKLER. So Prince Konstantin has sent for you, Professor. To-day already? That's like him!

BERNH. I shall only go there to ask him to do without my attendance for a time. I shall seek refuge in flight from these possible developments.

WINKLER. I fear you would have to stay away longer than your numerous patients would care for. For the whole affair is taking a fresh lease of life now, Professor — and it may last a very long time.

BERNH. Well, what can I do, then?

WINKLER. One becomes inured to it. In time it may even be a matter for pride.

BERNH. Proud? I? You can hardly imagine? Councillor, how ridiculous I appear to myself. It started this morning — with the reception at the prison door — then the article in the Topical News. Have you read it? I was really ashamed. And all my plans melted away in this tepid sense of the ridiculous.

WINKLER. Plans —? You mean — your book —

BERNH. Not that exactly. That plan faded away much earlier. When I started writing it in the leisured seclusion of my prison cell, I still felt the heat of anger, but gradually this evaporated more and more. The denunciation of Flint and Co. became — I can hardly say myself how it happened — perhaps in recollection of a certain incident — something in the nature of a philosophic treatise.

WINKLER. I am afraid your publisher will find little pleasure in that.

BERNH. The problem was no longer one of Austrian politics, or any kind of politics; all at once it seemed as though the broadest ethical issues were at stake; responsibility and revelation, and finally the question of free will —

WINKLER. Oh yes, you always end up with that if you dig down to the root of things. But it's better to break off before you get so far, otherwise one fine day it may happen that you begin to understand everything and forgive everything — and once you can neither love nor hate, what charm remains in life?

BERNH. Oh, you continue to love and hate, my dear Winkler! But all the same you can imagine that not much room was left in my book for his Excellency, Minister Flint. Then I made up my mind that if he could not read my grievances in black and white, at least he should hear them from me by word of mouth.

WINKLER. And to this we owe the pleasure of your visit?

BERNH. Yes, it was my intention to tell him to his face — well, you can pretty well imagine what. This was my intention this morning still, when I woke up in prison for the last time. But then came the ovations, that leading article and letters that I found at home. Then my only thought was to hasten to face my old friend while I could still retain some sense of gravity for the great reckoning. But when I did at last stand face to face with him, the last remnant of resentment flickered out. You should have heard him talk! It was impossible to be angry with him. I am beginning to think that I never really was so.

WINKLER. The Minister was always fond of you also. I can assure you of that.

BERNH. And now this business with Sister Ludmilla — and the prospect of renewed litigation. You must realize, my dear Winkler, that to come to myself at all and to regain the slightest self-respect, I must flee from all this commotion which is now buzzing around me for the simple reason that the world has at last found out that I was in the right —

WINKLER. What an idea, Professor! No man has ever become popular merely through being in the right. His popularity only arises when it suits some political party to think him right. Moreover, Professor, it is purely imagination on your part to think that you were right.

BERNH. What's that? Imagination that I Have I heard you aright?

WINKLER. Oh yes, I think you have.

BERNH. You think, Councillor —? You must really explain that. In your opinion I should have let his Reverence —

WINKLER. Certainly you should have, my dear Professor. Undoubtedly you were not born to be a reformer —

BERNH. Reformer —? My dear sir —

WINKLER. As little as I We have not the inner conviction to follow up our principles to the final consequences — to give up our lives, if necessary, for our convictions. And therefore the best thing, in fact the only decent thing, is for men of our mettle — to leave such matters severely alone —

BERNH. But —

WINKLER. No good results from meddling. What end would have been attained after all, my dear Professor, had you spared that poor creature a last shock on her death-bed? It seems much the same to me as trying to solve all social problems by making some poor devil a present of a villa.

BERNH. You forget only one thing, my dear Winkler, as everyone else seems to — that I had not the remotest intention of solving any problem whatever. I simply did what I held to be right in one specific instance.

WINKLER. That is where you went wrong. If we always did only the right thing, or rather started off one day at breakfast time, without further reflection, to do only the right thing all day long, we should certainly land in jail before supper time.

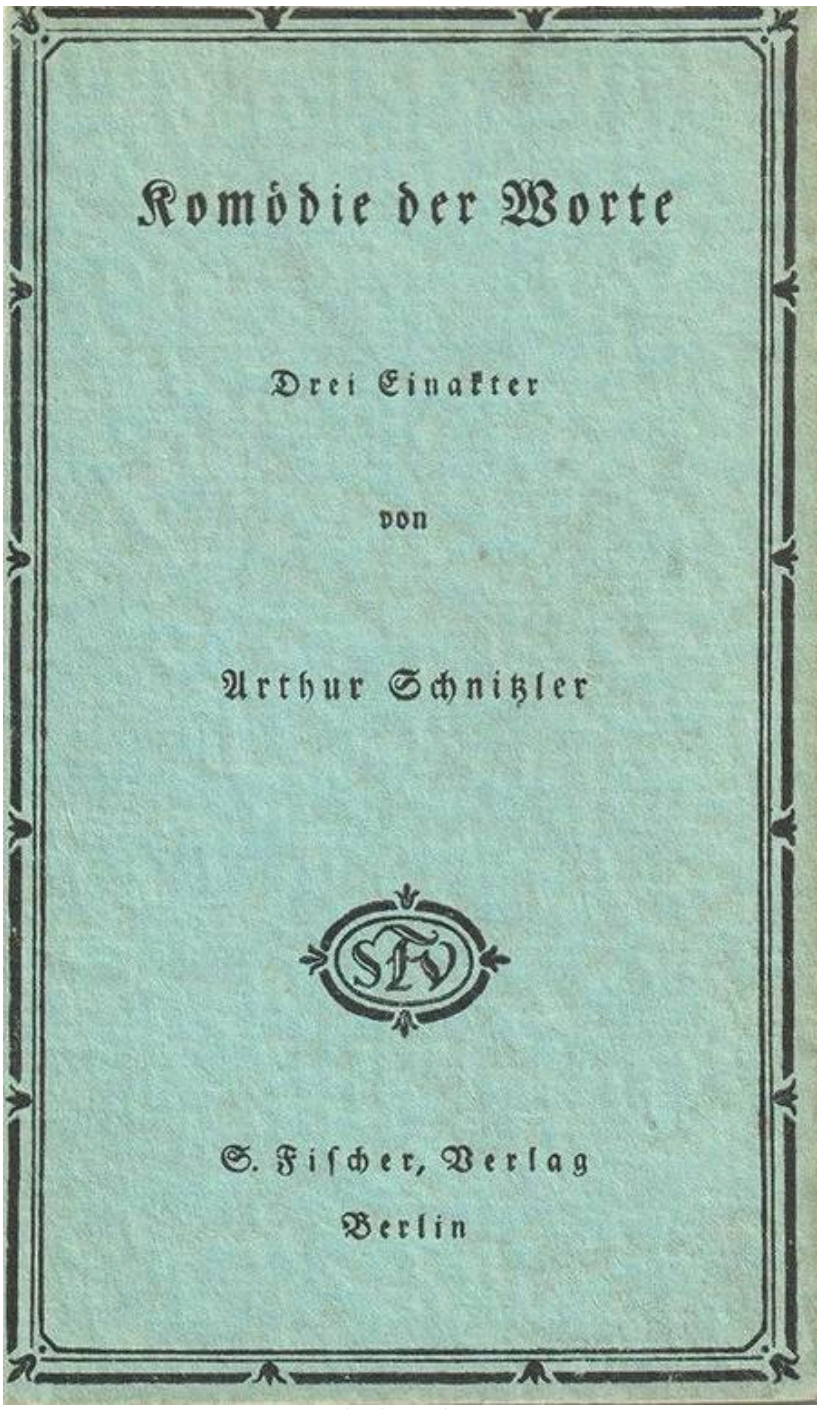
BERNH. And shall I tell you something, Councillor? In my place you would have acted exactly as I did.

WINKLER. Possibly. Then I should have been — you'll forgive me, Professor — just such an ass as you —

CURTAIN

Comedies of Words (1917)

Original German Title: 'Komödie der Worte'



Translated by Pierre Loving, 1923

From the beginning of the twentieth century, Schnitzler was among the most frequently performed playwrights on German stages. However, with the outbreak of the First World War, interest in his works declined. This was partly due to the fact that, as one of the few Austrian intellectuals, he was not enthusiastic about the war effort and made no bellicose pronouncements.

One of his last dramas, Komödie der Worte comprises three one-act plays "The Hour of Recognition," "The Big Scene," and "The Bacchus Festival". Written between 1913 and 1914, they were published in a single volume by S. Fischer in Berlin in 1915. The cycle premiered on 12 October 1915 at the Burgtheater and simultaneously at the Darmstadt Court Theatre and the New Theatre in Frankfurt am Main.

The first part, The Hour of Recognition, concerns Doctor Carl Eckold and his wife Clara, whose only child, Bettina, has left home following her marriage. Now, the parents must finally confront each other. Ten years earlier, Clara had committed adultery. Her husband had noticed, but remained silent for the sake of their child. Full of festering scorn and hatred, he blurts out his view of their deceitful coexistence. She resists with all her might, trying in vain to save the marriage and finally leaves her husband.

After the Vienna premiere, Schnitzler noted in his diary: "…the people weren't quite sure whether they liked it." His friend Brandes wrote to him in December 1915: "Tragic and comic elements are mixed, as is your custom." Some critics consider The Hour of Recognition to be one of the playwright's analytical masterpieces, employing once more the technique of supplying to the audience incomplete information, which is so characteristic of much of his work.

The first edition

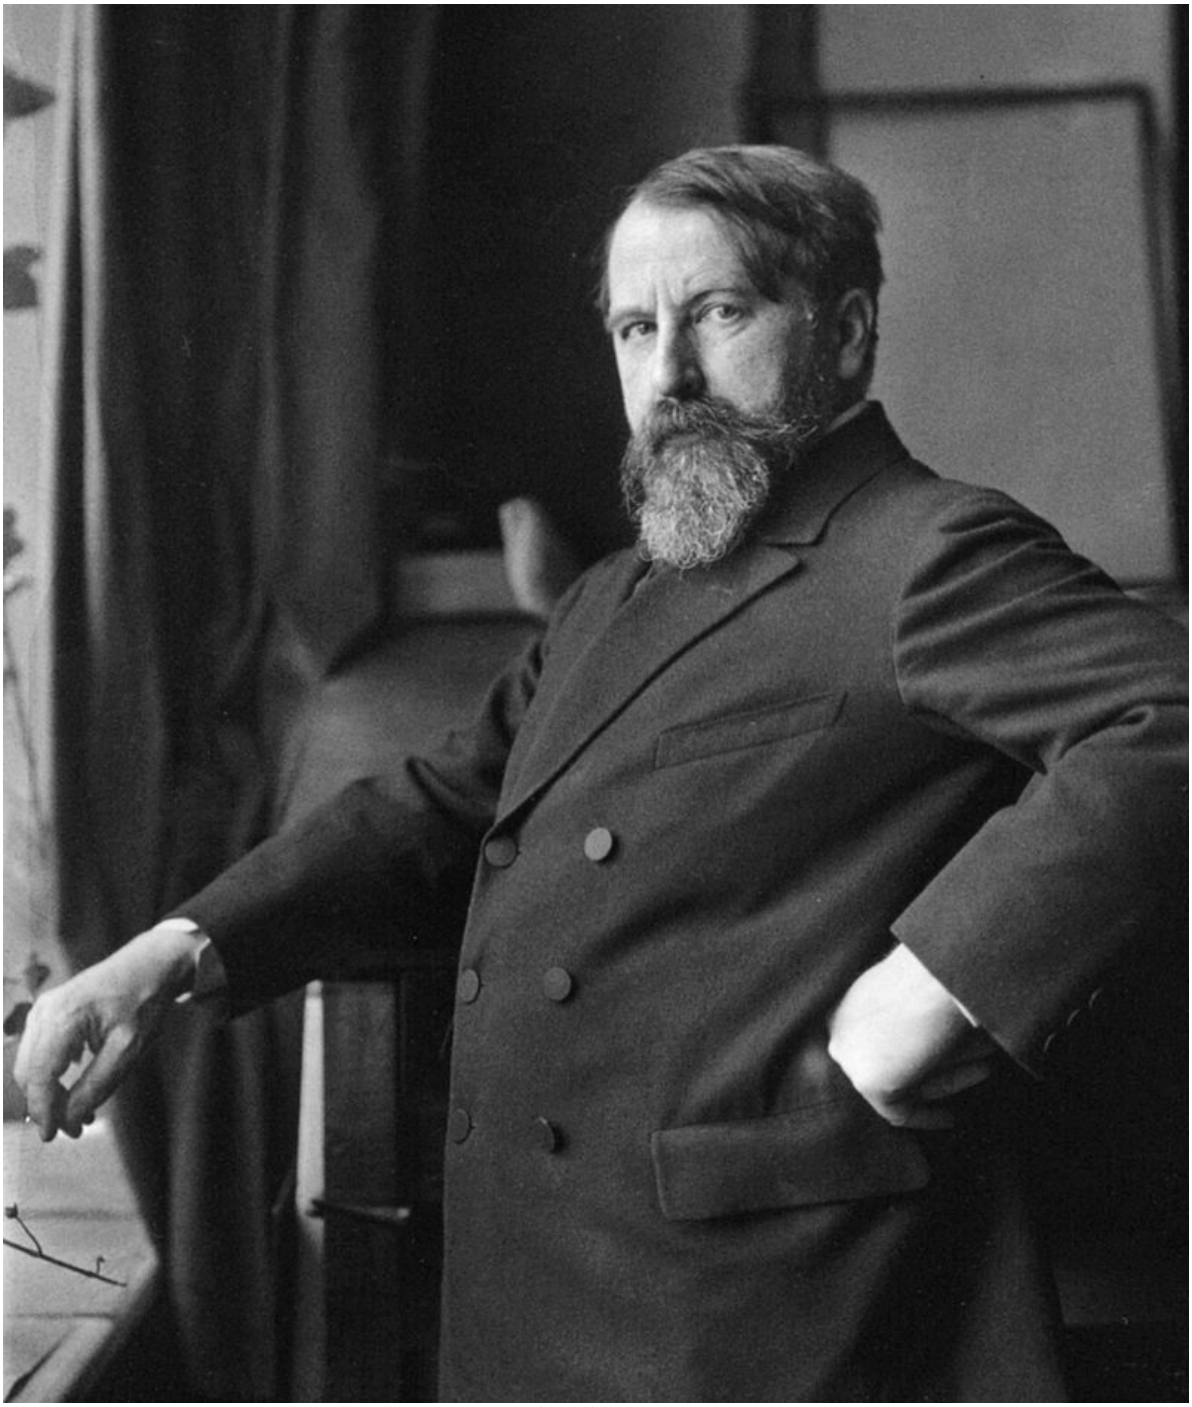
CONTENTS

PART I. THE HOUR OF RECOGNITION

PERSONS

THE HOUR OF RECOGNITION

PART II. THE BIG SCENE



PERSONS

THE BIG SCENE

PART III. THE FESTIVAL OF BACCHUS

PERSONS

THE FESTIVAL OF BACCHUS

Schnitzler, 1912

PART I. THE HOUR OF RECOGNITION

PERSONS

CARL ECKOLD, M.D.

CLARA, his wife.

PROFESSOR RUDOLPH ORMIN.

MAID AT THE ECKOLDS

SERVINGMAN AT THE ECKOLDS

THE HOUR OF RECOGNITION

[SCENE: DINING ROOM in the home of Dr. Eckold, Vienna. A door in the rear conducts to an ante-room or vestibule; another pierced in the right wall opens to the waiting-room, still another on the left leads to the other living rooms. The furniture is comfortable but old-fashioned.

Discovered, Dr. Carl Eckold, a man of, say 45, with a dark brown square-cut beard, inclining to baldness. He wears a pince-nez for reading purposes. Also, Clara, his wife, 40, still pretty. Both are seated at the table finishing their dessert.
The servingman comes in with a card.]

SERVINGMAN. The lady begs to be admitted at once, if possible.

ECKOLD [deliberately turning the card between his fingers]. My hours, as announced, start at three. It is scarcely half past two now. Ask the lady to be patient. Anybody else waiting?

SERVINGMAN. Three patients already, sir.

ECKOLD. H'm! I shall take them in the order of their arrival.

[Servingman goes of. The maid serves the coffee, which Clara pours into the cups.]

ECKOLD. Why, you've laid three covers, Clara. Have you forgotten that our Miss Bettina, or, to do her nibs justice, Mrs. Bettina Wöhrmann, dines in Salzburg today? Perhaps in Zurich? Perhaps — Heaven only knows where?

CLARA. NO. I haven't forgotten, Carl. The extra cover was laid for Ormin.

ECKOLD. Ah, yes. Made his apologies over the telephone, has he?

CLARA. No, nothing definite. Besides, I know he is coming to bid us good-bye.

ECKOLD. Terribly busy, I suppose, with this long journey in front of him. Will you call me when he comes? I want to pay my respects in person. [Rises, striding over to the right, turning half-way.] Are you going out?

CLARA. No, I've nothing particular on for tonight. Why do you ask? Anything you wish to consult me about?

ECKOLD. Nothing out of the ordinary. There's no hurry at all. Well — [glances at the clock, making for the door, right. The servingman enters with telegram and newspaper. Eckold steps toward him, taking the telegram. The servingman places the newspaper on the table.]

ECKOLD [opening the telegram]. From Bettina.

CLARA [going up to him, eagerly.] Oh, already?

ECKOLD. From Bettina and Hugo, of course. [Clara reads over his shoulder.]

ECKOLD. From Innsbruck.

CLARA. They didn't squander a round minute. Piled into a cab directly after the wedding supper and whipped to the station.

ECKOLD. Quite a sensible idea, that!

CLARA [reading], "Tomorrow Zurich. Day after tomorrow we expect to have a word from you at Luzerne, Palace Hotel."

ECKOLD. "A thousand regards."

CLARA. The identical route we travelled twenty-two years ago. Only we weren't so hotfoot to reach Innsbruck.

ECKOLD [without twitching a muscle of his face]. Modern tempo, I guess. And we didn't stop at the Palace Hotel, either.

CLARA. It wasn't up then.

ECKOLD. Even if it had been —

CLARA. It was glorious, all the same — without the Palace, I mean.

ECKOLD. Ah, but Bettina's struck better luck than you.

CLARA. Now — [touching his arm gently.] ECKOLD [moving away from her. Alongside the table, nonchalantly fluttering the newspaper]. I don't reproach myself in any way when I affirm that. A paternal million, let me tell you, isn't to be ground down with the heel of one's foot. Especially when the stars fight in their courses for you, which really is the case with your son-in-law. [Glancing at the newspaper.] Here's something about Ormin, by the way [reading] "The regular sanitation corps under the leadership of Rudolph Ormin, Royal and Imperial Professor, of the Austrian Red Cross, will leave Vienna this evening on the eight twenty express. At Trieste it will board the Austrian Lloyd liner Amphitrite, sailing for Japan, and thence will repair to the war zone." [He holds out the newspaper to her, scrutinizing her face closely as she peruses the column.] Not bad at all, that. [Site.]

CLARA [still standing]. You ploughed through something of the sort once.

ECKOLD. Bosnia —? There's no comparison — really.

CLARA. But it was a kind of war, wasn't it?

ECKOLD. Kind of? Not merely a "kind of," but a bona fide war, I assure you. You might have gathered that from my diary. I let you read it then. Surely you remember?

CLARA [laughing]. Certainly, I remember.

ECKOLD. From the steep mountain slopes they fired on us where we were huddled below. Little heed they gave to the Red Cross. Sanitation corps or no, be damned to you! [Changing his tone.] Ah, but it's jolly good going through it with the brevet of a superior — like Ormin, for instance! At the time I was only a callow surgeon. I had just taken my degree. Nowadays I am utterly unqualified for such an undertaking. It calls for more elasticity in a man, more idealism, in a certain sense, more youth.

CLARA. Ormin is two years older than you.
And, moreover, it's rumored his heart's not perfectly fit.

ECKOLD. But it's not a question of years, not even of health. What keeps one in good fettle is success, recognition, fame.

CLARA. Perhaps if you had adopted an academic career —

ECKOLD. Oh, of course. The difference in the nature of our endowments, Ormin's and mine, isn't so big that you can notice it. It was due to other things. Of that I am sure. Over and above all things else, Ormin possesses innate gaiety of spirit. There's the rub. The spiritual urge, as it were. Then you've got to give the man credit for some superficiality. That's an attribute you must be born with. It's not to be acquired, no matter how hard you try.

CLARA. Somehow he never needed to drum up a practice.

ECKOLD. Neither did I. Years ago, when he and I were young physicians, financially he was no better off than I. No better off than I. What's the good of paltering with the truth. Like mine in all respects, his lot was one of worriment and struggle.

CLARA. Yes, but for himself alone.

ECKOLD. Of course, when he married his anxieties were increased. What do you expect? A good deal has to be discounted — always. Were he to die one of these days Mrs. Melanie would not be so wonderfully provided for.

CLARA. Since she's not legally divorced, she gets her allowance just the same.

ECKOLD. Allowance! About two thousand crowns. And that, as you know, doesn't go a great way with dear Melanie. She used to spend as much as that on gloves and hats alone. At least that was ——

CLARA. Really, I think she was maligned more than she deserved. Society is horribly stony-hearted towards the wives of great men.

ECKOLD. Great? Pshaw. You mean, famous. Well, thank Heaven, you're spared such treatment. Now — [Is about to go when Professor Ormin comes in. He is a clean-shaven man of about 50, with a haggard, sharply-chiselled face.]

ORMIN. How d'ye do. I trust sincerely you haven't waited until now with the dinner. [Kisses the tips of Clarets fingers and shakes hands with Eckold.]

ORMIN. I've dined already, thank you.

CLARA. You must take a cup of coffee —

ORMIN. Thanks. Don't let me put you out, though. [Clara rings and gives an order to the maid who has entered.]

ECKOLD. Delighted to see you once again before you leave. This evening, eh? And then on the Amphitrite?

ORMIN. Yes.

ECKOLD. Here 'tis in the paper. Ah, but you're going to have a fine passage. In June — by the by, when do you expect to be at the front — on duty, I mean.

ORMIN. In four weeks. But I think it'll take us considerably longer to get to the actual war zone.

ECKOLD. Who knows, old man, but all may be settled before you arrive.

ORMIN. Settled? Why, it's scarcely begun. And judging from all appearances, things will be rather long drawn out. [The maid brings the coffee and Clara pours it into the cup. The maid goes out.]

ECKOLD. Are you taking an assistant along?

ORMIN. Yes, Marenzeller Kleinert's picked to take my place in the clinic. [Sipping his coffee.] Do you know who's sailing with us? Guess. On the Amphitrite, too. Our good old friend, Floding.

ECKOLD. Floding? I suppose he's aged a food deal. Grown virtuous, has he? Not likely, guess. Virtue as a rule is more elusive than age.

CLARA. In what capacity is Floding going to Japan?

ECKOLD. In the capacity of correspondent —

ORMIN. Yes, for the Rhenish News. So he writes me.

CLARA. You keep in touch with him?

ORMIN. Not very regularly. But since last summer, when we were accidentally thrown so much in each other's company — after many years — I've already told you all about it.

CLARA. Nowadays we never hear from him. If you hadn't brought his respects from Helgoland ——

ECKOLD. What's he going to write us for? It's ten years now that he left Vienna.

ORMIN. He refers to you habitually as one of his closest friends.

ECKOLD. Friends? [Pause.] I doubt whether I really owned a friend. Perhaps — you.

ORMIN. Oh, a good many. Possibly you make overstrict demands.

ECKOLD. Why make demands at all? Seldom, if ever, are any of them met.

ORMIN [jestingly to Clara'. What's come over your husband, eh? [Recollecting.] Oh, yes; his daughterkin. By God, I miss her, too. Have you had a line from her yet? No? It's hardly likely so soon.

CLARA. We received a telegram just this minute.

ECKOLD. From Innsbruck.

CLARA. Tomorrow they reach Zurich, day after tomorrow Luzerne.

ORMIN. And in the course of three weeks, I suppose, you will welcome her back home.

CLARA. Unfortunately, no. After the honeymoon they plan to move to Berlin.

ORMIN. Indeed. Is Wormann needed that bad in Berlin?

ECKOLD. Yes, now that his predecessor has been appointed Professor Extraordinary to Breslau —

ORMIN. Quite so. Oh, he'll carve out a ripping career for himself, your son-in-law will. With twenty-eight assistants at the Physiological Institute — and highly deserving of it all, let me add.

CLARA. I see no reason why it couldn't be over here just as well.

ORMIN. After all, the distance between Berlin and Vienna isn't so great.

CLARA. Just fancy! Day before yesterday she sat here with us. For seventeen years she sat in the self-same place. [Pause.] Dear me! All these sentimental after-thoughts, I'm afraid, won't help a bit. But the wrench is — so deep!

ORMIN. I never thought you'd take it to heart this way. All fathers and mothers must steel themselves against this sort of thing.

CLARA. Of what use is your steeling yourself against it?

ECKOLD. Yes, of what use? It's infinitely better to have no children at all.

CLARA [almost frightened]. What a thing to say!

ECKOLD [impenetrably]. I say it again.

ORMIN [tactfully]. Well — [Pause]. Now what else did I want to tell you? Oh, yes. One of the nurses of the Red Cross accompanying my expedition is — don't start I — Madame Melanie Ormin.

CLARA. Ah!

ECKOLD. Your wife?

ORMIN. My — wife that was, yes.

ECKOLD. Old man, sure as fate, you're going to come back with all your differences patched up.

ORMIN. Not a bit of it.

CLARA. Don't forget to remember me to Melanie, when you see her.

ORMIN. You are kindly disposed to her, aren't you? —

CLARA. We always got along very nicely together. You know that.

ECKOLD. Please remember me, too. And don't omit Floding, either. You can tell him from me it's a symptom of ungratefulness not to let himself be heard from, especially after such a bully friendship as he claims existed between us.

ORMIN. You demand, my dear Carl, more than you give. Why, you've chucked him on your own account. What do you expect?

CLARA. But, really, he liked him.

ECKOLD. Liked him? You exaggerate. He interested me. Quite an amusing cut-up, he was. Wicked and sentimental.

ORMIN. Not such an odd combination, by a long shot. That is, as far as wags who are niggardly endowed go.

ECKOLD. Niggardly endowed? You mean his halt foot. Ah, but don't you see that's why he was vouchsafed such beautiful blue eyes.

ORMIN. It's hardly the most striking paradox in his make-up. What's worse, is the fact that he possesses a poetical soul, coupled with not an ounce of poetic talent. That kind of thing spells the ruin of a man.

CLARA. I remember several lovely poems he wrote once.

ORMIN. Up to a certain age nobody objects strenuously to that. But, you see, he persists in turning them out still. Last summer — just to cite an instance — he recited several to me. CLARA. Well?

ORMIN. The surf was simply deafening. I must beg to be excused from any criticism. [Enter servingman with a card.]

ECKOLD [taking the card]. Excuse me. Praxis aurea, you know. Don't go until I return.

ORMIN. Can't promise that I'll stay that long, Carl. I've got to attend to several things before my departure.

ECKOLD. Won't you keep my wife company for a quarter of an hour or so? Call me when you're going. Now don't take yourself off uncivilly. Well, auf Wiedersehen. [Goes out right.]

CLARA [breaking in suddenly]. This is nice, Melanie's sailing with you that way!

ORMIN. Not with me. It just happens that she's a member of the party.

CLARA. Well, if it weren't for you the idea would never have occurred to her.

ORMIN. It's idle to conjecture about that. It's bewildering all the things she's put her hand to, and carried through, too, since we separated.

CLARA. Has she been living in Vienna recently?

ORMIN. Yes, and quite an age for her. Just fancy only three months ago she returned from Madeira, where I understood she kept a foreign pension.

CLARA. I was under the impression she had tried her luck in America.

ORMIN. Quite an old story, that. Do you know that she was on the stage over there? Played in English, mind you. It came to my ears only the other day. She seems to have been tremendously versatile in her way.

CLARA. Quite a remarkable creature, I must say. Perhaps you will be happy with her yet. ORMIN. I —

CLARA. Fifteen years ago you may have been unfit for married life.

ORMIN. On the contrary, I was always fit. Only I didn't happen to meet the right woman. [Simply.] I made her acquaintance — several years too late.

CLARA [smiling]. You'd have tired of the right woman just as you did of Melanie.

ORMIN. Why do you think so? I did not tire of Melanie. That's a mistaken notion of yours. We just — Melanie and I — after a certain period took to making separate trips. Objectively, I know, it has the appearance of tiring of one another. But it wasn't my fault. I am very strong for marital fidelity. At least I am sure of this much: I was destined to the domestic sphere. More so than Carl, for instance.

CLARA. More so than Carl — you?

ORMIN. Certainly. In him, lurking deep within, there broods a suggestion of the out-and-out undomestic creature. Yes, the genius of the philanderer.

CLARA [smiling]. In Carl?

ORMIN. Yes, in your husband, the practicing physician, whose consultation hours are between three and four.

CLARA [shaking her head incredulously]. Do you call yourself a student of human nature?

ORMIN. Knowledge of human nature is an assumption for the most part. Not always accurate nor pleasant, either. But, quite seriously, we have lived, both of us — he and I — at deepest odds with our innermost selves. For I have yearned all my life long for repose, spiritual repose. Had I achieved it, I dare say, I'd have made a bigger man of myself.

CLARA. You ought to be content.

ORMIN. Content? Are you thinking of what the world calls my career? People look up to me as a physician, as a professor, even — as if all that mattered the least bit! Under more favorable circumstances than I have been heir to, I might have accomplished greater things.

CLARA. Under more favorable —?

ORMIN. Well, suppose we put it this way: In the peaceful atmosphere of a veritable home. Please don't think me mawkish. I have always craved for that sort of thing, but somehow it was appointed far otherwise.

CLARA. Ah, but I can read a purpose in the fact that it was appointed otherwise.

ORMIN. A purpose? I doubt it, Clara. I doubt it because I know exactly where, under more auspicious circumstances, I might have found the repose I sought in vain. [In a more ardent, but a quite simple tone of voice.] We both know only too well, Clara, you and I.

CLARA [gently shaking her head]. What a mad notion of yours!

ORMIN. Before saying good-bye, I thought I might be permitted to call it to mind.

CLARA. But not to utter it.

ORMIN [earnestly but not heavily]. When you feel as I do, that you have never uttered the right words, and that the occasion will not present itself soon again —

CLARA [smiling, but averting her gaze], I hope, Ormin, you entertain no sinister presentiments.

ORMIN. Presentiments? Up to the present I've not gone far afield when I weighed probabilities strictly in the balance.

CLARA. But I have no presentiments whatever. And I feel, in fact I know — nothing will happen to you.

ORMIN. I'm not afraid. Bear in mind: nobody forced me to plunge headlong into the war and plague regions. The sealed purposes of Providence, however, are made more apparent to a man of my stripe from year to year.

CLARA. You are still young.

ORMIN. I? Ah, but you can say that more truthfully of Carl than of me.

CLARA. Of course you can say it of Carl too.

ORMIN. He has preserved himself better than I. His face is just as youthful as when he was an undergraduate. All around, he's had better luck than I.

CLARA [smiling]. In spite of his philandering instinct?

ORMIN [continuing earnestly]. I daresay in his profession too.

CLARA. Surely you don't envy him that, do you?

ORMIN. Why not? Is my calling on a higher plane? Sometimes an uncanny feeling seizes me when I am called to an unknown family and introduced — not to a human being, but to an ailing stomach. Eckold at least gets to know his patients.

CLARA. Nothing enviable in that —

ORMIN [interrupting]. Yes, Clara, the lot of a consulting physician has quite a peculiar charm. Especially when, as in Carl's case, you enjoy a good measure of the normal milk of human kindness.

CLARA. Do you consider Carl a kind man?

ORMIN. H'm! That's a posing question. Kind? Of course, he is kind. Every one of us is that, more or less. But kindly —? I don't know whether you follow me. True kindness or goodness is a rare and noble quality. I think one may even commit crimes in goodness, one may even sin —

CLARA. Good people would never think of doing that.

ORMIN. You are quite right. Good people, at their best, never transcend petty meannesses.

CLARA [laughing]. That — why, that might have been said by Floding.

ORMIN. You think so? Then, if you don't mind, I prefer to take it back.

CLARA [somewhat taken aback]. Our old friend, it appears, has not succeeded in winning your goodwill.

ORMIN. Last summer we were thrown together every single day. And in vacations people betray themselves more than ordinarily.

CLARA. Perhaps it was just a game of his to appear other than he is. It's like Floding. If you saw him in his true likeness, then he must have altered a good deal.

ORMIN. A man doesn't alter, Clara. He may disguise himself, he may dazzle others at times himself. But in the deepest recesses of his soul he is unalterably the same.

CLARA. If one only knew where the deepest recesses of the soul are situated.

ORMIN. There you have it. Exactly. That's why we are always the same. But I might hazard a guess, they are probably situated where our subconscious wishes slumber or give the appearance of slumbering.

CLARA. In the last analysis, Ormin, nothing matters — nothing but the deed we have accomplished; that which we have undergone in life, not that which we have desired or yearned for.

ORMIN. Quite so, Clara. And we can know mighty little about a person as long as his real features are screened behind the mist of his so-called daily affairs.

CLARA [smiling]. And you would have me believe that your gaze pierces this mist?

ORMIN [earnestly]. Sometimes. And by virtue of this penetration, for instance, the adventitious circumstance that you happen to go through life in the guise of the wife of my old chum, Carl Eckold, hasn't blinded me to the truth, namely, deep, deep within, Clara, you possess the soul of one who dares all for love.

CLARA [growing pale]. One who dares all for love! [Smiling.] You flatter me exceedingly. I love Carl, quite naturally. I have always loved him. But beyond that there's nothing extraordinary about it.

ORMIN [earnestly]. You know very well that's not what I was driving at.

CLARA [with equal seriousness]. I have never coveted any other lot. Never. I think I may be permitted to say of myself, with justice, that I have adorned, as far as lay in my power, the busy and preoccupied life of one who was dearer to me than anything else in the world. It wasn't at all times an easy task. But, thank Heaven, I recognized it as my mission.

ORMIN. Yes. I can well believe that. For Carl had need of you.

CLARA. As I had need of him.

ORMIN. Is this true, Clara? Were you always convinced that Carl Eckold, and no one else, constituted the meaning and end of your life?

CLARA [tartly]. He and Bettina. Yes, if you wish to put it that way; the meaning and the end.

ORMIN. I beg pardon, then.

CLARA. Quite unnecessary, I assure you.

ORMIN. Today, you see, I don't care to play cocksure. I can't say: — Well, until tomorrow or after tomorrow, dear lady.

CLARA [laughing]. Why not six months hence, then?

ORMIN [as gently as possible]. Let us hope so. [He starts to go, but hesitates at a movement of hers.] Oh, please don't break in on Carl. We've said good-bye already. And, with all due respect for him, the latest impression I wish to leave with you — [interrupts himself. Simply.] Good-bye, Clara.

CLARA. Good-bye. [They meet at the door. He clasps her hand.]

CLARA. Ormin!

ORMIN. Clara!

CLARA. You wear an air of having omitted something — through oversight.

ORMIN [waveringly]. Omitted? Who has not?

CLARA. In this connection, Ormin, let me allay your apprehensions before you go, at least as regards myself — I pledge my word, dear friend, you have no cause to revile yourself for anything.

ORMIN. I can't quite make out —

CLARA. Assuming that way back — ten years ago, is it not? — you had proved more tumultuous or more skillful in your manoeuvring, well, you'd never have corralled me into your collection.

ORMIN. H'm. Really, I don't see why you try by this meticulous choice of words —

CLARA. Oh, I don't doubt, I'd have turned out a rare specimen. No. But it could never have been. Quite otherwise was it decreed. I don't mind telling you: I loved you.

ORMIN [after a brief pause]. Oh! Oh! What a wretched simpleton I was!

CLARA [laughing low]. You do yourself rank injustice. It didn't depend on you altogether. Had I loved you less than I did, I'd have flung myself into your arms — perhaps. But you were more to me than a mere lover. You had suddenly taken the shape of my destiny. For this reason it could never have come to pass. And you were not only my destiny —

ORMIN. What did it matter? I tell you, happiness would have been ours, Clara. How many people can say that? Happiness! Yours and mine.

CLARA. For six months going, maybe a year. And even in that brief time it would not have been vouchsafed to us unmixed.

ORMIN. We might have purified it. Drained off the dross, sooner or later.

CLARA. Never.

ORMIN. Bettina?

CLARA. Not for Bettina's sake alone.

ORMIN. For him? What was he to you — then?

CLARA. What was he to me? What he has always been. What he has remained to this day — to this very day. I didn't realize so clearly as at that moment that my proper place was here — that I belonged utterly to him. Never till that moment, Ormin.

ORMIN. Why just that moment?

CLARA. Never before was I so sure of myself. [Pause.]

ORMIN. Forgive me, but, if my memory doesn't deceive me, your relations with Carl, at that time, left much to be desired. [Clara gazes at him astonished.] — Oh, a blind man would have noticed that. There's no more transparent stuff than that which matrimony is made of. At a pinch the individual can disguise himself, but in the sphere of human relationships masquerade is impossible.

CLARA [after a brief hesitation]. We were estranged at the time, if that's what you're aiming at. I won't attempt to dissemble. But despite that, indeed, for that very reason — [interrupting herself, then more ardently.] You will never understand! You've never conceived what marriage means — what marriage under certain circumstances may grow to mean. You've no idea of a year-in, year-out pull together — and ours was a long pull together! What links are wrought, stronger than anything else which passion can forge between one man and one woman! Notwithstanding all the tugging and gnawing, the link holds firm. The couple belong to one another beyond recall. And one feels this all the more keenly —

ORMIN. When one chafes burningly to part.

CLARA. Do you appreciate the truth of your words? In the midst of black distrust and pangs, the two people belong to one another just the same — and later on, more irrevocably, more inescapably by reason of their mutual devotion and tenderness. I hadn't the courage to leave him. Then less than ever. Do you follow me now? [with a soft smile]. All your overtures, as you see, would have fallen short. And so, when all's said, you've no grounds to reproach yourself.

ORMIN. Whether I follow you or not — what's the odds today? But that you should tell it to me now —

CLARA [without looking at him]. I had to, Ormin, sooner or later.

ORMIN [very softly]. You seem to be in doubt whether we shall meet again — here or elsewhere.

CLARA [tumultuously]. Please don't carry away a spurious image of me —

ORMIN. Into eternity.

CLARA. Into the far-away.

ORMIN. It makes you happy thinking I shall carry into the far-away the image of a saint, rather than that of a woman —

CLARA. I don't pretend to be a saint. That description fits me much less than the other.

ORMIN. Let's not attach too much weight to mere words.

CLARA. For my part you may attach to them whatever weight you like. I come equally short of sainthood as I do of the passion of the woman who dares all for love. Believe me, I am a mere woman, like hundreds and thousands of other women. Perhaps no worse, but certainly no better.

ORMIN. That sounds as if — [approaching her.] Is there yet another secret, Clara?

CLARA. None whatever for you, Ormin, in this hour.

ORMIN. None —?

CLARA. None.

ORMIN. Do I follow you rightly, Clara?

CLARA. Certainly.

ORMIN. Still it's a secret — [pause.]

CLARA. A name —? Does that signify?

ORMIN. I am not inquisitive.

CLARA. Life is full of strange coincidences, Ormin. Tomorrow at this hour you will be strolling up and down the deck of the Amphitrite in his company —

ORMIN. In his —? What's that you say? In his — why, it's —

CLARA. Yes.

ORMIN. If that is so, then there was no chance of its ever turning into destiny for you.

CLARA. Why do you ask? [Glancing meaningly about the room.] Here is your answer.

ORMIN. I mean a chance that you could not possibly foresee.

CLARA. Perhaps there was none.

ORMIN. You will never convince me, Clara, that you plunged cold-bloodedly into an affair of this ilk. There must be some reason why it was just he —

CLARA. Hurt vanity! It's just like a man to seek an explanation of a commonplace affair of this sort, if he happens not to have been the, —

ORMIN. Lucky fellow.

CLARA. The lucky fellow?

ORMIN. You must have loved him?

CLARA. I don't mean to deny it.

ORMIN. More than you loved me?

CLARA [laughing involuntarily]. Less than you.

ORMIN. And yet, will you say, that he never could have been your destiny? He too might have been that. It would have been beyond your strength to resist if he had clung to you, if he had not released you, if he had claimed what was his due —

CLARA. Due? He claimed no more than I was ready to grant him. Life had not pampered him like some of the others.

ORMIN [softly, to himself]. Like some of the others.

CLARA. He was always lonesome — from childhood. He never knew the quiet of a father's house.

ORMIN. And, that being the case, you could pose as something of a sister and mother —

CLARA. We were lovers.

ORMIN [still simply]. And you were the first heavenly ray to penetrate a lugubrious existence.

CLARA. I was.

ORMIN. Well, I must say, you had good reason to nourish the delusion.

CLARA. That's what I was to him. Perhaps I was more than mere happiness in his life. I don't know the kind of man life has made of him today. It cannot have offered him all that he hoped for, all that-perhaps he sought. But I know the man he was then. You, Ormin, did not know him. No. In fact, nobody knew him. Who troubled to peer into that cynical and solitary soul? I alone did. That is why I, of all people, can mean anything to him. And at the time I was the whole world to him — and without jeopardizing the calm of a third person concerned.

ORMIN. After all, it was an escapade.

CLARA. Escapade?

ORMIN. An affair. Fortunately, it came at a time when you were ripe for it.

CLARA [shaking her head]. I foresaw it. [Ormin gazes quizzically into her face.] You make out my real features behind the mist. You discern them all. Everything is as you have said. Behind the mist of sensations and impressions is limned the true image of what I am in my deepest self. [After a light sob.] I shouldn't have told you, Ormin.

ORMIN. Do you regret, Clara? I am grateful to you. It is so beautiful, so splendid that you — that both of us in this hour should have been able to speak out at last.

CLARA. Are we quite sure —?

ORMIN. Clara!

CLARA. Well, perhaps you are right. If it were only a question of words!

ORMIN. We will forget the words. Nothing depends on them. They are only —

[Eckold comes in from the right.]

ECKOLD. Eh, still here? Good!

CLARA. I was just about to call you.

ORMIN [ready to leave]. Dear chap —

ECKOLD. Thanks awfully for waiting.

ORMIN. I must say goodbye now.

ECKOLD. NO use keeping you any longer. Once more, bon voyage ——

[They shake hands.] Don't you know, Ormin — no sense in hiding it from you at this stage — I sort of envy you.

ORMIN. You do? Well, why not come along? Give up your practice for a few months and join us.

ECKOLD. What would I do? Surgery's not in my line.

ORMIN. That makes no bones. I guess we can handle the epidemic well enough. No red herring there for you, is there? —

ECKOLD. Going's out of the question, even if it tempted me. I'm the sort of person who never gets beyond the wishing stage.

ORMIN [to Clara]. Isn't he a little unjust to himself? —

CLARA. That's what I keep telling him sometimes.

ECKOLD. Well [pause] — good luck. Cure them by the thousands. And, mind you, come back whole yourself.

ORMIN. I hope for the best. Well, adieu. Think of me sometimes. Auf Wiedersehen, Clara. [He extends his hand and goes.] Silence.] [Eckold glances at the clock and rings. Servingman enters.]

ECKOLD. Has anyone else come in since?

SERVINGMAN. No, sir.

ECKOLD. Cab gone off yet?

SERVINGMAN [going to window]. Not yet, sir. [Exit.]

CLARA. It's only half-past five. [She goes to the window. Eckold seats himself and takes the newspaper.]

CLARA [turning toward him]. You had something to say to me.

ECKOLD. It will wait till tomorrow.

CLARA. About Bettina, isn't it? Family inheritance? Any difficulties? You were to the notary's today.

ECKOLD. Yes. The affair of the inheritance is going very smoothly. In a week or two everything will be adjusted. In any case, Bettina won't stick at a trifle. But — I wanted to ask you; you long for her very much, don't you?

CLARA. And you?

ECKOLD. Goes without saying. But I — I have my profession. You, I daresay, will find it harder getting used to her being away.

CLARA. I was prepared for it.

ECKOLD. Even so. Your whole life, at least during the past year, was wrapped up in Bettina. And you will feel an empty gap now.

CLARA [forcing a smile]. Oh, but there are heaps of things to distract one.

ECKOLD [staring straight ahead]. At all events. If you care to go over to Berlin — don't trouble about me. Go. [Clara gazes at him astonished.]

ECKOLD. I won't object at all. Less so, considering that Bettina is no longer with us, and there is no further need of our living together now.

CLARA. You amaze me.

ECKOLD. What amazes you?

CLARA [portraying growing astonishment]. You want to — you mean I should go away to Berlin?

ECKOLD. Merely a suggestion. Of course, we will have to canvass the details. But all things considered, I believe —

CLARA. What can this mean? What sudden idea is this?

ECKOLD. Sudden? It only looks that way to you. Until now I didn't mention it. The time wasn't ripe for it. I like to talk about things only when they have become, in a measure, realizable. But let me assure you it's an old notion of mine that after Bettina's marriage it might be a good thing to give up living together.

CLARA. Living to —

ECKOLD. Yes. Quite an old notion — a cherished notion, I might say. Let me see; I can tell you exactly how old it is — even to the very day it first struck me. It's ten years now. Last May it was ten years to a day. Do you follow me?

[He stands directly opposite her. They eye each other closely. Pause.]

CLARA. You mean that for ten whole years you kept silent?

ECKOLD. Yes. For ten whole years. But I'm not making a bid for your admiration. One must only be certain about what one wants. And I was certain. To trouble the outward calm of our existence, to bring about a deep-rooted revulsion of our life-relationship, while our daughter was still living under the roof of her parents would have been highly impractical, not to say immoral. And it would be just as immoral if we continued living together in our old way now that Bettina's gone.

CLARA. You kept silent ten whole years?

ECKOLD. I knew to-day had to come. Indeed, I lived in anticipation of it.

CLARA. Ten years you have waited for today? I can't bring myself to believe it. I credit no man with such self-control, least of all you, Carl.

ECKOLD. You have always underrated me. That I know. Both of you have underrated me. [Pause.]

CLARA. Why didn't you send me away then?

ECKOLD. With equal right I might ask: Why didn't you go away of your own accord?

CLARA. I can answer that very easily. Because I held this to be my home. Because this was my home, no matter what had happened.

ECKOLD. That view has its advantages, no doubt, especially its extraordinary convenience.

CLARA. It was your view too.

ECKOLD. Oh —

CLARA. Yes, it was. Otherwise what's to have prevented your showing me the door? It would have been only right, considering the opinion you held of me. What prevented you at the time, I haven't the slightest doubt, was the feeling that at bottom our relations were still the same.

ECKOLD. Ah!

CLARA. NO act of mine could have wrought a complete change.

ECKOLD. I don't quite grasp your —

CLARA. We were too far apart, as it was. That was the point. And what happened then had very little to do with our estrangement. ECKOLD. Estrangement? To what period do you allude? What do you call estrangement?

CLARA. Slipped your memory, has it? That which made everything else sufferable?

ECKOLD. Ah, yes, I know what you mean. You refer to the most dismal period of my life, when I was burdened down with cares and struggles; when I had finally to relinquish my academic and scientific dreams. I was doomed then — not because I lacked the necessary qualifications — I was doomed to remain a hack in my calling, instead of achieving what came as a windfall to others. I grant you, I was very ill-tempered. But I can picture the type of woman who would, at such a pass, have stood stoutly by the side of the man and cheered him and compensated him for all the meannesses he had to encounter in the world of daily affairs. You, however, attempted to make of my melancholy a kind of fault. And this estrangement — convenient word — was nothing more than a welcome refuge whereby you could seek your happiness elsewhere.

CLARA. You're not fair to me, Carl. I tried my very best at the time to lift you above your disillusions and trying experiences. But I wasn't strong enough for the task. Perhaps I tired too quickly. But it never for a moment occurred to me to blame you for your unfortunate temperament, as you charge. That this estrangement came about, was nobody's fault, yours no more than mine. It may be that human relations are subject to the same ailments as human beings. Surely you feel the truth of this. And so, all along you must have known that the obvious fact itself — the betrayal, as it used to be called, has very little significance outside of this. Otherwise, you would not have put up with it as you did.

ECKOLD. You think so? I see that I owe you an explanation as to how I could and did put up with it. To begin with, I was forewarned. I had the good sense to perceive destiny draw near. One can always do that. Some people shut their eyes tightly when it approaches. I refused to do so. And in this way I was clever enough to anticipate you. Do you follow me? Fling my vanity the dole. I didn't wait until the minute when your destiny and mine were consummated. I beheld it approaching. It was inevitable. And thus I prepared for it. It's surprising that you did not once suspect me. How little you must have cared for me! And I made no secret of it at all. Why he, your lover, knew all about it. Didn't he tell you? Odd! Perhaps it's slipped your memory. Well, it makes no difference. Destiny was fairly merciful, especially since I had all my plans worked out for the future.

CLARA [in a quiet voice]. It would have been more delicate to have shown me the door.

ECKOLD. And more delicate of you to have gone away at the right time. Such matters are never very delicate. It wouldn't have been practical to have parted then.

CLARA. Surely you don't believe that?

ECKOLD. Why not? Would my decision appear more conscionable, do you think, if I rolled my eyes, lifted my hand to strike you and stormed about like a madman? I might have done it ten years ago, had I been a fool. You can't expect it today.

CLARA. There's no one here to witness the scene, Carl — no one. You will please consider me as little importunate as I consider you a —

ECKOLD. A what?

CLARA. A comedian who simply won't have his big scene ruined. Well, let this suffice. You wanted your triumph. You have it. And let it content you. As you may imagine I shall try to be with Bettina as often as possible. That's my own wish. But of what use is all the rest? Why sever our relationship today? Why? Since we know that nothing of the sort is apt to happen again, there's nothing I can see which would justify such a belated punishment and revenge. We can still go on being what we have been to one another in these latter years. Throughout all these years, thank heaven, you haven't always played comedy parts. It's beyond human endurance. You would have forgiven me, at heart, long ago, even if you did not forgive yourself. Oh, before, a long time before we came to be nothing but good friends —

ECKOLD. Good friends? Mere words! Naturally there's this thing and that to talk about when one is living together under the same roof, especially because of the many common interests. Above all, when there is a child. If you care to call such a bond friendship, I'm sure I have no objection. For my own part, however, I always held my life to be apart from yours, and I have lived in anticipation of this hour.

CLARA. But only since we became nothing more than house companions. Once it was different.

ECKOLD. It was never different.

CLARA. It was different! Recollect. After the dark hour of estrangement, of lies, if you will, there came another, a better time when we found each other again.

ECKOLD. We? Found one another —?

CLARA. We both realized what we had suffered without unlocking our lips. And many wounds were healed. Everything, in fact. Yes. Try to recall. We were happy again as in the past, happier than we had ever been. You could never glean that from your intercourse with the world. Call to mind our wonderful trip — soon after. And the glorious days in Rome, in Naples. You threw off your comedy part. Let everything else crumble. But when we were again reconciled after our — respective affairs and we had learned anew what we meant to each other — that was no lie, no self-deception! Only make an effort to recall. It's a little hard to speak of it today. But you know and I know that at no time was I so utterly yours. Never, even in our earliest years of married life, was I so completely your ideal as then when we found each other again.

ECKOLD. Nonsense!

CLARA. It can't be —

ECKOLD. It is. You were neither my wife, nor my ideal — much less than later, for instance, you were my friend. You couldn't be that to me again.

CLARA. Carl!

ECKOLD. Yes, I recall. It possesses its own peculiar allurement, the time you speak of. But you were not my ideal. At the very best —

CLARA [passionately]. Don't say what's utterly beyond cure!

ECKOLD. Why should there be a cure? You will always be the same to me.

CLARA. Carl! If this be true —

ECKOLD. It is true!

CLARA. You should have told me this before you took me back. You had the right, it may be, to drive me away, even to kill me, if you wished. But the right to conceal the punishment you had meted out to me was not yours — You have deceived me more nefariously and a thousandfold more cowardly than I have deceived you. You have demeaned me lower than one human being has a right to demean another human being!

ECKOLD [triumphing]. Do you feel that? Does it cut you to the heart? Ah, that's as it should be. It was worth waiting ten years for this hour, this hour when you feel your degradation as trenchantly as I felt mine then.

CLARA. I never degraded you.

ECKOLD. Yes, you did. You degraded me, made me look ridiculous and heaped insult upon insult. Were it not he, I might perhaps have forgotten — forgiven. My anger would have dissolved into thin air, my hate would have vanished. But you gave yourself to him of all people — to him who has inherited all things from childhood —— everything which was denied me. I was filled with doubts and qualms. But it was he who always gave himself airs, held himself a better man because, forsooth, nature had endowed him with a gayer temperament. That galled my heart. But it also lent me patience to allow my hate to swell.

CLARA. He? What piece of good fortune did he come into? Who on earth is so fortunate that you should speak such words of envy?

ECKOLD. Do you hide his precious name still —— Ormin's name? The lordly Ormin's, the superior Ormin's, the favorite of the gods —

CLARA [stupefied]. Ormin? But that — Ormin? Suppose it's all a mistake?

ECKOLD. Eh? What sudden notion of yours is this?

CLARA. Produce your evidence, if you have any. Produce it.

ECKOLD. The trick comes too late. Ten times — a hundred times you betrayed yourself. But how could you fancy that all suspicions were disarmed, and all foresight provided, simply because he engaged lodgings for your dove-cote under an assumed name? Naturally, the investigations were made a trifle difficult through the genial pseudonym of Ernst Mayer, but they led eventually to the goal, even though it was just in the nick of time. Had you broken with him on the tenth of May instead of on the next day, then I should have had practically no evidence against you. For on the next day, a little nervous perhaps about your security, Mr. Ernst Mayer decided to go away on a journey — it is not recorded where — and your love's young dream came to an end. I am quite well posted, am I not? And how beautifully everything adjusted itself for us. Had I also seen you disappear on the next day from that house —

CLARA. Well?

ECKOLD. Oh, I don't know. Maybe your dove-cote episode would have ended tragically. For a trace of folly will be found in every one of us — in the Ormins as well as the Eckolds of the world. As it was, however, I had time to think it over. I did think it over and came to the conclusion that I would keep silent until today.

CLARA. And in his presence today —

ECKOLD. Why should I trouble about him? Sentimental ninny! Who in his old age, realizing that his gifts are growing stale, crosses the sea, seeking in the romantic atmosphere of pestilence and war, a reconciliation with his worthy wife —

CLARA. Why do you abuse him?

ECKOLD. Why not? Wasn't his whole life a public abuse of me?

CLARA. If you felt that way about it why didn't you say so to his face today?

ECKOLD. Men need not talk earnestly and in detail about such things. What women mean to me, what women have meant to me from a certain moment in my life, others as well as you, I've never hidden from him. In the same way he has always known that I have penetrated to the innermost recesses of his rather delicate and complacent soul.

CLARA. There is nothing to see in him. He never played comedy parts as you have. He was always truthful.

ECKOLD. Is the old witchery still effective, do you think? Positively you are beginning to pity me.

CLARA. I don't need to. I've been happy in my time, as happy as any woman can hope to be. I am still happy today — in the consciousness that I once belonged to him. Nothing can rob me of that memory. It was he and no one else. And I loved him beyond words. Beyond words — do you follow me? As I have loved nobody else in the world. Oh, I shall never forget that I was happy in this house and that I was intimate for so many years with no one as with you. And you, too, later, when you are calmer, will call to mind those happy hours. But what were the gifts life offered, what was domestic happiness, maternal bliss, compared to the lease of blessed ecstasy when I was — his — his — when I was his all-in-all —

ECKOLD. You saw him today for the last time. Do you realize that? You understand now why I forewent the opportunity of explanation with him.

CLARA. I understand. Oh, I understand everything so lucidly that I am going to leave this house — tonight.

ECKOLD. We are of one mind. But why leave just today? I give you leave to stay as long as you like.

CLARA. As it is, it is ten years too late.

ECKOLD [shrugging his shoulders]. You know my view. Really I'm not unthankful toward those first years of our marriage, but today — but today the time had come to speak about those other matters. Cruel words in cases like this are unavoidable. [Glances out of the window.] I haven't given up hope altogether that later, perhaps, we will talk quietly. Have you nothing else to say to me? Well, then, this — this evening let it be. There are, of course, certain necessary formal matters to be discussed. I have to go now — I must [hesitates, then] — Adieu. [Clara remains silent. Eckold goes out. Clara stands alone for a space, rigid and immobile; then, as if awaking from a trance, she darts into the room on the left, and returns almost immediately with her hat and wraps. She hesitates. Then seating herself at the small secretary, she takes a blank sheet of paper and starts to write. Almost inaudibly.]

CLARA. What's the good? Words lie. [Rising.] Bettina? She needs me no longer. [Rings.]

MAID [who has entered]. Did you ring, madam?

CLARA. I shall be home rather late tonight. Don't wait with the supper. [Goes out. The maid gazes at her somewhat perplexed.]

[CURTAIN.]

PART II. THE BIG SCENE

A PLAY IN ONE ACT

PERSONS

CONRAD HERBOT, AN actor.

SOPHIE, his wife.

EDGAR GLEY.

DOCTOR FALK, director of a theatre.

VILMA FLAMM.

A BELL-HOP.

A THEATRE EMPLOYEE.

THE BIG SCENE

[SCENE. AN APARTMENT in a fashionable hotel. There is a door framed in the back wall giving onto the corridor; another, hung with portieres, on the left, conducting to an adjoining room. Down left, a fireplace with brightly burning logs. Directly in front of the fireplace, a small table with a settee. In the centre, a thought to the right, an ordinary escritoire with telephone apparatus

Alongside the escritoire, as if tentatively pushed up, is a divan. In the back, left, alcoves skillfully concealed by curtains. There is a rather large window on the right affording a glimpse of the theatre vis-à-vis. Two wardrobes flank either side of the door in the back.
Late afternoon on a day toward the end of fall. For several minutes the room remains vacant. Then, a knock. Pause. The knocking is resumed.

A Bell-hop glides in by way of the door in the back. He is carrying several letters. Almost simultaneously Sophie enters from the other door.]

SOPHIE. Letters? [The Bell-hop intent on putting the letters on the escritoire approaches her.] Any for me? — [She relieves him of the letters and glances hastily through the pile. She puts three on the escritoire and keeps one in her hand.] Ah! From him. [The Bell-hop goes. Sophie moves to the window with the letter, which she proceeds feverishly to open. She reads it, smiles as if pleased, shakes her head and then resumes reading. In the midst of this, she is interrupted by another knock.] Come in.

[The Bell-hop re-enters, this time with a card which he hands to Sophie.]

SOPHIE. Vilma Flamm? I don't recollect ever meeting her.

BELL-HOP. The lady says she comes by previous appointment.

SOPHIE. By previous appointment? Ah, quite so. You will please inform the lady that my husband — that Mr. Herbot, actor by appointment to the Burgtheatre, is not at home. [The Bellhop goes.]

SOPHIE [continues reading her letter. Her face shows that she is profoundly touched]. No. What an idea! Surely he doesn't believe — [a knock]. I wonder what that is now? Come in.

[Vilma Flamm enters. She is a girl somewhere in the vicinity of twenty-two, fashionably but not, one would say, expensively gowned. Nor, taken all in all, is she particularly attractive, due perhaps to the fact that her hat is so immense and her coif so distinctly and unmistakably of Pre-Raphaelite origin. Her eyes are lustrous and dark. She is slightly ill at ease under Sophie's appraising look.]

VILMA. I beg your pardon —

SOPHIE. Miss Flamm, I believe —?

VILMA. Yes. I come at the request of — SOPHIE. Didn't the boy tell you? Mr. Herbot is not at home just now.

VILMA. I hope you will forgive me, but I couldn't help thinking there must be some mistake since Mr. Herbot asked me here at five today. I'm afraid I am a trifle late. Do you expect Mr. Herbot back shortly?

SOPHIE [extremely cool]. I can't say for certain. Don't you think you had better call again some other time? Or — would you prefer waiting in the lobby?

VILMA. I — wait? I'm not strong on the art of waiting. And besides — I presume you are Mr. Herbot's secretary?

SOPHIE. No, I am his wife.

VILMA [involuntarily]. Ah! —

SOPHIE. The announcement seems to occasion you a good deal of amazement, Miss Flamm. VILMA. Oh no. Only I was under the impression — to be sure, it's common gossip by now, that Mr. Herbot is divorced from his wife.

SOPHIE [with admirable self-possession]. A mistake, I assure you.

VILMA. Thank Heaven for that.

SOPHIE [wheeling half-way round]. Very good of you to say so, I'm sure. [With greater affableness.] If you'd care to leave a message for my husband —?

VILMA. I do hope you won't mind! But, you see, it's rather of a personal nature. I came expecting to get a try-out from Mr. Herbot, who has made a great name for himself at the Burgtheatre.

SOPHIE. A try-out?

VILMA. Perhaps I ought to tell you that I am preparing myself for a career on the stage. For six months, or thereabouts, I've been a pupil of Madame Fuchs. But lately I have gotten into the habit of questioning very seriously whether her method is quite the correct one. It goes without saying, that the members of my family are utterly opposed to the idea. My father's a merchant in the city — Flamm and Sons, Haberdashers. The sons are my brothers. I gave Mr. Herbot full particulars about myself in a letter which I sent him a little over a week ago. And in reply Mr. Herbot was generous enough to call this appointment for five o'clock today. I suppose he's forgotten all about it.

SOPHIE. Quite possible, since, as you say, he made it eight days ago — [A knock.]

VILMA [eagerly]. Come in. Oh — I beg — your pardon.

[Sophie smiles involuntarily. The Bell-hop appears with a card.]

SOPHIE. Oh, certainly. Show him in.

[Falk enters. He is a small slender man, clean-shaven, with a pair of keen penetrating eyes. He wears a tortoise-shell pince-nez which he removes instinctively from time to time from the bridge of his nose. He is wearing an overcoat. In one hand he clutches a stick and in the other a manuscript case.]

FALK. Well, here I am. I didn't wait to be shown in.

SOPHIE [quite beside herself with joy. Offering him her hand]. Good evening, dear friend. [To Vilma, who remains standing gazing wide-eyed at the director.] You will pardon me, Miss Flamm, but, if I were you, I would write again.

VILMA. Would it be too presumptuous to beg you to present me to the director —

[Falk turns away after shooting a withering glance at Vilma.]

SOPHIE [slightly confused]. For the moment — I — have forgotten your name ——

VILMA. If you will allow me, I will introduce myself: I am Vilma Flamm, actress by profession —— an actress, that is, about to be. Herr Director you see before you one of your most ardent admirers. I rarely visit any other theatre but yours. So I would take this opportunity —

FALK. But I would not. [Turns away.]

VILMA. It was wholly unintentional, I assure you. It must have been the hand of destiny —

FALK. Perhaps. If so, then you have entirely misread the drift of this hand. I do not discuss theatrical business outside of my office, and there only between two and three, afternoons, by previous arrangement.

VILMA. Then may I call on you tomorrow at two —?

FALK. Please don't put yourself out, my dear young lady. We have no vacancy at the present moment. But you are young yet; my advice to you is to try the provinces. Germany, believe me, is rich in excellent —

VILMA [as if suddenly struck with the idea]. Theatres.

FALK. Railways. Good evening, Miss —

VILMA. At all events, I shall never forget this hour.

FALK. I can't put a stop to your memory, I'm sure.

VILMA. Good evening, Mrs. Herbot. Good evening, Herr Director.

[She goes out.]

FALK [still flourishing his stick]. Why do you let people of that description cross your threshold, Mrs. Herbot. May I —?

[He places his stick and overcoat on the divan, but retains the case in his hand.]

SOPHIE. I couldn't help it. She came in unawares. Herbot, it seems, had made an appointment with her in order, as she says, to give her a try-out.

FALK. One shouldn't object to that. Occasionally he is obsessed with the idea of instructing the young.

SOPHIE. There are times when — I — I feel as if I must pack my things and leave him.

FALK. It wouldn't pay, that. As regards this would-be actress, she needn't trouble you nor me nor even him very much. Proof is, he wasn't even at home when she called.

SOPHIE. He wrote her eight days ago when, supposedly, he was divorced.

FALK. Oh no.

SOPHIE. And if I hadn't come yesterday —

FALK [seizing the occasion]. But you are here, my dear Sophie. Let's keep to that just now. And that's why I've come: to offer you my welcome and congratulations on your return.

SOPHIE. Thanks. I gladly accept your welcome. But as to the congratulations — do you think they are à propos?

FALK. Indeed they are. A thousand congratulations. I've already congratulated your husband at rehearsal today, and I daresay I have every reason in the world to congratulate myself, besides, on winning back my star actor. —

SOPHIE. But you never lost him, to begin with.

FALK. Still —

SOPHIE. Oh, I followed his repertory day by day. He played, in all, from September 1st until today, October 30th. Six times a week, and in the course of this period he created two brand-new parts, one classic and the other modern. And both, I understand, were successes.

FALK. Successes? H'm. That's as you look at it. To my way of thinking, he made a fizzle of these parts. Why, I couldn't help hissing him myself — under my breath, of course, because noisy manifestations of disapproval are prohibited in my theatre. Oh yes; he made a hit with the gallery. What else do you expect? Good Heavens, a dozen geniuses can be ruined and laid away before the great general public or, for that matter, the critics get even an inkling that one of the most cherished idols of the day is threatening to topple. Only the other day, — it was in Tasso — he tripped up disgracefully on lines no fewer than seven times. The gullible, easily credulous public, I daresay, thought each slip-up a fresh nuance. In addition he's fallen into a habit of mouthing — the same mannerism, in fact, which he used to pull off before I came along and literally rescued him from the Burgtheatre.

SOPHIE. Don't try to cry down the Burgtheatre. It's superior to — most others.

FALK. Oh, of course. That's a regular little pet view which you Viennese hold. Let me tell you, dear Sophie, it would have spelled the end of Herbot as an actor if he —

SOPHIE. If he had stayed on at the Burgtheatre?

FALK. Ah — no. I mean, if you two had not been brought together again. As a patron of German art in general and as a director of a theatre in particular, I was bound to bring you both to your senses.

SOPHIE. Oh!

FALK. And to thrust you into his arms.

SOPHIE. Indeed? Then it was the theatre director, not my husband, who sent me those appealing letters.

FALK. Appealing or not, at all events, I am gratified that they were not sent unavailingly. And I can't help coddling myself into thinking that not only my theatre, but Herbot himself and you, above all, are going to gain by it.

SOPHIE. Will you not admit — be truthful now! — that I acted a little precipitately in coming so soon.

FALK. I don't think so. But, touching those other things, I don't care to be pretentious. It is for the best; it is good for you too, that Herbot and you have made it up. You belong to one another. Yes, apart from whatever indiscretions you may have committed or may, in future, commit!

SOPHIE. You!

FALK. I mean, either of you. And as for him — well, this is by no means the first time that I've called your attention to it — you must really take him as he is. Wherever geniuses are to be considered, you can always count on a certain amount of poignant grief to directors as well as to women.

SOPHIE. Except that, in the case of the director, the grief has its recompense.

FALK. Don't say that, Sophie. Ultimately, it has its recompense for you women, too. You must exult exquisitely, you women, when you realize that a jack-a-napes fashioned along Herbot's lines, is directly dependent on you, and that this dependency increases from year to year. In short, if you will have the truth, he can neither live nor act without you. Don't you perceive, Sophie, if ever there existed an indisputable mark of love, then here it is. And since you cannot live without him —

SOPHIE. I'm not so sure of that.

FALK. Well, at all events, you are here. The rest will follow, if it hasn't already. But let me have a good look at you, Sophie. Seclusion, it seems, has worked wonders with you —— if seclusion it was.

SOPHIE. Doctor! Whatever can you be thinking of?

FALK. Well, assuming for an instant it were true, nobody would count it against you. Least of all, he. And revenge, if you'll forgive the bromide, is said to be sweet.

SOPHIE. Revenge is a thing I do not understand.

FALK. Oh, well, it doesn't matter much because revenge — at least in cases like this — rarely comes unalloyed. For the doer of vengeance, so called, a good deal of the sweetness is thinned in the process, a fact which has somehow got itself overlooked in the proverb. Why are you laughing, Sophie?

SOPHIE. What you just said, is very clever. But how ruthlessly you'd cut it out, if by chance you came across it in the dialogue of one of your playwrights!

FALK. Well, what do you expect? Wisdom on the stage is like sowing the sands. It's altogether out of place. But to take up again our uncut dialogue: — Ah, but you have grown slenderer and a shade paler in complexion.

SOPHIE. You only fancy so, doctor. I'm looking fine. And, all in all, I had a splendid time. Seclusion isn't such a bad thing after all —— and bracing, quite bracing, believe me. Just think: to stroll for hours along the stretch of beach or to lose oneself in some beautiful book or to lie, perfectly relaxed, in a boat and gaze up, drinking in the blue immensity of the heavens; but, above and beyond all this, not to have to listen to lies, lies — the whole livelong day.

FALK. You exaggerate, Sophie. Lies —! There are no such things as lies in the world. There are only people who permit themselves to be fooled. And you were never one of them, Sophie. On the other hand, there are certain human relations that are founded on lies. Only this fact must be ignored, never traded on. In spite of everything, Herbot loves you and has always loved you. This is the undeniable truth, no matter what has happened.

SOPHIE. And will happen in the future, you must add.

FALK. It will never happen again. This would-be tragedy queen in her rather piteous dilemma is negligible, any way you take her. Surely Herbot couldn't foresee eight days ago that you'd give in. He probably wanted to lay in fuel for the winter.

SOPHIE. Do you condone this sort of thing too? Do you realize that he wrote me daily, though I haven't replied with so much as a couple of cool lines. And what letters!

FALK. More beautiful than mine?

SOPHIE. It seemed that he had no other thought, no other longing but for me.

FALK. Which is quite true. Shall I tell you, Sophie, how this spoiled child wept like a babe because of you. You won't take unfair advantage of the confidence, I hope. And not only did he come up and weep in my quiet chambers, but recently, the other day, in fact, we were sitting in the restaurant and he was to all intents and purposes gay; and then suddenly he dropped his head on the table and commenced whimpering like a dog.

SOPHIE. And in your apartment, you say, ne wept like a babe. Doubtless this is a fine distinction.

FALK. Well then, if you'll have it so, like a dog —

SOPHIE. But in the restaurant, I suppose, you first opened a "pottle Sec," as he calls it.

FALK. No use denying it.

SOPHIE. He did drink with you —

FALK. Only when despair got the better of him.

SOPHIE. But you'll admit that he got pleasure out of it.

FALK. Yes. Life runs its course. That's from one of my playwrights. Not very profound, I daresay, but it hits the bull's-eye. And so what can we do but resign ourselves to our destinies? Tonight, after the final curtain of Hamlet — 11.45 — in honor of the reunion of husband and wife, and of the cause of German art, we'll blow ourselves to a "pottle" of wine. And I promise you, he won't start whimpering tonight — But what the deuce can be keeping him so long?

SOPHIE. His usual afternoon stroll — or, who knows, he may be betraying me with some tragedienne or banker's wife — or simply a shopgirl.

FALK. Oh please! Betraying you —! Before Hamlet? Incredible!

SOPHIE [laughing involuntarily]. What's that you're promenading back and forth?

FALK. Oh this?' This is a new play. A very interesting part for him? I want him to look at it. Now that the affair [with a bow] has been successfully concluded, I know I can trust in his judgment.

SOPHIE. You flatter me.

FALK. But, tell me, when did you arrive, Frau Sophie, which being rendered into our beloved German tongue, means, not without good reason, Frau Wisdom.

SOPHIE. Last night. Oh, you needn't pull a wry face. The hotel was overcrowded. We got this room this morning.

FALK. Seriously now, doesn't it speak well for him that he has kept your charming apartment locked up and sworn an oath that he won't cross the threshold except arm in arm with you?

SOPHIE. Oh yes, there are some oaths which he keeps. You see, the hotel, being directly opposite the theatre, is altogether more convenient for — try-outs and coaching —

FALK. Enough. Either you're reconciled or you're not reconciled. Why are you suspicious? Have you any grounds? Quite frankly, I didn't come here with the single purpose of congratulating you. There is a promise I want to obtain from you, if I can.

SOPHIE. A promise?

FALK. That you won't go through the same rigmarole again.

SOPHIE. Rigmarole? I?

FALK. I mean, that you won't leave him again. I can't afford accidents in the middle of the season. This time you fled on August 14th, and it wasn't until September 1st that he recovered sufficiently to act. Now wouldn't I be in a fine fix, if you were to do it again when the play we re producing happens to be a hit? I simply cant let matters reach that pass. And so I want you to promise me —

SOPHIE. Hadn't we better sign a contract.

FALK. Contract —? Oh please! I wish you to give your promise gratuitously, out of a sense of conviction, insight and understanding of my position. He, I know, won't trespass again. As a conductor of a place of amusement, you realize that I am committed, like the prohibition of smoking in the theatre, to anticipate every eventuality. And so if this little thing should happen again —

SOPHIE. Doctor! You amaze me. Little thing! Have I been speaking to the four winds? Or must I assume that in this lying world, even such a respectable member of society — such a gentleman as yourself, has lost, along with the rest, the power to differentiate between levity and — baseness?

FALK. But — but —

SOPHIE. Under such circumstances, how can I come back to him?

FALK. You needn't come back to him. To begin with, you should not go away at all. Why don't you take things less tragically? You can do it. You have proved it over and over again. To be truthful with you, I can't understand why you left this time —?

SOPHIE. You can't understand? You, who have been a bystander through it all, from beginning to end?

FALK. You remember three years ago? I was a bystander to that too. As far as I can tell, the cases are alike. Faithless once, faithless always. Why did you leave this time —?

SOPHIE. They are different, dear friend. At that time we two alone, Herbot and I, had to make it up with one another. The happiness of other people was not at stake.

FALK. Of course a third person was involved. That's in the very nature of these affairs.

SOPHIE. Philinchen? A frivolous woman who'd gone through almost everything, and who had no responsibility whatever to herself or to anybody else. And then, when a man plays the same dangerous rôle night after night for a hundred nights, and you are playing opposite him — it's like tempting fate. I saw it coming on the first night, huge, irresistible. After that the only question was at which performance the affair would come to full fruition.

FALK. It was on the ninth. By the twenty fifth it was closed.

SOPHIE. You keep your books accurately, doctor.

FALK. I am half a parent to Herbot. And I assure you, had it lasted longer, I should have substituted another Rautendelein. Entirely on your account, dear Sophie. Because I knew you did mind, in spite of what you say.

SOPHIE. Mind? Ah no. I understood it. I said to myself: — What would happen to you if you played opposite a man like Herbot, night after night? Unfortunately, there is no other like him. I can quite grasp how like incense, like a wild abandon, a nightmare, the feeling would come over one — and then at last one awakes. This forbearance did not come at once. In the throes of my first anguish, I wanted to kill them.

FALK. Both?

SOPHIE [earnestly]. Him — at least, him.

FALK. And what about me? Eh? I should have had to put off my play. And a fine chance I'd have, getting on my feet again!

SOPHIE [laughing involuntarily]. But how do you explain the fact that, after Herbot, others played the part?

FALK. Later — much later. Before a performance, I warn you, no star is allowed to be murdered. Now you have an inkling of what drawbacks there are in this repertory business. But many thanks for not carrying out your intention. You were wise in thinking better of it, just as now —

SOPHIE. I'm not sure yet whether it's the best thing in this case, though.

FALK. Right after the affair — after that first crisis, I remember quite well that you really became mated for the first time. And you were wonderfully happy. At least until August of this year. And, trust me, you will be happy together again.

SOPHIE. Wonderfully happy?

FALK. Certainly.

SOPHIE. I don't think so. Even though I've come back, be assured it can never mean happiness again.

FALK. But —

SOPHIE. Only think, doctor, who the favorite is now. A young girl, an innocent young girl about to be married. And her fiancé is a splendid young man who is quite daft about the girl. Besides, he and Herbot are quite friendly. Has anyone the right to jeopardize a third person in an affair of this kind?

FALK. In a higher sense, certainly not. But in the present instance the happiness of a third person is not in peril. The fellow knows absolutely nothing, and the wedding will take place in eight days.

SOPHIE. Oh, that is the least consideration.

FALK. I'm afraid, Sophie, you've been to too many performances of Ibsen at my theatre. Luckily, Herbot has no use for Ibsen and regards the affair as comparatively harmless — not very different from that other one. At that time, it was the case of a young girl of good family too; yes, and she was about to be married. But an affair of this sort doesn't always imply a climax, as you think. With the perplexities of conscience Herbot has no patience. His is much too primitive — let us be frank — his is too wholesome a nature.

SOPHIE. Wholesome? Is that the correct word?—'

FALK. Really, I never dreamed you'd take the thing so painfully. At first I had no idea when the affair would peter out. They were wrapped up in one another and noticed nothing or seemed to notice nothing. Naturally I wondered a bit, and I dare say I had cause to wonder too.

SOPHIE. That's a bit dark, doctor.

FALK. Well, what I mean is that I should certainly have wondered if they had let the thing go on that way, if at the critical moment I had not found them with entanglements elsewhere.

SOPHIE [smiling]. Indeed. How you notice everything, dear doctor.

FALK. You don't have to be particularly sharp for that. And I, as an old skillful dramatist, cannot lay the tragic blame at your door.

SOPHIE [very earnestly]. Perhaps you are right. But I am not altogether without blame. Otherwise I should not have come back.

FALK. And wouldn't it be much nicer — and here the unmoral casuist puts the question — wouldn't it somewhat relieve the situation if you were likewise — how shall I put it? — caught in a fault?

SOPHIE. Perhaps. Similar thoughts have come to me unaided in my seclusion.

FALK. Similar thoughts occurred to you, and yet you remained alone?

SOPHIE. Do you still doubt that?

FALK. Oh no!

SOPHIE. I don't think you have a true account of the affair to which you allude. And since I feel that you are a friend —

FALK. You have none better —

SOPHIE. Then you ought to know the truth. My truth. Here is a letter which I received from him one hour ago. From him.

FALK. From him? From the young chap sporting the hunting cap? My chess opponent?

SOPHIE. You referred to him, didn't you? Or did you suspect an escapade with some one else? It's a letter from the young man with whom I seemed to you to be so taken up, emotionally and otherwise, that I allowed the affair between my husband and Daisy to take its natural course. Would you care to read it?

FALK. Typed, is it? No? Oh, you will have to excuse me, Sophie. Read it to me yourself with your dark resonant voice.

SOPHIE. I'll read only a few lines which, I think, will clear up everything for you. Just a minute. [Turns pages and reads.] "I have just learnt, dear madam, that you are still in Brioni and as ever, alone. Since you left the Attersee lakeside before me and have not, to my knowledge, arrived at Vienna, it follows that you have not seen your husband for two months." [Interrupts herself.] The letter was forwarded to me here.

[Reads further.] “It is not my intention to force myself into your private affairs, nor to attempt to penetrate what appears a self-chosen reticence. Whatever has happened, whatever your plans are, I must not presume to be concerned any further than you will allow. But, if I may, I should like to remind you of one hour — a wonderful hour on the shore of the lake just before sunset—” A wonderful sunset, while my husband and Daisy and her fiancé were out sailing in the distance.

FALK. Is that what our friend means by “wonderful”? He is undoubtedly referring to something that happened between you and him —

SOPHIE. It was the hour when he dared utter his feelings, for the first and only time. No, he didn’t utter them. He betrayed them in a quiet but moving way. By kissing my hand! That was all.

FALK. That may be much.

SOPHIE. At all events, you must admit, that my transgression was very slight.

FALK. All the more praiseworthy, because he’s such a handsome, clean-cut fellow. I’ve rarely gotten along with anybody so well. His personality gives out a kind of wood smell. I welcome an unliterary chap like that as a godsend. I’ll bet he never wrote a play in his life.

SOPHIE. Ah, yes. They’ve something original to offer, these simple good people who are no geniuses.

FALK. Good. What a word! That wonderful hour on the shore of the lake — I’m inclined to think it depended entirely on you and the good —

SOPHIE. You don’t know him, if you say that. Even at that moment his intentions were — well, honorable. Just as they are now. And he clears himself, as you will see, in the letter. Let me read the ending. [She turns the pages.]

FALK. You’re skipping a good deal.

SOPHIE [reading]. “Just the same — I am just as I was in the summer. When you need a friend, call on me or, better still, come yourself—”

FALK. Come yourself?

SOPHIE. Listen to the rest. [Reads.] “My life belongs to you. I am all alone and absolutely free. If you are free too, Frau Sophie, as free as I suppose you to be—”

FALK [brusquely] His conjecture is wrong, quite wrong. Have you written him so?

SOPHIE. The letter came only an hour ago.

FALK. “Come yourself.” Not bad, that. The fellow seems daft about inviting everybody to his hunting-lodge at Klein-Reifling.

SOPHIE. Everybody?

FALK. Yes. He's invited me this summer. "If," said he, "you'd care to get away from the theatrical groove, come out to Klein-Reifling. Wonderful country, you know. We can play chess every evening. You don't have to shoot deer, if you don't care to." I don't suppose he asked you to shoot, either, Sophie.

SOPHIE [dropping the letter]. Ah, how stupid we are! Why are we humans created with the power to ruin the lives of people who are innocent and who don't understand the meaning of it all?

FALK. Understand? Can't Herbot charge you with a want of understanding? Was he as bad as you make him out? Does he bother about the happiness of others? What are other people to him? To him who is accustomed always to play the leading part? Supernumeraries — people who never get a curtain call and die ingloriously behind the scenes! You can do no wrong to such people when you're composed of heroic stuff yourself — What is it? —

SOPHIE. He — he is coming. I hear his footstep and my heart's going pit-a-pat, like a young girl's. Oh, it's sheer faint-heartedness.

FALK. On the contrary. It's just as it should be.

[Conrad Herbot enters. He is a man of about 45 with dark curly hair and a pair of grey-striped black eyes. He is wearing an overcoat and hat.]

HERBOT. Good evening. [Slaps Falk on the shoulder.] Well, what do you say, old chap? Now I'm at home, as it were, even though this happens to be — for the time being — nothing better than a room in a hotel. [Pats Sophie's cheek.] Good evening, dear. [To Falk.] She's looking extremely well, isn't she? And pretty too? Let me tell you, it's quite cozy now that she's come back.

FALK. I second that.

HERBOT. The last few hours have brought me back to my old self quite remarkably, and it's almost as if it had never been otherwise. The two months are dead and forgotten. Hola! Hola!

SOPHIE. But I was away, wasn't I? You speak now as the Berliners do.

HERBOT [removing his overcoat]. Of course. Of all things, she can't bear that. [Exaggerating the Viennese accent.] Goin' to be good from now on, little dearie?

FALK. Well, I'll leave you two together — newly-weds just home from church.

SOPHIE. Won't you stay for a cup of coffee?

FALK. Thanks. I really can't stay any longer. [Sophie rings.]

HERBOT. Are you leaving us again so soon?

FALK. I've been here an hour already. Where have you been gadding about at this hour?

HERBOT [glancing at the clock]. Good Heavens, it's half past six already. Ah, but there's a great fascination in walking about the streets when you know there's someone at home waiting for you.

FALK. Only, as I remember, it wasn't quite fascinating for the person who had to wait. Well, see you later at the theatre. [To Sophie.] I've kept your box for you. Outside of that the house is all sold out.

HERBOT. A work of art!

FALK. Goodbye.

HERBOT. Now that you're here, I want to reiterate that you don't pay me half the salary that's coming to me. So long! Will you be in the box too?

FALK. On one condition: that you will play your part with some degree of intelligence.

HERBOT. You villain! In honor of this glorious day, suppose we drop into the Kannenberg after the play and open a pottle of Sec —

SOPHIE. Conrad!

HERBOT. What — is it, my dear? Oh, alright. [Mimicking the Viennese.] Let's have some suds instead and a plate of goulash. Eh? What do you say to that?

FALK. That depends on Sophie.

[Waiter enters, receives orders from Sophie and goes out.]

HERBOT [catching sight of the manuscript]. What's that?

FALK. The play I spoke about this morning.

HERBOT. Another? Thank God Sophie's here at least. My vacation, I perceive, is over at last. I have about a half dozen of them over there. Believe me, Falk, I tried my hardest to look through one and then another; and the result is a brain-storm.

FALK. Did you ever hear anything like it? [To Sophie.] The foremost names in the German dramatic world.

HERBOT. Well, I should like awfully to say something straight out to you, Falk. To me every play at the reading seems pure twaddle. And in the majority of cases I am right. As a matter of fact, with many, when you see them on the stage —

FALK. With Conrad Herbot in the leading part.

HERBOT. That never did hurt any play. Doubtless you sometimes feel as I do, that all this theatrical clap-trap is the merest flummery. Backdrop and wings! The curtain goes up and the curtain goes down, and nine times out of ten the fellow who trafficks on the boards is a blackguard of the —

FALK. Leave him alone.

HERBOT. Upon my word, we're the most paradoxical people in the world, we actor-folk. In private life, I grant you quite rational — quite. Then we strike a pose behind the footlights and mouth some bit got by rote, just as if we meant it in all seriousness. We enter and we exist and out front the audience sit gaping and whispering behind their palms. Incredible! That they should fall for such a thing. Do you know what I think at times? That this so-called art of the theatre is simply an invention of the box-office.

FALK. A powerful and eke a profound observation!

HERBOT. True, isn't it? And yet if the public were informed of this fact, it would ruin your business, wouldn't it? Well, for the time being I'm going to keep it to myself; but some day, I don't mind telling you, I'm going to write an article to this tune — when the time is ripe — It would make a splendid Christmas supplement. The public's very fond of that sort of thing.

FALK. You'd better wait a bit, that is, until you've stopped drawing a salary. Next year perhaps or the year after.

HERBOT. Oh yes, that would suit you to a dot. You want to lay by a pile meanwhile. Well, good luck to you, if you can do it. Oh, and by the way, if there's going to be a raft of junk cluttering the doorway of my dressing room the same as yesterday, during Tasso, I'll raise such a rumpus ——

FALK. And if you fill your dressing room with cigarette smoke again, I'll give you two weeks' notice —

HERBOT. Just what I'm waiting for. Then I'll be able to lead a normal life for the rest of my days. Lying at ease on the grass and gazing up at the blue sky, or with a gun plopping through the meadows and the fertile fields —

FALK. With a gun?

HERBOT. Certainly. It's not a bad substitute for the stage.

FALK. Did my chess opponent, the fellow with the green hat, invite you too?

HERBOT. Herr von Bolschau. Of course he did.

FALK. It's an obsession with him.

HERBOT. Charming fellow, Bolschau is. Ask Sophie. She likes him too. Isn't that so, dear? [In Berlinese.] We know whom to like and whom not to like, don't we, my dear? —

FALK. I won't let you go. You've no business in Klein-Reifling. Well, auf Wiedersehen. I invite myself to your box, Sophie. [Goes.]

HERBOT. What a soul that man has! In our last contract I fell beautifully for him. Well, he'll have to shell out or I sail for America. On this side they pay starvation salaries. Well, Sophie [drawing her to him], here we are together again. But tell me, please. Did you intend to leave me for good?

SOPHIE. Here I am, back again. So let's not talk about it. Let's forget it.

HERBOT. Oh, if one only could! You've no idea what I suffered while you were away. I wasn't myself at all. I walked about as in a dream — as in an evil dream. And I played comedy parts like a swine. Not always — but most of the time.

SOPHIE. Yes, that's exactly what Falk says.

HERBOT. What? The impudence! I was all right for I don't know how long. I was good enough, even for the public. Too good! You should penetrate the man first. For a measly hundred marks he'd cut his throat. But they're all the same, every one of them. He's spreading the rumor about that I'm going back home. But nobody believes him. They have eyes and ears, thank Heaven! The public is mine. Now, and for a long time to come. And more than ever, now — now that you have come back — now, believe me. Without you I am lost. That's the truth. I should have given up the legitimate stage and gone into vaudeville. In vaudeville there's a better chance to travel and, on the whole, it pays better.

[The waiter brings tea, pastry and sets the tea-table.]

HERBOT. I'll tell you what: In February I'm going to take time out and we'll go to the Riviera. I won't accept your "no." By God, I've earned it. Since the time I was a boy I've longed to go there, and today I am 43. Connected almost twenty seven years with the theatre. Twenty seven. "At the age of sixteen, a mere youngster, he ran away" — but you know the rest. [Waiter goes out.]

SOPHIE [pouring tea]. Until today I've been unable to find out from whom you ran away. Your parents were reconciled to the idea of your going on the stage.

HERBOT. Why, of course. You see, at the age of 14, I acted all kinds of parts at home. "The late lamented actor by appointment at the Hoftheatre at Bayreuth, Herr Story, who in the youngster devoted to Thespis—" and so on. [Notices the card.] Who is Vilma Flamm?

SOPHIE. Vilma Flamm is a young lady.

HERBOT. What kind of a young lady?

SOPHIE. A young artiste with whom you had an engagement here.

HERBOT. An engagement?

SOPHIE. You were going to see if she had any talent. She wrote you eight days ago.

HERBOT. Oh yes, the little goose! I hope you speedily showed her the door.

SOPHIE. Of course. But you had an appointment with her.

HERBOT. Not unlikely. You know sometimes one replies and sometimes one doesn't. Was anybody else here?

SOPHIE. Not today.

HERBOT. Well, if that sort come, just put them out. You have plein pouvoir. I don't give try-outs, I do not instruct. I do not write in autograph albums. On the other hand, it may have been a blackmailer. I'll be hanged if I can remember the name of Vilma Flamm. [They sit at the tea-table.]

SOPHIE. You always had a poor memory.

HERBOT. You don't expect me to have a memory for such things. Just consider what I must cram into my head, as it is. The godlike words of the master creations of our great poets — and all that modern rot, besides. Naturally there's hardly any room for anything else.

SOPHIE. For nothing at all?

HERBOT. To be quite frank, the function is under my control. I remember and I forget, just as it pleases me. And I assure you, Sophie — I know what's passing through your mind now — if I should casually meet a certain lady in the street, I'd cut her without a moment's hesitation. I should not recognize her at all. If I should attempt to recall her features, it would be in vain.
She is a shadow, a ghost, your old grandmother, if you like.

SOPHIE [bursting out]. How could you do it?

HERBOT. Yes, how could I do it?

SOPHIE. Her fiancé was your friend.

HERBOT. Not friend; hardly that. Still, I confess, it was a rascally thing to do. And, being aware of that, I was amply prepared to pay the price.

SOPHIE. You were — when were you prepared?

HERBOT. That very morning, Sophie. When I returned home from her arms — I beg your pardon — and found you gone and your farewell note. Those terrible words! When I realized that I had lost you — lost you for ever, do you know what agony I suffered? I resolved then to go to him, confess what a scoundrel I was and frankly tell him that I had betrayed my wife and seduced his fiancée — and so on. For hours and hours in the early morning dusk I wandered along the river-bank and fought a terrific struggle with myself, until I saw that I dared not do it. If only for the sake of Daisy's family. But they were gloomy days to bear, Sophie, those last five days in our country villa — and perhaps the greatest ordeal of all was the need of lying, the need of going on lying.

SOPHIE. You mean —?

HERBOT. Well, you see I had to find some plausible excuse for your sudden departure. And so in my desperation, I invented the yarn or a drain bursting in our Berlin apartment. Oh, I sketched in the details — details, whole letters from you, humorous turns of expression. Can you imagine it! In this way I had to drag on my life, on my lips a drain burst and in my heart — death. Yes, dearest, it was by no means easy to live out the day as if nothing had happened; taking your morning bath as before, eating breakfast, sailing —

SOPHIE. As if nothing had happened. Both day and night.

HERBOT. Sophie, upon my word, on that day when you went away I was done with —

SOPHIE. Don't pledge your word. Oaths are not necessary in reference to the past. The past is buried, dead and buried.

HERBOT. Yes, buried a long time ago.

SOPHIE. But the future, that belongs to us, if you are willing.

HERBOT. If I am willing? If I am — Sophie, dear!

SOPHIE. And I beg of you, Conrad, above all things be truthful. It is the one thing I demand of you. I can understand everything. I can forgive everything. Only, I beg of you, don't put on the comic spirit. Don't — in my presence. It isn't necessary. Everything which you have just said, was not you. There was an occasional gleam which shone through your mask, but you — your inmost self — it was not that; that you, I mean, which abides in the recesses of self, very deep within. And I cannot resist the feeling that that which you are is somehow good — somehow — and on that I place my trust. You've only got to believe in it yourself. Deep in the beginnings of your consciousness, I feel — oh so vividly — that you are a mere child, nothing but a child. So —

HERBOT. A child? There may be a good deal in what you say. I have something to confess to you, Sophie. Whenever I start introspecting or dreaming about myself, I invariably see myself not as a somewhat mature person with iron grey hair, but rather as a small boy who is always being led by the hand of somebody, by his father or his tutor, though, to be sure, I never had a tutor. I'm quite amazed sometimes — but you must promise me not to let this go further — that people talk to me as if I were quite rational and wholly grown-up; while I feel an irresistible impulse to say to them, "Please let me be. I can't make head or tail of your twaddle. By nature I am alien to your confidence." Yes indeed, Sophie, that was a singularly apt observation — I am a child. [A knock is heard.] Who the deuce can that be? Come in. [Enter boy with card.]

HERBOT [ignoring it]. I am not at home. [Reads the card and starts.] Eh?

SOPHIE. What is it? [Takes the card out of his hand.] Edgar Gley — Edgar —

HERBOT. You heard what I said. I am not at home to any one. I play tonight and I am busy.

SOPHIE. You must see him, Herbot.

HERBOT. Must? I don't see that.

SOPHIE [to the Bell-hop]. Wait a minute.

HERBOT. Where is the gentleman waiting?

BELL-HOP. In the lobby, sir.

SOPHIE [under her breath to Herbot]. You can't avoid this interview. The sooner it is over, the better.

HERBOT. Show the gentleman in. [Bell-hop goes.]

SOPHIE [anxiously and quite earnestly]. Conrad —

HERBOT. What is it? Certainly it shows lack of consideration just before Hamlet. [Walking back and forth.]

SOPHIE. Are you sure you haven't heard from him since?

HERBOT. I've told you, haven't I? Not for two months — it's quite incredible that he should suspect anything. It can't be about her.

SOPHIE. HOW does he come to be here, in Berlin? She's in Vienna. Last we heard of him he was in Villach attached to the governor's suite — and suddenly he is here.

HERBOT. On furlough, no doubt. After all, Berlin's a rather interesting city ——

SOPHIE. Are you sure you weren't imprudent. You must have climbed through her window at night. Someone must have seen you —

HERBOT. Certainly not he. Otherwise he'd have paid me a visit before today.

SOPHIE. Nonsense! This once I give you leave to lie.

HERBOT. Thanks for the privilege. You can trust me when it comes to that. But now suppose you go into the salon. If you should stay within hearing, I might — and I want unlimited freedom. If I felt that you were eavesdropping, I'd be uncertain about myself. Now —

SOPHIE [anxiously]. Conrad —

HERBOT. Be at rest, dearest. [He caresses her hair. As he is about to draw her close to him, she fends him off gently and goes into the adjoining room. For a space he remains motionless, then takes up the discarded manuscript, turns the pages idly and at length lights a cigarette. Growing perceptibly impatient, he rises, goes to the door on the right and listens. There is a knock. He tiptoes noiselessly back into the centre of the room and pretends to be absorbed in reading the manuscript. There is a second knock.]

HERBOT. Come in. [Edgar Gley enters.]

EDGAR. Good evening.

HERBOT. Good evening, Mr. Gley. I'm delighted to see you, even though this be only an hotel apartment.

EDGAR. I don't wish to keep you long, Mr. Herbot.

HERBOT. You know I play tonight.

EDGAR. I know.

HERBOT. I have about a quarter of an hour to spare. Won't you take a seat? My wife will regret missing —

EDGAR [slightly taken aback]. Your wife — is here?

HERBOT. Of course. Where then should she be? She went away for a couple of weeks — Ah, you know our apartment was in a terrible mess. You remember, don't you? I believe I told you about it — a drain burst. Tomorrow or the day after tomorrow it will be in shipshape again. The place was almost flooded. Quite a bother, let me tell you. And ten thousand marks' damage at the very lowest estimate. When everything is repaired, we will entertain as before. I regret most of all the loss of several irreplaceable specimens of handwriting. I am, as you are aware, a collector of ancient examples of handwriting. Are you interested in that sort of thing? [Edgar starts to speak but restrains himself as if lacking courage.]

HERBOT [noticing the effort]. But I see I'm boring you about myself and my affairs. How is your fiancée? I presume you've just come from Vienna.

EDGAR. No, straight from Villach. I have something to ask you, Mr. Herbot. Please answer "yes" or "no." Were you Daisy's lover?

HERBOT [rising]. I —? Mr. Gley, I'm afraid I do not follow you. What evil-minded — slander-monger —

EDGAR. It is quite obvious that you must take this stand. But it is equally obvious that nothing is proved by your disavowal. [Herbot is about to interrupt.] Your word of honor proves nothing either.

HERBOT. Unfortunately a man has nothing outside his word of honor which he can call his own. There are people who would be satisfied with Conrad Herbot's mere word of honor.

EDGAR. In a matter of this sort, do you think? Unfortunately I'm not in a position to —

HERBOT. Well, at all events, will you tell me from what source you got your information? Will you be good enough to show me the anonymous letter? I shall soon prove to you —

EDGAR. Let's not trifle about that. I ask you again: — Were you Daisy's lover?

HERBOT. Since you don't care to reveal the source of this brazen — no, the grounds of your libellous suspicion; and since you make it impossible for me to defend, frankly to deny the charge, I therefore propose to you, Mr. Gley, that we leave the young woman entirely out of the discussion and confine ourselves to the simple fact that my nose is an eyesore to you. I promise you that I shall feel as injured as you please and — we will arrange to meet in one of those delightful little glades yonder!

EDGAR. Mr. Herbot, I don't feel disposed to doubt your mood and, I take it, there is no question about mine. Don't let's go through a scene of high-sounding words. Mr. Herbot, we want, if possible, — and to me it is possible — to talk like two men — no, let alone every vanity and every question of honor in the accepted sense, like two human beings. I ask you for the last time, Mr. Herbot, please to abandon the manner you have assumed thus far. I don't for a moment question the correctness of it. But please understand that a human being confronts you now, Mr. Herbot, one who demands nothing but the truth, whatever it may be. You follow me, Mr. Herbot? One who, however poignant it may be, is ready to bear it. Understand me, please, Mr. Herbot, I come neither in the guise of a fool nor as an avenger to one who is either a knave or who has been unjustly so accused. Human to human! If it fell out as I suspect, Mr. Herbot, it probably was no dastardly act. If otherwise, then it wasn't very far from it. But no matter what has happened, nothing in the world could force us to face one another with pistols so that one of us might — [Herbot starts to speak.]

EDGAR. Not yet. You're going to go on lying, I suppose. But please listen to what I have to say. I have lived through many things — I know what a mere fragrance, what the perfume of summer evenings can do with us. I know, too, how far behind us we can thrust our lot like a dream which has been told as a tale by a stranger.

And I know that I am prepared to endure anything, except uncertainty. I can forgive everything but lies. See how easy the truth is made for you! I trust you are beginning to understand. Or do you suspect perhaps that I am laying a trap for you, unawares. I have, I think, surrendered myself completely into your hands, Mr. Herbot. I've stood here like the most pitiful clown. If I had wanted to take advantage of your confession and entrap you and then to reassume the affronted bridegroom; if this were so, you would be at liberty to deny me all satisfaction, spit in my face for, whatever you may have done, I should have been viler than you by far. Can you hesitate still, Mr. Herbot? Never, I feel, has one man spoken to another as I have done to you. Were you Daisy's lover? You are silent? You must speak. You must speak the truth, before it is too late. Yes, Mr. Herbot, before it is too late. For should I casually learn the truth later — and things of this sort are known to exist; there are such things as belated confessions by women — then I won't fight a duel with you, then I'd strike you down like a —

HERBOT. Stop. Go no further. I — I am at your disposal. Yes, at your disposal? There is no way out of this for you or me.

EDGAR. Then you were Daisy's —

HERBOT. I was not. And yet one of us must die.

EDGAR. The truth! The truth! Mr. Herbot.

HERBOT. What are words —? Now if someone had predicted — I beg your pardon, I can't say more. [He goes to the window apparently moved. However, unobserved of Edgar he steals a glance at the clock. For a space he remains standing at the window.]

EDGAR. Speak out, Mr. Herbot.

HERBOT [turning toward him again]. Child of man, how simple the world appears to you! Yes and no; truth and falsehood; faith and deception. Oh, if it were only as simple as that, young fr — Mr. Gley. But it is not as simple as that. By Heaven, if I were of your mould, it would be the easiest thing in the world, in order to set your troubled mind at rest, to answer your question exactly as you've asked it. Yes, it would be the easiest thing in the world if somebody else had come instead of you — you, Edgar Gley, who have been a stranger to me until now. If somebody else had come — one of the dozens of commonplace folk whose life does not touch mine, I should have let him go back to the banal world whence he came. To him I might say — no, swear that nothing happened. But, at the risk of your calling me inhuman, I cannot answer you that way. For it would be the most cowardly of lies. It would be one of those lies one could swear to before the law. And behind it all, there would still be something unsaid, simple yet different — confoundedly simple, don't you know? And that would be to answer: — It happened, Mr. Gley. Daisy was my mistress — and then to take you at your word, to dismiss you and exult that the way is clear and to flatter myself again with hope, like an old fool, that now that the young chap, the lover, the fiancé is out of the way, the impossible will come to pass. And one's maddest wish would be granted. And can you be certain that you will not be up to these damnable tricks when you're not over-clever. You don't perceive, fool that you are, that the dream cannot last; that it must perish with disillusionment, regret and denunciation. Well, Edgar Gley, I loved your fiancé. I adored her. I wanted to break away from my wife. I loved Daisy — like a schoolboy. I didn't keep my love a secret from her. I wrote verses to her — old Herbot, mind you, wrote verses, paced back and forth under her window, stole softly into her garden, threw his tender billets-doux, like Romeo, through the window — [Pauses suddenly as if something had just occurred to him.] Ah, now I see everything. Someone must have seen me. Someone must have spied me one night in the garden or perhaps in the wherry directly opposite the house. But who can it have been? You've received anonymous letters: admit it.

EDGAR. That's unimportant. Go on.

HERBOT. What else do you want to know?

EDGAR. You made love to Daisy — and she quietly let you.

HERBOT. Let me — I can't deny it.

EDGAR. Read your letters? [Herbot smiles.] And replied to them? Please answer.

HERBOT. You will not begrudge me that, Mr. Gley.

EDGAR. I am sorry.

HERBOT [with the express purpose of discounting the truth of the words he is about to utter]. I possess nothing in writing —

EDGAR. Mr. Herbot, lies are lies. If you seek to mislead me regarding a minor detail, how do I know that the rest also —

HERBOT. Don't persist in that belief. Let's break off right here.

EDGAR. Impossible.

HERBOT. Well, then, there's nothing else I can do. Do as you please, Mr. Gley. I am entirely at your disposal —

EDGAR. You've gone too far to hold back now. I promise you that no one will learn the gist of this conversation — not even my fiancée. Don't torture me any longer. You have my word of honor.

HERBOT [after a rapid pause, rummages in his pocket and extracts a letter]. Here's a letter from Daisy to me. [After an involuntary start of Edgar's.] Allow me to read it. Later you can verify whether I have omitted a syllable. But it must be heard in the proper tone, otherwise it might be misunderstood. [Reads.] "Conrad Herbot, I beg of you, go away."

EDGAR. When was this written?

HERBOT [showing date]. August 27th, A. M. [Reads.] "Don't bring unhappiness to people who have never wronged you. Do not forget, Conrad Herbot, what you've meant to me long before I ever knew you. Let that suffice. When I see you again on the stage in one of your glorious—" Ah, let's skip that. "Never has a man of your sort—" Rather poignant, this! Miss Daisy simply means that she's never had a man, about whom she used to read in the papers, make love to her. And so and so on. But please listen carefully. [Reads.] "Remember that you have a fascinating wife who loves you and that I am engaged to one who loves me dearly and whose love I return. Yes, Conrad Herbot, I love him and I will never love anybody else. But you, Conrad Herbot, are perilous — that's the only way I can express it. Sometimes I feel as if I hate you. I implore you to go away — please go away."

EDGAR [taking the letter]. On the 27th and you went away —?

HERBOT. Several hours later.

EDGAR. And if you had stayed —?

HERBOT. Mr. Gley, I might have stayed without harm. Through this letter I first grew aware of my "perilousness" so called. Until then —

EDGAR. But you yourself just said that you intended to —

HERBOT. Uproot you from Daisy's heart? Yes. I don't deny it. I was a fool. This letter brought me to my senses with a shock. "I will never love anybody else."

EDGAR. But she wavered. This letter proves it beyond a doubt. She wavered between you and me. And it depended altogether on you —

HERBOT [interrupting]. I'd believe that too, if I were still the fool today I was for about half an hour. She's always been yours. But when it comes to fame — Ah, my young friend, you've no idea what a pretty dance that leads a young girl's heart? We never know, we poor mortals, whether it is genuine passion or simply the fragrance of immortality wafting about us. Quite frankly, I envy the men who have never had to doubt whether they were loved for themselves alone. Were I not Conrad Herbot, but the same as any other man — a landed proprietor from Klein-Reifling, for instance, — doubtless I should have appeared ridiculous to your fiancée. But Conrad Herbot went daft about her — and that touched her a bit. She realized quite clearly that she was Conrad Herbot's last love, and I suppose a moment came when she almost believed the emotion to be love. She's not the first who's felt that way. But guilty — if I may mention the word in the same breath with all this — I was guilty, I alone. It would never have gone as far as it did, not even up to the letters, if I'd been able to conceal my feelings. But that was beyond me. Like a fatality it swept over me.

EDGAR. You intended to leave your wife, you said a moment ago. She went away before you —

HERBOT [cutting in quickly]. Not on account of the pipe-leak. You may rest assured of that. She went away because I was unable to cover up the true state of my emotions. I kept no secrets from her. She's a wonderful woman. Directly upon receiving this letter and my flight from Daisy, I told her all about it. I begged her to come to me, to stand by me, to rescue me from utter despair. But she thought it unworthy to live with me so long as my heart was given to another. She wanted to come back only when I could write to her with a peaceful conscience that the last embers were extinguished. Three days ago. I found that I could write her that. She's been here since yesterday, and tomorrow old Herbot will be in his home again.

EDGAR. Why didn't she tell me all this?

HERBOT. Can't you really guess, Mr. Gley, how near she was to doing it? How often the confession surged to her lips? I — I have seen it. Thank God, it's turned out differently. It would have been a terrible awakening for us all.

EDGAR. Why was she silent?

HERBOT. Shall I tell you? Because, possessing an instinct of refinement, she knew that that which externally appeared to you in the light of a confession was in reality a bald-faced lie. She never loved me, Mr. Gley. That must be apparent to you. Never. And I venture that you, Mr. Gley, may go through the wedding ceremony with a more beautiful sense of security than many another young fellow who, as the saying is, has nothing with which to reproach his fiancée. Miss Daisy, as it were, has had her escapade. And, I am sure, that the day will come when she'll tell it to you herself. She will tell it to you even before you lead her to the altar. And, if you wish to oblige me, wait until then. Don't broach the subject yourself. [Seeing Edgar is silent.] How absurd of me! Of course you won't be able to keep your lips locked that long. Of course you're going to tell her everything. You'll tell her that I showed you the letter too —

EDGAR [after cursorily glancing through it again, flings it into the fire.] Never, as sure as you see it burning to ashes! Of this letter nothing shall be said. And nothing shall be said of this visit of mine.

HERBOT. Don't promise too much, Mr. Gley.

EDGAR [looks at him]. I promise no more than I think I can keep. Goodbye, Mr. Herbot.

HERBOT. You've something else to ask me, Mr. Gley?

EDGAR [staring straight at him a long time]. Nothing whatever. [Impulsively extending his hand.]

HERBOT [almost genuinely]. Be good to her, Mr. Gley. Please be good to her. [Edgar goes.]

[Herbot returns from the door with a serious expression at first, then a self-satisfied but not quite frivolous smile flits across his face. He glances at the clock. He makes a gesture indicating that there's ample time yet. Rings. Bell-hop enters.]

HERBOT. Will you please ask my wife to come up? She's in the lobby. [Bell-hop goes out. Sophie comes in from the left.]

HERBOT [turning round and catching sight of her]. Oh! you were —

SOPHIE. Yes, all the time.

HERBOT. But you promised me — Ah, I understand. Perhaps it's better so. I hope you are satisfied.

SOPHIE. Quite.

HERBOT. It wasn't easy, I assure you. At the outset I was seized with something like a first-night nervous fit. Though I wasn't unprepared. I was weak at the beginning.

SOPHIE. Well, you carried it off —

HERBOT. But didn't it come a cropper as I went along? You thought it quite different, dearest, didn't you?

That I'd disavow everything? But only fools disavow, sane people —

SOPHIE. Lie.

HERBOT. Lie? No, Sophie, don't think it was unadulterated falsehood. Part of it was true. That's the rare thing about it: the way the truth was interwoven with the falsehood. That's why it looked so plausible. Well, thank Heaven, we can breathe freely again.

SOPHIE. You think —? Have you forgotten already? Suppose he should by chance learn the truth later — you know what he threatened to do. And he will learn the truth. It's only deferred.

HERBOT. Nonsense! He'll never get at the truth. That's quite sure.

SOPHIE. Sure? He'll talk to me. Don't fool yourself about that. And I daresay contradictions will crop up.

HERBOT. Contradictions? Why?

SOPHIE. Especially in the story about the letter. How will you explain away the trumped-up letter?

HERBOT. Trumped-up? It was real.

SOPHIE. The letter was real —?

HERBOT. Certainly it was. Daisy actually wrote it. But not on the 27th of August. On the 2nd. It was a simple matter to interpolate the 7.

SOPHIE. I don't quite understand.

HERBOT. But, sweetheart, it's quite a simple matter. The contingency of some chatter-box gassing about us had to be taken into consideration. It seemed likely that an anonymous letter or something of the sort would come up. And so I arranged with Daisy what we would do if something like that happened. It was evident that a bare denial would not clear the air. And so this occurred to us to pull us through.

SOPHIE. Ah, indeed. Very clever. Now I'm beginning to understand —

HERBOT. And the letter — I read it beautifully, did I not? It seemed as if created for the purpose — how shall I put it? — just to serve us with an alibi.

SOPHIE. Extraordinary.

HERBOT. There are no other letters. Nor any other evidence of any shape. And, you may be sure, that Daisy will take care of her end of the affair.

SOPHIE. We hope so. But I don't think she'll come any way near you in that.

HERBOT. Maybe better. A girl of her sort — Trust women for that. They're born with the instinct. But, aside from that, don't you think he was capital?

SOPHIE. He?

HERBOT. Edgar Gley. Surely he had the easier task. But shall I tell you something in confidence, Sophie? There were moments when I was literally swept along and little else was needed that I should have believed the whole story myself.

SOPHIE. What story?

HERBOT. Oh, you overheard it. Somewhere near the close of the scene. It seemed as if nothing, absolutely nothing had existed between the girl and myself. It was like a stroke of genius, you might say. [Falk comes in wearing his overcoat and carrying his hat in his hand]

FALK. Are you out of your mind? Here it is a quarter to seven! What's the matter?

HERBOT. Do you think it takes me an hour to get into Hamlet's togs?

FALK. Paragraph seven:— "All performers in the current production must be in their dressing rooms— "Besides, the crown prince is going to be present.

HERBOT. Really, and the princess?

FALK. And suite.

HERBOT. NOW, Sophie, what do you say to that? I can still draw the best people to the stalls even though he's about disgusted them with his tomfoolery. Haven't you gone and raised the price of seats? Later on over a pottle of Sec we'll talk seriously about the terms of my new contract. Particularly the clause referring to my leave of absence. In February we intend taking a trip to the Riviera. Isn't that so, Sophie?

FALK. Are you or are you not going to —

HERBOT. Well, Sophie, get ready as quickly as you can. Today I'm going to play only for you. As far as I am concerned, let his Majesty or the Lord be present.

FALK. I'll bet you wouldn't be a bit surprised if the Lord came to Berlin expressly to witness your Hamlet.

HERBOT. If he came, he'd get a ticket to Rheinhardt's. Don't you think so?

FALK. In any case, it would be in the papers.

HERBOT [quickly caressing Sophie on the cheek and kissing her forehead]. Addio. A rivederci! [Takes his hat and overcoat and goes out.]

FALK. He's in fine spirits. You're not quite as gay. You stand there for all the world like a piece of sculpture. What's the matter? Scenes? Again?

SOPHIE [motionless]. No, never again. Everything's at an end.

FALK [after a brief pause]. Well, aren't you going to dress for the theatre? Auf Wiedersehen.

SOPHIE. I'm not going to the theatre. I'm leaving.

FALK. What do you mean?

SOPHIE. Tonight — in an hour. Everything is over and done with.

FALK. What's the matter?

SOPHIE. I can't tell you in a word.

FALK. Oh, I don't want to appear too pressing. I can do without the scene with the ghost, with Hamlet's father I mean. But, if you still regard me as a friend —

SOPHIE. Why should I? [After a short pause.] Edgar Gley was here.

FALK. Oh!

SOPHIE. He wanted an explanation. My husband gave it to him. I was in the next room the whole time? I overheard everything.

FALK. Well?

SOPHIE. I never suspected a man could lie that way.

FALK. Did you think —? You ought to be glad.

SOPHIE. The whole thing was preconcerted and planned between him and the girl. They anticipated it. And my husband told the young fellow a story about his being daft about the girl and that she was indifferent to his attentions. And the truth is, he visited her night after night by scaling the window.

FALK. Well, you couldn't expect him to tell Mr. Gley that, could you? It's much better to lie artfully in these affairs than not at all.

SOPHIE. You should have heard it. And he suspected nothing and was quite happy about it. Oh, if you had heard it you would now understand why it's impossible for me to live one day longer, no, one hour with this man —

FALK. But where are you going?

SOPHIE. HOW should I know? Away — away.

FALK. Don't you really know?

SOPHIE. What?

FALK. Where you want to run away to. Or do you imagine —

SOPHIE. If it were as you insinuate, do you think I would have needed a subterfuge to go? I am going to no one! I simply want to go away, and I want to be alone — for the rest of my life alone.

FALK. That'll never do. You must return in two weeks. I can't give you a longer leave of absence than that.

Our contract —

SOPHIE. How can you jest about it? Don't you understand? It is over and done with forever. Nothing remains, nothing but nausea, no, horror, an overwhelming horror of it all. How can I go back to him? One can go back to a man when he has failed miserably, when he has committed a crime, when he's wounded somebody unto death; one can go back to one who is repentant and to one who is not repentant. But a man must recognize what he's done. Herbot doesn't recognize it. He doesn't understand me and he doesn't understand himself and he doesn't understand anybody else. Love, hypocrisy, murder, everything which pervades reality is of no greater moment to him than if he were playing one of his parts. He and I speak different tongues, and there is no longer an interpreting medium between us. If, from the depths of my despair I were to throw myself out of the window, it would merely be the end of an act for him. The curtain falls and he goes out for his "pottle of Sec." A human being — he? A maddened harlequin, rather, who when occasion serves is also ready to play the human being. But no human being he no — [Sinks exhausted on the divan with her face buried in her hands.]

FALK. Too bad. Too bad.

SOPHIE. Oh, your pity is superfluous now.

FALK. But, dear lady, it needn't remain this way. How differently would this scene have touched you which he seems to have gone through with Mr. Gley, how little horrible, how much gayer, how glorious even would the scamp have appeared to you —

SOPHIE. If I had been worthy of him.

FALK. Naturally, you realize, that will never be — can never be. In this case you remained the same Sophie throughout. One always remains the same. But you should have taken things in a lighter vein. Your incredible respectability is what brings the false note into your relation with Herbot. And carrying, as you do, this weight of respectability, you know in your heart that it can not help matters. If, for instance, you were married to a man of the type of Mr. Gley, a gentleman, — to betray, as the phrase is, that sort of chap is indeed a detestable thing, because in the mind of the Mr. Gleys of the world an act of betrayal is tremendously significant, undeserved and degrading. And very often it may drive the Mr. Gleys of the world to suicide. With the Herbots it's another matter entirely. The Herbots pretend not to notice it. They pretend it even to themselves. Somehow they soon recover.

SOPHIE. You speak like a sophist of the first water.

FALK. Only in the capacity of theatrical director, I assure you.

SOPHIE [smiling]. As regards theatrical matters, I am, from now on, an outsider. Pardon me, I must pack. I don't want him to find me here.

FALK. Seriously, are you leaving — today? Impossible.

SOPHIE. Quite possible, believe me.

FALK. But what am I to say to him?

SOPHIE. Tell him I was too affected by his scene with Mr. Gley to stomach Hamlet into the bargain.

FALK. He'll never accept that.

SOPHIE. Well, then, tell him the truth — that — I —

FALK. Love him.

SOPHIE. No, that I hate him. And that I will never — not as long as I live —

FALK. Hush! No oaths. One should never burn one's bridges behind one. You see, one is put in a very embarrassing position trying to rebuild them.

SOPHIE [crossing over to the left]. Goodbye.

FALK. I don't want to keep you back any longer. Good luck, only if you were to ask my advice, don't run away to utter solitude, but to something else —

SOPHIE. Really, you are —

FALK. You're not forced to do anything, not even to come back, if you don't care to. You can stay there. Perhaps that spells your lucky star. Ah, look down, Sophie. Look at the line-up of motors. Yes, I'm of the opinion that you should forgive him something.

SOPHIE. I might, if I were a theatre director.

FALK. You should, as a wife. It's almost a sacred office for you.

SOPHIE. Oho!

FALK. Forgive and — take your revenge. The latter in particular has a rumored sweetness about it. Well auf Wiedersehen, Sophie; auf Wiedersehen soon. [Answering her look.] Perhaps in the Styrian woods. You know I'm invited to go hunting too. Or at least to play chess. A telegram is sufficient and I come, were it only to call for you and to escort you back to one who must be, do what you may, your inevitable choice. There are less noble men, Sophie — [The door in the rear opens and Herbot strides into the room, clad in his Hamlet costume with a half-buttoned overcoat thrown over it.]

FALK. What —? Are you mad?

HERBOT. What's the matter? Why are you taking so long, Sophie? I peeped through the slit in the curtain and didn't see you in your box — [Sophie replies with a frozen stare.]

FALK [goes up and takes him by the shoulders]. Now really, do you wish to — It's five minutes after seven.

HERBOT. Let them wait! I won't go on a fraction of a minute before Sophie is seated in her box.

SOPHIE. But — but — I haven't dressed yet.

HERBOT. I don't care! Come with me as you are.

FALK [to Herbot]. See that you get a move on quickly, do you hear?

HERBOT. Sorry. But without her I don't move an inch. I know. I know. She made up her mind not to come at all. She's probably told you everything. Memories were raked up. But look at her, Falk. As she stands there she is like a ghost carved in marble. But come to me — come. The past is dead — stone dead. Don't you understand that yet, dear? Try not to think of my former waywardness. What, after all, do my escapades with other women matter? Why trouble about other people? I've never loved anybody but you. If you refuse to come, I won't act. For all I care, our friend here may close down his theatre.

FALK. Six thousand four hundred Marks. Of course you can make that up, can't you?

HERBOT. The nerve! If Hamlet were played by some one else, you wouldn't have half the house you've got tonight. And if you, Sophie, are not in your box, I won't act today, nor tomorrow — never again and farewell to the stage. [He flings the sword he's been clutching from him.]

FALK [at the window]. There goes Her Highness.

HERBOT. A fig for Her Highness! Let her turn around and go back home, your Highness. There is but one High — [He is suddenly on his knee before Sophie. A Theatre Employee enters.]

T. E. I beg your pardon, Herr Direktor. It is seven-ten. His Royal Highness — the audience —

FALK [to Employee]. Ring up the curtain.

HERBOT [to Theatre Employee]. He says so, not I.

FALK. Ring up the curtain! [The Theatre Employee goes.]

SOPHIE. Get up.

HERBOT. Are you coming? [Sophie does not reply audibly but the expression on her face answers in the affirmative.] —

HERBOT [rising to his feet and putting his arm about her waist, he takes the sword which Falk has picked up.] "Was ever woman in this humor wooed?"

FALK. That isn't Hamlet. That's Richard the Third.

HERBOT. Well then, arm in arm with you — FALK. That's from something else. You will make a holy mess of the performance tonight.

HERBOT. Why must it be just from "Hamlet"? — [Pressing Sophie close to his side.] Isn't it a lofty line?

FALK. Are you ready? [He thrusts them both through the door. The door for a moment affords a view in which the hotel guests, passing down the corridor, gaze astonished at the pair. Falk then turns the lights out, goes out and locks the door.]

[CURTAIN.]

PART III. THE FESTIVAL OF BACCHUS

A COMEDY OF WORDS

PERSONS

FELIX STAUFNER, WRITER.

AGNES, his wife.

DR. GUIDO WERNIG.

RAILWAY GUARD.

WAITER.

BUFFET-DISPENSER (a woman).

Passengers and Station employees.

The action takes place in the railroad waiting room of a large Austrian city in the mountains.

THE FESTIVAL OF BACCHUS

[SCENE: — STATION and restaurant. In the rear glass doors giving onto the platform. Right a stairway conducting downstairs. On the left is the buffet, with a clock above it. A number of tables, covered and uncovered, with chairs. A blackboard near the middle platform door, right. On the wall are time-tables, maps, posters. The buffet dispenser is busy behind the buffet. Several people are seated at the tables. The guard stands by the middle platform door, which is open. As the curtain rises the train has just come in. Passengers enter from the platform and pass through the dining room on the right, using the steps. On the left Agnes and Guido are standing, almost motionless, with their eyes fixed intently on the door as if expecting someone. When the last of the passengers has passed through the waiting room, Guido steps up to the door and peers out on the platform. He makes a step as if to go out but is intercepted by the guard. Agnes in the meantime has also loitered up to the door.]

GUIDO. There's no one else.

AGNES. Strange!

GUIDO. Was that the Innsbruck train?

[The Guard locks the door.]

GUARD. No, sir.

GUIDO. No?

GUARD. That was the Bavarian express. The Innsbruck train is scheduled to arrive at 5.20.

GUIDO. Why do you say "is scheduled to arrive"?

GUARD. Because it's almost always late. However, there has been no report yet.

GUIDO. You mean that it will arrive on time?

GUARD. No, that it will be late. [Goes of left by the steps.]

GUIDO [glancing at the clock]. We have fully eight minutes before us. [Lights a cigarette.] AGNES. Eight minutes. [Comes down and seats herself at one of the tables.]

[The Waiter approaches and hovers about.]

GUIDO [after a brief pause to Agnes, standing behind her chair]. Agnes —

AGNES. Guido —?

GUIDO [seating himself beside her]. Wouldn't it be a better idea to—'

WAITER. Your order, sir?

GUIDO. Thank you. We have just had something here.

[Waiter, slightly piqued, shrugs his shoulders and goes off left.]

GUIDO. Wouldn't it be better, I mean, if I waited for him alone?

AGNES. Why this sudden change of mind? Have you completely lost faith in my determination? Do you think that I shrink from meeting him face to face —

GUIDO. No, no. I have the greatest confidence in you. But I repeat: it's quite impossible to foretell how he'll take the news. And that's why —

AGNES [rising fervently]. No. We've made up our minds. We'll wait for him together. In this way the situation will at once be made clear to him. And that in itself is a big advantage. No superfluous words will be necessary. It's only fair to us — and to him. We owe him that much. Or, if you like, I at least owe it to him. [The whistle of a locomotive is heard. Agnes starts but does not turn. Guido rises. A railway employee comes from the platform, meticulously locks the door after him, and writes on the blackboard:— "Express No. 57 from Innsbruck — 44 minutes late. "He intercepts a woman with two children at the door and closes it again behind him. Guido and Agnes have not turned around. The whistle of the locomotive dies away.]

GUIDO [close to her]. Agnes, do you love me?

AGNES. I adore you. And you?

GUIDO. You know. [Hastily.] And in one hour all will be over. Bear that in mind. Tomorrow we will be far away. Think of that when you face him. Together — forever!

AGNES [somewhat mechanically], Forever — [without looking round]. Hasn't it come in yet? ——

GUIDO [turning round]. The eight minutes are up. [The Guard re-enters.]

GUIDO [noticing the writing on the board]. Oh! —

AGNES [following his glance]. What is it?

GUIDO. Delay; forty-four minutes' delay.

GUARD. More likely an hour.

GUIDO. Here it is very plain, forty-four minutes. Forty-four! I dare say that's calculated to the dot.

GUARD [coldly]. Oh, she may make it in less.

[He goes over to the buffet, exchanges a few words with the coffee-dispenser, and then goes off. Guido and Agnes stare at one another.]

GUIDO. That's so.

AGNES. One hour —

GUIDO. Let's go outside a bit.

AGNES. But it hasn't stopped raining. But if you want to take a walk — I'll wait for you here.

I prefer to look at the illustrated papers. [Sits, taking up a newspaper.]

[Guido approaches the buffet and sets his watch by the clock.]

AGNES [gazing at him with a smile]. He must be pretty impatient, too, in his compartment.

GUIDO [returning to her]. How — do you mean, Agnes?

AGNES. As you know, he telegraphed that he was coming from Stubai on the five-twenty train. I fancy he's under the impression that I'm waiting for him after these six weeks of separation, and that together we'll take the train back to Seewalchen, to our villa. Well, I am waiting for him — only it isn't quite as he imagined it.

GUIDO. It would be more agreeable to me if you'd refrain from going off on a sentimental jag this way.

AGNES. Sentimental —? I? Would I be here, if I were sentimental? [Brief pause.]

GUIDO [making conversation]. You've missed the six o'clock train anyway.

AGNES. There's another at seven.

GUIDO. Do you think he'll take it?

AGNES. Why not? I'll beg him to — And if you know him at all, he's the sort of man — [Breaking off.] He'll find everything at home as he left it. I've ordered Therese to prepare everything as if —

GUIDO. That wasn't quite necessary. If he ever loved you he will never put foot into a house in which he lived with you for five summers [bitterly] and happily at that.

AGNES. Yes, he will. He's awfully fond of the little cottage and the landscape. At any rate, they haven't changed.

GUIDO. I'm sure he won't go back to it this year any more.

AGNES. If he's wise, he'll go right home and sleep there tonight.

GUIDO. In a house — alive with such memories?

AGNES [staring straight ahead of her]. Let's hope that he's already started to forget me on the return trip.

GUIDO. Do you imagine that he will?

AGNES. Well, isn't it the best thing we can wish him? — [She takes a newspaper again and pretends to be absorbed in it.]

GUIDO [eyeing Agnes, paces up and down, adjusts his watch again, then stepping up to her]. We might take something. [Taps on the table, then takes a newspaper and flutters the leaves nervously, glancing all the while at Agnes, who seems quite absorbed in reading, calling petulantly:] Waiter.

WAITER [appearing, still slightly piqued]. Yes, sir.

GUIDO. Bring me — [To Agnes.] What'll you have?

AGNES. It's immaterial to me.

GUIDO. Well, bring two lemon sodas.

AGNES. I prefer raspberry. [Waiter moves away. Pause. Guido fixes his eyes on Agnes.]

AGNES [continuing to read; smiling]. Here's something about you.

GUIDO. About me?

AGNES. Yes. "Regatta at Attersee. First prize, Baron Ramming, yacht Storm; second prize, Dr. Guido Wernig, yacht Watersprite."

GUIDO. Quite right. You see, such insignificant nobodies like myself do get into the papers sometimes. Of course, only on corresponding insignificant occasions — and then they capture only second prize.

AGNES. Next time it will be the first — on another See.

GUIDO. You're very optimistic. But — isn't it the hand of destiny?

AGNES [with an inquiring glance]. The second prize?

GUIDO. The delay, I mean. Once again you have enough time to think it over. [She beckons him to draw nearer.] Perhaps it isn't so simple a thing as you imagine. When you've once been the helpmate of a great man, to become the wife of a quite ordinary doctor of chemistry —

AGNES [interrupting him quickly]. In the first place, Guido, your factory in your particular line is quite as well known as the collected works of my husband.

GUIDO. What have I to do with the factory? My father founded it — managed it — I am only his son.

AGNES. Besides, I didn't fall in love with Felix because he was a great man, as you put it. Whoever heard of him when we were married?

GUIDO. But you foresaw it —

AGNES. Foresaw it — yes.

[Waiter comes with sodas. He places the glasses on the table. Agnes and Guido are silent. The Waiter moves away. Pause.]

GUIDO. Why are you silent, Agnes?

AGNES [staring straight ahead]. How mysterious life is! Six weeks ago, no more than six weeks ago, I crossed the lake with him in the small steamboat — six weeks. I said good bye to him almost on this very spot. And how the world has changed in this short time! If he if we had guessed that bright summer day —

GUIDO. Do you regret it, Agnes? If so, there is still time.

AGNES [as if waking from a trance]. I regret nothing — nothing. All that has happened was destined to happen. Don't you know I realize that, Guido? And all that has happened points to our happiness together — and also to his.

GUIDO. His?

AGNES. I have no doubt he'll thank me right off seeing I've given him back his freedom. People of his sort —

GUIDO. "People of his sort—"

AGNES. Everything in life has its deeper meaning. It is well, it is perhaps profoundly necessary that he should from now on dwell in solitude.

GUIDO. In solitude —? What do you call solitude?

AGNES [looking up] What do you mean by that?

GUIDO. Nothing, but what you imagine yourself.

AGNES. Don't try to evade my question. You did the same once before in a similar circumstance.

GUIDO. HOW SO? When?

AGNES. On the train.

GUIDO. I'm sure my allusion is not beyond your surmise. The suspicion that not his play alone kept him in Stubaital six weeks, instead of the projected three, surely is not new to you today. You smile?

AGNES. It's a bit amusing to me the way you're trying, very obviously, to make me jealous.

GUIDO. Far from it. But, if you'll pardon my saying it, I don't see any sense in your seeking to surround your — your former husband with a kind of halo. He is every bit of a human being. In certain respects he's not a whit better than I and —

AGNES [laughing]. And you — you wished to say. Very kind of you, I'm sure.

GUIDO. Don't misunderstand me.

AGNES. Oh, I understand you perfectly. You want me to believe that Mademoiselle X —

GUIDO. Bianca Walter —

AGNES. Whose postscript is on the picture post card, has contrived somehow to detain my husband —

GUIDO. You husband that was — Herr Felix Staufner.

AGNES. Felix —

GUIDO. I'm not trying to convince you, I merely make the statement.

AGNES. Without evidence you can prove nothing. Besides the truth will soon out.

GUIDO. How do you make that out?

AGNES. He will tell the truth.

GUIDO. In all probability you won't have to hear it. Aside from the fact that it is immaterial to you and that the moment my conjectures are confirmed you will be pleased.

AGNES. I shall be quite happy over it. Need I tell you that? Nothing more desirable could happen to me than if he stepped off the train with Fräulein Bianca or somebody else.

GUIDO. I'm afraid, Agnes, that you conceive life as too simple a thing. Mademoiselle X —

AGNES. Bianca.

GUIDO. Will not accompany him. She will remain in Stubai for the present.

AGNES. With her mother?

GUIDO. Why with her mother? Why bother about her mother?

AGNES. Because her name, too, is on the picture post card. However, I think we are doing the young lady an injustice and celebrating a little prematurely. Doubtless she is a respectable girl of good family. An admirer of my — my Felix Staufner, just like her mother. [She takes a card out of her purse and reads: "Isabella Walter and her daughter cannot omit the opportunity of gratefully sending their heartfelt greetings to the wife of the master—"

GUIDO. A bit wordy.

AGNES. But very unsuspicious.

GUIDO. You carry the card about with you?

AGNES. I had no time to put it away.

GUIDO. You have answered it, then?

AGNES. Why not? It's the last. It arrived four days ago. And it's positively the last he's written as my husband.

[Guido makes as if to take the card; she makes a gesture of refusal and he seems hurt.]

AGNES. Just one word.

GUIDO. What sort of word, if I may ask?

AGNES. Auf Wiedersehen.

[Guido bites his lip.]

AGNES. Well, doesn't it seem proper? I didn't write "Auf gutes Wiedersehen," or "Auf glückliches Wiedersehen," simply "Auf Wiedersehen."

GUIDO. And did you write him letters, too, during this time?

AGNES. Only one.

GUIDO. Well — well!

AGNES. That was before there was anything between you and me; before that evening — when you suddenly appeared in my garden under my window — and called my name in the dark. Yes, in this way one sometimes writes a farewell letter without suspecting it! How mysterious life — [Guido has taken the card in his hand and seems bent on crumpling it.]

AGNES. What are you doing, Guido?

GUIDO. You love him still.

AGNES [earnestly]. No, Guido, I love no one but you. I have never loved anybody — not even Felix — as much as I love you. [Grasping his hand.] But I shall never cease [letting his hand go] to admire and to respect Felix Staufner; to be spiritually akin to Felix Staufner, the writer. In a certain sense relations such as existed between Felix and myself can never alter — never. The fact that we were married is of least importance. Even if I should never see him again, if we should remain miles and miles GUIDO [interrupting]. Yes, if you would only remain miles and miles apart! Well and good. Then everything would be all right; then I'd have nothing to oppose to your spiritual relations. But, unfortunately, I can't spend my life taking endless trips. I must be back in harness in the damned —

AGNES. Certainly; I'd never permit you to give up your profession. You must work, even if it isn't absolutely necessary. I don't propose to take up with an idler.

GUIDO. I don't intend to give up my profession. But what's to prevent my practicing it elsewhere? I'll speak to the governor. As it is, he's been planning for sometime to establish a branch office in Germany or America.

AGNES. Or Australia.

GUIDO. The farther the better.

AGNES. Guido!

GUIDO. I simply can't bear to have you meet your former husband again.

AGNES [determined]. I shan't permit you at the eleventh hour to violate all our stipulations. You know that

Felix is not like other men —

GUIDO. Do you really believe that he won't find another — friend very soon?

AGNES. A friend? No. Never. A mistress — certainly. And whether her name be Bianca or something else — I only hope that I'll be able to approve of his choice.

GUIDO. Why do you hope so? Do you intend to be friendly with the future mistress of your husband?

AGNES. If things should fall out so —

GUIDO. They will not fall out so. I wish to make clear to you that I desire to keep our home — as soon as our affairs are in order, and that will be soon, I trust — respectable. And I warn you that this — mind you, I don't say uninteresting — partly dubious crowd of artists and actorfolk of both sexes who used to frequent your house, will not be welcome under my roof.

AGNES. As regards dubious affairs, you ought to —

GUIDO. That's another matter entirely. A real passion explains, condones everything. And besides, your husband deserves his fate.

AGNES. Oh!

GUIDO. A woman, I hold, must be guarded jealously like a priceless gem. One should never leave a young woman alone, wholly alone among a crowd of young people in summer — near a lake —

AGNES. In spite of his doubts he trusted me. It's all part and parcel of the paradox in his makeup.

GUIDO. A man doesn't trust a woman whom he loves. He trembles for her. He fights for her. I shall never trust you. Even after we've lived together for years. Even if we should have children — and we will have children. I will always be concerned about you. To make sure of a woman one must keep on insulting her.

AGNES. But he never resorted to that. He was jealous oftener than you think. He was jealous even of you.

GUIDO. Of me —! Well, I thought —

AGNES. That was before he had the slightest grounds. Even then — How mysterious —

GUIDO. Life is.

AGNES. We had scarcely spoken three times together. Naturally he said nothing, but I noticed that it was so. For the life of me, I couldn't make it out. You were out sailing on the lake all day long — at the outset. Only in the evening did you venture to sit beside us on the hotel terrace and chatter all manner of nonsense which, to tell the truth, didn't interest me the least bit.

GUIDO. Nonsense — why —

AGNES. I only mean to say that everything was quite harmless in those early days. Admit that you didn't trouble at all about me. The little Baroness Fellah meant more to you — and the Lord knows who else? But he saw it coming. I observed it in his glances. He suspected immediately that you — that you only —

GUIDO. And still he left you to your own devices. Saw it coming and went away on a trip.

AGNES. It's a way with him when he's greatly absorbed in a piece of work. Everything else is put aside.

GUIDO. And he fled [pointedly] to solitude. AGNES [ignoring his innuendo]. At all events he stopped caring about people — that is, about people whom he loved.

GUIDO. Did he leave you alone often?

AGNES. Sometimes. But that was not the worst. It was much more uncomfortable when he stayed at home and left me alone. When my voice had lost its caress, when I became, in a measure, paler, more shadowy than any being he ever created; when I felt myself snuffed out — for him —

GUIDO. For me — you will never be snuffed out — never, Agnes.

AGNES [as if waking from a trance]. Never, Guido! You will never leave me alone. You will never repair to solitude and forget me for days, weeks, at a stretch, as he's done. It isn't good to leave us women alone. You are right, Guido. It's quite perilous — it's — [For several minutes past there has been a commotion in the waiting room. Passengers come up the steps. The Guard enters from the right and goes to the platform door.]

GUIDO. What's the matter? [Glancing at the clock above the buffet.] There's still twelve minutes. [Guard opens the door.]

AGNES. It seems as if —

GUIDO [quickly to the Guard]. The Innsbruck train? —

GUARD. Yes, sir.

GUIDO. I thought you said it wouldn't arrive before ten minutes yet —?

GUARD. She's made up a bit for lost time.

GUIDO [to Agnes]. You are pale. Don't you care to — [Passengers go through the waiting room to the platform outside.]

AGNES [passionately shaking her head]. Let us go out, don't you think?

GUIDO. On the platform?

AGNES. Yes. It's better than waiting out here. I wish him to see us directly from the car window.

GUIDO. I don't know.

AGNES. Come. [They start to go out on the platform.]

GUARD. Platform tickets, please.

GUIDO. Good Lord! [Searching in his purse.] Here. [Offers the Guard money]

GUARD. Over there, at the ticket machine.

GUIDO. But the train will be in by that time.

GUARD. There's lots of time yet.

GUIDO [goes to the ticket machine, deposits a few coins and yanks the lever in vain]. It doesn't work.

GUARD [going over to the machine, tries to manipulate the lever, fails, then shakes his head]. Don't work sometimes.

GUIDO. But we'll —

GUARD. Ah, there you are. It's all right now. [Hands two tickets to Guido. Back to the door which he has previously closed and now reopens.] Here she comes now. [Noise of an incoming train.]

AGNES. Your hand, Guido. [Hand in hand they go through the door — way onto the platform. As they pass out Felix appears on the right, mounting the steps. He spies Agnes, makes as if to follow, observes almost simultaneously that she is not alone and is just in time to see her disappear hand in hand with Guido on the platform. He remains standing a moment. Then makes a step towards them. At the platform door he pauses again. Then he strides to the other platform door and seems to be following with his eyes the pair of them as they go to meet the incoming train. He steps back, passes his hand over his forehead and peers through the glass door. The pair vanish out of sight. The train has already stopped and the passengers pour in from the platform. Most of them pass through the waiting room to the steps on the right. Several take seats at the tables; several step up to the buffet and order refreshments. Felix advances to the center of the stage. The stream of passengers rushes by him. He feels he must get out of their path, so he steps back again to the open platform door. He looks for Agnes and Guido. Gazing intently out, he watches them. Then, as if fearing to be observed, he drops back. On his face there is depicted complete understanding of the situation. Answering a sudden impulse to escape, he hurries to the steps on the right. He remains standing there a moment, shakes his head and hastens again to the closed platform door, peering out. The last of the passengers are leaving the platform. Moving away from the door Felix comes to the front in an attitude of suspense, with his face contorted into a smile. Then, growing serious again, he seats himself at a table on the right, the same, in fact, at which Agnes and Guido had sat before. Mechanically he picks up a newspaper and glances above it in the direction of the platform door. The Guard has already shut the door. He opens it again. First there enters a belated woman with a multiplicity of hand bags, then a station official, and lastly Guido and Agnes. They do not at first discover Felix, who is intrenched behind his newspaper.]

GUIDO. Amazing —

AGNES. Is there another train today?

GUIDO. Let's have a look at the time-table. [They go to the time-table on the wall next to the steps. Guido studies it carefully.] Nine — twelve — no, that's not from Innsbruck. If we could only find out somehow. Just wait —

FELIX [putting the newspaper aside, rises and strides quickly toward Agnes and Guido, who are studying the time-table. For a space he stands motionless behind her. He speaks suddenly in an unsuspecting, joyous tone.] Well, here you are, Agnes.

[Agnes turns around, likewise Guido, but they utter no word.]

FELIX [overlooking the awkwardness of the situation very quickly]. You see, I came up on the earlier train, at noon. Unfortunately I couldn't telegraph you in time. It was a sudden whim of mine. I awoke somewhat earlier this morning. My things were all packed. So I said to myself: "Suppose you take the first train and loaf about Salzburg for several hours." I'm glad to see you, Agnes — glad to see you. [Wrings her hand.] How d'ye do, doctor? What are you doing here? En route for Vienna? [Extends his hand.] Your vacation's over, I suppose.

GUIDO [hesitatingly taking the proffered hand]. No, I'm not going to Vienna. I was glad to escort your — your wife permitted me to — and, really — [Agnes casts an anxious glance at him, which is not lost on Felix.]

FELIX [quickly interrupting]. Very good of you, doctor. My wife loves to chat. Very kind of you, doctor, to keep her company. When one has taken the trip thirty or forty times the beauties of nature grow banal. [Suddenly.] But Agnes, let me look at you. We haven't seen each other for such an age. Six weeks! I don't recollect our ever having been parted so long during the five years we've been married. Isn't that so?

AGNES. You're looking very well, Felix.

FELIX. Am I? Well, I hope so. And you, too. Why, you seem to have grown a little stouter. And you're sunburnt, quite sunburnt. You were out in the open a good deal, weren't you? And then the weather was simply glorious. But today — of course. It was very nice of you to come to meet me.

AGNES. But you asked me to.

FELIX. I simply wanted to let you know. I didn't reckon on it for a moment. Besides, it's two and a half hours from Seewalchen to here. And you had to change, too. Take it any way you like, it's a trip — even with the doctor's pleasant company.

GUIDO. As regards my accompanying your wife, allow me —

AGNES [interrupting, suddenly to Felix]. You were here, then, at twelve? What have you done until now?

FELIX. I'll tell you presently. [Indicating the table.] Won't you join me — I've a tremendous hankering for a cup of coffee. And you? Or have you already had some? Waiter! Waiter! What was that you asked a moment ago? How I passed the time? Well, as it was dinner time, I dined in town, of course very well, too — at the Nürnberg. [Sits.] Well, doctor, won't you join us? [Agnes sits.]

GUIDO [with a meaningful glance at Agnes]. I don't really know whether — You see, I have —

FELIX [quickly]. No ceremony, doctor. Please. [To waiter who approaches.] Let us have some — [to Agnes] — coffee, eh? And what'll you have, doctor?

GUIDO [who has taken a seat in response to a wink of Agnes]. I have just —

AGNES [quickly to waiter]. Three mélanges, please. [Waiter is about to go.]

FELIX. I'll have mine a bit strong. And, by the way, have you still got that coffee cake you had six weeks ago? It was delicious.

AGNES. You remember it still?

FELIX. You liked it, too. [To the waiter.] Well, bring us some coffee cake with the coffee. [Waiter goes.]

FELIX. NOW — what were we talking about? Oh, yes. I dined at the Nürnberg and then I loafed about town —

AGNES. In the rain?

FELIX. Ah, I didn't mind it the least bit. Coming upon the sultriness of the morning it was a veritable godsend. Then, you see, I called on Sebastian Schwartz for half an hour.

AGNES [by way of explanation to Guido]. That's the antique dealer, you know.

FELIX. You aren't interested in antiques, I presume, doctor?

GUIDO. I don't understand enough about them. But —

FELIX [quickly to Agnes]. He has lots of beautiful things. Some of them quite expensive.

AGNES. And I suppose you untied your pursestrings liberally again.

FELIX. Not much. I've already had several things sent on to Seewalchen to the villa. A nampulla such as we've wanted for a long time.

AGNES. For the dining room?

FELIX. Yes, of course. Certainly you can hang it in the dining room if you wish. And then I bought a lovely amulet. Baroque. Genuine. Aqua marine with a little silver chain — wait until you see it. I have it here in my purse. But, tell me, when did you arrive? At four, I take it?

AGNES. No, I dined in town, too.

GUIDO. We had dinner here, too.

AGNES [resuming]. We ate at the station and —

FELIX [quickly]. And loafed about town until now. Curious, isn't it, that we didn't meet?

GUIDO. We took a drive.

AGNES. Considering the bad weather — the doctor was very kind — [Waiter brings coffee, etc. Felix, moving back his chair, causes the table and glasses to tremble. Waiter is somewhat taken aback. Guido seems to hesitate a moment, then, — with nervous haste, he does likewise. Felix stirs his coffee. The waiter goes off with the newspapers.]

GUIDO [with sudden determination]. Mr. Staufner, I must ask —

FELIX [quickly]. But drink your coffee, old man. And let me enjoy mine while I may. Then, if it suits you, you may ask my indulgence to whatever you please. I find tiffin the nicest refreshment of the day. I can do without my dinner, but never without my afternoon coffee.

GUIDO. Mr. Staufner, you asked me a moment ago whether I was going to Vienna. Well —

FELIX [quickly]. Excuse my hawing asked. I noticed the effect on you was painful. I don't want to have appeared indiscreet. What you have decided to do with the rest of your vacation is clearly a personal matter. Enjoy life as long — and so on. Aren't you going to take over the management of the Höllenstein factory when your father is ready to retire —

GUIDO. My father is quite robust. He has no intention of retiring from business. [He endeavors to exchange glances with Agnes who, however, avoids his look.]

FELIX. HOW old is he, if I may ask?

GUIDO. Sixty-two. But as I said —

FELIX. In any case, the main burden will soon fall to your shoulders. So enjoy life as long as you may. And above all things else, travel.

AGNES. The doctor has traveled considerable. He's already been to America.

GUIDO. Yes, I've been to South America. FELIX. Indeed. To South America. And do you know Japan at all?

GUIDO. No, I don't know Japan.

FELIX. Japan has lured me for ever so long. Don't you feel like going there too, Agnes?

AGNES. There are many places not so far.

FELIX. What of that? Do you expect to travel round the world inch by inch? It can't be done. What kind of a hat are you wearing, Agnes?

AGNES. You know it.

FELIX. The red band is kind of new to me.

AGNES. Yes, it is new.

FELIX. Quite a summer hue. It glows and sparkles. [He repeats the phrase, but almost in an uncontrollable threatening tone of voice.] It glows and sparkles.

[Agnes gazes at him in terror and shoots a sudden glance at Guido. Guido involuntarily assumes a dignified posture.]

FELIX [glancing up, in a gentler tone]. You are not interested in women's hats, I presume, doctor?

GUIDO [As if perceiving an opportunity to fasten his fangs]. Not generally. But I am interested in this one, Mr. Staufner. And not only —

[Agnes looks at him frightened.]

FELIX. Not only in the hat, but also, the wearer. That goes without saying. I am too, doctor. Naturally the hat would be a matter of indifference to both of us if, say, it hung over there on that hook.

GUARD [entering and calling out]. Passenger train to Schwannemarkt, Bocklabruck, Atnang, Linz, Vienna.

GUIDO [pushing back his chair as if to rise]. Mr. Staufner —

FELIX. Oh, yes. That's your train. If you intend going back to Seewalchen you'll have to make a connection. [To Agnes, who looks at him quite confused.] You thought it was ours, too?
No, it is not ours, Agnes. I understand fully, doctor — this attraction to the field of your triumph. Yes, your triumph — [laughing loudly]. My cordial wishes are perhaps a little tardy at this moment.

GUIDO [taken aback]. How. [Agnes gazes at Felix, not understanding.]

FELIX. You — [pause] — won — at the Regatta, didn't you? —

GUIDO [involuntarily heaving a sigh of relief]. Oh, thank you. It was only the second prize.

AGNES [likewise relieved]. How do you come to know about it? —

FELIX. Why, it's in the newspaper.

AGNES. You read the sporting page nowadays? Since when?

FELIX. Not all of it. But news about Seewalchen, for obvious reasons, interested me. Moreover, it was on the train, where one reads everything, even one's railway ticket. [To Guido.] Have you been interested in yachting very long?

GUIDO. Quite a number of years. On Ostersee mostly in the past.

FELIX. On Binnensee, I imagine, it's more difficult.

GUIDO. Not necessarily.

FELIX. Unfortunately, I know nothing about GUIDO. I suppose you haven't taken up sport, Mr. Staufner?

FELIX. Oh, yes — yes. Mostly of a tourist character. I climb a good deal. In Stubai I negotiated several trails.

AGNES. Alone?

FELIX. The big ones, yes. On the little ones I had a party along. Two ladies — mother and daughter. The young lady kept up very nicely on foot.

AGNES. Miss Bianca Walter —?

FELIX. HOW do you —? Why, yes.

AGNES. I hazard the guess she's blond. That's your favorite color.

FELIX. Of course, she's blond. Would you care to know more about her? She's a young actress just beginning her career. She played something for me once — The Jungfrau von Orleans.

AGNES. Very nice.

FELIX. It was, indeed. By the bye, I should have her picture somewhere about me.

AGNES. Her picture? You have her picture about you —?

FELIX. Yes. [He takes it out of his breast pocket.] She gave it to me before I left. The first chance I get I'd like to show it to a manager. She wants ever so much to get a position in Vienna. She imagines it only needs a word from me. These women certainly are naïve! The mother wasn't bad-looking, either.

AGNES. Isabella.

FELIX. Isabella? Why, yes, of course. Isabella was the mother's name.

AGNES. And the daughter's Bianca.

FELIX. Isabella was the mother's name and the daughter's Bianca. Sounds like a ballad almost. [To Guido.] Don't you think so?

GUIDO [icily]. I'm no judge.

AGNES. But I thought you had no intention of making any acquaintances there, and that you were going to devote yourself exclusively to your work.

FELIX. Oh, appearances to the contrary, I was quite assiduous. You will be quite satisfied with me, I think.

AGNES [with an effort]. Have you finished.

FELIX. Finished? Not quite.

AGNES. Under the circumstances little else was to be expected.

FELIX. HOW malevolent you can be, Agnes! No reason for it — at all. When luck's on my side, as you know, I can get through in three or four days. Only I need your advice.

AGNES [joyful in spite of herself]. My advice?

FELIX. Yes, without equivocation. First, I'd like to talk it over with you. I'll also read you as much as I have.

So let's not take the train back to Seewalchen for the present. Until I have cleared up everything I don't care to go back. And here in Salzburg, I know from previous experience I can work extraordinarily well. That's why we'll stay here for a few days.

AGNES. We're going to stay here? That's rather new to me.

FELIX. TO me, also. I simply mean that the idea struck me on the train. You're with me in this, aren't you? We've only got to telegraph to good old Therese, asking her to send you whatever you need — absolute necessities. Of course, some superfluous things, too. And whatever for the present you're urgently in want of we can purchase today. Or have you, by chance, in response to some secret presentiment, brought your little crocodile purse with you?

GUIDO [as if sensing the underlying meaning. Externally unruffled, but without malice]. I put the crocodile purse in my suitcase, thinking it safer there.

FELIX. Indeed? Capital! Then everything is in ship-shape. And you're glad to stay on, aren't you, Agnes? The three days, I promise you, will pass quickly. All difficulties will be surmounted — and before we return to our little country house I shall put the finishing touch to — [he hesitates]— "The Festival of Bacchus."

AGNES [taken by surprise]. "The Festival of Bacchus"?

FELIX. Yes; why these wide eyes of wonderment?

AGNES. You're writing "The Festival of Bacchus"?

FELIX. Yes.

AGNES. But you started out with quite a different purpose.

FELIX. Quite right. But, soon after, on the way to Stubaital, it flashed upon me, before anything else, I must do "The Festival of Bacchus." There are good and sufficient reasons for this change. It was conditioned by mysterious laws.

GUIDO. Yes, life is very mysterious.

FELIX. Life — no. Not more than ordinarily so. But art is. Yes, art is most — A thing of this sort is leavened within. It matures deep in the recesses of self. [Indicating his forehead.] Here one knows nothing about it. So it is. [Breaking off in another tone.] Two acts, as I said, are finished. Only in the third act I find I'm up against it, and no thoroughfare. Well, you'll hear it and, I have no doubt, something suggestive will occur to you.

AGNES. If you think so —— [The waiter has appeared.]

FELIX [noticing him]. Oh, yes. Well —?

GUIDO. Mine was a mélange —

FELIX. What a notion, doctor? [The waiter.] Three mélanges and three portions of coffee cake.

GUIDO. Four — I had two.

FELIX [laughing]. Ah, yes; four then.

WAITER. Five.

FELIX. Five?

AGNES. You crumbled one.

FELIX. Oh, did I? Really? Well, then, five.

WAITER. TWO crowns, 40 pfennig.

FELIX [counting]. Very well.

WAITER [discreetly to Guido]. And then there were two lemon sodas.

GUIDO. Ah, yes. [Is about to pay.] —

FELIX [noticing Guido's attempt]. What is that? Ah, yes? [Gaily.] Please, please. [Is about to pay.]

GUIDO. I insist —

FELIX. Please let me. Two sodas. Here you are. [Pays. Waiter goes. Felix extracts a cigarette case from his pocket and offers Guido a cigarette.]

GUIDO [falteringly helping himself to a cigarette]. Thanks.

[Felix offers him a light and then proceeds to light his own.]

GUIDO. And now, if you'll excuse me, I must be going.

FELIX. Good day, doctor, and a pleasant journey to you — whatever route you decide to take.

GUIDO. Thanks. Good bye, my dear Mrs. Staufner. [Not yet does he dare to extend his hand.] I trust soon — [overjoyed at the sudden idea] — perhaps I shall have the pleasure of seeing you again at the première of your husband's new play —

AGNES. I shall be pleased —

FELIX. You're in no way bound to attend, doctor.

GUIDO. No trouble at all. You see, I've never missed one of your first nights yet. So, naturally, I shall not fail to be present at the opening of "The Festival of Bax—"

FELIX. Bacchus, doctor.

GUIDO. I beg your pardon.

FELIX. It's not a mythological play, as appears from the title, neither is it in verse, if such things scare you away.

GUIDO. Not at all.

FELIX. The title is only used metaphorically, of course. If I attempted to put on a real Festival of Bacchus, I'd have no end of trouble with the censor, as you can imagine.

GUIDO. I'm ashamed to confess that I don't know what a Festival of Bacchus is.

FELIX. Really? The Festival of Bacchus was a quaint custom of the ancient Greeks — a religious custom, you might say.

GUIDO. A — religious custom?

FELIX [with marginal lilt and brevity]. Yes. A night was set aside once a year at the season of the vintage, if I err not, when men and women were granted unlimited freedom after a fashion.

GUIDO. Unlimited freedom —

FELIX [very cool, merely informative]. After a fashion. On this night of nights all family ties, all prescriptive laws were dissolved. Men, women, and girls departed from their homes at sundown — homes whose peace they had surrounded and protected — and repaired to a sacred grove (there were many such groves in the land) to celebrate under the sheltering wing of night the divine festival —

GUIDO. The divine festival —

FELIX. The divine festival.

GUIDO. Under the wing of night.

FELIX. Yes.

GUIDO. And supposing the moon shone?

FELIX. That did not matter. At daybreak — the festival was over, and every participant was pledged to forget with whom he celebrated his share of the divine festival. Pledged in all honor. That was a part of the religious custom — just as the celebration itself. To recognize one another afterward would have been considered in bad taste, as being, indeed, frivolous. And, as the saying runs, the votaries of the gods, somewhat tired and yet refreshed, in a measure even purified, wended their way home.

GUIDO. And at home one had an exciting theme for discussion ready to hand — until the next festival.

FELIX. At home nothing was allowed to be said about the festival. There'd be no sense in that. There was as little individual responsibility for the experiences of that night — as there is for dreams.

GUIDO. But didn't it sometimes happen that a couple who had found themselves together in a sacred grove, had no desire to escape from one another's sight so soon — and neither of them showed up at home?

FELIX. That was impossible. The penalty for that was death.

AGNES. Death —?

FELIX. Yes, death. They had to part when the sun rose. The ritual in this respect was very strict.

GUIDO. You say the penalty was death —?

FELIX. TO be exact, there was an extenuating circumstance.

GUIDO. Ah!

FELIX [with emphasis]. When two people who had found themselves together under the wing of night yearned for one another still on the following night — this happened less frequently than one imagines — no one was allowed, neither husband nor wife nor father nor mother, to stand in their way. And these two met again on the same spot where they had parted in the morning. But from the second night — and here we must really marvel at the wisdom of the priests — from this second night, which was no longer a festival to the god there was no asylum. Their former home was closed to them and they were for the remainder of their days dependent on one another. That is why so very few cared to leave their homes on the second night. [Pause.]

GUIDO. You've looked up the mythology of it pretty thoroughly for your comedy, Mr. Staufner.

FELIX. It wasn't necessary. If you were to investigate you would discover that my version doesn't correspond exactly. For, as I said, the Festival of Bacchus is but a symbol suitable to my purpose. My play is set in the present, and the present lacks several things which makes the revival of such a beautiful, simple and pure celebration as the ancient Festival of Bacchus, impossible. People have grown too irreligious. Instead of experiencing the natural naturally, they befog things with their pedantic psychology. Nowadays Festivals of Bacchus are no longer possible because our love-life is murky, yes, poisoned by lies and self-deception, by jealousy and fear, by insolence and remorse. Only occasionally — and this but in pious souls — there is kindled a faint or still more brilliant reflection of the marvellous magic which once pervaded the Festival of Bacchus. And this magic is perhaps of a higher order than the other. But who of us can glory in his own piety? Who of us —?

GUARD [entering]. Express to Freilassing, Rosenheim, Munich, Paris —

FELIX [in an altered tone of voice]. Isn't that your train, doctor?

GUIDO [surprised]. My train —?

AGNES. For Paris. Of course it's your train, doctor.

GUIDO. Well let it be — And now I must see about my baggage. Dear Mrs. Staufner — [Agnes gives him her hand. Guido hesitates a moment, then kisses it. He bows to Felix. Felix extends his hand. Guido takes it hurriedly, then goes down the steps. Pause. Commotion. Passengers pass out to the platform with porters, etc.]

AGNES [looking at him, after a long pause]. And what kind of a reflection is that?

[Felix looks at her as if he did not quite follow her meaning.] —

AGNES. The reflection in pious souls which you just mentioned, which to you signifies a loftier magic than the marvellous festival itself — this festival which according to you is no longer celebrated nowadays? —...

FELIX [almost crudely]. This magic is called — forgetting. But we don't believe in that, you and I.

AGNES. You may be right. There may, however, be another which is easier to believe in. [Felix gives her a questioning look.]

AGNES. Understanding. [She has the picture in her hand and crushes it. Felix laughs curtly.]

GUIDO [entering from the right with two handbags. He steps up to the table]. Pardon me, since it was most convenient to check both bags on one ticket — I —

AGNES [anxiously]. Thank you, very much. Please put it here.

GUIDO. Don't mention it. [He places Agnes handbag on the chair which he previously occupied.] —.

FELIX [rising suddenly]. Dr. Wernig —

GUIDO [comprehending, with great dignity]. If it is your pleasure, Mr. Staufner, I can likewise put off my departure.

AGNES [quickly, with determination]. You will depart on this train, Guido.

[Felix looks at her. Guido stands irresolute. Pause.]

FELIX. You may go! [Guido bows and goes out on the platform.]

FELIX [sits. His face is contorted. Then he rises again, as if to follow Guido. Agnes restrains him by grasping his arm. Felix reseats himself. Agnes tears Bianca's picture into small bits.]

FELIX [bitterly]. If this were all!

AGNES [with a ghost of a smile]. We must be pious, both of us.

FELIX [in a sudden hollow tone of voice]. I hate you!

AGNES. And I hate you a thousand times more bitterly — [with a new expression of tenderness] — my lover!

[CURTAIN.]

The Delphi Classics Catalogue

We are pleased to present a hyperlinked listing of our complete catalogue of English titles, with new titles being added every month. Buying direct from our website means you can make great savings and take advantage of our instant Updates service. You can even purchase an entire series (Super Set) at a special discounted price.

Only from our website can readers purchase a complete Parts Edition of our titles. When you buy a Parts Edition, you will receive a folder of your chosen author's works, with each novel, play, poetry collection, non-fiction book and more divided into its own special eBook. This allows you to read individual novels etc. and to know precisely where you are in an eBook. For more information, please visit our Parts Edition page.

Series Contents

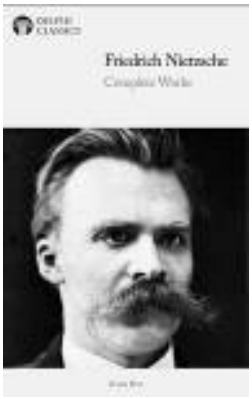
Series One

Anton Chekhov
Charles Dickens
D. H. Lawrence
Dickensiana Volume I
Edgar Allan Poe
Elizabeth Gaskell
Fyodor Dostoyevsky
George Eliot
H. G. Wells
Henry James
Ivan Turgenev
Jack London
James Joyce
Jane Austen
Joseph Conrad
Leo Tolstoy
Louisa May Alcott
Mark Twain
Oscar Wilde
Robert Louis Stevenson
Sir Arthur Conan Doyle
Sir Walter Scott

The Brontës
Thomas Hardy
Virginia Woolf
Wilkie Collins
William Makepeace Thackeray

Series Two

Alexander Pushkin
Alexandre Dumas
Andrew Lang
Anthony Trollope
Bram Stoker
Christopher Marlowe
Daniel Defoe
Edith Wharton
F. Scott Fitzgerald
G. K. Chesterton
Gustave Flaubert
H. Rider Haggard
Herman Melville
Honoré de Balzac
J. W. von Goethe
Jules Verne
L. Frank Baum
Lewis Carroll
Marcel Proust
Nathaniel Hawthorne
Nikolai Gogol
O. Henry
Rudyard Kipling
Tobias Smollett
Victor Hugo
William Shakespeare



Series Three

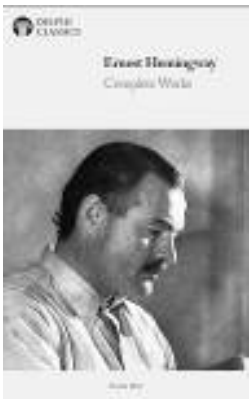
Ambrose Bierce
Ann Radcliffe
Ben Jonson
Charles Lever
Émile Zola
Ford Madox Ford
Geoffrey Chaucer
George Gissing
George Orwell
Guy de Maupassant
H. P. Lovecraft
Henrik Ibsen
Henry David Thoreau
Henry Fielding
J. M. Barrie
James Fenimore Cooper
John Buchan
John Galsworthy
Jonathan Swift
Kate Chopin
Katherine Mansfield
L. M. Montgomery
Laurence Sterne
Mary Shelley
Sheridan Le Fanu
Washington Irving

Series Four

Arnold Bennett
Arthur Machen
Beatrix Potter
Bret Harte
Captain Frederick Marryat
Charles Kingsley
Charles Reade
G. A. Henty
Edgar Rice Burroughs
Edgar Wallace
E. M. Forster
E. Nesbit
George Meredith
Harriet Beecher Stowe
Jerome K. Jerome
John Ruskin
Maria Edgeworth
M. E. Braddon
Miguel de Cervantes
M. R. James
R. M. Ballantyne
Robert E. Howard
Samuel Johnson
Stendhal
Stephen Crane
Zane Grey

Series Five

Algernon Blackwood
Anatole France
Beaumont and Fletcher
Charles Darwin
Edward Bulwer-Lytton
Edward Gibbon
E. F. Benson



Frances Hodgson Burnett
Friedrich Nietzsche
George Bernard Shaw
George MacDonald
Hilaire Belloc
John Bunyan
John Webster
Margaret Oliphant
Maxim Gorky
Oliver Goldsmith
Radclyffe Hall
Robert W. Chambers
Samuel Butler
Samuel Richardson
Sir Thomas Malory
Thomas Carlyle
William Harrison Ainsworth
William Dean Howells
William Morris

Series Six

Anthony Hope
Aphra Behn
Arthur Morrison
Baroness Emma Orczy
Captain Mayne Reid
Charlotte M. Yonge
Charlotte Perkins Gilman
E. W. Hornung
Ellen Wood
Frances Burney
Frank Norris
Frank R. Stockton
Hall Caine
Horace Walpole
One Thousand and One Nights
R. Austin Freeman

Rafael Sabatini
Saki
Samuel Pepys
Sir Issac Newton
Stanley J. Weyman
Thomas De Quincey
Thomas Middleton
Voltaire
William Hazlitt
William Hope Hodgson

Series Seven

Adam Smith
Benjamin Disraeli
Confucius
David Hume
E. M. Delafield
E. Phillips Oppenheim
Edmund Burke
Ernest Hemingway
Frances Trollope
Galileo Galilei
Guy Boothby
Hans Christian Andersen
Ian Fleming
Immanuel Kant
Karl Marx
Kenneth Grahame
Lytton Strachey
Mary Wollstonecraft
Michel de Montaigne
René Descartes
Richard Marsh
Sax Rohmer
Sir Richard Burton
Talbot Mundy
Thomas Babington Macaulay

W. W. Jacobs

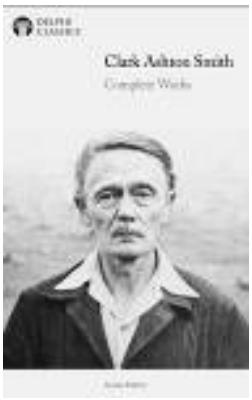
Series Eight

Anna Katharine Green
Arthur Schopenhauer
The Brothers Grimm
C. S. Lewis
Charles and Mary Lamb
Elizabeth von Arnim
Ernest Bramah
Francis Bacon
Gilbert and Sullivan
Grant Allen
Henryk Sienkiewicz
Hugh Walpole
Jean-Jacques Rousseau
John Locke
John Muir
Joseph Addison
Lafcadio Hearn
Lord Dunsany
Marie Corelli
Niccolò Machiavelli
Ouida
Richard Brinsley Sheridan
Sigmund Freud
Theodore Dreiser
Walter Pater
W. Somerset Maugham

Series Nine

Aldous Huxley
August Strindberg
Booth Tarkington
C. S. Forester
Erasmus
Eugene Sue
Fergus Hume
George Moore
Gertrude Stein
Giovanni Boccaccio
Izaak Walton
J. M. Synge
Johanna Spyri
John Galt
Maurice Leblanc
Max Brand
Molière
Norse Sagas
R. D. Blackmore
R. S. Surtees
Sir Thomas More
Stephen Leacock
The Harvard Classics
Thomas Love Peacock
Thomas Paine
William James

Series Ten



A. E. W. Mason
Abraham Lincoln
Baruch Spinoza
Carolyn Wells
Charles Brockden Brown
Earl Derr Biggers
Evelyn Waugh
F. Marion Crawford
Fred M. White
Frederick Douglass
Gaston Leroux
Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel
George Berkeley
Howard Pyle
John Kendrick Bangs
John Steinbeck
John Stuart Mill
J. S. Fletcher
Martin Luther Sherwood Anderson
Thomas Dekker
Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Jefferson
Willa Cather
William Faulkner
William Le Queux

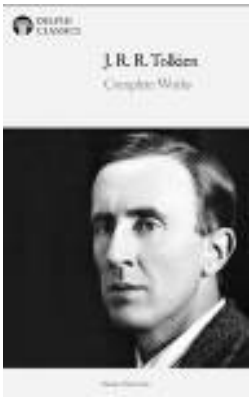
Series Eleven

A. Merritt
Blaise Pascal
Charles W. Chesnutt
Dashiell Hammett
Dinah Craik
Elizabeth Inchbald
François Rabelais

George Griffith
George du Maurier
Hamlin Garland
Hugh Lofting
Joel Chandler Harris
John Calvin
M. P. Shiel
Matthew Lewis
Nevil Shute
Olaf Stapledon
P. G. Wodehouse
Philip Massinger
Raymond Chandler
Romain Rolland
Sabine Baring-Gould
Sarah Orne Jewett
Thomas Aquinas
Thomas Browne
William Wycherley

Series Twelve

A. A. Milne
Alexis de Tocqueville
Alphonse Daudet
Anne Thackeray Ritchie
Arthur Quiller-Couch
Clark Ashton Smith
Dorothy L. Sayers
E. T. W. Hoffmann
Emanuel Swedenborg
Ernest Thompson Seton
H. Bedford-Jones
Harry Collingwood
Ivan Goncharov
James Branch Cabell



Jane Porter
Louis Joseph Vance
May Sinclair
Mrs Humphry Ward
Mystery, Morality and Miracle Plays
Sinclair Lewis
The Mabinogion
Theodore Roosevelt
Thomas Hughes
Thomas Wolfe
William Black
William Godwin

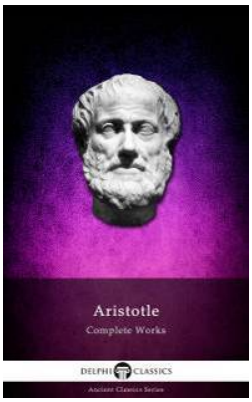
Series Thirteen

Arthur Ransome
Benjamin Franklin
Charles Williams
Denis Diderot
Dorothy Richardson
E. R. Eddison
Ellen Glasgow
Enid Blyton
Eugene O'Neill
Francis Stevens
Friedrich Engels
George Borrow
George Sand
J. D. Beresford
Jack Kerouac
John Ford
Josephine Tey
Mary Rinehart
P. C. Wren
Romance of the Three Kingdoms

T. E. Lawrence
Thorne Smith
Upton Sinclair
Victorian Explorers and Travellers
Winston Churchill (British statesman)
Winston Churchill (US novelist)

Series Fourteen

Alfred de Musset
G. P. R. James
George Washington Cable
Grace Livingston Hill
J. R. R. Tolkien
James Hilton
Jean Racine
Jeffery Farnol
John Dewey
John Dos Passos
John Henry Newman
John Wyndham
Johnston McCulley
Mary Webb
Noël Coward
Otis Adelbert Kline
Peter Cheyney
Philip Stanhope
Raphael Holinshed
Sapper
Sir Richard Steele
Soren Kierkegaard
Thomas Nashe
W. E. Johns
William Henry Hudson
William John Locke

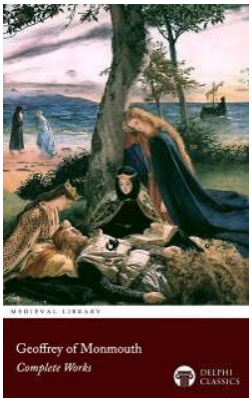


Series Fifteen

Albert Camus
Albert Einstein
Angela Brazil
Arthur Schnitzler
Bertrand Russell
Carson McCullers
Cornell Woolrich
Erle Stanley Gardner
François de La Rochefoucauld
George Whyte-Melville
Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz
Ida B. Wells
Jacques Futrelle
John Aubrey
John Cowper Powys
John Lyly
Joris-Karl Huysmans
Marjorie Bowen
Maurice Maeterlinck
Natsume Soseki
Owen Wister
Rhoda Broughton
Seabury Quinn
Slave Narratives
Susanna Centlivre
Thomas Henry Huxley

Series Sixteen

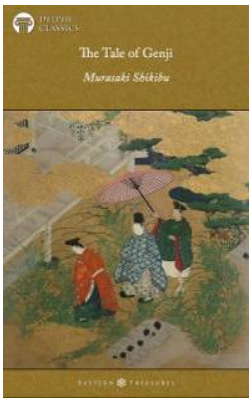
Alfred Russel Wallace
Arthurian Literary Cycle
E. D. E. N. Southworth
Earl of Shaftesbury
Edward Payson Roe
Eleanor Porter
Freeman Wills Crofts
George Farquhar
Hale White
Henri Poincaré
J. Meade Falkner
James George Frazer
James Hogg
John Burroughs
John Maynard Keynes
John O'Hara
Leslie Stephen
Mervyn Peake
Montesquieu
Patricia Wentworth
Rainer Maria Rilke
Robert Hugh Benson
Shirley Jackson
Thomas Mann
Vicente Blasco Ibáñez
William Wells Brown



Ancient Classics

Achilles Tatius
Aeschines
Aeschylus
Alcaeus
Alciphron
Alcman
Ambrose
Ammianus Marcellinus
Anacreon
Andocides
Anselm of Canterbury
Antiphon
Apollodorus
Apollonius of Rhodes
Appian
Apuleius
Aratus
Archilochus
Aristophanes
Aristotle
Aristoxenus
Arrian
Athanasius
Athenaeus
Augustine
Aulus Gellius
Ausonius
Bacchylides
Basil of Caesarea
Bede
Boethius
Callimachus
Callistratus
Cassius Dio
Cato

Catullus
Cicero
Claudian
Clement of Alexandria
Coluthus
Cornelius Nepos
Cyprian
Demosthenes
Dio Chrysostom
Diodorus Siculus
Diogenes Laërtius
Dionysius of Halicarnassus
Ennius
Epictetus
Euclid
Eunapius
Euripides
Eusebius
Eutropius
Florus
Frontius
Fronto
Gregory I
Gregory of Nazianzus
Herodas
Herodian
Herodotus
Hesiod
Hippocrates
Homer
Horace
Iamblichus
Isaeus
Isocrates
Jerome
John Chrysostom
Josephus
Julian
Julius Caesar
Juvenal
Livy
Longus
Lucan
Lucian
Lucretius
Lycophron
Lysias



Manetho
Marcus Aurelius
Martial
Nonnus
Onasander
Oppian
Origen
Orosius
Ovid
Panyassis
Parthenius
Pausanias
Persius
Petronius
Phaedrus
Philostratus
Pindar
Plato
Plautus
Pliny the Elder
Pliny the Younger
Plotinus
Plutarch
Polybius
Porphyry
Proclus
Procopius
Propertius
Prudentius
Ptolemy
Quintus Curtius Rufus
Quintus Smyrnaeus
Roman Law Codes
Sallust
Sappho
Seneca the Younger
Septuagint
Sidonius
Sophocles
Sozomen
Statius
Stesichorus
Strabo
Suetonius
Tacitus
Terence
Tertullian

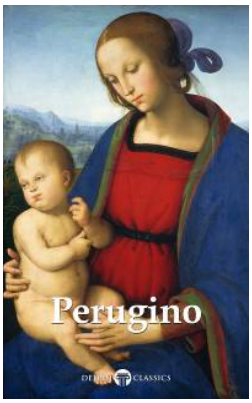
Theocritus
Theophrastus
Thucydides
Tibullus
Valerius Flaccus
Varro
Velleius Paterculus
Virgil
Vitruvius
Xenophon
Zosimus

Medieval Library

Ælfric of Eynsham
Anglo-Saxon Chronicle
Anna Komnene
Asser
Christine de Pizan
Einhard
Geoffrey of Monmouth
Gildas
Gregory of Tours
Jacobus de Voragine
Jean Froissart
Marco Polo
Margery Kempe
Nennius
Saxo Grammaticus
William of Malmesbury

Eastern Treasures

Book of Sindibad
The Puranas
The Tale of Genji
The Vedas
Sufi Texts
Sun Tzu



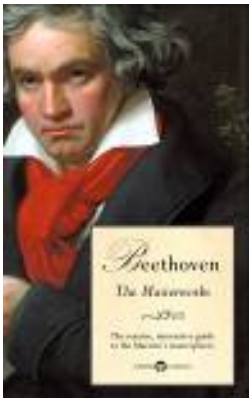
Delphi Poets Series

A. E. Housman
Adam Mickiewicz
Adelaide Crapsey
Alexander Pope
Alfred, Lord Tennyson
Algernon Charles Swinburne
Alice Meynell
Andrew Marvell
Basho and the Haikuists
Beowulf
C. Day-Lewis
Charles Baudelaire
Charles Sorley
Charlotte Smith
Christina Rossetti
Confederation Poets
D. H. Lawrence

Dante Alighieri
Dante Gabriel Rossetti
Delphi Poetry Anthology
Dylan Thomas
Edgar Allan Poe
Edmund Spenser
Edmund Waller
Edward Lear
Edward Thomas
Edward Young
Edwin Arlington Robinson
Elizabeth Barrett Browning
Ella Wheeler Wilcox
Emily Dickinson
Epic of Gilgamesh
Ezra Pound
Francis Thompson
Friedrich Schiller
Fulke Greville
Garcilaso de la Vega
George Chapman
George Crabbe
George Herbert
Gerard Manley Hopkins
Giacomo Leopardi
Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer
Hafez
Heinrich Heine
Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey
Henry Lawson
Henry Wadsworth Longfellow
Isaac Rosenberg
James Hogg
James Russell Lowell
Johan Ludvig Runeberg
John Clare
John Donne
John Dryden
John Gay
John Gower
John Greenleaf Whittier
John Keats
John Masefield
John Milton
John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester
Joseph Addison
Jupiter Hammon

Kahlil Gibran
Leigh Hunt
Lord Byron
Louise Imogen Guiney
Ludovico Ariosto
Luís de Camões
Mary Robinson
Matthew Arnold
Matthew Prior
Medieval Poetry Collection
Michael Drayton
Nikolai Nekrasov
Omar Khayyam
Paul Laurence Dunbar
Percy Bysshe Shelley
Petrarch
Phillis Wheatley
Rabindranath Tagore
Ralph Waldo Emerson
Richard Crashaw
Robert Bridges
Robert Browning
Robert Burns
Robert Frost
Robert Southey
Rumi
Rupert Brooke
Saadi
Samuel Taylor Coleridge
Sandor Petofi
Sanskrit Epics
Sara Teasdale
Siegfried Sassoon
Sir Philip Sidney
Sir Thomas Wyatt
Sir Walter Raleigh
Sylvia Plath
T. S. Eliot
Thomas Chatterton
Thomas Gray
Thomas Hardy
Thomas Hood
Thomas Moore
Thomas Otway
Torquato Tasso
Vita Sackville-West
W. B. Yeats

W. E. Henley
Walt Whitman
Walter Savage Landor
Wilfred Owen
William Blake
William Congreve
William Cowper
William Cullen Bryant
William Drummond
William Wordsworth

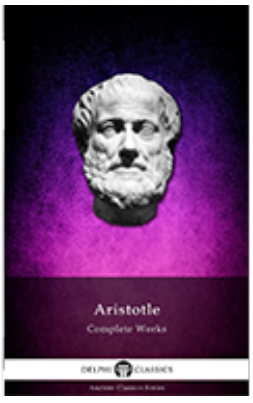


Masters of Art

Albrecht Dürer
Alfred Sisley
Alphonse Mucha
Amedeo Modigliani
Andrea Mantegna
Anthony van Dyck
Artemisia Gentileschi
Auguste Rodin
Berthe Morisot
Camille Pissarro
Canaletto
Caravaggio
Caspar David Friedrich
Claude Lorrain
Claude Monet
Correggio
Dante Gabriel Rossetti
Diego Velázquez
Donatello
Edgar Degas
Édouard Manet
Edvard Munch
Edward Burne-Jones
Egon Schiele

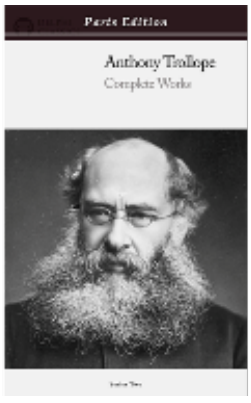
El Greco
Eugène Delacroix
Fra Angelico
Francisco Goya
Georges Seurat
Gerard ter Borch
Gerrit Dou
Giotto
Giovanni Battista Tiepolo
Giovanni Bellini
Gustav Klimt
Gustave Courbet
Hans Holbein the Younger
Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec
Henri Matisse
Hieronymus Bosch
Hokusai
J. M. W. Turner
Jacques-Louis David
James Abbott McNeill Whistler
Jan van Eyck
Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres
Johannes Vermeer
John Constable
John Everett Millais
John William Waterhouse
Joshua Reynolds
Leonardo da Vinci
Mary Cassatt
Masaccio
Michelangelo
Nicolas Poussin
Paolo Veronese
Paul Cézanne
Paul Gauguin
Paul Klee
Peter Paul Rubens
Piero della Francesca
Pierre-Auguste Renoir
Piet Mondrian
Pieter Bruegel the Elder
Pietro Perugino
Pontormo
Raphael
Rembrandt van Rijn
Sandro Botticelli
Thomas Eakins

Thomas Gainsborough
Tintoretto
Titian
Vincent van Gogh
Wassily Kandinsky
William Hogarth



Great Composers

Antonio Vivaldi
Franz Schubert
Frédéric Chopin
Giuseppe Verdi
Johann Sebastian Bach
Johannes Brahms
Ludwig van Beethoven
Piotr Illitch Tchaïkovsky
Richard Wagner
Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart



Alphabetical List of Titles

View our entire catalogue here

Browse eBooks by Themes

17th Century 18th Century Adventure Afr-Am Americans Baroque Children's Dutch Early-19th
Eastern Epic Poets Fantasy French German History Horror Humour Interwar Irish Italian

LGBTQ Medieval Modernists Non-Fiction Philosophy Playwrights Pulp Religion Renaissance Romantics Russians Sci-Fi Scottish Spanish Thrillers Victorians War Poets

www.delphiclassics.com

Is there an author or artist you would like to see in a series? Contact us at sales@delphiclassics.com (or via the social network links below) and let us know!

Be the first to learn of new releases and special offers:

Join our Mailing List

Zentralfriedhof, Vienna, one of the largest cemeteries in the world by number of interred — Schnitzler's final resting place. He died on 21 October 1931 in Vienna of a brain haemorrhage.

Schnitzler's grave